START

Microfilmed By:

NORTHEAST DOCUMENT CONSERVATION CENTER
Andover, MA 01810

DECEMBER 1993

Camera Operator:
Kathy Wilder

MASTER NEGATIVE NUMBER: BSO-56-005

MICROFILMED
August 1993 - April 1994

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SCRAPBOOK MICROFILMING PROJECT

Funded in part by

THE NATIONAL ENDOWMENT FOR THE HUMANITIES

Grant No. PS-20709-93

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA MICROFILMING PROJECT

A Cooperative Project Between the Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives and the Boston Public Library (August 1993 - April 1994)

The Microfilming Project incorporates two collections of scrapbooks housed in two separate repositories. The first set of scrapbooks (80 volumes) resides within the Allen A. Brown Collection of the Boston Public Library (BPL) Music Department. Their call number is M.125.5. The second set of scrapbooks (132 volumes) resides within the Press Clippings collection of the Boston Symphony Orchestra (BSO) Archives. They have the designation Pres 56.

The BPL scrapbooks begin with the founding of the BSO in 1881 and continue, through 79 seasons, to 1960. Articles consist mainly of reviews and feature stories from Boston and New York newspapers. Occasionally, magazine articles and press releases are also included. The scrapbooks cover most aspects of the BSO.

The BSO scrapbooks run from 1889, the Orchestra's 9th season, to 1973. In addition to local reviews and features, the volumes contain articles culled from national and international publications. The scrapbooks document, in detail, all aspects of the BSO: The Symphony Orchestra (including subscription concerts, tours, and trips), the Boston Pops, the Tanglewood Festival, the Tanglewood Music Center, and Symphony Hall.

The two sets of scrapbooks have been filmed as two separate entities. Researchers wanting to look at specific seasons or subjects must examine both sets of films to ensure full coverage.

The scrapbooks do not represent the complete holdings of either location on the subject of the BSO.

Requests for positive microfilm copies of individual rolls, or of film sets, should be directed to the respective repository:

Music Department
Boston Public Library
Post Office Box 286
Boston, MA 02117

Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives
Symphony Hall
Boston, MA 02115

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SCRAPBOOKS

1889 - 1973

132 VOLUMES

Source: Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives

FINDING AID

Boston Symphony Orchestra Scrapbooks (Series 56, Sub-Series 1)

Source: Press Office (Office of the Public Relations Director)

The BSO scrapbooks comprise part of one series in the BSO Archives. Series 56, Press Clippings, is divided by format into 3 sub-series: 1) Scrapbooks, 1889-1973 (132 volumes); 2) Loose Clippings, 1931-1991 (9 record cartons); and 3) Oversize Newspapers and Journals, 1919-1979 (1 oversize box). Each sub-series is arranged chronologically.

The scrapbooks contain concert notices and reviews, record reviews, and feature articles. Early scrapbooks may also contain programs, tickets, and subscription orders. Materials are organized by concert season into the following categories: BSO (including tours); Kneisel Quartet (and later Boston Symphony Chamber Players); Boston Pops (referred to in early years as Promenade concerts); and Tanglewood (including the Tanglewood Music Center, the Tanglewood Festival, Tanglewood-on-Parade, and the Fromm Festival of Contemporary Music).

Reviews and articles cover a wide range of subjects: Founder H.L. Higginson; BSO conductors, players, trustees, and other personnel; guest artists and composers; BSO and Pops performances and recordings; U.S. and overseas tours; BSO/Cecilia Society joint performances; open rehearsals; and special events connected to anniversary celebrations and fundraising.

Feature stories document changes in the size, composition, and location of the orchestra. Topics include the hiring of women and minorities; the unionization of players; controversies (such as the internment of conductor Karl Muck during World War II); the sale of the old Music Hall; and the construction of Symphony Hall and other structures (such as the Koussevitsky Music Shed at Tanglewood).

Reproductions of the materials in the collection may not be made without permission from the Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives.

GUIDE TO CONTENTS

Institution: BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Series Name: PRESS CLIPPINGS
Series Number: 56
Series Dates: 1889-1991

Sub-series Name: SCRAPBOOKS
Sub-series Number: 1
Sub-series Dates: 1889-1973

VOLUME LISTING

VOL	TITLE	DATES
1	BSO	1889-1890
2	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1890-1891
3	BSO	1891-1892
4	Promenade (Pops)	1892
5	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1892-1893
6	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1893-1894
7	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1894-1895
8	BSO	1895-1896
9	Promenade (Pops)	1895-1896
10	BSO	1896-1897
11	BSO	1897-1898
12	Promenade (Pops)	1897-1898
13	BSO	1898-1899
14	BSO	1899-1900
15	Pops	1899-1900
16	BSO	1900-1901
17	BSO	1901-1902
18	Pops	1901-1903
19	BSO	1902-1903
20	BSO	1903-1904
21	BSO	1904-1905
22	Pops	1904-1905
23	BSO	1905-1906
24	BSO	1906-1907
25	BSO	1907-1908
26	BSO	1908-1909
27	BSO Pops	1909-1910
28	BSO Pops	1910-1911
29	BSO Advertisements	1910-1911
30	BSO Pops	1911-1912
31	BSO Pops	1912-1913
32	BSO Pops	1913-1914
33	BSO Pops	1914-1915
34	BSO Pops	1915-1916
35	BSO Pops	1916-1917
36	BSO Pops	1917-1918
37	Karl Muck	1918
38	BSO Pops	1918-1919
39	BSO Pops	1919-1920
40	BSO Advertisements	1919-1920
41	BSO Pops	1920-1921
42	BSO Pops	1921-1922
43	BSO BSO Advertisements Pops Advertisements	1922-1923
44	BSO Pops	1922-1924
45	BSO Pops	1924
46	BSO BSO Advertisements Pops Advertisements	1924-1926
47	BSO Pops	1925-1926
48	BSO Advertisements Pops Advertisements	1926-1927
49	BSO Pops	1926-1928
50	BSO	1928
51	BSO Pops	1928-1929
52	BSO Pops U.S. Tour	1929-1930
53	BSO	1930-1931
54	BSO Pops	1931-1932
55	BSO Pops	1932-1933
56	BSO	1933-1934
57	BSO	1934-1935
58	BSO	1935-1936
59	BSO	1936-1937

VOL	TITLE	DATES
60	Pops
	Tanglewood	1936-1937
61	BSO	1937
62	BSO	1937-1938
63	Pops
	Tanglewood	1938
64	BSO	1938-1939
65	Pops
	Tanglewood	1939
66	BSO	1939-1940
67	Tanglewood	1939-1941
68	BSO
	Pops	1940
69	BSO	1940-1941
70	Tanglewood	1940-1944
71	BSO	1941-1942
72	BSO	1942-1943
73	BSO	1943-1944
74	BSO
	Pops
	Tanglewood	1944-1945
75	BSO
	Pops
	Tanglewood	1945-1946
76	BSO
	Pops
	Tanglewood	1946-1947
77	Tanglewood	1947-1948
78	BSO	1947-1949
79	Tanglewood	1949-1950
80	BSO	1949-1951
81	Tanglewood	1950-1951
82	BSO
	Pops	1951-1952
83	BSO
	Pops	1952-1953
84	Tanglewood	1952-1953
85	BSO	1953-1955
86	Tanglewood	1953-1954
87	Tanglewood	1954-1955
88	BSO
	Pops	1955-1956
89	Tanglewood	1955-1956
90	Tanglewood	1955-1956
91	European Tour	1956
92	European Tour	1956-1957
93	BSO
	Pops	1956-1957
94	Tanglewood	1957
95	BSO	1957-1958
96	BSO
	Pops	1958-1959
97	BSO	1958-1959
98	Tanglewood	1958-1959
99	Tanglewood	1959
100	BSO
	Pops	1959-1960
101	Tanglewood	1959-1960
102	Far Eastern Tour	1959-1960
103	BSO
	Pops	1960-1961
104	Tanglewood	1961
105	BSO
	Pops	1961-1962
106	Tanglewood	1962
107	BSO
	Pops	1962-1963
108	Tanglewood	1963
109	BSO
	Pops	1963-1964
110	Tanglewood	1963-1964
111	BSO
	Pops	1964-1966
112	Tanglewood	1965
113	BSO 85th Anniversary	1965
114	BSO
	Pops	1965-1966
115	Tanglewood	1966
116	BSO
	Pops	1966-1967
117	Tanglewood	1967
118	BSO
	Pops	1967-1968
119	Tanglewood	1968-1969
120	BSO
	Pops	1968-1969
121	Tanglewood	1969
122	BSO
	Pops	1969-1970
123	Tanglewood	1970
124	BSO
	Pops	1970-1971
125	Tanglewood	1971
126	BSO
	Pops	1971-1972
127	European Tour	1970-1971
128	European Tour	1971
129	Tanglewood	1972
130	BSO
	Pops	1972-1973
131	Tanglewood	1973
132	BSO
	Pops	1973-1974

MATERIALS NOT FILMED

SUB-SERIES NUMBER	SUB-SERIES NAME	SUB-SERIES DATES
2	Loose Clippings	1931-1991
3	Oversize Newspapers and Journals	1919-1979

COPYRIGHT STATEMENT

The copyright law of the Unites States - Title 17, United States Code - concerns the making of photocopies or other reproductions of copyrighted material.

Under certain conditions specified in the law, libraries and archives are authorized to furnish a photocopy or other reproduction. One of these specified conditions is that the photocopy or other reproduction is not to be "used for any purpose other than private study, scholarship, or research." If a user makes a request for, or later uses, a photocopy or reproduction for purposes in excess of "fair use," that user may be liable for copyright infringement.

This institution reserves the right to refuse to accept a copy order if, in its judgment, fulfillment of the order would involve violation of the copyright law.

TECHNICAL DATA

IMAGE PLACEMENT: (IA) IB IIA IIB

REDUCTION RATION: 12X

FILM STOCK:

REEL 5

Volume 7-8

BSO, Kneisel
1894-1895
to BSO
1895-1896

2.5 mm
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

150 mm

100 mm

A5

A4

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

3.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

MULTIPLE EXPOSURES DUE TO COLOR VARIATIONS AND OVERLAPPING MATERIAL

VOLUME 7

BSO
KNEISEL QUARTET

1894 - 1895

SHIPMAN'S
Invoice & Scrap BOOK

MUSIC HALL. | BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

14th Season, 1894-95.

24 PUBLIC REHEARSALS

on Friday Afternoons, beginning Oct. 12 (omitting Nov. 2, Dec. 7, Jan. 11, Feb. 8, and March 15).

24 CONCERTS

on Saturday Evenings, beginning Oct. 13 (omitting Nov. 3, Dec. 8, Jan 12, Feb. 9, and March 16).

Soloists: Mesdames EAMES, JUCH, NORDICA, BEACH, Messrs. BEN DAVIES, YSAYE, CESAR, THOMSON, BAERMANN, HUSS, MOLE, KNEISEL, SCHROEDER, and others.

Tickets for the series of Concerts and for the series of Rehearsals, $12 and $7.50, according to location.

The $12 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, MONDAY, Sept. 24, at 10 A.M.
The $7.50 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, TUESDAY, Sept. 25, at 10 A.M.
The $12 Seats for the Concerts will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, on THURSDAY, Sept. 27, at 10 A.M.
The $7.50 Seats for the Concerts will be sold in like manner, at the same place, on FRIDAY, Sept. 28, at 10 A.M
Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.
Tickets will be delivered in the Hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be immediately resold.

HERALD - SEPTEMBER 16.

BOSTON MUSIC HALL.

FOURTEENTH SEASON.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR,

WILL GIVE A SERIES OF

TWENTY-FOUR CONCERTS

On Consecutive Saturday Evenings, from Oct. 13, 1894, to April 27, 1895, Omitting Nov. 3, Dec. 8, 1894, Jan. 12, Feb. 9 and March 16, 1895, and

TWENTY-FOUR PUBLIC REHEARSALS,

ON CONSECUTIVE FRIDAY AFTERNOONS, from Oct. 12, 1894, to April 26, 1895, Omitting Nov. 2, Dec. 7, 1894, Jan. 11, Feb. 8 and March 15, 1895.

SOLOISTS: Mmes. Eames, Juch, Beach, Messrs. Davies, Ysaye, Cesar Thomson, Baermann, Kneisel, Schroeder and Others.

TICKETS for the series of Concerts and for the series of Rehearsals, $12.00 and $7.50, according to location.

The $12 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, Monday, Sept. 24, at 10 A. M.
The $7.50 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, Tuesday, Sept. 25, at 10 A. M.
The $12 Seats for the Concerts will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, Thursday, Sept. 27, at 10 A. M.
The $7.50 Seats for the Concerts will be sold in like manner, at the same place, on Friday, Sept. 28, at 10 A. M.
Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

Tickets will be delivered in the hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought or they will be resold.

GLOBE—SUNDAY SEPTEMBER 16, 1894

BOSTON MUSIC HALL.

FOURTEENTH SEASON.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR,

WILL GIVE A SERIES OF

TWENTY-FOUR CONCERTS

On Consecutive Saturday Evenings, from Oct. 13, 1894, to April 27, 1895, Omitting Nov. 3, Dec. 8, 1894, Jan. 12, Feb. 9 and March 16, 1895, and

TWENTY-FOUR PUBLIC REHEARSALS,

ON CONSECUTIVE FRIDAY AFTERNOONS, from Oct. 12, 1894, to April 26, 1895, Omitting Nov. 2, Dec. 7, 1894, Jan. 11, Feb. 8 and March 15, 1895.

SOLOISTS: Mmes. Eames, Juch, Beach, Messrs. Davies, Ysay, Cesar, Thomson, Baermann, Kneisel, Schroeder and Others.

TICKETS for the series of Concerts and for the series of Rehearsals, $12.00 and $7.50, according to location.

The $12 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, Monday, Sept. 24, at 10 A. M.
The $7.50 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, Tuesday, Sept. 25, at 10 A. M.
The $12 Seats for the Concerts will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, Thursday, Sept. 27, at 10 A. M.
The $7.50 Seats for the Concerts will be sold in like manner, at the same place, on Friday, Sept. 28, at 10 A. M.
Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

Tickets will be delivered in the hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought or they will be resold.

TIMES, SUNDAY,

SEPTEMBER 16, 1894.

MUSIC HALL. | BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

14th Season, 1894-95.

24 PUBLIC REHEARSALS

on Friday Afternoons, beginning Oct. 12 (omitting Nov. 2, Dec. 7, Jan. 11, Feb. 8, and March 15).

24 CONCERTS

on Saturday Evenings, beginning Oct. 13, (omitting Nov. 3, Dec. 8, Jan. 12, Feb. 9, and March 16).

Tickets for the series of Concerts and for the series of Rehearsals, $12 and $7.50, according to the location.

The $12 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, MONDAY, Sept. 24, at 10 a. m.
The $7.50 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, TUESDAY, Sept. 25, at 10 a. m.
The $12 Seats for the Concerts will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, on THURSDAY Sept 27, at 10 a. m.
The $7 50 Seats for the Concerts will be sold in like manner, at the same place, on FRIDAY, Sept. 28, at 10 a m.
Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.
Tickets will be delivered in the Hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be immediately resold.

BOSTON POST.

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

MONDAY MORNING, SEPT. 17, 1894.

BOSTON MUSIC HALL.

FOURTEENTH SEASON.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR,

WILL GIVE A SERIES OF

TWENTY-FOUR CONCERTS

On Consecutive Saturday Evenings, from Oct. 13, 1894, to April 27, 1895, Omitting Nov. 3, Dec. 8, 1894, Jan. 12, Feb. 9 and March 16, 1895, and

TWENTY-FOUR PUBLIC REHEARSALS

On Consecutive Friday Afternoons, from Oct. 12, 1894, to April 26, 1895, Omitting Nov. 2, Dec. 7, 1894, Jan. 11, Feb. 8 and March 15, 1895.

SOLOISTS---Mmes. Eames, Juch, Beach, Messrs. Davies, Ysaye, Cesar, Thomson, Baermann, Kneisel, Schroeder and Others.

TICKETS for the Series of CONCERTS and for the Series of REHEARSALS, $12.00 and $7.50, According to Location.

The $12 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, Monday, Sept. 24, at 10 A. M.
The $7.50 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, Tuesday, Sept. 25, at 10 A. M.
The $12 Seats for the Concerts will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, Thursday, Sept. 27, at 10 A. M.
The $7.50 Seats for the Concerts will be sold in like manner, at the same place, on Friday, Sept. 28, at 10 A. M.
Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.
Tickets will be delivered in the hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought or they will be resold.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, SEPT. 16.

MUSIC HALL. | BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

14th Season, 1894-95.

24 PUBLIC REHEARSALS.

on Friday Afternoons, beginning Oct. 12 (omitting Nov. 2, Dec. 7, Jan. 11, Feb. 8, and March 15).

24 CONCERTS

On Saturday evenings, beginning Oct. 13 (omitting Nov. 3, Dec. 8, Jan. 12, Feb. 9, and and March 16).

Tickets for the series of Concerts and for the series of Rehearsals, $12 and $7.50, according to location.

The $12 seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, MONDAY, Sept. 24, at 10 A. M.
The $7.50 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, TUESDAY, Sept. 25, at 10 A.M.
The $12 Seats for the Concerts will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, on THURSDAY, Sept. 27, at 10 A. M.
The $7.50 Seats for the Concerts will be sold in like manner, at the same place, on FRIDAY. Sept. 28, at 10 A. M.
Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.
Tickets will be delivered in the Hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be immediately resold,

[2]

MUSIC HALL. | BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

14th Season, 1894-95.

24 PUBLIC REHEARSALS

on Friday Afternoons, beginning Oct. 12 (omitting Nov. 2, Dec. 7, Jan. 11, Feb. 8, and March 15).

24 CONCERTS

on Saturday Evenings, beginning Oct. 18 (omitting Nov. 3, Dec. 8, Jan 12, Feb. 9, and March 16).

Soloists: Mesdames EAMES, JUCH, NORDICA, BEACH, Messrs. BEN DAVIES, YSAYE, CESAR, THOMSON, BAERMANN, HUSS, MOLE, KNEISEL, SCHROEDER, and others.

Tickets for the series of Concerts and for the series of Rehearsals, $12 and $7.50, according to location.

The $12 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, MONDAY, Sept. 24, at 10 A.M.
The $7 50 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, TUESDAY, Sept. 25, at 10 A.M.
The $12 Seats for the Concerts will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, on THURSDAY, Sept. 27, at 10 A.M.
The $7.50 Seats for the Concerts will be sold in like manner, at the same place, on FRIDAY, Sept. 28, at 10 A.M
Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.
Tickets will be delivered in the Hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be immediately resold.

SUNDAY HERALD - SEPTEMBER 16.

BOSTON MUSIC HALL.

FOURTEENTH SEASON.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR,

WILL GIVE A SERIES OF

TWENTY-FOUR CONCERTS

On Consecutive Saturday Evenings, from Oct. 13, 1894, to April 27, 1895, Omitting Nov. 3, Dec. 8, 1894, Jan. 12, Feb. 9 and March 16, 1895, and

TWENTY-FOUR PUBLIC REHEARSALS,

ON CONSECUTIVE FRIDAY AFTERNOONS, from Oct. 12, 1894, to April 26, 1895, Omitting Nov. 2, Dec. 7, 1894, Jan. 11, Feb. 8 and March 15, 1895.

SOLOISTS: Mmes. Eames, Juch, Beach, Messrs. Davies, Ysaye, Cesar Thomson, Baermann, Kneisel, Schroeder and Others.

TICKETS for the series of Concerts and for the series of Rehearsals, $12.00 and $7.50, according to location.

The $12 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, Monday, Sept. 24, at 10 A. M.
The $7.50 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, Tuesday, Sept. 25, at 10 A. M.
The $12 Seats for the Concerts will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, Thursday, Sept. 27, at 10 A. M.
The $7.50 Seats for the Concerts will be sold in like manner, at the same place, on Friday, Sept. 28, at 10 A. M.
Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

Tickets will be delivered in the hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought or they will be resold.

GLOBE—SUNDAY SEPTEMBER 16, 1894.

BOSTON MUSIC HALL.

FOURTEENTH SEASON.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR,

WILL GIVE A SERIES OF

TWENTY-FOUR CONCERTS

On Consecutive Saturday Evenings, from Oct. 13, 1894, to April 27, 1895, Omitting Nov. 3, Dec. 8, 1894, Jan. 12, Feb. 9 and March 16, 1895, and

TWENTY-FOUR PUBLIC REHEARSALS,

ON CONSECUTIVE FRIDAY AFTERNOONS, from Oct. 12, 1894, to April 26, 1895, Omitting Nov. 2, Dec. 7, 1894, Jan. 11, Feb. 8 and March 15, 1895.

SOLOISTS: Mmes. Eames, Juch, Beach, Messrs. Davies, Ysay, Cesar, Thomson, Baermann, Kneisel, Schroeder and Others.

TICKETS for the series of Concerts and for the series of Rehearsals, $12.00 and $7.50, according to location.

The $12 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, Monday, Sept. 24, at 10 A. M.
The $7.50 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, Tuesday, Sept. 25, at 10 A. M.
The $12 Seats for the Concerts will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, Thursday, Sept. 27, at 10 A. M.
The $7.50 Seats for the Concerts will be sold in like manner, at the same place, on Friday, Sept. 28, at 10 A. M.
Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

Tickets will be delivered in the hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought or they will be resold.

TIMES, SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 16, 1894.

MUSIC HALL. | BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

14th Season, 1894-95.

24 PUBLIC REHEARSALS

on Friday Afternoons, beginning Oct. 12 (omitting Nov. 2, Dec. 7, Jan. 11, Feb. 8, and March 15).

24 CONCERTS

on Saturday Evenings, beginning Oct. 13, (omitting Nov. 3, Dec. 8, Jan. 12, Feb. 9, and March 16).

Tickets for the series of Concerts and for the series of Rehearsals, $12 and $7.50, according to the location.

The $12 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, MONDAY, Sept. 24, at 10 a. m.
The $7.50 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, TUESDAY, Sept. 25, at 10 a. m.
The $12 Seats for the Concerts will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, on THURSDAY Sept 27, at 10 a. m.
The $7 50 Seats for the Concerts will be sold in like manner, at the same place, on FRIDAY, Sept. 28, at 10 a m.
Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.
Tickets will be delivered in the Hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be immediately resold.

BOSTON POST.

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

MONDAY MORNING, SEPT. 17, 1894.

BOSTON MUSIC HALL.

FOURTEENTH SEASON.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR,

WILL GIVE A SERIES OF

TWENTY-FOUR CONCERTS

On Consecutive Saturday Evenings, from Oct. 13, 1894, to April 27, 1895, Omitting Nov. 3, Dec. 8, 1894, Jan. 12, Feb. 9 and March 16, 1895, and

TWENTY-FOUR PUBLIC REHEARSALS

On Consecutive Friday Afternoons, from Oct. 12, 1894, to April 26, 1895, Omitting Nov. 2, Dec. 7, 1894, Jan. 11, Feb. 8 and March 15, 1895.

SOLOISTS---Mmes. Eames, Juch, Beach, Messrs. Davies, Ysaye, Cesar, Thomson, Baermann, Kneisel, Schroeder and Others.

TICKETS for the Series of CONCERTS and for the Series of REHEARSALS, $12.00 and $7.50, According to Location.

The $12 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, Monday, Sept. 24, at 10 A. M.
The $7.50 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, Tuesday, Sept. 25, at 10 A. M.
The $12 Seats for the Concerts will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, Thursday, Sept. 27, at 10 A. M.
The $7.50 Seats for the Concerts will be sold in like manner, at the same place, on Friday, Sept. 28, at 10 A. M.
Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

Tickets will be delivered in the hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought or they will be resold.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, SEPT. 16.

MUSIC HALL. | BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

14th Season, 1894-95.

24 PUBLIC REHEARSALS.

on Friday Afternoons, beginning Oct. 12 (omitting Nov. 2, Dec. 7, Jan. 11, Feb. 8, and March 15).

24 CONCERTS

On Saturday evenings, beginning Oct. 18 (omitting Nov. 3, Dec. 8, Jan. 12, Feb. 9, and and March 16).

Tickets for the series of Concerts and for the series of Rehearsals, $12 and $7.50, according to location.

The $12 seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, MONDAY, Sept. 24, at 10 A. M
The $7.50 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, TUESDAY, Sept. 25, at 10 A.M.
The $12 Seats for the Concerts will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, on THURSDAY, Sept. 27, at 10 A. M.
The $7.50 Seats for the Concerts will be sold in like manner, at the same place, on FRIDAY. Sept. 28, at 10 A. M.
Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.
Tickets will be delivered in the Hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be immediately resold,

---

[2]

BOSTON
MUSIC HALL

FOURTEENTH SEASON,
. . 1894-95 . .

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR.

TWENTY-FOUR CONCERTS

ON CONSECUTIVE SATURDAY EVENINGS, FROM OCTOBER 13, 1894, TO APRIL 27, 1895, OMITTING NOV. 3, DEC. 8, 1894, JAN. 12, FEB. 9, AND MARCH 16, 1895, AND

TWENTY-FOUR PUBLIC REHEARSALS

ON CONSECUTIVE FRIDAY AFTERNOONS, FROM OCTOBER 12, 1894, TO APRIL 26, 1895, OMITTING NOV. 2, DEC. 7, 1894, JAN. 11, FEB. 8, AND MARCH 15, 1895.

Soloists: Mmes. EAMES, JUCH, BEACH, Messrs. YSAYE, CÉSAR THOMSON, BEN DAVIES, BAERMANN, MOLÉ, KNEISEL, SCHROEDER, and Others.

TICKETS for the series of Concerts and for the series of Rehearsals, $12.00 and $7.50, according to location.

The $12 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, MONDAY, September 24, at 10 A.M.

The $7.50 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, TUESDAY, September 25th, at 10 A.M.

The $12 Seats for the Concerts will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, on THURSDAY, September 27th, at 10 A.M.

The $7.50 Seats for the Concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place, on FRIDAY, September 28th, at 10 A.M.

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

Tickets will be delivered in the Hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be immediately resold.

Gazette
SUNDAY MORNING EDITION.
BOSTON, SEPT. 23, 1894

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MR. EMIL PAUR . . . Conductor.

14th Season.

Auction Sale of $12 seats for the Friday afternoon Public Rehearsals, at Music Hall, tomorrow (Monday) morning, at ten o'clock continuing through the day.

Auction sale of $7.50 seats for Friday afternoon Public Rehearsals, Tuesday, Sept. 25. Auction sale of $12 seats for Concerts, Thursday, Sept. 27. Auction sale of $7.50 concert seats, Friday, Sept. 28.

Boston Commonwealth.
SEPTEMBER 22, 1894

BOSTON Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.
FOURTEENH SEASON.

Auction Sale of $12 seats for the Friday afternoon public rehersals at Music Hall, Monday morning, at 10 o'clock, continuing through the day.

Auction Sale of $7.50 seats for the Friday afternoon public rehersals Tuesday, Sept. 25. Auction Sale of $12 seats for Concerts Thursday Sept. 27th. Auction Sale of $7.50 Concert seats Friday, Sept. 28.

The Boston Commercial
SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 22, 1894.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

FOURTEENTH SEASON.

Auction sale of $12 seats for the Friday Afternoon Public Rehearsals at Music Hall MONDAY MORNING, beginning at 10 o'clock.

Auction sale of $7.50 seats for the Friday Afternoon Public Rehearsals TUESDAY, Sept. 25.

Auction sale of $12 seats for Concerts THURSDAY, Sept. 27.

Auction sale of $7.50 seats for Concerts FRIDAY, Sept. 28.

BOSTON COURIER,
SUNDAY MORNING,
SEPTEMBER 23, 1894.

MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. EMIL PAUR. Conductor.

14th Season, 1894-5.

24 PUBLIC REHEARSALS

on Friday Afternoons, beginning Oct. 12, (omitting Nov. 2, Dec. 7, Jan. 11, Feb. 8, and March 15).

24 CONCERTS

on Saturday Evenings, beginning Oct. 13, (omitting Nov. 3, Dec. 8, Jan. 12, Feb. 9 and March 16),

SOLOISTS: Mmes. Eames, Juch, Beach, Messrs. Ysaye, Cesar, Thomson, Ben Davies, Baermann, Mole, Kneisel, Schroeder, Huss, and Others.

Tickets for the series of Concerts and for the series of Rehearsals, $12 and $7.50, according to location.

The $12 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction at Music Hall, MONDAY, Sept. 24, at 10 A. M.

The $7.50 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, TUESDAY, Sept. 25, at 10 A.M.

The $12 Seats for the Concerts will be sold at auction at Music Hall, on THURSDAY, Sept. 27, at 10 A.M.

The $7.50 Seats for the Concerts will be sold in like manner, at the same place, on FRIDAY, Sept. 28, at 10 A. M.

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

Tickets will be delivered in the Hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be immediately resold.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
MONDAY MORNING, SEPT. 17, 1894.

MUSIC HALL. BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

14th Season, 1894-95.

24 PUBLIC REHEARSALS

on Friday Afternoons, beginning Oct. 12 (omitting Nov. 2, Dec. 7, Jan. 11, Feb. 8, and March 15).

24 CONCERTS

on Saturday Evenings, beginning Oct. 13 (omitting Nov. 4, Dec. 8, Jan. 12, Feb. 9, and March 16).

Soloists: Mesdames EAMES, JUCH, BEACH, Messrs. BEN DAVIES, YSAYE, CESAR, THOMSON, BAERMANN, MOLE, KNEISEL, SCHROEDER, and others.

Tickets for the series of Concerts and for the series of Rehearsals, $12 and $7.50, according to location.

The $12 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, MONDAY, Sept. 24, at 10 A.M.

The $7.50 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, TUESDAY, Sept. 25, at 10 A.M.

The $12 Seats for the Concerts will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, on THURSDAY, Sept. 27, at 10 A.M.

The $7.50 Seats for the Concerts will be sold in like manner, at the same place, on FRIDAY, Sept. 28, at 10 A.M.

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

Tickets will be delivered in the Hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be immediately resold.

It&

SALE OF SYMPHONY CONCERT TICKETS.

One week from today the sale of season tickets for the series of public rehearsals and concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra opens in Music Hall. For 13 seasons this organization has given each year 24 public rehearsals on Friday afternoons and 24 concerts on Saturday evenings. The same number will be given this year. Among the soloists already engaged are Mesdames Eames, Juch, Beach, Messrs. Ysaye, Thomson, Baermann, Mole, Kneisel, Schroeder and others.

JOURNAL-
-SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 16, 1894

BOSTON MUSIC HALL.

FOURTEENTH SEASON.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR,
WILL GIVE A SERIES OF

TWENTY-FOUR CONCERTS

On Consecutive Saturday Evenings, From Oct. 13, 1894, to April 27, 1895, Omitting Nov. 3, Dec. 8, 1894, Jan. 12, Feb. 9 and March 16, 1895, and

TWENTY-FOUR PUBLIC REHEARSALS,

ON CONSECUTIVE FRIDAY AFTERNOONS from Oct. 12, 1894, to April 26, 1895, Omitting Nov. 2, Dec. 7, 1894, Jan. 11, Feb. 8 and March 15, 1895.

SOLOISTS: Mmes. Eames, Juch, Beach, Messrs. Davies, Ysaye, Cesar Thomson, Baerman, Kneisel, Schroeder and Others.

TICKETS for the series of Concerts and for the series of Rehearsals, $12.00 and $7.50, according to location.

The $12 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, Monday, Sept. 24, at 10 A. M.
The $7.50 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, Tuesday, Sept. 25, at 10 A. M.
The $12 Seats for the Concerts will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, Thursday, Sept. 27, at 10 A. M.
The $7.50 Seats for the Concerts will be sold in like manner, at the same place, on Friday, Sept. 28, at 10 A. M.

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

Tickets will be delivered in the hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought or they will be resold.

[3]

BOSTON
MUSIC HALL

FOURTEENTH SEASON,
. . 1894-95 . .

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR.

TWENTY-FOUR CONCERTS

ON CONSECUTIVE SATURDAY EVENINGS, FROM OCTOBER 13, 1894, TO APRIL 27, 1895, OMITTING NOV. 3, DEC. 8, 1894, JAN. 12, FEB. 9, AND MARCH 16, 1895, AND

TWENTY-FOUR PUBLIC REHEARSALS

ON CONSECUTIVE FRIDAY AFTERNOONS, FROM OCTOBER 12, 1894, TO APRIL 26, 1895, OMITTING NOV. 2, DEC. 7, 1894, JAN. 11, FEB. 8, AND MARCH 15, 1895.

Soloists: Mmes. EAMES, JUCH, BEACH, Messrs. YSAYE, CÉSAR THOMSON, BEN DAVIES, BAERMANN, MOLÉ, KNEISEL, SCHROEDER, and Others.

TICKETS for the series of Concerts and for the series of Rehearsals, $12.00 and $7.50, according to location.

The $12 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, MONDAY, September 24, at 10 A.M.

The $7.50 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, TUESDAY, September 25th, at 10 A.M.

The $12 Seats for the Concerts will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, on THURSDAY, September 27th, at 10 A.M.

The $7.50 Seats for the Concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place, on FRIDAY, September 28th, at 10 A.M.

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

Tickets will be delivered in the Hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be immediately resold.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
MONDAY MORNING, SEPT. 17, 1894.

MUSIC HALL. BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.
Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.
14th Season, 1894-95.
24 PUBLIC REHEARSALS
on Friday Afternoons, beginning Oct. 12 (omitting Nov. 2, Dec. 7, Jan. 11, Feb. 8, and March 15).
24 CONCERTS
on Saturday Evenings, beginning Oct. 13 (omitting Nov. 4, Dec. 8, Jan. 12, Feb. 9, and March 16).

Soloists: Mesdames EAMES, JUCH, BEACH, Messrs. BEN DAVIES, YSAYE, CESAR, THOMSON, BAERMANN, MOLE, KNEISEL, SCHROEDER, and others.

Tickets for the series of Concerts and for the series of Rehearsals, $12 and $7.50, according to location.

The $12 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, MONDAY, Sept. 24, at 10 A.M.
The $7.50 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, TUESDAY, Sept. 25, at 10 A.M.
The $12 Seats for the Concerts will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, on THURSDAY, Sept. 27, at 10 A.M.
The $7.50 Seats for the Concerts will be sold in like manner, at the same place, on FRIDAY, Sept. 28, at 10 A.M.
Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.
Tickets will be delivered in the Hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be immediately resold. 1t&

SALE OF SYMPHONY CONCERT TICKETS.

One week from today the sale of season tickets for the series of public rehearsals and concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra opens in Music Hall. For 13 seasons this organization has given each year 24 public rehearsals on Friday afternoons and 24 concerts on Saturday evenings. The same number will be given this year. Among the soloists already engaged are Mesdames Eames, Juch, Beach, Messrs. Davies, Ysaye, Thomson, Baermann, Mole, Kneisel, Schroeder and others.

Gazette
SUNDAY MORNING EDITION.
BOSTON, SEPT. 23, 1894

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MR. EMIL PAUR . . . Conductor.

14th Season.

Auction Sale of $12 seats for the Friday afternoon Public Rehearsals, at Music Hall, tomorrow (Monday) morning, at ten o'clock continuing through the day.

Auction sale of $7.50 seats for Friday afternoon Public Rehearsals, Tuesday, Sept. 25. Auction sale of $12 seats for Concerts, Thursday, Sept. 27. Auction sale of $7.50 concert seats, Friday, Sept. 28.

Boston Commonwealth.
SEPTEMBER 22, 1894

BOSTON Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.
FOURTEENH SEASON.

Auction Sale of $12 seats for the Friday afternoon public rehersals at Music Hall, Monday morning, at 10 o'clock, continuing through the day.

Auction Sale of $7.50 seats for the Friday afternoon public rehersals Tuesday, Sept. 25. Auction Sale of $12 seats for Concerts Thursday Sept. 27th. Auction Sale of $7.50 Concert seats Friday, Sept. 28.

The Boston Commercial
SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 22, 1894.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

FOURTEENTH SEASON.

Auction sale of $12 seats for the Friday Afternoon Public Rehearsals at Music Hall MONDAY MORNING, beginning at 10 o'clock.

Auction sale of $7.50 seats for the Friday Afternoon Public Rehearsals TUESDAY, Sept. 25.

Auction sale of $12 seats for Concerts THURSDAY, Sept. 27.

Auction sale of $7.50 seats for Concerts FRIDAY, Sept. 28.

BOSTON COURIER, SUNDAY MORNING, SEPTEMBER 23, 1894.

MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. EMIL PAUR. Conductor.
14th Season, 1894-5.

24 PUBLIC REHEARSALS
on Friday Afternoons, beginning Oct. 12, (omitting Nov. 2, Dec. 7, Jan. 11, Feb. 8, and March 15).

24 CONCERTS
on Saturday Evenings, beginning Oct. 13, (omitting Nov. 3, Dec. 8, Jan. 12, Feb. 9 and March 16),

SOLOISTS: Mmes. Eames, Juch, Beach, Messrs. Ysaye, Cesar, Thomson, Ben Davies, Baermann, Mole, Kneisel, Schroeder, Huss, and Others.

Tickets for the series of Concerts and for the series of Rehearsals, $12 and $7.50, according to location.

The $12 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction at Music Hall, MONDAY, Sept. 24, at 10 A. M.

The $7.50 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, TUESDAY, Sept. 25, at 10 A.M.

The $12 Seats for the Concerts will be sold at auction at Music Hall, on THURSDAY, Sept. 27, at 10 A.M.

The $7.50 Seats for the Concerts will be sold in like manner, at the same place, on FRIDAY, Sept. 28, at 10 A. M.

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

Tickets will be delivered in the Hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be immediately resold.

JOURNAL-
-SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 16, 1894.

BOSTON MUSIC HALL.

FOURTEENTH SEASON.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR,
WILL GIVE A SERIES OF

TWENTY-FOUR CONCERTS

On Consecutive Saturday Evenings, From Oct. 13, 1894, to April 27, 1895, Omitting Nov. 3, Dec. 8, 1894, Jan. 12, Feb. 9 and March 16, 1895, and

TWENTY-FOUR PUBLIC REHEARSALS,

ON CONSECUTIVE FRIDAY AFTERNOONS from Oct. 12, 1894, to April 26, 1895, Omitting Nov. 2, Dec. 7, 1894, Jan. 11, Feb. 8 and March 15, 1895.

SOLOISTS: Mmes. Eames, Juch, Beach, Messrs. Davies, Ysaye, Cesar Thomson, Baerman, Kneisel, Schroeder and Others.

TICKETS for the series of Concerts and for the series of Rehearsals, $12.00 and $7.50, according to location.

The $12 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, Monday, Sept. 24, at 10 A. M.
The $7.50 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, Tuesday, Sept. 25, at 10 A. M.
The $12 Seats for the Concerts will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, Thursday, Sept. 27, at 10 A. M.
The $7.50 Seats for the Concerts will be sold in like manner, at the same place, on Friday, Sept. 28, at 10 A. M.
Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

Tickets will be delivered in the hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought or they will be resold.

[3]

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

FOURTEENTH SEASON, 1894-95.

Auction Sale of $12 Seats for the Friday Afternoon Public Rehearsals at Music Hall Tomorrow (Monday), Beginning at 10 o'clock.

Auction Sale of $7.50 Seats for Rehearsals, Tuesday, Sept. 25, at 10 A. M.
Auction Sale of 12.00 Seats for Concerts, Thursday, Sept. 27, at 10 A. M.
Auction Sale of 7.50 Seats for Concerts, Friday, Sept. 28, at 10 A. M.

BOSTON JOURNAL—SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 23, 1894.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

FOURTEENTH SEASON, 1894-95.

Auction Sale of $12 Seats for the Friday Afternoon Public Rehearsals at Music Hall Tomorrow (Monday), Beginning at 10 o'clock.

Auction Sale of $7.50 Seats for Rehearsals, Tuesday, Sept. 25, at 10 A. M.
Auction Sale of 12.00 Seats for Concerts, Thursday, Sept. 27, at 10 A. M.
Auction Sale of 7.50 Seats for Concerts, Friday, Sept. 28, at 10 A. M.

GLOBE—SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 23, 1894.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

FOURTEENTH SEASON, 1894-95.

Auction Sale of $12 Seats for the Friday Afternoon Public Rehearsals at Music Hall Tomorrow (Monday), Beginning at 10 o'clock.

Auction Sale of $7.50 Seats for Rehearsals, Tuesday, Sept. 25, at 10 A. M.
Auction Sale of 12.00 Seats for Concerts, Thursday, Sept. 27, at 10 A. M.
Auction Sale of 7.50 Seats for Concerts, Friday, Sept. 28, at 10 A. M.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

FOURTEENTH SEASON, 1894-95.

Auction Sale of $12 Seats for the Friday Afternoon Public Rehearsals at Music Hall Tomorrow (Monday), Beginning at 10 o'clock.

Auction Sale of $7.50 Seats for Rehearsals, Tuesday, Sept. 25, at 10 A. M.
Auction Sale of 12.00 Seats for Concerts, Thursday, Sept. 27, at 10 A. M.
Auction Sale of 7.50 Seats for Concerts, Friday, Sept. 28, at 10 A. M.

SUNDAY MORNING, SEPT. 23, 1894.

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

BOSTON POST.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

BOSTON, September 24th, 1894.

Auction Sale of $12 Season Tickets for the Friday Afternoon PUBLIC REHEARSALS at Music Hall, this (Monday) morning, beginning at TEN o'clock.

THE SUNDAY HERALD — BOSTON, SEPTEMBER 23, 1894

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

FOURTEENTH SEASON, 1894-95.

Auction Sale of $12 Seats for the Friday Afternoon Public Rehearsals at Music Hall Tomorrow (Monday), Beginning at 10 o'clock.

Auction Sale of $7.50 Seats for Rehearsals, Tuesday, Sept. 25, at 10 A. M.
Auction Sale of 12.00 Seats for Concerts, Thursday, Sept. 27, at 10 A. M.
Auction Sale of 7.50 Seats for Concerts, Friday, Sept. 28, at 10 A. M.

BOSTON JOURNAL---SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 23, 1894.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

FOURTEENTH SEASON, 1894-95.

Auction Sale of $12 Seats for the Friday Afternoon Public Rehearsals at Music Hall Tomorrow (Monday), Beginning at 10 o'clock.

Auction Sale of $7.50 Seats for Rehearsals, Tuesday, Sept. 25, at 10 A. M.
Auction Sale of 12 00 Seats for Concerts, Thursday, Sept. 27, at 10 A. M.
Auction Sale of 7.50 Seats for Concerts, Friday, Sept. 28, at 10 A. M.

GLOBE—SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 23, 1894-

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

FOURTEENTH SEASON, 1894-95.

Auction Sale of $12 Seats for the Friday Afternoon Public Rehearsals at Music Hall Tomorrow (Monday), Beginning at 10 o'clock.

Auction Sale of $7.50 Seats for Rehearsals, Tuesday, Sept. 25, at 10 A. M.
Auction Sale of 12.00 Seats for Concerts, Thursday, Sept. 27, at 10 A. M.
Auction Sale of 7.50 Seats for Concerts, Friday, Sept. 28, at 10 A. M.

BOSTON POST.
The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.
SUNDAY MORNING, SEPT. 23, 1894.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

FOURTEENTH SEASON, 1894-95.

Auction Sale of $12 Seats for the Friday Afternoon Public Rehearsals at Music Hall Tomorrow (Monday), Beginning at 10 o'clock.

Auction Sale of $7.50 Seats for Rehearsals, Tuesday, Sept. 25, at 10 A. M.
Auction Sale of 12.00 Seats for Concerts, Thursday, Sept. 27, at 10 A. M.
Auction Sale of 7.50 Seats for Concerts, Friday, Sept. 28, at 10 A. M.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

BOSTON, September 24th, 1894.

Auction Sale of $12 Season Tickets for the Friday Afternoon PUBLIC REHEARSALS at Music Hall, this (Monday) morning, beginning at TEN o'clock.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.
SEASON 1894-95.
REHEARSALS. 265
No.
Premium
Name,

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.
SEASON 1894-95. 625
REHEARSALS.
No.
Premium,
Name,

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.
SEASON 1894-95.
CONCERTS. 701
No.
Premium,
Name,

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.
SEASON 1894-95.
CONCERTS. 426
No.
Premium,
Name,

X
M

Boston Music Hall
Boston Symphony Orchestra
Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor
Tuesday Afternoon, January 29
At 2.30
- - ADMIT ONE - -
C. A. ELLIS, Manager

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR.

... FOURTEENTH SEASON, 1894-95 ...

TEN CONCERTS IN SANDERS THEATRE, CAMBRIDGE

Thursday Evening, October 18.
Thursday Evening, November 8.
Thursday Evening, November 22.
Thursday Evening, December 13.
Thursday Evening, January 3.
Thursday Evening, January 24.
Thursday Evening, February 14.
Thursday Evening, March 7.
Thursday Evening, April 4.
Thursday Evening, April 25.

SOLO ARTISTS:

MRS. JULIE M. WYMAN.
MR. BEN DAVIES.
MR. E. A. MAC DOWELL.
MR. T. ADAMOWSKI.
MR. EUGENE YSAYE.
And others to be announced.

Season tickets, with reserved seats for the series of ten concerts, $7.50.

☞The sale of season tickets opens at the University Bookstore, Cambridge, Saturday, October 13, at 8 A.M.

A limited number of reserved seats have been reserved for College Officers and invited guests.

Pawtucket Tribune

PAWTUCKET, THURSDAY, OCT. 11, 1894.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,
MR. EMIL PAUR.....Conductor.
FOURTEENTH SEASON 1894-95
6 GRAND CONCERTS
IN INFANTRY HALL, PROVIDENCE.
WEDNESDAY EVENINGS,
Oct. 24, Nov. 14, Dec. 19, Jan. 16, Feb. 20 and March 20.

SOLO ARTISTS—MME. JULIE M. WYMAN, MISS GERTRUDE FRANKLIN, MONS POL PLANÇON (the distinguished Baritone of Abbey, Schoeffel & Grau's Opera Co.), MR. CARL GAERMANN, MR. CESAR THOMSON (the famous Belgian Violinist), and others.

Season tickets, with reserved seats, for the series of six concerts, $5. Programme books, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed, will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets.

The sale of season tickets will open at the Box Office, Infantry Hall, Monday Morning, Oct. 15, at 9 o'clock. To secure a fair distribution of seats no more than ten tickets will be sold to one person. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
o9 6t

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

SEASON 1894-95.

REHEARSALS. 265

No.

Premium.

Name,

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

SEASON 1894-95. 625

REHEARSALS.

No.

Premium,

Name,

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

SEASON 1894-95.

CONCERTS. 701

No.

Premium,

Name,

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

SEASON 1894-95. 426

CONCERTS.

No.

Premium,

Name,

X

M

Boston Music Hall

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor

Tuesday Afternoon, January 29

At 2.30

- - ADMIT ONE - -

C. A. ELLIS, Manager

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR.

... FOURTEENTH SEASON, 1894-95 ...

TEN CONCERTS IN SANDERS THEATRE, CAMBRIDGE

Thursday Evening, October 18.

Thursday Evening, November 8.

Thursday Evening, November 22.

Thursday Evening, December 13.

Thursday Evening, January 3.

Thursday Evening, January 24.

Thursday Evening, February 14.

Thursday Evening, March 7.

Thursday Evening, April 4.

Thursday Evening, April 25.

SOLO ARTISTS:

MRS. JULIE M. WYMAN.
MR. T. ADAMOWSKI.
MR. BEN DAVIES.
MR. EUGENE YSAYE.
MR. E. A. MAC DOWELL.
And others to be announced.

Season tickets, with reserved seats for the series of ten concerts, $7.50.

☞The sale of season tickets opens at the University Bookstore, Cambridge, Saturday, October 13, at 8 A.M.

A limited number of reserved seats have been reserved for College Officers and invited guests.

Pawtucket Tribune

PAWTUCKET, THURSDAY, OCT 11, 1894.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,
MR. EMIL PAUR.....Conductor.
FOURTEENTH SEASON 1894-95
6 GRAND CONCERTS
IN INFANTRY HALL, PROVIDENCE.
WEDNESDAY EVENINGS,
Oct. 24, Nov. 14, Dec. 19, Jan. 16, Feb. 20 and March 20.

SOLO ARTISTS—MME. JULIE M. WYMAN, MISS GERTRUDE FRANKLIN, MONS POL PLANÇON (the distinguished Baritone of Abbey, Schoeffel & Grau's Opera Co.), MR. CARL GAERMANN, MR. CESAR THOMSON (the famous Belgian Violinist), and others.

Season tickets, with reserved seats, for the series of six concerts, $5. Programme books, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed, will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets.

The sale of season tickets will open at the Box Office, Infantry Hall, Monday Morning, Oct. 15, at 9 o'clock. To secure a fair distribution of seats no more than ten tickets will be sold to one person. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

o9 6t

The following works will be included in the programmes: —

SYMPHONY No. 7,	Beethoven
SYMPHONY No. 8,	Beethoven
SYMPHONY IN G MAJOR,	Haydn
SYMPHONY IN C MAJOR,	Schumann
ITALIAN SYMPHONY,	Mendelssohn
SYMPHONY IN E MINOR, No. 4,	Brahms
SYMPHONY IN D (first time),	Sgambati
SYMPHONY, "From the New World,"	Dvorak
OVERTURE, "Fidelio,"	Beethoven
" "Magic Flute,"	Mozart
" "Carlo Broski,"	Auber
" "Hebrides,"	Mendelssohn
" "Genoveva,"	Schumann
" "Carnaval Romain,"	Berlioz
TRAGIC OVERTURE,	Brahms
OVERTURE, "Carnaval" (new),	Dvorak
OVERTURE, "Sappho" (new),	Goldmark
PRELUDE, "The Deluge,"	Saint-Saëns
PASSACAGLIA,	Bach
CONCERTO GROSSO,	Handel
ENTR'ACTE ROSAMUNDE,	Schubert
OVERTURE, Scherzo, Notturno, and Wedding March from the "Midsummer-Night's Dream,	Mendelssohn
SUITE,	Lachner
SYMPHONIC POEM,	Smetana
BALLET MUSIC, "Daemon,"	Rubinstein
SUITE L'ARLESIENNE,	Bizet
SEEBILDER,	Paine
VARIATIONS FOR ORCHESTRA,	Knorr

One concert will be devoted entirely to a Wagner programme.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

SEASON 1894-95.

CONCERTS.

426

No. .....

Premium, ...

Name, ...

Pawtucket Tribune

PAWTUCKET, THURSDAY, OCT. 11, 1894.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. EMIL PAUR.....Conductor.

FOURTEENTH SEASON 1894-95

6 GRAND CONCERTS

IN INFANTRY HALL, PROVIDENCE.

WEDNESDAY EVENINGS,

Oct. 24, Nov. 14, Dec. 19, Jan. 16, Feb. 20 and March 20.

SOLO ARTISTS—MME. JULIE M. WYMAN, MISS GERTRUDE FRANKLIN, MONS POL PLANÇON (the distinguished Baritone of Abbey, Schoeffel & Grau's Opera Co.), MR. CARL GAERMANN, MR. CESAR THOMSON (the famous Belgian Violinist), and others.

Season tickets, with reserved seats, for the series of six concerts, $5. Programme books, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed, will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets.

The sale of season tickets will open at the Box Office, Infantry Hall, Monday Morning, Oct. 15, at 9 o'clock. To secure a fair distribution of seats no more than ten tickets will be sold to one person. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

o9 6t

X

.....

M

Boston Music Hall

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor

Tuesday Afternoon, January 29

At 2.30

- - ADMIT ONE - -

C. A. ELLIS, Manager

THE KNEISEL QUARTET

FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin
OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin
L. SVECENSKI, Viola
ALWIN SCHROEDER, Violoncello

Tenth Season, 1894-95

EIGHT CONCERTS

In Union Hall, 48 Boylston St., on Monday Evenings,

AT EIGHT O'CLOCK.

October 22, November 12, December 10, December 31,
January 21, February 18, March 18, and April 8.

ASSISTING ARTISTS, Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, Mrs. Emil Paur, Mr. Ernst Perabo, Mr. Arthur Whiting, Mr. Leon Pourtan, and others to be announced.

The following is a partial list of the works to be performed:

BEETHOVEN	Quartets: Op. 18, B-flat; Op. 74, E-flat; Op. 130, A minor; Op. 131, B-flat; Op. 132, C-sharp minor.
BRAHMS	Quartet, B-flat; Clarinet Quintet, B minor; Piano Quintet, F minor.
MOZART	Quartet, A major; Quintet, G minor.
HAYDN	Quartets: E-flat; G major.
SVENDSEN	Octet for Strings.
RUBINSTEIN	Piano Trio.

NOVELTIES.

SGAMBATI	Quartet, D-flat major.
BORODINE	Quartet, D major.
HANS KOESSLER	Quartet (manuscript).
C. M. LOEFFLER	Quintet (manuscript).
A. KAHN	Piano Trio
ED. SCHUETT	Piano Quartet, F major.

Subscription tickets, with reserved seats for the series, $8.00, on sale at the Box Office, Music Hall, Monday, October 15, at 9 a.m.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR.

... FOURTEENTH SEASON, 1894-95 ...

SIX CONCERTS IN INFANTRY HALL, PROVIDENCE

Wednesday Evening, October 24.

Wednesday Evening, November 14.

Wednesday Evening, December 19.

Wednesday Evening, January 16.

Wednesday Evening, February 20.

Wednesday Evening, March 20.

SOLO ARTISTS:

MME. JULIE M. WYMAN.
MONS. POL PLANCON, (The distinguished baritone of Abbey, Schoeffel & Grau's Opera Co.,
MISS GERTRUDE FRANKLIN.
MR. CARL BAERMANN.
MR. CÉSAR THOMSON
(The famous Belgian violinist) and Others.

Season tickets, with reserved seats for the series of six concerts, $5. Programme books, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed, will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets.

☞ The sale of season tickets will open at the box office, Infantry Hall, MONDAY MORNING, October 15, at 9 o'clock. To secure a fair distribution of seats, no more than ten tickets will be sold to one person.

METROPOLITAN OPERA HOUSE.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

SEASON 1894-95.

SPECIAL NOTICE TO SUBSCRIBERS.

Subscribers of last season may secure their subscription tickets for the five concerts at the Metropolitan Opera House, in advance of the public sale, by applying at Schuberth's, 23 Union Square, from Monday, Oct. 15, to Saturday, Oct. 20, inclusive.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

THE NEWS, PROVIDENCE, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 13, 1894.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

Fourteenth Season, 1894-95.

6=GRAND CONCERTS=6

IN INFANTRY HALL,

WEDNESDAY EVENINGS, Oct. 24, Nov. 14, Dec. 19, Jan. 16, Feb. 20 and March 20.

SOLO ARTISTS:

Mme. Julie M. Wyman, | Mons. Pol Plancon,
(The distinguished baritone of Abbey, Schoeffel & Grau's Opera Co.)
Miss Gertrude Franklin, | Mr. Carl Baermann,
Mr. Cesar Thomson,
(The Famous Belgian Violinist) and others.

...5. Programme books with descriptive notes on the works to be ...tickets.
...Hall, MONDAY MORNING, Oct. 15, at 9 o'clock. To secure a fair ...
C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

[6]

THE KNEISEL QUARTET

FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin
OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin
L. SVECENSKI, Viola
ALWIN SCHROEDER, Violoncello

Tenth Season, 1894-95

EIGHT CONCERTS

In Union Hall, 48 Boylston St., on Monday Evenings,

AT EIGHT O'CLOCK.

October 22, November 12, December 10, December 31,
January 21, February 18, March 18, and April 8.

ASSISTING ARTISTS, Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, Mrs. Emil Paur, Mr. Ernst Perabo. Mr. Arthur Whiting, Mr. Leon Pourtan, and others to be announced.

The following is a partial list of the works to be performed:

BEETHOVEN	Quartets: Op. 18, B-flat; Op. 74, E-flat; Op. 130, A minor; Op. 131, B flat; Op. 132, C-sharp minor.
BRAHMS	Quartet, B-flat; Clarinet Quintet, B minor; Piano Quintet, F minor.
MOZART	Quartet, A major; Quintet, G minor.
HAYDN	Quartets: E-flat; G major.
SVENDSEN	Octet for Strings.
RUBINSTEIN	Piano Trio.

NOVELTIES.

SGAMBATI	Quartet, D-flat major.
BORODINE	Quartet, D major.
HANS KOESSLER	Quartet (manuscript).
C. M. LOEFFLER	Quintet (manuscript).
A. KAHN	Piano Trio
ED. SCHUETT	Piano Quartet, F major.

Subscription tickets, with reserved seats for the series, $8.00, on sale at the Box Office, Music Hall, Monday, October 15, at 9 a.m.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR.

... FOURTEENTH SEASON, 1894-95 ...

SIX CONCERTS IN INFANTRY HALL, PROVIDENCE

Wednesday Evening, October 24.

Wednesday Evening, November 14.

Wednesday Evening, December 19.

Wednesday Evening, January 16.

Wednesday Evening, February 20.

Wednesday Evening, March 20.

SOLO ARTISTS:

MME. JULIE M. WYMAN.

MONS. POL PLANCON,
(The distinguished baritone of Abbey, Schoeffel & Grau's Opera Co.,

MISS GERTRUDE FRANKLIN.

MR. CARL BAERMANN.

MR. CÉSAR THOMSON
(The famous Belgian violinist) and Others.

Season tickets, with reserved seats for the series of six concerts, $5. Programme books, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed, will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets.

☞ The sale of season tickets will open at the box office, Infantry Hall, MONDAY MORNING, October 15, at 9 o'clock. To secure a fair distribution of seats, no more than ten tickets will be sold to one person.

METROPOLITAN OPERA HOUSE.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

SEASON 1894-95.

SPECIAL NOTICE TO SUBSCRIBERS.

Subscribers of last season may secure their subscription tickets for the five concerts at the Metropolitan Opera House, in advance of the public sale, by applying at Schuberth's, 23 Union Square, from Monday, Oct. 15, to Saturday, Oct. 20, inclusive.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

THE NEWS, PROVIDENCE, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 13, 1894.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.
Fourteenth Season, 1894-95.

6=GRAND CONCERTS=6
IN INFANTRY HALL,
WEDNESDAY EVENINGS, Oct. 24, Nov. 14, Dec. 19, Jan. 16, Feb. 20 and March 20.

SOLO ARTISTS:

Mme. Julie M. Wyman,
Miss Gertrude Franklin,
Mons. Pol Plancon,
(The distinguished baritone Abbey, Schoeffel & Grau's Opera Co.)
Mr. Carl Baermann,
Mr. César Thomson,
(The Famous Belgian Violinist) and others.

Season tickets with reserved seats for the series of six concerts, $5. Programme books with descriptive notes on the works to be performed will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets.
The sale of season tickets will open at the ticket office, Infantry Hall, MONDAY MORNING, Oct. 15, at 9 o'clock. To secure a fair distribution of seats no more than ten tickets will be sold to one person.
C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

[6]

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

(87 PERFORMERS.)

MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR.

. . . FOURTEENTH SEASON, 1894-95 . . .

FIVE CONCERTS IN THE METROPOLITAN OPERA HOUSE

Thursday Evening, November 1.

Thursday Evening, December 6.

Thursday Evening, January 10.

Thursday Evening, February 7.

Thursday Evening, March 14.

SOLO ARTISTS:

MME. NORDICA. MR. POL PLANCON.

MR. CÉSAR THOMSON. MR. ALWIN SCHROEDER.

And Others.

Subscription tickets, with reserved seats for the series of five concerts, $7.50, $6, $5, and $3, and boxes $50, $40, and $30, according to location, will be on sale at Schuberth's, 23 Union Square, and at the Box Office, Metropolitan Opera House, on and after Monday, Oct. 22.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR.

. . . FOURTEENTH SEASON, 1894-95 . . .

SIX CONCERTS IN INFANTRY HALL, PROVIDENCE

Wednesday Evening, October 24.

Wednesday Evening, November 14.

Wednesday Evening, December 19.

Wednesday Evening, January 16.

Wednesday Evening, February 20.

Wednesday Evening, March 20.

SOLO ARTISTS:

MME. JULIE M. WYMAN. MONS. POL PLANCON, (The distinguished baritone of Abbey, Schoeffel & Grau's Opera Co.,

MISS GERTRUDE FRANKLIN. MR. CARL BAERMANN.

MR. CÉSAR THOMSON (The famous Belgian violinist) and Others.

Season tickets, with reserved seats for the series of six concerts, $5. Programme books, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed, will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets.

☞ The sale of season tickets will open at the box office, Infantry Hall, MONDAY MORNING, October 15, at 9 o'clock. To secure a fair distribution of seats, no more than ten tickets will be sold to one person.

THE NEWS, PROVIDENCE, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 13, 1894.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

6=GRAND CONCERTS=6

IN INFANTRY HALL,

WEDNESDAY EVENINGS, Oct. 24, Nov. 14, Dec. 19, Jan. 16, Feb. 20 and March 20.

SOLO ARTISTS:

Mme. Julie M. Wyman, | Mons. Pol Plancon,

Miss Gertrude Franklin, | Mr. Carl Baermann,

Mr. Cesar Thomson,

(The Famous Belgian Violinist) and others.

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

Fourteenth Season, 1894-95.

Season tickets with reserved seats for the series of six concerts, $5. Programme books with descriptive notes on the works to be performed, will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets. The sale of season tickets will open at the box office, Infantry Hall, MONDAY MORNING, Oct. 15, at 9 o'clock. To secure a fair distribution of seats, no more than ten tickets will be sold to one person.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

[6]

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR.

... FOURTEENTH SEASON, 1894-95 ...

SIX CONCERTS IN INFANTRY HALL, PROVIDENCE

Wednesday Evening, October 24.

Wednesday Evening, November 14.

Wednesday Evening, December 19.

Wednesday Evening, January 16.

Wednesday Evening, February 20.

Wednesday Evening, March 20.

SOLO ARTISTS:

MME. JULIE M. WYMAN.

MONS. POL PLANCON, (The distinguished baritone of Abbey, Schoeffel & Grau's Opera Co.,

MISS GERTRUDE FRANKLIN.

MR. CARL BAERMANN.

MR. CÉSAR THOMSON
(The famous Belgian violinist) and Others.

Season tickets, with reserved seats for the series of six concerts, $5. Programme books, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed, will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets.

☞ The sale of season tickets will open at the box office, Infantry Hall, MONDAY MORNING, October 15, at 9 o'clock. To secure a fair distribution of seats, no more than ten tickets will be sold to one person.

PROGRAMMES

Thursday Evening, November 1.

SYMPHONY IN D (first time) . . . . . Sgambati
ARIA.
Mons. PLANCON.
TAMBOURIN, GAVOTTE, AND CHACONNE . . . . Gluck
SYMPHONIC POEM, "Phaëton" . . . . . Saint-Saëns
ARIA.
Mons. PLANCON.
OVERTURE, "Sappho" (first time) . . . . . Goldmark

Thursday Evening, December 6.

SYMPHONY No. 7 . . . . . Beethoven
CONCERTO FOR VIOLIN
Mr. CÉSAR THOMSON.
OVERTURE, "Wem die Krone" (first time) . . . . . Ritter
CARNIVAL IN PARIS . . . . . Svendsen
SYMPHONIC POEM, "Les Préludes" . . . . . Liszt

Thursday Evening, January 10.

. . GRAND WAGNER PROGRAMME . .

Soloist, Mme. NORDICA.

Thursday, February 7.

SYMPHONY No. 3 (Eroica) . . . . . Beethoven
CONCERTO FOR VIOLONCELLO (MS., first time) . C. M. Loeffler
Mr. SCHROEDER.
SUITE, "L'Arlésienne" . . . . . Bizet
OVERTURE, "Genoveva" . . . . . Schumann

Thursday, March 14.

SOLO ARTIST TO BE ANNOUNCED.

SYMPHONIE FANTASTIQUE . . . . . Berlioz
BALLET MUSIC, "Die Rebe" . . . . . Rubinstein
OVERTURE, "Lenore No. 2" . . . . . Beethoven

Programme books, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed, will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

6=GRAND CONCERTS=6

IN INFANTRY HALL,

WEDNESDAY EVENINGS, Oct. 24, Nov. 14, Dec. 19, Jan. 16, Feb. 20 and March 20.

SOLO ARTISTS:

Mme. Julie M. Wyman, | Mons. Pol Plancon,
(The distinguished baritone of Abbey, Schoeffel & Grau's Opera Co.)
Miss Gertrude Franklin, | Mr. Carl Baermann,
Mr. Cesar Thomson,
(The Famous Belgian Violinist) and others.

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

Fourteenth Season, 1894-95.

Season tickets with reserved seats for the series of six concerts, $5. Programme books with descriptive notes on the works to be performed, will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets. The sale of season tickets will open at the box office, Infantry Hall, MONDAY MORNING, Oct. 15, at 9 o'clock. To secure a fair distribution of seats, no more than ten tickets will be sold to one person. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

THE NEWS, PROVIDENCE, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 13, 1894.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET

FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin
OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin
L. SVECENSKI, Viola
ALWIN SCHROEDER, Violoncello

Tenth Season, 1894-95

EIGHT CONCERTS

In Union Hall, 48 Boylston St., on Monday Evenings,

AT EIGHT O'CLOCK.

October 22, November 12, December 10, December 31,
January 21, February 18, March 18, and April 8.

ASSISTING ARTISTS, Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, Mrs. Emil Paur, Mr. Ernst Perabo, Mr. Arthur Whiting, Mr. Leon Pourtan, and others to be announced.

The following is a partial list of the works to be performed:

BEETHOVEN	Quartets: Op. 18, B-flat; Op. 74, E-flat; Op. 130, A minor; Op. 131, B-flat; Op. 132, C-sharp minor.
BRAHMS	Quartet, B-flat; Clarinet Quintet, B minor; Piano Quintet, F minor.
MOZART	Quartet, A major; Quintet, G minor.
HAYDN	Quartets: E-flat; G major.
SVENDSEN	Octet for Strings.
RUBINSTEIN	Piano Trio.

NOVELTIES.

SGAMBATI	Quartet, D-flat major.
BORODINE	Quartet, D major.
HANS KOESSLER	Quartet (manuscript).
C. M. LOEFFLER	Quintet (manuscript).
A. KAHN	Piano Trio
ED. SCHUETT	Piano Quartet, F major.

Subscription tickets, with reserved seats for the series, $8.00, on sale at the Box Office, Music Hall, Monday, October 15, at 9 a.m.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

The following works will be included in the programmes:—

SYMPHONY No. 7,	Beethoven
SYMPHONY No. 9,	Schubert
SYMPHONY No. 3,	Brahms
SYMPHONY, "From the New World,"	Dvorak
SYMPHONY IN D (new),	Sgambati
OVERTURE, "Egmont,"	Beethoven
" "Carnaval Romain,"	Berlioz
" "Hebrides,"	Mendelssohn
" "Teufels,"	Auber
SUITE,	Gluck
SUITE, "L'arlesienne,"	Bizet
SUITE,	Monsigny
HUNGARIAN RHAPSODY,	Liszt
BALLET MUSIC, "Damon,"	Rubinstein
DANSE MACABRE,	Saint-Saëns

One concert will be devoted entirely to a Wagner programme.

METROPOLITAN OPERA HOUSE.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

SEASON 1894-95.

SPECIAL NOTICE TO SUBSCRIBERS.

Subscribers of last season may secure their subscription tickets for the five concerts at the Metropolitan Opera House, in advance of the public sale, by applying at Schuberth's, 23 Union Square, from Monday, Oct. 15, to Saturday, Oct. 20, inclusive.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

THE NEWS, PROVIDENCE, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 13, 1894.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

6=GRAND CONCERTS=6

IN INFANTRY HALL,

WEDNESDAY EVENINGS, Oct. 24, Nov. 14, Dec. 19, Jan. 16, Feb. 20 and March 20.

SOLO ARTISTS:

Mme. Julie M. Wyman, | Mons. Pol Plancon, (The distinguished baritone Abbey, Schoeffel & Grau's Opera Co.)

Miss Gertrude Franklin, | Mr. Carl Baermann,

Mr. Cesar Thomson, (The Famous Belgian Violinist) and others.

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

Fourteenth Season, 1894-95.

Series of six concerts, $5. Programme books with descriptive notes on the works to be given at each concert, 10 cents. Season tickets will be on sale at Infantry Hall, MONDAY MORNING, Oct. 15, at 9 o'clock. To secure a fair selection of seats early application should be made. Address C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

[6]

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA!

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

FOURTEENTH SEASON 1894-95.

6 GRAND CONCERTS

IN INFANTRY HALL,

WEDNESDAY EVENINGS, OCT. 24, NOV. 14, DEC. 19, JAN. 16, FEB. 20, MAR. 20

SOLO ARTISTS:

Mme. JULIE M. WYMAN,
Miss GERTRUDE FRANKLIN,
Mons. POL PLANCON,
(The distinguished baritone of Abbey, Schoeffel & Grau's Opera Co.)
Mr. CARL BAERMANN,
Mr. CESAR THOMPSON.
(THE FAMOUS BELGIAN VIOLINIST) AND OTHERS.

Season tickets, with reserved seats, for the series of six concerts, $5. Program books, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed, will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets.

The sale of season tickets will open at the box office, Infantry hall, tomorrow (MONDAY) MORNING, Oct 15, at 9 o'clock. To secure a fair distribution of seats no more than ten tickets will be sold to one person. C. A. ELLIS, Mgr.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

(87 PERFORMERS.)

MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR.

. . . FOURTEENTH SEASON, 1894-95 . . .

FIVE CONCERTS IN THE ACADEMY OF MUSIC, PHILADELPHIA

Monday Evening, October 29.

Monday Evening, December 3.

Monday Evening, January 7.

Monday Evening, February 4.

Monday Evening, March 11.

SOLO ARTISTS.

Mrs. JULIE M. WYMAN.
Mr. EUGENE YSAYE.
(His first appearance in Philadelphia.)
Miss ADELE AUS DER OHE.
And Others to be announced.

Subscription tickets, with reserved seats for the series of five concerts, $7, $5, and $3.50, according to location.

☞ The sale of subscription tickets will open Monday morning, October 22, at 1221 Chestnut Street.

Programme books, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed, will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of subscription tickets.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1894-95.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

I. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 18, AT 7.45, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

BACH. PASSACAGLIA.

BEETHOVEN. OVERTURE. "Fidelio."

BRAHMS. SYMPHONY No. 4, in E minor, op. 98.
I. Allegro non troppo.
II. Andante moderato.
III. Allegro giocoso.
IV. Allegro energico e passionato.

BERLIOZ. OVERTURE. "Carnaval Romain."

Second Concert Thursday, November 8. Solo Artist, Mr. E. A. MACDOWELL.

[7]

SUNDAY TELEGRAM, PROVIDENCE, OCTOBER 14,

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA!

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

FOURTEENTH SEASON 1894-95.

6 GRAND CONCERTS

IN INFANTRY HALL,

WEDNESDAY EVENINGS, OCT. 24, NOV. 14, DEC. 19, JAN. 16, FEB. 20, MAR. 20

SOLO ARTISTS:

Mme. JULIE M. WYMAN,
Miss GERTRUDE FRANKLIN,
Mons. POL PLANCON,
(The distinguished baritone of Abbey, Schoeffel & Grau's Opera Co.)
Mr. CARL BAERMANN,
Mr. CESAR THOMPSON.
(THE FAMOUS BELGIAN VIOLINIST) AND OTHERS.

Season tickets, with reserved seats, for the series of six concerts, $5. Program books, with dscriptive notes on the works to be performed, will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets.

The sale of season tickets will open at the box office, Infantry hall, tomorrow (MONDAY) MORNING, Oct 15, at 9 o'clock. To secure a fair distribution of seats no more than ten tickets will be sold to one person. C. A. ELLIS, Mgr.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

(87 PERFORMERS.)

MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR.

FOURTEENTH SEASON, 1894-95

FIVE CONCERTS IN THE ACADEMY OF MUSIC, PHILADELPHIA

Monday Evening, October 29.

Monday Evening, December 3.

Monday Evening, January 7.

Monday Evening, February 4.

Monday Evening, March 11.

SOLO ARTISTS.

Mrs. JULIE M. WYMAN.
Mr. EUGENE YSAYE.
(His first appearance in Philadelphia.)
Miss ADELE AUS DER OHE.
And Others to be announced.

Subscription tickets, with reserved seats for the series of five concerts, $7, $5, and $3.50, according to location.

☞ The sale of subscription tickets will open Monday morning, October 22, at 1221 Chestnut Street.

Programme books, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed, will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of subscription tickets.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1894-95.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

I. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 25, AT 7.45, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

BACH — PASSACAGLIA

BEETHOVEN. — OVERTURE, "EGMONT."

BRAHMS — SYMPHONY No. 4, in E minor, op. 98
I. Allegro non troppo.
II. Andante moderato.
III. Allegro giocoso.
IV. Allegro energico e passionato.

BERLIOZ. — OVERTURE, "Carnaval Romain."

Second Concert Thursday, November 8. Solo Artist, Mr. E. A. MACDOWELL.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA!

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

FOURTEENTH SEASON 1894-95.

6 GRAND CONCERTS

IN INFANTRY HALL,

WEDNESDAY EVENINGS, OCT. 24, NOV. 14, DEC. 19, JAN. 16, FEB. 20, MAR. 20

SOLO ARTISTS:

Mme. JULIE M. WYMAN,
Miss GERTRUDE FRANKLIN,
Mons. POL PLANCON, (The distinguished baritone of Abbey, Schoeffel & Grau's Opera Co.)
Mr. CARL BAERMANN,
Mr. CESAR THOMPSON.

(THE FAMOUS BELGIAN VIOLINIST) AND OTHERS.

Season tickets, with reserved seats, for the series of six concerts, $5. Program books, with dscriptive notes on the works to be performed, will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets.

The sale of season tickets will open at the box office, Infantry hall, tomorrow (MONDAY) MORNING, Oct 15, at 9 o'clock. To secure a fair distribution of seats no more than ten tickets will be sold to one person. C. A. ELLIS, Mgr.

PROGRAMMES

Monday Evening, October 29.

OVERTURE, "Tannhäuser" . . . . . Wagner
ARIA from "Le Prophète" . . . . . Meyerbeer
Mrs. WYMAN.
SYMPHONY in C major . . . . . Schumann
TAMBOURIN, GAVOTTE, and CHACONNE . . . . . Gluck
SONGS WITH PIANO.
Mrs. WYMAN.
OVERTURE, "Sappho" (first time) . . . . . Goldmark

Monday Evening, December 3.

SYMPHONY in D (first time) . . . . . Sgambati
CONCERTO FOR VIOLIN
Mr. YSAYE.
ENTR'ACTE from "Rosamunde" . . . . . Schubert
MARCH in B minor . . . . . Schubert–Liszt
CARNIVAL IN PARIS . . . . . Svendsen
OVERTURE, "Egmont" . . . . . Beethoven

Monday Evening, January 7.

SYMPHONY No. 7 . . . . . Beethoven
CONCERTO FOR PIANOFORTE
Miss AUS DER OHE.
OVERTURE, "Carnaval" (first time) . . . . . Dvorak
OVERTURE, Scherzo, Notturno, and Wedding March from the "Midsummer-Night's Dream" . . . . . Mendelssohn

Monday Evening, February 4.

SOLO ARTIST TO BE ANNOUNCED.

SUITE . . . . . Lachner
OVERTURE, "Wem die Krone" (first time) . . . . . Ritter
SYMPHONY in F major . . . . . Brahms

Monday Evening, March 11.

SOLO ARTIST TO BE ANNOUNCED.

RIGADON . . . . . Monsigny
HUNGARIAN RHAPSODY, No. 2 . . . . . Lisst
SYMPHONIE FANTASTIQUE . . . . . Berlioz

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1894-95.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

I. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 18, AT 7.45, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

BACH. PASSACAGLIA.

BEETHOVEN. OVERTURE. "Fidelio."

BRAHMS. SYMPHONY No. 4, in E minor, op. 98.
I. Allegro non troppo.
II. Andante moderato.
III. Allegro giocoso.
IV. Allegro energico e passionato.

BERLIOZ. OVERTURE. "Carnaval Romain."

Second Concert Thursday, November 8. Solo Artist, Mr. E. A. MacDowell.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR.

. . . FOURTEENTH SEASON, 1894-95 . . .

FIVE CONCERTS IN METZEROTT MUSIC HALL, WASHINGTON

Tuesday Evening, October 30.

Tuesday Evening, December 4.

Tuesday Evening, January 8.

Tuesday Evening, February 5.

Tuesday Evening, March 12.

SOLO ARTISTS.

Mrs. JULIE M. WYMAN.

Mr. CÉSAR THOMSON.
(His first appearance in Washington.)

Mr. T. ADAMOWSKI.

And Others to be announced.

Subscription tickets, with reserved seats for the series of five concerts, $7 and $5, according to location.

☞ The sale of subscription tickets will open Monday morning, October 22, at Metzerott's Music Store, 1110 F Street.

Programme books, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed, will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of subscription tickets.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

(87 PERFORMERS.)

MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR.

. . . FOURTEENTH SEASON, 1894-95 . . .

FOUR PUBLIC REHEARSALS
FOUR CONCERTS

In the ACADEMY OF MUSIC
(Under the auspices of the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn.)

FRIDAY AFTERNOONS,
SATURDAY EVENINGS,

November 2 and 3. January 11 and 12. February 8 and 9. March 15 and 16.

SOLO ARTISTS:

Mrs. JULIE M. WYMAN,

Miss ADELE AUS DER OHE,

AND OTHERS TO BE ANNOUNCED.

Season tickets, with reserved seats for the series of four Concerts, $5, $4, and $2.50, according to location; and for the series of four Public Rehearsals, $4, $3.50, and $2.50.

The sale of season tickets for both series opens Wednesday, October 24, at Chandler's Music Store, 300 Fulton Street, Brooklyn.

Programme books, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed, will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

(EIGHTY-SEVEN PERFORMERS),

MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR.

Fourteenth Season, 1894-95.

FIVE CONCERTS IN NEW MUSIC HALL

(Facing Mt. Royal and Maryland Avenues),

Wednesday Evening, Oct. 31. Wednesday Evening, Dec. 5.

Wednesday Evening, Jan. 9. Wednesday Evening, Feb. 6.

Wednesday Evening, March 13.

. . . SOLO ARTISTS . . .

MME. MELBA. MME. NORDICA. MME. SCALCHI.
MR. MAUGIERE. MR. PLANCON.
MR. CÉSAR THOMSON. MR. ALWIN SCHROEDER.
And others to be announced.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

The first concert of this series will constitute the

Inauguration of the New Music Hall,

When the doors will be opened to the public for the first time. On this occasion a

GRAND OPERATIC CONCERT

Will be given with the following extraordinary array of Artists:

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

(EIGHTY-SEVEN PERFORMERS).

MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR.

MME. MELBA (The world-renowned Prima Donna Soprano, her first appearance in Baltimore).

MME. SCALCHI, Contralto.

MONS. MAUGIERE, Tenor.
(His first appearance here.)

MONS. POL PLANCON, Baritone.
(His first appearance here.)

From the Grand Italian and French Opera Company of the Metropolitan Opera House, New York (by special arrangement with Messrs. Abbey, Schoeffel & Grau), forming the greatest combination of artists that has ever appeared in a single performance in this city. (The scale of prices for this concert will be $4, $3, and $2, according to location of seats.)

Season tickets with reserved seats, for the series of five concerts (including the Inauguration Concert), $9, $7, and $5, according to location.

The sale of season tickets will open at Albert's Ticket Office, 13 No. Charles Street on Tuesday morning, October 23.

Programme books, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed, will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

UNION HALL, 48 BOYLSTON STREET.

TENTH SEASON, 1894-95.

Monday Evening, October 22, at 8.

First Concert

BY

The Kneisel Quartet.

FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin.
OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin.
L. SVECENSKI, Viola.
ALWIN SCHROEDER, Violoncello.

WITH THE ASSISTANCE OF

Mr. Max Zach.

Programme.

HAYDN. QUARTET in G major, op. 77, No. 1.
Allegro moderato.—Adagio.—Menuetto (Presto). Finale. (Presto).

SGAMBATI. QUARTET in D-flat major, op. 17.
Adagio.—Vivace ma non troppo.—Prestissimo.—Andante sostenuto.—Allegro.
(First time at these concerts.)

MOZART. QUINTET in G minor.
Allegro.—Menuetto (Allegretto).—Adagio ma non troppo.—Adagio.—Allegro.
Second Viola: Mr. MAX ZACH.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR.

. . . FOURTEENTH SEASON, 1894-95 . . .

FIVE CONCERTS IN METZEROTT MUSIC HALL, WASHINGTON

Tuesday Evening, October 30.

Tuesday Evening, December 4.

Tuesday Evening, January 8.

Tuesday Evening, February 5.

Tuesday Evening, March 12.

SOLO ARTISTS.

Mrs. JULIE M. WYMAN.

Mr. CÉSAR THOMSON.
(His first appearance in Washington.)

Mr. T. ADAMOWSKI.

And Others to be announced.

Subscription tickets, with reserved seats for the series of five concerts, $7 and $5, according to location.

☞ The sale of subscription tickets will open Monday morning, October 22, at Metzerott's Music Store, 1110 F Street.

Programme books, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed, will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of subscription tickets.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

(EIGHTY-SEVEN PERFORMERS).

MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR.

Fourteenth Season, 1894-95.

FIVE CONCERTS IN NEW MUSIC HALL

(Facing Mt. Royal and Maryland Avenues).

Wednesday Evening, Oct. 31.

Wednesday Evening, Dec. 5.

Wednesday Evening, Jan. 9.

Wednesday Evening, Feb. 6.

Wednesday Evening, March 13.

. . . SOLO ARTISTS. . . .

MME. MELBA. MME. NORDICA. MME. SCALCHI.
MR. MAUGIERE. MR. PLANCON.
MR. CÉSAR THOMSON. MR. ALWIN SCHROEDER.
And others to be announced.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

The first concert of this series will constitute the

Inauguration of the New Music Hall,

When the doors will be opened to the public for the first time. On this occasion a

GRAND OPERATIC CONCERT

Will be given with the following extraordinary array of Artists:

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

(EIGHTY-SEVEN PERFORMERS).

MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR.

MME. MELBA (The world-renowned Prima Donna Soprano, her first appearance in Baltimore).

MME. SCALCHI, Contralto.

MONS. MAUGIERE, Tenor.
(His first appearance here.)

MONS. POL PLANCON, Baritone.
(His first appearance here.)

From the Grand Italian and French Opera Company of the Metropolitan Opera House, New York (by special arrangement with Messrs. Abbey, Schoeffel & Grau), forming the greatest combination of artists that has ever appeared in a single performance in this city. (The scale of prices for this concert will be $4, $3, and $2, according to location of seats.)

Season tickets with reserved seats, for the series of five concerts (including the Inauguration Concert), $9, $7, and $5, according to location.

The sale of season tickets will open at Albert's Ticket Office, 13 No. Charles Street on Tuesday morning, October 23.

Programme books, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed, will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

(87 PERFORMERS.)

MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR.

. . . FOURTEENTH SEASON, 1894-95 . . .

FOUR PUBLIC REHEARSALS
FOUR CONCERTS

In the ACADEMY OF MUSIC

(Under the auspices of the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn.)

FRIDAY AFTERNOONS, SATURDAY EVENINGS,

November 2 and 3. January 11 and 12. February 8 and 9. March 15 and 16.

SOLO ARTISTS:

Mrs. JULIE M. WYMAN,

Miss ADELE AUS DER OHE,

AND OTHERS TO BE ANNOUNCED.

Season tickets, with reserved seats for the series of four Concerts, $5, $4, and $2.50, according to location; and for the series of four Public Rehearsals, $4, $3.50, and $2.50.

The sale of season tickets for both series opens Wednesday, October 24, at Chandler's Music Store, 300 Fulton Street, Brooklyn.

Programme books, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed, will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

UNION HALL, 48 BOYLSTON STREET.

TENTH SEASON, 1894-95.

Monday Evening, October 22, at 8.

First Concert

BY

The Kneisel Quartet.

FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin.
OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin.
L. SVECENSKI, Viola.
ALWIN SCHROEDER, Violoncello.

WITH THE ASSISTANCE OF

Mr. Max Zach.

Programme.

HAYDN. QUARTET in G major, op. 77, No. 1.
Allegro moderato.—Adagio.—Menuetto (Presto).
Finale. (Presto)

SGAMBATI. QUARTET in D-flat major, op. 17.
Adagio.—Vivace ma non troppo.—Prestissimo.—
Andante sostenuto.—Allegro.
(First time at these concerts.)

MOZART. QUINTET in G minor.
Allegro.—Menuetto (Allegretto).—
Adagio ma non troppo.—Adagio.—Allegro.
Second Viola: Mr. MAX ZACH.

PROGRAMMES

Tuesday Evening, October 30.

OVERTURE, "Tannhäuser"	Wagner
ARIA from "Le Prophète"	Meyerbeer
Mrs. WYMAN.
SYMPHONY in C major	Schumann
SONGS WITH PIANO.
Mrs. WYMAN.
ENTR'ACTE, "Gwendoline" (first time)	Chabrier
OVERTURE, "Sappho" (first time)	Goldmark

Tuesday Evening, December 4.

SYMPHONY in D (first time)	Sgambati
CONCERTO FOR VIOLIN
Mr. CÉSAR THOMSON.
ENTR'ACTE from "Rosamunde"	Schubert
CARNIVAL IN PARIS	Svendsen
OVERTURE, "Egmont"	Beethoven

Tuesday Evening, January 8.

GRAND WAGNER PROGRAMME.

Tuesday Evening, February 5.

SYMPHONY No. 7	Beethoven
SOLO FOR VIOLIN
Mr. ADAMOWSKI.
OVERTURE, "Wem die Krone" (first time)	Ritter
SUITE	Lachner

Tuesday Evening, March 12.

SOLO ARTIST TO BE ANNOUNCED.

OVERTURE, "Lenore, No. 2"	Beethoven
RIGODON	Monsigny
SYMPHONY, "From the New World"	Dvorak
HUNGARIAN RHAPSODY, No. 2	Liszt

Among the works to be included in the programmes are the following:—

SYMPHONY No. 7	Beethoven
SYMPHONY in F major	Brahms
SYMPHONIE FANTASTIQUE	Berlioz
OVERTURE, "Lenore," No. 2	Beethoven
OVERTURE, "Wem die Krone" (first time)	Ritter
ACADEMIC OVERTURE	Brahms
KAISERMARSCH	Wagner
CARNIVAL IN PARIS	Svendsen
SYMPHONIC POEM, "Les Préludes"	Liszt
HUNGARIAN RHAPSODY, No. 2	Liszt
RIGODON	Monsigny
SUITE, "L'Arlésienne"	Bizet

The first concert will be devoted largely to operatic selections.

The third concert will be devoted entirely to a Wagner programme, with solo numbers by MME. NORDICA.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

(87 PERFORMERS.)

MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR.

...FOURTEENTH SEASON, 1894-95...

FOUR PUBLIC REHEARSALS
FOUR CONCERTS

In the ACADEMY OF MUSIC

(Under the auspices of the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn.)

FRIDAY AFTERNOONS,
SATURDAY EVENINGS,

November 2 and 3. January 11 and 12. February 8 and 9. March 15 and 16.

SOLO ARTISTS:

Mrs. JULIE M. WYMAN,

Miss ADELE AUS DER OHE,

AND OTHERS TO BE ANNOUNCED.

Season tickets, with reserved seats for the series of four Concerts, $5, $4, and $2.50, according to location; and for the series of four Public Rehearsals, $4, $3.50, and $2.50.

The sale of season tickets for both series opens Wednesday, October 24, at Chandler's Music Store, 300 Fulton Street, Brooklyn.

Programme books, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed, will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

UNION HALL, 48 BOYLSTON STREET.

TENTH SEASON, 1894-95.

Monday Evening, October 22, at 8.

First Concert

BY

The Kneisel Quartet.

FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin.
OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin.
L. SVECENSKI, Viola.
ALWIN SCHROEDER, Violoncello.

WITH THE ASSISTANCE OF

Mr. Max Zach.

Programme.

HAYDN.	QUARTET in G major, op. 77, No. 1. Allegro moderato.—Adagio.—Menuetto (Presto). Finale. (Presto).
SGAMBATI.	QUARTET in D-flat major, op. 17. Adagio.—Vivace ma non troppo.—Prestissimo.—Andante sostenuto.—Allegro. (First time at these concerts.)
MOZART.	QUINTET in G minor. Allegro.—Menuetto (Allegretto).—Adagio ma non troppo.—Adagio.—Allegro. Second Viola: Mr. MAX ZACH.

PROGRAMMES

I. Concert, Friday and Saturday, November 2 and 3.

KAISERMARSCH . . . . . Wagner
ARIA, from "Le Prophète" . . . . . Meyerbeer

Mrs. WYMAN.

SYMPHONY IN C MAJOR . . . . . Schumann
SONGS WITH PIANO.

Mrs. WYMAN.

TAMBOURIN, GAVOTTE, AND CHACONNE . . . Gluck
OVERTURE, "Carnaval Romain" . . . . . Berlioz

II. Concert, Friday and Saturday, January 11 and 12.

Soloist.

SYMPHONY No. 7 . . . . . Beethoven
CONCERTO FOR PIANOFORTE.

Miss AUS DER OHE.

PRELUDE, "The Deluge" . . . . . Saint-Saëns
OVERTURE, "Carnival" (first time) . . . . . Dvorak
OVERTURE, Scherzo, Notturno, and Wedding March, from "Midsummer-night's Dream" . . . . Mendelssohn

III. Concert, Friday and Saturday, February 8 and 9.

SOLO ARTIST TO BE ANNOUNCED.

SUITE . . . . . Lachner
SYMPHONY IN A MAJOR . . . . . Mendelssohn
ENTR'ACTE, from "Rosamunde" . . . . . Schubert
OVERTURE, "Sappho" . . . . . Goldmark

IV. Concert, Friday and Saturday, March 15 and 16.

SOLO ARTIST TO BE ANNOUNCED.

OCEAN SYMPHONY . . . . . Rubinstein
HUNGARIAN RHAPSODY No. 2 . . . . . Liszt
OVERTURE, "Lenore No. 2" . . . . . Beethoven

Boston Symphony Orchestra

(EIGHTY-SEVEN PERFORMERS),

MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR.

Fourteenth Season, 1894-95.

FIVE CONCERTS IN NEW MUSIC HALL

(Facing Mt. Royal and Maryland Avenues),

Wednesday Evening, Oct. 31. Wednesday Evening, Dec. 5.
Wednesday Evening, Jan. 9. Wednesday Evening, Feb. 6.
Wednesday Evening, March 13.

SOLO ARTISTS.

MME. MELBA. MME. NORDICA. MME. SCALCHI.
MR. MAUGIERE. MR. PLANCON.
MR. CÉSAR THOMSON. MR. ALWIN SCHROEDER.
And others to be announced.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

The first concert of this series will constitute the

Inauguration of the New Music Hall,

When the doors will be opened to the public for the first time. On this occasion a

GRAND OPERATIC CONCERT

Will be given with the following extraordinary array of Artists:

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

(EIGHTY-SEVEN PERFORMERS).

MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR.

MME. MELBA (The world-renowned Prima Donna Soprano, her first appearance in Baltimore).

MME. SCALCHI, Contralto.

MONS. MAUGIERE, Tenor. (His first appearance here.)

MONS. POL PLANCON, Baritone. (His first appearance here.)

From the Grand Italian and French Opera Company of the Metropolitan Opera House, New York (by special arrangement with Messrs. Abbey, Schoeffel & Grau), forming the greatest combination of artists that has ever appeared in a single performance in this city. (The scale of prices for this concert will be $4, $3, and $2, according to location of seats.)

Season tickets with reserved seats, for the series of five concerts (including the Inauguration Concert), $9, $7, and $5, according to location.

The sale of season tickets will open at Albert's Ticket Office, 13 No. Charles Street on Tuesday morning, October 23.

Programme books, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed, will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

UNION HALL, 48 BOYLSTON STREET.

TENTH SEASON, 1894-95.

Monday Evening, October 22, at 8.

First Concert

BY

The Kneisel Quartet.

FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin. L. SVECENSKI, Viola.
OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin. ALWIN SCHROEDER, Violoncello.

WITH THE ASSISTANCE OF

Mr. Max Zach.

Programme.

HAYDN. QUARTET in G major, op. 77, No. 1.
Allegro moderato.—Adagio.—Menuetto (Presto). Finale. (Presto).

SGAMBATI. QUARTET in D-flat major, op. 17.
Adagio.—Vivace ma non troppo.—Prestissimo.—Andante sostenuto.—Allegro.
(First time at these concerts.)

MOZART. QUINTET in G minor.
Allegro.—Menuetto (Allegretto).—Adagio ma non troppo.—Adagio.—Allegro.
Second Viola: Mr. MAX ZACH.

[8]

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

FOURTEENTH SEASON, 1894-95.

HOTEL LIST.

E. Paur.

I. Schnitzler. / P. Fiumara.

A. Goldstein. / S. Goldstein.

F. R. Comee. / C. M. Loeffler.

H. D. Simpson. / E. B. Marble.

A. Litke. / F. Müller.

Fr. Kneisel.

E. Fiedler. / A. Moldauer.

A. Kolster. / M. Kluge.

T. Adamowski. / J. Adamowski.

E. M. Heindl.

J. E. Eichler. / W. Krafft.

A. Schroeder.

P. Metzger. / R. Kurth.

C. Mole.

E. Golde. / W. A. Field.

A. Hackebarth.

G. Bareither. / S. Elkind.

L. Pourtau.

H. Schuecker. / J. Hoffmann.

G. Gerhardt. / H. Hoyer.

L. Svecenski. / O. Roth.

F. Mahn. / H. Berger.

H. J. Butler. / A. Reinhart.

E. Grunberg. / M. Zach.

A. Rigg. / J. Abloescher.

W. W. Swornsbourne. / F. E. Schuchmann.

E. Mingels. / E. Loeffler.

G. Strube.

C. Barleben. / A. Nagel.

F. E. Hahn. / H. Eichheim.

J. Knecht. / G. Sauer.

K. Rissland. / Carl Barth.

J. Akeroyd,

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

14th SEASON, 1894-95.

October-November Itinerary.

Leave Boston Sunday, October 28, 7.30 P.M. Providence Depot.
Arrive Philadelphia, Monday, October 29, at 7, A.M.
CONTINENTAL HOTEL.
Rehearsal, Academy of Music at 7, P.M.
Concert at 8, P.M.
Leave Philadelphia, Tuesday, October 30, Philadelphia and Reading Depot, 12th and Market Streets, 7.40 A.M.
Arrive Baltimore, Camden St. Station, at 10.15 A.M.
CARROLLTON HOTEL.
Leave Baltimore, Camden Street Station B. & O. R. R. at 6 P.M.
Arrive Washington 7.05 P.M
Concert at Metzerott's Music Hall, 1110 F Street, at 8 P.M.
Leave Washington, B. & O. R. R., at 10.40 P.M.
Arrive Baltimore, at 11.30 P.M.
Rehearsal at Music Hall, Mt. Royal and Maryland Avenues, Wednesday, Oct. 31, at 10.30, A.M.
Concert at 8, P.M.
Leave Baltimore, Camden Street Station, B. & O. R. R. Thursday, November 1, at 8.50, A.M.
Arrive New York, 1.55 P.M.
PARK AVENUE HOTEL.
Concert at Metropolitan Opera House, at 8 P.M.
Public Rehearsal at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Friday, Nov. 2, at 3 P.M.
Concert at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Saturday, November 3, at 8.15. P.M.
Leave New York, Saturday, November 3, midnight. Grand Central Depot.
Arrive Boston, Sunday, November 4, at 7 A.M. Providence Depot.
Instruments must be ready and marked to-night, (Saturday), after the Concert.

C. A. ELLIS, MANAGER.
F. R. COMEE, ASS'T MANAGER.

SATURDAY, October 27, 1894.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

14th SEASON, 1894-95.

January Itinerary.

Leave Boston Sunday, January 6, 7.30 P.M. Providence Depot.
Arrive Philadelphia, Monday, January 7, at 7, A.M.
CONTINENTAL HOTEL.
Concert at Academy of Music at 8, P.M.
Hotel baggage not ready directly after the concert will be moved at owner's expense.
Leave Philadelphia, Tuesday, January 8, Philadelphia and Reading Depot, 12th and Market Streets, 7.50 A.M.
Arrive Baltimore, Camden St. Station, B. & O. R. R. at 10.15 A.M.
CARROLLTON HOTEL.
Leave Baltimore, Camden Street Station B. & O. R. R. at 6 P.M.
Arrive Washington 7.05 P.M
Concert at Metzerott's Music Hall, 1110 F Street, at 8 P.M.
Leave Washington, B. & O. R. R., at 10.40 P.M.
Arrive Baltimore, at 11.30 P.M.
Concert at Music Hall, Mt. Royal and Maryland Avenues, Wednesday, January 9, at 8. P.M.
Hotel baggage not ready directly after the concert will be moved at owner's expense.
Leave Baltimore, Camden Street Station, B. & O. R. R. Thursday, January 10, at 8.50, A.M.
Arrive New York, 1.55 P.M.
PARK AVENUE HOTEL.
Rehearsal, at Metropolitan Opera House at 5, P.M.
Concert at Metropolitan Opera House, at 8 P.M.
Public Rehearsal at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Friday, Jan'y 11, at 3 P.M.
Concert at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Saturday, January 12, at 8.15. P.M.
Leave New York, Saturday, January 12, midnight. Grand Central Depot, 42d St.
Arrive Boston, Sunday, January 13, at 7 A.M. Providence Depot.
Instruments must be ready and marked to-night, (Saturday), after the Concert.

C. A. ELLIS, MANAGER.
F. R. COMEE, ASS'T MANAGER.

SATURDAY, January 5, 1895.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

14th SEASON, 1894-95.

December Itinerary.

Leave Boston Sunday, December 2, 7.30 P.M. Providence Depot.
Arrive Philadelphia, Monday, December 3, at 7, A.M.
CONTINENTAL HOTEL.
Concert at 8, P.M.
Leave Philadelphia, Tuesday, December 4, Philadelphia and Reading Depot, 12th and Market Streets, 7.40 A.M.
Arrive Baltimore, Camden St. Station, at 10.15 A.M.
CARROLLTON HOTEL.
Rehearsal, at Music Hall at 12, noon.
Leave Baltimore, Camden Street Station B. & O. R. R. at 6 P.M.
Arrive Washington 7.05 P.M
Concert at Metzerott's Music Hall, 1110 F Street, at 8 P.M.
Leave Washington, B. & O. R. R., at 10.40 P.M.
Arrive Baltimore, at 11.30 P.M.
Concert at Music Hall, Mt. Royal and Maryland Avenues, Wednesday, December 5, at 8, P.M.
Hotel baggage not ready directly after the concert will be moved at owner's expense.
Leave Baltimore, Camden Street Station, B. & O. R. R. Thursday, December 6, at 8.50, A.M.
Arrive New York, 1.55 P.M.
PARK AVENUE HOTEL.
Concert at Metropolitan Opera House, at 8 P.M.
Hotel baggage not ready directly after the concert will be moved at owner's expense.
Leave New York, Friday, December 7, Grand Central Depot, 42d St. 1, P.M.
Arrive Hartford, 4.40. P.M.
ALLYN HOTEL.
Concert at Foot Guard Armory at 8, P.M.
Leave Hartford Saturday, December 8, at 3.50 P.M.
Arrive New Haven at 5.05, P.M.
NEW HAVEN HOUSE.
Concert at Hyperion Theatre at 8, P.M.
Sleeping Cars ready directly after the concert.
Arrive Boston, Sunday, December 9, at 7 A.M. Providence Depot.
Instruments must be ready and marked to-night, (Saturday), after the Concert.

C. A. ELLIS, MANAGER.
F. R. COMEE, ASS'T MANAGER.

SATURDAY, December 1, 1894.

. . BOSTON MUSIC HALL . .

TUESDAY AFTERNOON
JANUARY 29, AT 2.30 .

Boston Symphony Orchestra

MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR

. . AND . .

= MELBA =

EXTRA POPULAR MATINEE

Tickets with reserved seats, $2, $1.50, and $1, according to location, now on sale at the Box Office.

The Kneisel Quartet . . of Boston

Season 1893=94

Under the management of
C. A. ELLIS
Music Hall, Boston

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

14th SEASON, 1894-95.

February Itinerary.

Leave Boston Sunday, Febr'y 3, at 12, midnight. Providence Depot.
Arrive Grand Central Depot, New York, Monday, Feb'y 4, at 7, A.M.
Leave New York, Central Railroad of New Jersey; Depot foot of, Liberty Street, 9 A.M.
Arrive Philadelphia, at 11.23 A.M. Philadelphia and Reading R. R. Depot, 12th and Market Streets.
CONTINENTAL HOTEL.
Concert at Academy of Music at 8, P.M.
Hotel baggage not ready directly after the concert will be moved at owner's expense.
Leave Philadelphia, Tuesday, February 5, Philadelphia and Reading Depot, 12th and Market Streets, 7.50 A.M.
Arrive Baltimore, Camden St. Station, B. & O. R. R. at 10.15 A.M.
CARROLLTON HOTEL.
Leave Baltimore, Camden Street Station B. & O. R. R. at 6 P.M.
Arrive Washington 7.05 P.M
Concert at Metzerott's Music Hall, 1110 F Street, at 8 P.M.
Leave Washington, B. & O. R. R., at 10.40 P.M.
Arrive Baltimore, at 11.30 P.M.
Concert at Music Hall, Mt. Royal and Maryland Avenues, Wednesday, February 6, at 8, P.M.
Hotel baggage not ready directly after the concert will be moved at owner's expense.
Leave Baltimore, Camden Street Station, B. & O. R. R. Thursday, February 7, at 8.50, A.M.
Arrive New York, 1.55 P.M.
PARK AVENUE HOTEL.
Concert at Metropolitan Opera House, at 8 P.M.
Public Rehearsal at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Friday, Feb'ry 8, at 3 P.M.
Concert at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Saturday, February 9, at 8.15. P.M.
Leave New York, Saturday, February 9, midnight. Grand Central Depot, 42d St.
Arrive Boston, Sunday, February 10, at 7 A.M. Providence Depot.
Instruments must be ready and marked to-night, (Saturday), after the Concert.

C. A. ELLIS, MANAGER.
F. R. COMEE, ASS'T MANAGER.

SATURDAY, February 2, 1895.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

14th SEASON, 1894-95.

March Itinerary.

Leave Boston Sunday, March 10, at 7.30, P.M. Providence Depot.
Arrive Philadelphia Monday, March 11, at 7 A.M. Broad St. Station Penna. R. R.
CONTINENTAL HOTEL.
Concert at Academy of Music at 8, P.M.
Hotel baggage not ready directly after the concert will be moved at owner's expense.
Leave Philadelphia, Tuesday, March 12, Philadelphia and Reading Depot, 12th and Market Streets, 7.50 A.M.
Arrive Baltimore, Camden St. Station, B. & O. R. R. at 10.15 A.M.
CARROLLTON HOTEL.
Leave Baltimore, Camden Street Station B. & O. R. R at 6 P.M.
Arrive Washington 7.05 P.M
Concert at Metzerott's Music Hall, 1110 F Street, at 8 P.M.
Leave Washington, B. & O. R. R., at 10.40 P.M.
Arrive Baltimore, at 11.30 P.M.
Rehearsal at Music Hall, Mt. Royal and Maryland Avenues, Wednesday, March 13, at 12 o'clock noon.
Concert at Music Hall, at 8, P.M.
Hotel baggage not ready directly after the concert will be moved at owner's expense.
Leave Baltimore, Camden Street Station, B. & O. R. R. Thursday, March 14, at 8.50, A.M.
Arrive New York, 1.55 P.M.
PARK AVENUE HOTEL.
Concert at Metropolitan Opera House, at 8 P.M.
Public Rehearsal at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Friday, March 15, at 3 P.M.
Concert at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Saturday, March 16, at 8.15. P.M.
Leave New York, Saturday, March 16, midnight. Grand Central Depot, 42d St.
Arrive Boston, Sunday, March 17, at 7 A.M. Providence Depot.
Instruments must be ready and marked to-night, (Saturday), after the Concert.

C. A. ELLIS, MANAGER.
F. R. COMEE, ASS'T MANAGER.

SATURDAY, March 9, 1895.

[10]

TUESDAY AFTERNOON
JANUARY 29, AT 2.30

. . Programme . .

OVERTURE, "Fra Diavolo"	Auber
ARIA from "Les Huguenots"	Meyerbeer
MME. MELBA
BALLET MUSIC from "Coppelia"	Delibes
MAD SCENE from "Lucia"	Donizetti
MME. MELBA
a. ENTR'ACTE from "Gwendoline"	Chabrier
b. SCHERZO (new, first time)	Goldmark
SONG, "Se seran Rose"	Arditi
MME. MELBA
WALTZ, "Southern Roses"	Joh. Strauss
OVERTURE, "Mignon"	A. Thomas

The Kneisel Quartet . . of Boston

Season 1893=94

Under the management of
C. A. ELLIS
Music Hall, Boston

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

14th SEASON, 1894-95.

February Itinerary.

Leave Boston Sunday, Febr'y 3, at 12, midnight. Providence Depot.
Arrive Grand Central Depot, New York, Monday, Feb'y 4, at 7, A.M.
Leave New York, Central Railroad of New Jersey; Depot foot of Liberty Street, 9 A.M.
Arrive Philadelphia, at 11.23 A.M. Philadelphia and Reading R. R. Depot, 12th and Market Streets.
CONTINENTAL HOTEL.
Concert at Academy of Music at 8, P.M.
Hotel baggage not ready directly after the concert will be moved at owner's expense.
Leave Philadelphia. Tuesday, February 5, Philadelphia and Reading Depot, 12th and Market Streets, 7.50 A.M.
Arrive Baltimore, Camden St. Station, B. & O. R. R. at 10.15 A.M.
CARROLLTON HOTEL.
Leave Baltimore, Camden Street Station B. & O. R. R. at 6 P.M.
Arrive Washington 7.05 P.M
Concert at Metzerott's Music Hall, 1110 F Street, at 8 P.M.
Leave Washington, B. & O. R. R., at 10.40 P.M.
Arrive Baltimore, at 11.30 P.M.
Concert at Music Hall, Mt. Royal and Maryland Avenues, Wednesday, February 6, at 8, P.M.
Hotel baggage not ready directly after the concert will be moved at owner's expense.
Leave Baltimore, Camden Street Station, B. & O. R. R. Thursday, February 7, at 8.50, A.M.
Arrive New York, 1.55 P.M.
PARK AVENUE HOTEL.
Concert at Metropolitan Opera House, at 8 P.M.
Public Rehearsal at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Friday, Feb'ry 8, at 3 P.M.
Concert at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Saturday, February 9, at 8.15. P.M.
Leave New York, Saturday, February 9, midnight. Grand Central Depot, 42d St.
Arrive Boston, Sunday, February 10, at 7 A.M. Providence Depot.
Instruments must be ready and marked to-night, (Saturday), after the Concert.

C. A. ELLIS, MANAGER.
F. R. COMEE, ASS'T MANAGER.

SATURDAY, February 2, 1895.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

14th SEASON, 1894-95.

March Itinerary.

Leave Boston Sunday, March 10, at 7.30, P.M. Providence Depot.
Arrive Philadelphia Monday, March 11, at 7 A.M. Broad St. Station Penna. R. R.
CONTINENTAL HOTEL.
Concert at Academy of Music at 8, P.M.
Hotel baggage not ready directly after the concert will be moved at owner's expense.
Leave Philadelphia. Tuesday, March 12, Philadelphia and Reading Depot, 12th and Market Streets, 7.50 A.M.
Arrive Baltimore, Camden St. Station, B. & O. R. R. at 10.15 A.M.
CARROLLTON HOTEL.
Leave Baltimore, Camden Street Station B. & O. R. R at 6 P.M.
Arrive Washington 7.05 P.M
Concert at Metzerott's Music Hall, 1110 F Street, at 8 P.M.
Leave Washington, B. & O. R. R., at 10.40 P.M.
Arrive Baltimore, at 11.30 P.M.
Rehearsal at Music Hall, Mt. Royal and Maryland Avenues, Wednesday, March 13, at 12 o'clock noon.
Concert at Music Hall, at 8, P.M.
Hotel baggage not ready directly after the concert will be moved at owner's expense.
Leave Baltimore, Camden Street Station, B. & O. R. R. Thursday, March 14, at 8.50, A.M.
Arrive New York, 1.55 P.M.
PARK AVENUE HOTEL.
Concert at Metropolitan Opera House, at 8 P.M.
Public Rehearsal at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Friday, March 15, at 3 P.M.
Concert at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Saturday, March 16, at 8.15. P.M.
Leave New York, Saturday, March 16, midnight. Grand Central Depot, 42d St.
Arrive Boston, Sunday, March 17, at 7 A.M. Providence Depot.
Instruments must be ready and marked to-night, (Saturday), after the Concert.

C. A. ELLIS, MANAGER.
F. R. COMEE, ASS'T MANAGER.

SATURDAY, March 9, 1895.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

14th SEASON, 1894-95.

October-November Itinerary.

Leave Boston Sunday, October 28, 7.30 P.M. Providence Depot.
Arrive Philadelphia, Monday, October 29, at 7, A.M.
CONTINENTAL HOTEL.
Rehearsal, Academy of Music at 7, P.M.
Concert at 8, P.M.
Leave Philadelphia, Tuesday, October 30, Philadelphia and Reading Depot, 12th and Market Streets, 7.40 A.M.
Arrive Baltimore, Camden St. Station, at 10.15 A.M.
CARROLLTON HOTEL.
Leave Baltimore, Camden Street Station B. & O. R. R. at 6 P.M.
Arrive Washington 7.05 P.M
Concert at Metzerott's Music Hall, 1110 F Street, at 8 P.M.
Leave Washington, B. & O. R. R., at 10.40 P.M.
Arrive Baltimore, at 11.30 P.M.
Rehearsal at Music Hall, Mt. Royal and Maryland Avenues, Wednesday, Oct. 31, at 10.30, A.M.
Concert at 8, P.M.
Leave Baltimore, Camden Street Station, B. & O. R. R. Thursday, November 1, at 8.50, A.M.
Arrive New York, 1.55 P.M.
PARK AVENUE HOTEL.
Concert at Metropolitan Opera House, at 8 P.M.
Public Rehearsal at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Friday, Nov. 2, at 3 P.M.
Concert at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Saturday, November 3, at 8.15. P.M.
Leave New York, Saturday, November 3, midnight. Grand Central Depot.
Arrive Boston, Sunday, November 4, at 7 A.M. Providence Depot.
Instruments must be ready and marked to-night, (Saturday), after the Concert.

C. A. ELLIS, MANAGER.
F. R. COMEE, ASS'T MANAGER.

SATURDAY, October 27, 1894.

The Kneisel Quartet was organized in 1884 by Franz Kneisel, who came to America in that year to accept an appointment as Concertmeister of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and to establish a series of Chamber Music Concerts in Boston, to be of the same high standard as those of the larger organization.

The Quartet includes the leading Viola and the leading 'Cellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and is made up of the following artists:

Franz Kneisel, 1st Violin.
Otto Roth, 2d Violin.
L. Svecenski, Viola.
Alwin Schroeder, Violoncello.

Its annual series of concerts in Boston, New York, and other cities attract the attention of connoisseurs and professionals alike, and have been pronounced by the most exacting critics to be unexcelled by those of any similar organization in the world.

.. BOSTON MUSIC HALL ..

TUESDAY AFTERNOON
JANUARY 29, AT 2.30 ..

Boston Symphony Orchestra

MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR
.. AND ..

= MELBA =

EXTRA POPULAR MATINEE

Tickets with reserved seats, $2, $1.50, and $1, according to location, now on sale at the Box Office.

.. Press Notices ..

.....

"In all these works the playing of Mr. Kneisel and his fellows was quite beyond praise, altogether lovely in tone and sentiment, and finished in execution. The audience was rapturous in its applause after each movement."—N. Y. Tribune.

.....

"It is not too much to say that the Beethoven quartet was played divinely."—N. Y. Times.

.....

"This Quartet [Kneisel] is the greatest in America; and, allied to its beauty of tone production,—a true quartet tone,—its interpretations are always significant and truthful."—N. Y. Recorder.

.....

"Everything that Messrs. Kneisel, Roth, Svecenski, and Schroeder select is sure to be well played."—N. Y. Evening Post.

.....

"The fifth quartet of the series which forms Beethoven's Op. 18 was given with a perfection that aroused the audience (which was as large as the hall would allow) to the most fervid applause at the end of each movement. Such marvellous ensemble, such exquisite shading, require something more graphic than type for adequate description."—Boston Advertiser.

.....

"The Dvorák quartet was given with a perfection that makes all criticism ridiculous. Never have the Kneisels done a finer piece of artistic work."—Boston Transcript.

.....

"It is no hyperbole to say that the playing of the Kneisel Quartet at their fourth concert was perfect."—Boston Beacon.

BLANK PAGE

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCVII., NO. 13.

SUNDAY, JANUARY 13, 1895.

THE TRIUMPH OF M. YSAYE.

The Great Violinist Holds His Hearers Spellbound.

Tremendous Enthusiasm at His Recital in Music Hall Yesterday Afternoon.

M. Ysaye gave his first recital in Boston yesterday afternoon in Music Hall, which held an enormous audience, every seat and all the available standing room being occupied. It was not only a huge company, but its enthusiasm was tremendous. M. Ysaye was assisted by Miss Theodora Pfaffin, soprano, and Mr. Aime Lachaume, pianist. The programme played was:

Sonata for piano and violin.....Cesar Franck
Air from "Samson and Delila"...Saint-Saens
Fantasie appassionata.....Vieuxtemps
Ballade, B minor, No. 3.....Chopin
Sonata, D minor, Sarabande, Gigue, Chaconne.....Bach
Pastorale.....Bizet
Les Filles de Cadis.....Delibes
Scene au Berceau.....Ysaye
Mazurka (Dans le lointain).....Ysaye
Saltarelle Carnavalesque.....Ysaye

The French sonata was given for the first time here. It is in the extreme modern school, and is a carefully written work, with many beautiful movements in it; but on a first hearing it seems rambling, rhapsodic, formless and without meaning. The only movement that says anything clear is the finale, but even here the composer seems to be trammelled by the task he has imposed on himself of trying to be coherent. The general color of the work is poetic—that is, it has a melancholy unmeaning. Now and then the violin part is so brilliant, so difficult and so prominent that the sonata takes on the aspect of a violin concerto with a pianoforte obstruction. Its originality, however, is unquestionable, and a better acquaintance with it would doubtless make it more interesting than it appeared to be on this occasion. Of the playing of M. Ysaye, —who, by the way, was received with overwhelming cordiality it is difficult to write without exhausting the vocabulary of superlatives reserved for the greatest artists. The largeness and exquisite purity of his tone, his wonderful bowing, the ease with which he performs marvels with his left hand, the fascinating truth of his intonation, and, above all, the breadth, warmth and manliness of his style are indescribable. Criticism is out of the question. Through the whole recital one could only listen, admire and wonder.

His reading and playing of the Vieuxtemps Fantasie held every hearer fairly and irresistibly spellbound. Nothing could be more beautiful than the pathos he threw into his rendering of the more cantabile movements of the work. He was, however, at his best in the Bach sonata. There he was heard without accompaniment, and the nobility of his style and his keen artistic sympathy with what is highest and most worthy in his art were made delightfully apparent. The chacoune was given with amazing fertility of resource in variety of expression, and the extraordinary technique of the artist was displayed at its finest in what is, perhaps, the most exacting work ever written for the violin. At the close of his performance he was rewarded with an outburst of applause that was almost deafening, and he was recalled again and again. His own compositions are very charming. It is true that they are mainly of a virtuoso nature, but their melodies are flowing, unconventional and dignified, and they are dignified in character. The Cradle Song is especially pretty and interesting, and the dainty mazourka has a peculiarly piquant grace in the pianissimo that prevails through it. The Saltarelle is a bit of pyrotechnics for fingers and bow, in his playing of which the artist dazzled and almost bewildered his audience by his appeal to both eyes and ears. Again he was greeted with a storm of plaudits, and was recalled many times. The concert was, perhaps, somewhat too long, but it is not every day that one hears an Ysaye.

Miss Pfaffin's singing was pleasantly received. Her voice is somewhat thin and wiry in quality, but she sings tunefully and with spirit, and she found favor with the audience. Mr. Lachaume's playing throughout was artistic in feeling and his technique is admirable. His performance of the Chopin ballad was somewhat more robust than is the custom, but it was thoughtful and had a welcome freedom from affectation.

On Wednesday afternoon, Jan. 23, a second recital will be given by the same artists. M. Ysaye will be heard in the Kreutzer Sonata by Beethoven; a sonata by Bach, Beethoven's Romanza in F, a paraphrase from Wagner's "Parsifal," another of the Siegfried idyls, and the "Zigeuner Weiser," by Sarasate.

[illegible] HERALD.
[illegible] 1895.
The Cheapest Paper of the State.

MONDAY MORNING, JAN. 14, 1895.

AN ISAYE CRAZE

SEEMS TO BE COMING IN BOSTON.

The Violinist's First Concert Given in Music Hall Saturday—The Programme Chiefly of the French School, with a Back Number to Flavor It—New Music.

Unless signs fail, an Isaye craze is setting in, similar to the Paderewski furore. Music Hall was crowded in every part Saturday afternoon, on the occasion of the first concert given by the great violinist. The audience was not such as one finds at the usual "miscellaneous concert," and while there was abundance of applause, the encore fiend was conspicuous by his absence.

The programme was chiefly of the French school, yet the one Bach number was sufficient to put the stamp of classicality upon the entire proceedings. The first number of the programme might also fairly be called classical, although it was not in the regular sonata form. It was a sonata for violin and piano, by Cesar Franck, and was heard for the first time here. It was solid and true music, not giving the melodic grace of a Massenet or the sparkle of a St. Saens, but presenting well developed ideas, good figure treatment and well chosen contrasts. Its last movement was its strongest and had some interesting imitative work between violin and piano. At the latter instrument sat a young artist not unknown to Boston; when "L'Enfant Prodigue" was given at the Boston Museum some time ago, there was an artist at the piano who chiefly carried that graceful pantomime to success; his name was Aimé Lachaume, and when he reappeared in this more legitimate musical atmosphere he was most cordially welcomed. His playing was as intelligent and as poetic as ever, but he was somewhat overweighted in the second and last movements of this sonata. Of M. Isaye's violin work in this one can only speak in terms of enthusiasm; the work is one which would probably make but a dry effect in any but the greatest hands, and the delicacy of shading and sweetness of tone had much to do with winning the work the success it achieved. M. Isaye's next number was of a very different character; it it was Vieuxtemps Fantasie appassionata; Vieuxtemps is really worthy of his name, since his music represents a bygone epoch, an era of violin fireworks, a time when virtuosity was its own reward. Of course every technical barricade was captured with exciting energy, and the violinist frankly paused with expectation of applause (which he received galore), even in the midst of the work, regardless of the fact that the hard-worked M. Lachaume was still laboring at the keyboard.

Musical greatness M. Isaye undoubtedly has, and it stood forth in all its glory in the performance of the Bach sonata in D minor. This was a gradual ascent to Olympus, for the first movement, the Sarabande, was powerful; the second, a Gigue, was still more so, and the great Chaconne was a culmination which was not to be surpassed. This Chaconne, universally recognized as one of the most difficult violin works in existence, is Joachim's favorite chevul de bataille, but Isaye is not inferior to the great Hungarian in this number; it is not too much to say that this was the greatest performance of this work that has yet been heard in America. M. Isaye himself might be characterized as a younger Joachim, in that he so thoroughly combines technique with artistic expression. He is not yet so broad in tone as Joachim, he does not rival the late Wieniawski in this direction, but he combines Sarasate's tenderness of tone and showy technique, with something more manly than Sarasate can give, and there is more sincerity and enthusiasm in his playing than one gets from most of the great masters of the violin. The amount of shading and expression which he put into the Bach Chaconne may not have been in line with tradition, but it is a modernization which is commendable nevertheless.

The recalls after this number were too numerous to be counted, but no attempt was made to force an encore. The last numbers of the programme were three pieces of M. Isaye's own composition. All three were graceful, although none was great. The Scene au Berceau was a romantic bit of the modern French school, introducing plenty of work with the mute. The exquisite quality of the artist's tone was remarkable in this. The Mazurka, which came next, had more of technical display, and the full tones of the G string, the rapidity and surety of the double-stopping, and the fine harmonics, deserve chronicling. Finally a showy Saltarelle with some phenomenal combinations of bow and pizzicato brought the great violinist's work to a close. One can only say as a summing up, that it is an open question whether M. Isaye is not at present the world's greatest violinist.

Miss Theodora Pfaffin gave some songs of the modern French school. She has a very agreeable voice, sufficiently flexible, sure in intonation, and catches up the spirit of what she sings in a praiseworthy fashion. "Agreeable" is, however, the strongest adjective that may be applied as yet, for of passion or of verve there is much promise rather than full attainment, although the sweetness and purity of the voice are very charming.

M. Lachaume deserves praise for the conscientious way in which he performed his manifold duties. He was musician-of-all-work during the concert, but appeared once as a soloist in Chopin's ballade in B minor. This he performed with some freedom of phrasing, but with a poetry and caprice that made amends for the fault. He was heartily applauded and recalled at the end of the number. Miss Pfaffin also received enthusiastic recalls after her songs.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

[illegible]

SUNDAY, JANUARY 13, 1895.

The First Concert Given by Ysaye in Music Hall.

Mr. Eugene Ysaye, violinist, assisted by Miss Theodora Pfaffiin, soprano, and Mr. Aimé Lachaume, pianist, gave a concert yesterday afternoon in Music Hall. There was a very large and enthusiastic audience. The program was as follows:

Sonata for violin and piano.....Cesar Franck
(First Time.)
Messrs. Ysaye and Lachaume.
Air, "Samson et Dalila".....Saint-Saens
Miss Pfaffiin.
Fantasia Appassionata.....Vieuxtemps
Mr. Ysaye.
Ballade, in A flat major.....Chopin
Mr. Lachaume.
Sonata, in D minor, Sarabande, Gigue, Chaconne, for violin alone.....Bach
Mr. Ysaye.
a Pastorale.....Bizet
b "Les filles de Cadiz".....Delibes
Miss Pfaffiin.
Soli for violin, Scene au Berceau; Mazurka, No. 3 ("Dans le lointain"); Saltarelle Carnavalesque.....Ysaye
Mr. Ysaye.

Glorious and entrancing as was the playing of Ysaye, the virtuoso, the feature of the concert was the sonata of César Auguste Franck as played by Ysaye and Lachaume. For here, at last, was an opportunity of hearing in its perfection a masterpiece by one of the greatest composers of this century. These are big words. Time will nod his head to the truth of the statement.

How quiet and how useful was the life of this modest musician, who is almost unknown in this country, although a few organists appreciate the worth of the pieces written for their instrument by him. He was born in Liège, as was Ysaye. The year of his birth was 1822, and when he was 15 he entered the Paris Conservatory. In Paris he spent the rest of his life, and there he died in 1890. In Paris he was not appreciated by the public while he was alive, and yet his beautiful oratorio "Ruth" was produced as long ago as 1846. In 1872 he was nominated professor of the organ at the Conservatory, and thus he influenced modern French music; for to many young composers who wished to devote themselves to orchestral compostion he was the beloved and revered "Père Franck."

This is not the place to give a list of his orchestral and choral works, his songs and chamber music. Each year they are heard more frequently, and in Germany he has obtained his just rating. It is enough to say here that the sonata for violin and piano is one of his later works.

The most serious-minded of French musicians admit his pre-eminence in absolute music in France. Conservatives and radicals agree in this. It was Chabrier who spoke in the name of the Société Nationale at his grave. Among the illustrious pupils are Fawré, Bruneau, Messager, Vincent d'Indy, Coquard, Camille Benoit, Hue, Pierné, Tiersot, Augusta Holmés; it is a long list.

The chief characteristic of this sonata so superbly played by pianist as well as violinist is its intense purity. Here is music free from earthly dross. In an age when all Frenchmen as Matthew Arnold said are given up apparently to the worship of the goddess Lubricity, here is music without suggestion of woman, without a trace of human passion. To some perhaps the themes may seem cold; say, rather, mystical. But how noble, how spiritual are themes and developments. Here is nothing carelessly contrived for the display of virtuosity. On the contrary, there is absolute finish without thought of personal display for the interpreters. How lovely, how musical the canon in the finale; but would a careless hearer have ever suspected that the flowing measures were a triumph of scholastic skill?

***

There is nothing new to be said of Ysaye's performance. He was tested yesterday in every way, and in every way he acquitted himself manfully and artistically. His greatest popular success was undoubtedly in the piece by Vieuxtemps, although he was recalled again and again after the Bach chaconne. It is easy to prophesy that some will never be satisfied with his playing of Bach. They will complain of elegance, of sentiment, of a lack of scratching virility, and heaven knows what beside. The trouble with these good people is that they have evolved a Bach out of their inner consciousness, and then they fit the player to their idea of the composer. But was Bach as dry as they pretend? Had he not feeling, passions, soul, aspirations, doubts? Why should he be hammered out, or dried and salted? And yet some would say seriously, "When you play Bach, shut your eyes, saw away, keep time with your foot, and breathe hard. Remember that Bach must not be played as though he were a modern." To which a polite though not forcible enough answer is "Fudge."

Mr. Ysaye's pieces were chiefly interesting on account of the fact that they were played by the composer. They are pretty enough and catchy—and that is all.

Admirable in all respects was the piano playing of Mr. Lachaume. When he was at the Boston Museum as the pianist of the "Enfant Prodigue" Company he delighted by his skill and sympathetic treatment. Yesterday he showed a finely-developed technique, artistic intelligence and indisputable musical feeling. He is, indeed, a welcome visitor.

As for Miss Pfaffin she sang the passionate aria from "Samson and Delilah" with the coquetry of a canary bird. In the other selections she was heard to greater advantage.

PHILIP HALE.

The Evening Standard.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.

MONDAY EVENING, JAN. 14.

THE YSAYE CONCERTS.

So great was the demand in Boston the past week for tickets to the Ysaye concert, and many being unable to secure the seats they desired, that the management has arranged for two additional concerts in Boston—a matinee Wednesday afternoon, Jan. 23d, at Music hall, and a Sunday evening concert at the Boston theater, Jan. 20th. There will be an entire change of programme at each of these concerts, the matinee numbers including several novelties in the way of violin music, sure to attract the attention of violin students, while M. Lachaume and Miss Pfaffiin will be heard in choice selections. For the concert at the Boston theater next Sunday evening, in addition to these artists, a large and efficient orchestra of picked musicians from America's principal musical organization will assist under the leadership of the great Boston favorite, Mr. T. Adamowski, who makes this his only appearance as a conductor outside of the summer promenade concerts, and the orchestral numbers will be of the same nature, brilliant and popular as at these concerts.

[12]

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, JAN. 13, 1895.

Ysaye Gives a Concert in Music Hall.

The distinguished Belgian pianist, Eugene Ysaye, whose appearance at a recent symphony concert made a profound impression here, gave a recital in Music hall yesterday afternoon, assisted by Miss Theodora Pfaffin, soprano, and Mr Aime Lachaume, pianist.

The audience was very large and unusually demonstrative in expressing appreciation of all that was offered. Had the artists complied with the demands for encore numbers the concert would have been twice the proper length. As will be seen by the following the original program was of great length:

Sonata for violin and piano .....Cesar Franck
Messrs Ysaye and Lachaume
Air de Samson et Dalila .....C S Saint-Saens
Miss Pfaffiin
Fantasia Appassionata .....Vieuxtemps
Mr Ysaye
Ballade, in B minor, No. 3 .....Chopin
Mr Lachaume
Sonata, in D minor .....Bach
Mr Ysaye
Pastorale .....Bizet
Les Filles de Cadiz .....Delibes
Miss Pfaffiin
Scene au Berceau .....E Ysaye
Mazurka, No. 3 (Dans le lointain) .....E Ysaye
Saltarelle Carnavalesque .....E Ysaye
Mr Ysaye

There was no doubt left regarding Mr Ysaye's standing as an artist after his playing with the symphony orchestra, but yesterday the varied program offered opportunities of enjoying to the full his superb technique, his grand style, force, depth of sentiment and incomparable beauty and purity of tone.

The Cesar Franck sonata is not an especially interesting or comprehensive composition, but it offers a good many opportunities for the performer to display his virtuosity, and in consequence was listened to with rapt attention yesterday afternoon. The pianist was inclined to use the pedal too much, and frequently drowned the tone of the violin altogether.

The Vieuxtemps fantasia, as played by Mr Ysaye, was a dazzling exhibition of virtuosity, and was remarkable for its correctness of intonation. The Bach sonata for violin alone is a most trying work, and consequently is not often performed. Ysaye played it superbly yesterday, giving the three movements, sarabande, gigne and chaconne, with splendid expression and in true classic style.

The three original compositions are pleasing works, and are written in a free and graceful style, possessing considerable melody and offering admirable opportunities for display of the performer's virtuosity. As played by their composer they are indeed charming.

Mr Lachaume played Ysaye's accompaniments with excellent judgment and fine effect. He also made a rather favorable impression by his solo performance of the Chopin ballad. His playing was technically correct, but lacked color and warmth of expression.

Miss Pfaffiin has a light and pleasing voice which she uses generally with good effect. She was not heard to particular advantage in the "Samson et Dalila" aria, but made a better impression in the song by Delibes.

Two more concerts will be given in Boston by M Ysaye, the first on Sunday evening, Jan 20, at the Boston theater, and the second on Wednesday afternoon, Jan 23, at Music hall. At the first concert M Ysaye will be assisted by an orchestra under the leadership of Mr Adamowski. At the afternoon concert M Ysaye will present several novelties and some well-known compositions, both of great interest to violin players and musicians.

Gazette

SUNDAY MORNING EDITION.

BOSTON, JAN. 27, 1895

The Ysaye Recital.

The second Ysaye concert was given at Music Hall, on Wednesday afternoon, with the following programme: Beethoven's Kreutzer Sonata; Paraphrase de Parsifal, Siegfried Idyll, Wagner-Wilhelmj; Scherzo in B-flat minor, Chopin, played by Mr. Lachaume; Sonata in B-flat Bach; Romance in F, Beethoven; Zigeuner Weisen, Sarasate.

The Kreutzer sonata was finely played both by Mr. Ysaye and by Mr. Lachaume, and it aroused the wildest enthusiasm. It is in all-sufficing pleasure to listen to the delightful tones that Mr. Ysaye draws from his violin, but when to this are added surpassing technique, the rarest sympathetic insight and the capacity in the artist to produce all the effects intended by the composer a degree of satisfaction is reached that can be expressed only by praise that savors of adulation. What, for example, shall be said of the marvellous playing of the Bach sonata? Here there was no tampering with classic dignity and severity, but what a wonderful transformation was brought about. Bach eagerly and hungrily listened to by the average lover of music; a work that the average interpreter converts into an arid desert, transformed into a paradise. In the playing of this one work alone, Mr. Ysaye vindicated the justice of all the praise that was or could be bestowed on him. Broadness, dignity, impressiveness, full comprehension, full powers of expression, the most skilled fingers, a magic bow, and a violin gifted with a responsive soul. As Mr. Wegg would say, this is dropping into poetry; but cold, formal criticism is an insult to this fine artist, who can raise even indifference to the pitch of fine frenzy. Almost equal to the Bach interpretation was the playing of the Wilhelmj arrangements of Wagner; difficulties were there, and in abundance, and how easily they were conquered no one noticed in the larger pleasure of yielding to the emotions that the playing called forth. Throughout, the most exacting criticism was more than satisfied, and nothing remains to be done but to heap praise on, praise.

The work performed by Mr. Lachaume, as accompanist, is of high quality; he was particularly admirable in the Kreutzer sonata, and demonstrated that he had not only skilled fingers, but the rarer gift of high artistic intelligence and conscience. His solo number—Chopin's B-flat minor Scherzo—was also an admirable piece of work, somewhat marred by forced and obtrusive emphasis.

Miss Priscilla White sang an aria by Handel, and two songs by Mrs. Beach. The distinguishing trait of Miss White, as an artist, is her confidence in herself; whether in tune or out of tune, whether she runs away from or lags behind the accompanying piano, whether or not she trills on a right or a wrong note, makes no difference to her, she airily finishes her work according to her own ideas, and if she is wrong, that is the fault of the composer. The hearty manner in which she misinterpreted Handel was admirable; the debonair manner in which she took her breath in the wrong places, the gay carelessness of her phrasing, the originality of her trilling on the wrong notes, and her innocent satisfaction in finishing a piece according to a new method, are pleasant memories. And yet Miss White has very much to learn before she can be accepted as a solo singer; she sings out of tune, she has no ear for rhythm, her phrasing is faulty, and there is no evidence of an inspiration that will partly excuse a bad method.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCVII., NO. 13.

SUNDAY, JANUARY 13, 1895.

THE TRIUMPH OF M. YSAYE.

The Great Violinist Holds His Hearers Spellbound.

Tremendous Enthusiasm at His Recital in Music Hall Yesterday Afternoon.

M. Ysaye gave his first recital in Boston yesterday afternoon in Music Hall, which held an enormous audience, every seat and all the available standing room being occupied. It was not only a huge company, but its enthusiasm was tremendous. M. Ysaye was assisted by Miss Theodora Pfaffin, soprano, and Mr. Aime Lachaume, pianist. The programme played was:

Sonata for piano and violin.....Cesar Franck
Air from "Samson and Delila"...Saint-Saens
Fantasie appassionata.....Vieuxtemps
Ballade, B minor, No. 3.....Chopin
Sonata, D minor, Sarabande, Gigue, Chaconne .....Bach
Pastorale .....Bizet
Les Filles de Cadiz.....Delibes
Scene au Berceau.....Ysaye
Mazurka, (Dans le lointain).....Ysaye
Saltarelle Carnavalesque.....Ysaye

The French sonata was given for the first time here. It is in the extreme modern school, and is a carefully written work, with many beautiful movements in it; but on a first hearing it seems rambling, rhapsodic, formless and without meaning. The only movement that says anything clear is the finale, but even here the composer seems to be trammelled by the task he has imposed on himself of trying to be coherent. The general color of the work is poetic—that is, it has a melancholy unmeaning. Now and then the violin part is so brilliant, so difficult and so prominent that the sonata takes on the aspect of a violin concerto with a pianoforte obstruction. Its originality, however, is unquestionable, and a better acquaintance with it would doubtless make it more interesting than it appeared to be on this occasion. Of the playing of M. Ysaye, —who, by the way, was received with overwhelming cordiality it is difficult to write without exhausting the vocabulary of superlatives reserved for the greatest artists. The largeness and exquisite purity of his tone, his wonderful bowing, the ease with which he performs marvels with his left hand, the fascinating truth of his intonation, and, above all, the breadth, warmth and manliness of his style are indescribable. Criticism is out of the question. Through the whole recital one could only listen, admire and wonder.

His reading and playing of the Vieuxtemps Fantasie held every hearer fairly and irresistibly spellbound. Nothing could be more beautiful than the pathos he threw into his rendering of the more cantabile movements of the work. He was, however, at his best in the Bach sonata. There he was heard without accompaniment, and the nobility of his style and his keen artistic sympathy with what is highest and most worthy in his art were made delightfully apparent. The chacoune was given with amazing fertility of resource in variety of expression, and the extraordinary technique of the artist was displayed at its finest in what is, perhaps, the most exacting work ever written for the violin. At the close of his performance he was rewarded with an outburst of applause that was almost deafening, and he was recalled again and again. His own compositions are very charming. It is true that they are mainly of a virtuoso nature, but their melodies are flowing, unconventional and dignified, and they are dignified in character. The Cradle Song is especially pretty and interesting, and the dainty mazourka has a peculiarly piquant grace in the pianissimo that prevails through it. The Satanelle is a bit of pyrotechnics for fingers and bow, in his playing of which the artist dazzled and almost bewildered his audience by his appeal to both eyes and ears. Again he was greeted with a storm of plaudits, and was recalled many times. The concert was, perhaps, somewhat too long, but it is not every day that one hears an Ysaye.

Miss Pfaffin's singing was pleasantly received. Her voice is somewhat thin and wiry in quality, but she sings tunefully and with spirit, and she found favor with the audience. Mr. Lachaume's playing throughout was artistic in feeling and his technique is admirable. His performance of the Chopin ballad was somewhat more robust than is the custom, but it was thoughtful and had a welcome freedom from affectation.

On Wednesday afternoon, Jan. 23, a second recital will be given by the same artists. M. Ysaye will be heard in the Kreutzer Sonata by Beethoven; a sonata by Bach, Beethoven's Romanza in F, a paraphrase from Wagner's "Parsifal," another of the Siegfried Idyls, and the "Zigeuner Weiser," by Sarasate.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
MONDAY MORNING, JAN. 14, 1895.

AN ISAYE CRAZE

SEEMS TO BE COMING IN BOSTON.

The Violinist's First Concert Given in Music Hall Saturday—The Programme Chiefly of the French School, with a Back Number to Flavor It—New Music.

Unless signs fail, an Isaye craze is setting in, similar to the Paderewski furore. Music Hall was crowded in every part Saturday afternoon, on the occasion of the first concert given by the great violinist. The audience was not such as one finds at the usual "miscellaneous concert," and while there was abundance of applause, the encore fiend was conspicuous by his absence.

The programme was chiefly of the French school, yet the one Bach number was sufficient to put the stamp of classicality upon the entire proceedings. The first number of the programme might also fairly be called classical, although it was not in the regular sonata form. It was a sonata for violin and piano, by Cesar Franck, and was heard for the first time here. It was solid and true music, not giving the melodic grace of a Massenet or the sparkle of a St. Saens, but presenting well developed ideas, good figure treatment and well chosen contrasts. Its last movement was its strongest and had some interesting imitative work between violin and piano. At the latter instrument sat a young artist not unknown to Boston; when "L'Enfant Prodigue" was given at the Boston Museum some time ago, there was an artist at the piano who chiefly carried that graceful pantomime to success; his name was Aime Lachaume, and when he reappeared in this more legitimate musical atmosphere he was most cordially welcomed. His playing was as intelligent and as poetic as ever, but he was somewhat overweighted in the second and last movements of this sonata. Of M. Isaye's violin work in this one can only speak in terms of enthusiasm; the work is one which would probably make but a dry effect in any but the greatest hands, and the delicacy of shading and sweetness of tone had much to do with winning the work the success it achieved. M. Isaye's next number was of a very different character; it it was Vieuxtemps Fantasie appassionata; Vieuxtemps is really worthy of his name, since his music represents a bygone epoch, an era of violin fireworks, a time when virtuosity was its own reward. Of course every technical barricade was captured with exciting energy, and the violinist frankly paused with expectation of applause (which he received galore), even in the midst of the work, regardless of the fact that the hard-worked M. Lachaume was still laboring at the keyboard.

Musical greatness M. Isaye undoubtedly has, and it stood forth in all its glory in the performance of the Bach sonata in D minor. This was a gradual ascent to Olympus, for the first movement, the Sarabande, was powerful; the second, a Gigue, was still more so, and the great Chaconne was a culmination which was not to be surpassed. This Chaconne, universally recognized as one of the most difficult violin works in existence, is Joachim's favorite cheval de bataille, but Isaye is not inferior to the great Hungarian in this number; it is not too much to say that this was the greatest performance of this work that has yet been heard in America. M. Isaye himself might be characterized as a younger Joachim, in that he so thoroughly combines technique with artistic expression. He is not yet so broad in tone as Joachim, he does not rival the late Wieniawski in this direction, but he combines Sarasate's tenderness of tone and showy technique, with something more manly than Sarasate can give, and there is more sincerity and enthusiasm in his playing than one gets from most of the great masters of the violin. The amount of shading and expression which he put into the Bach Chaconne may not have been in line with tradition, but it is a modernization which is commendable nevertheless.

The recalls after this number were too numerous to be counted, but no attempt was made to force an encore. The last numbers of the programme were three pieces of M. Isaye's own composition. All three were graceful, although none was great. The Scene au Berceau was a romantic bit of the modern French school, introducing plenty of work with the mute. The exquisite quality of the artist's tone was remarkable in this. The Mazurka, which came next, had more of technical display, and the full tones of the G string, the rapidity and surety of the double-stopping, and the fine harmonics, deserve chronicling. Finally a showy Saltarelle with some phenomenal combinations of bow and pizzicato brought the great violinist's work to a close. One can only say as a summing up, that it is an open question whether M. Isaye is not at present the world's greatest violinist.

Miss Theodora Pfaffin gave some songs of the modern French school. She has a very agreeable voice, sufficiently flexible, sure in intonation, and catches up the spirit of what she sings in a praiseworthy fashion. "Agreeable" is, however, the strongest adjective that may be applied as yet, for of passion or of verve there is much promise rather than full attainment, although the sweetness and purity of the voice are very charming.

M. Lachaume deserves praise for the conscientious way in which he performed his manifold duties. He was musician-of-all-work during the concert, but appeared once as a soloist in Chopin's ballade in B minor. This he performed with some freedom of phrasing, but with a poetry and caprice that made amends for the fault. He was heartily applauded and recalled at the end of the number. Miss Pfaffin also received enthusiastic recalls after her songs.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Journal.
SUNDAY, JANUARY 13, 1895.

The First Concert Given by Ysaye in Music Hall.

Mr. Eugene Ysaye, violinist, assisted by Miss Theodora Pfaffin, soprano, and Mr. Aimé Lachaume, pianist, gave a concert yesterday afternoon in Music Hall. There was a very large and enthusiastic audience. The program was as follows:

Sonata for violin and piano.....Cesar Franck
(First Time.)
Messrs. Ysaye and Lachaume.
Air, "Samson et Dalila".....Saint-Saens
Miss Pfaffin.
Fantasia Appassionata.....Vieuxtemps
Mr. Ysaye.
Ballade, in A flat major.....Chopin
Mr. Lachaume.
Sonata, in D minor, Sarabande, Gigue, Chaconne, for violin alone.....Bach
Mr. Ysaye.
a Pastorale .....Bizet
b "Les filles de Cadiz".....Delibes
Miss Pfaffin.
Soli for violin, Scene au Berceau; Mazurka, No. 3 ("Dans le lointain"); Saltarelle Carnavalesque .....Ysaye
Mr. Ysaye.

Glorious and entrancing as was the playing of Ysaye, the virtuoso, the feature of the concert was the sonata of César Auguste Franck as played by Ysaye and Lachaume. For here, at last, was an opportunity of hearing in its perfection a masterpiece by one of the greatest composers of this century. These are big words. Time will nod his head to the truth of the statement.

How quiet and how useful was the life of this modest musician, who is almost unknown in this country, although a few organists appreciate the worth of the pieces written for their instrument by him. He was born in Liège, as was Ysaye. The year of his birth was 1822, and when he was 15 he entered the Paris Conservatory. In Paris he spent the rest of his life, and there he died in 1890. In Paris he was not appreciated by the public while he was alive, and yet his beautiful oratorio "Ruth" was produced as long ago as 1846. In 1872 he was nominated professor of the organ at the Conservatory, and thus he influenced modern French music; for to many young composers who wished to devote themselves to orchestral compostion he was the beloved and revered "Père Franck."

This is not the place to give a list of his orchestral and choral works, his songs and chamber music. Each year they are heard more frequently, and in Germany he has obtained his just rating. It is enough to say here that the sonata for violin and piano is one of his later works.

The most serious-minded of French musicians admit his pre-eminence in absolute music in France. Conservatives and radicals agree in this. It was Chabrier who spoke in the name of the Société Nationale at his grave. Among the illustrious pupils are Fawré, Bruneau, Messager, Vincent d'Indy, Coquard, Camille Benoit, Hue, Pierné, Tiersot, Augusta Holmés; it is a long list.

The chief characteristic of this sonata so superbly played by pianist as well as violinist is its intense purity. Here is music free from earthly dross. In an age when all Frenchmen as Matthew Arnold said are given up apparently to the worship of the goddess Lubricity, here is music without suggestion of woman, without a trace of human passion. To some perhaps the themes may seem cold; say, rather, mystical. But how noble, how spiritual are themes and developments. Here is nothing carelessly contrived for the display of virtuosity. On the contrary, there is absolute finish without thought of personal display for the interpreters. How lovely, how musical the canon in the finale; but would a careless hearer have ever suspected that the flowing measures were a triumph of scholastic skill?

***

There is nothing new to be said of Ysaye's performance. He was tested yesterday in every way, and in every way he acquitted himself manfully and artistically. His greatest popular success was undoubtedly in the piece by Vieuxtemps, although he was recalled again and again after the Bach chaconne. It is easy to prophesy that some will never be satisfied with his playing of Bach. They will complain of elegance, of sentiment, of a lack of scratching virility, and heaven knows what beside. The trouble with these good people is that they have evolved a Bach out of their inner consciousness, and then they fit the player to their idea of the composer. But was Bach as dry as they pretend? Had he not feeling, passions, soul, aspirations, doubts? Why should he be hammered out, or dried and salted? And yet some would say seriously, "When you play Bach, shut your eyes, saw away, keep time with your foot, and breathe hard. Remember that Bach must not be played as though he were a modern." To which a polite though not forcible enough answer is "Fudge."

Mr. Ysaye's pieces were chiefly interesting on account of the fact that they were played by the composer. They are pretty enough and catchy—and that is all.

Admirable in all respects was the piano playing of Mr. Lachaume. When he was at the Boston Museum as the pianist of the "Enfant Prodigue" Company he delighted by his skill and sympathetic treatment. Yesterday he showed a finely-developed technique, artistic intelligence and indisputable musical feeling. He is, indeed, a welcome visitor.

As for Miss Pfaffin she sang the passionate aria from "Samson and Delilah" with the coquetry of a canary bird. In the other selections she was heard to greater advantage.

PHILIP HALE.

The Evening Standard.
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
MONDAY EVENING, JAN. 14.

THE YSAYE CONCERTS.

So great was the demand in Boston the past week for tickets to the Ysaye concert, and many being unable to secure the seats they desired, that the management has arranged for two additional concerts in Boston—a matinee Wednesday afternoon, Jan. 23d, at Music hall, and a Sunday evening concert at the Boston theater, Jan. 20th. There will be an entire change of programme at each of these concerts, the matinee numbers including several novelties in the way of violin music, sure to attract the attention of violin students, while M. Lachaume and Miss Pfaffin will be heard in choice selections. For the concert at the Boston theater next Sunday evening, in addition to these artists, a large and efficient orchestra of picked musicians from America's principal musical organization will assist under the leadership of the great Boston favorite, Mr. T. Adamowski, who makes this his only appearance as a conductor outside of the summer promenade concerts, and the orchestral numbers will be of the same nature, brilliant and popular as at these concerts.

[12]

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, JAN. 13, 1895.

Ysaye Gives a Concert in Music Hall.

The distinguished Belgian pianist, Eugene Ysaye, whose appearance at a recent symphony concert made a profound impression here, gave a recital in Music hall yesterday afternoon, assisted by Miss Theodora Pfaffin, soprano, and Mr Aime Lachaume, pianist.

The audience was very large and unusually demonstrative in expressing appreciation of all that was offered. Had the artists complied with the demands for encore numbers the concert would have been twice the proper length. As will be seen by the following the original program was of great length:

Sonata for violin and piano .....Cesar Franck
Messrs Ysaye and Lachaume
Air de Samson et Dalila .....C S Saint-Saens
Miss Pfaffin
Fantasia Appassionata .....Vieuxtemps
Mr Ysaye
Ballade, in B minor, No. 3 .....Chopin
Mr Lachaume
Sonata, in D minor .....Bach
Mr Ysaye
Pastorale .....Bizet
Les Filles de Cadiz .....Delibes
Miss Pfaffin
Scene au Berceau .....E Ysaye
Mazurka, No. 3 (Dans le lointain) .....E Ysaye
Saltarelle Carnavalesque .....E Ysaye
Mr Ysaye

There was no doubt left regarding Mr Ysaye's standing as an artist after his playing with the symphony orchestra, but yesterday the varied program offered opportunities of enjoying to the full his superb technique, his grand style, force, depth of sentiment and incomparable beauty and purity of tone.

The Cesar Franck sonata is not an especially interesting or comprehensive composition, but it offers a good many opportunities for the performer to display his virtuosity, and in consequence was listened to with rapt attention yesterday afternoon. The pianist was inclined to use the pedal too much, and frequently drowned the tone of the violin altogether.

The Vieuxtemps fantasia, as played by Mr Ysaye, was a dazzling exhibition of virtuosity, and was remarkable for its correctness of intonation. The Bach sonata for violin alone is a most trying work, and consequently is not often performed. Ysaye played it superbly yesterday, giving the three movements, sarabande, gigne and chaconne, with splendid expression and in true classic style.

The three original compositions are pleasing works, and are written in a free and graceful style, possessing considerable melody and offering admirable opportunities for display of the performer's virtuosity. As played by their composer they are indeed charming.

Mr Lachaume played Ysaye's accompaniments with excellent judgment and fine effect. He also made a rather favorable impression by his solo performance of the Chopin ballad. His playing was technically correct, but lacked color and warmth of expression.

Miss Pfaffin has a light and pleasing voice which she uses generally with good effect. She was not heard to particular advantage in the "Samson et Dalila" aria, but made a better impression in the song by Delibes.

Two more concerts will be given in Boston by M Ysaye, the first on Sunday evening, Jan 20, at the Boston theater, and the second on Wednesday afternoon, Jan 23, at Music hall. At the first concert M Ysaye will be assisted by an orchestra under the leadership of Mr Adamowski. At the afternoon concert M Ysaye will present several novelties and some well-known compositions, both of great interest to violin players and musicians.

Gazette
SUNDAY MORNING EDITION.
BOSTON, JAN. 27, 1895

The Ysaye Recital.

The second Ysaye concert was given at Music Hall, on Wednesday afternoon, with the following programme: Beethoven's Kreutzer Sonata; Paraphrase de Parsifal, Siegfried Idyll, Wagner-Wilhelmj; Scherzo in B-flat minor, Chopin, played by Mr. Lachaume; Sonata in B-flat Bach; Romance in F, Beethoven; Zigeuner Weisen, Sarasate.

The Kreutzer sonata was finely played both by Mr. Ysaye and by Mr. Lachaume, and it aroused the wildest enthusiasm. It is in all-sufficing pleasure to listen to the delightful tones that Mr. Ysaye draws from his violin, but when to this are added surpassing technique, the rarest sympathetic insight and the capacity in the artist to produce all the effects intended by the composer a degree of satisfaction is reached that can be expressed only by praise that savors of adulation. What, for example, shall be said of the marvellous playing of the Bach sonata? Here there was no tampering with classic dignity and severity, but what a wonderful transformation was brought about. Bach eagerly and hungrily listened to by the average lover of music; a work that the average interpreter converts into an arid desert, transformed into a paradise. In the playing of this one work alone, Mr. Ysaye vindicated the justice of all the praise that was or could be bestowed on him. Broadness, dignity, impressiveness, full comprehension, full powers of expression, the most skilled fingers, a magic bow, and a violin gifted with a responsive soul. As Mr. Wegg would say, this is dropping into poetry; but cold, formal criticism is an insult to this fine artist, who can raise even indifference to the pitch of fine frenzy. Almost equal to the Bach interpretation was the playing of the Wilhelmj arrangements of Wagner; difficulties were there, and in abundance, and how easily they were conquered no one noticed in the larger pleasure of yielding to the emotions that the playing called forth. Throughout, the most exacting criticism was more than satisfied, and nothing remains to be done but to heap praise on, praise.

The work performed by Mr. Lachaume, as accompanist, is of high quality; he was particularly admirable in the Kreutzer sonata, and demonstrated that he had not only skilled fingers, but the rarer gift of high artistic intelligence and conscience. His solo number—Chopin's B-flat minor Scherzo—was also an admirable piece of work, somewhat marred by forced and obtrusive emphasis.

Miss Priscilla White sang an aria by Handel, and two songs by Mrs. Beach. The distinguishing trait of Miss White, as an artist, is her confidence in herself; whether in tune or out of tune, whether she runs away from or lags behind the accompanying piano, whether or not she trills on a right or a wrong note, makes no difference to her, she airily finishes her work according to her own ideas, and if she is wrong, that is the fault of the composer. The hearty manner in which she misinterpreted Handel was admirable; the debonair manner in which she took her breath in the wrong places; the gay carelessness of her phrasing, the originality of her trilling on the wrong notes, and her innocent satisfaction in finishing a piece according to a new method, are pleasant memories. And yet Miss White has very much to learn before she can be accepted as a solo singer; she sings out of tune, she has no ear for rhythm, her phrasing is faulty, and there is no evidence of an inspiration that will partly excuse a bad method.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 13, 1895.

If anything could reconcile one to making a part of even a large and yet not densely crowded audience in Music Hall at a concert of strictly solo music, it would be when Mr. Ysaye was the chief performer, as he was yesterday afternoon on the occasion of his second Boston appearance. Full enjoyment is usually possible there only when either an orchestral or choral band performs or when so many people are present that there are no great gaps among them which a common feeling cannot cross unitingly. But this artist's tone is so continuously large, rich, persuasive and commanding and the magnetism of his absorption into his playing of the soul of his music, that even scattered and remote hearers are touched by his personality and respond to the musical message he diffuses among them. There was a better test of his quality and his authority in this concert than at his debut, when he had a crowded and eager assembly before him and a sympathetic and encouraging orchestral support around him. Accordingly he newly demonstrated his right to stand somewhat apart by reason of his personal values in the small group of pre-eminent contemporary masters of the violin. His list of selections named: The "Fantasia Appassionata" of Vieuxtemps; a sonata and three dance forms by Bach; a pastoral scene, a mazurka and a saltarello of his own writing, and a sonata for violin and piano, by Cesar Franck, which was new to Boston. In this last he had the assistance of M. Lachaume, who also played Chopin's B-minor Ballade, No. 30. Singing varied the progress of the programme, as Miss Theodora Pfafflin contributed the familiar scene from Saint Saens's "Sampson and Delilah," and a couple of songs by Bizet and Delibes. She came a stranger, but her sweet and sympathetic voice and nice, although not forcible style, made friends for her at once and insured her a welcome when she shall return.

The sonata, which had its first presentation, proved to be a thoughtful work, polished in style, not over-rich in material or much varied in style, but well considered in detail and having one movement—a "fantasia-recitative"—particularly suiting with the violinist's emotional disposition and manner of expression by the shifting phases of its romantic roaming. M. Ysaye's own pieces were pleasant and graceful, setting out their notions in smooth periods well placed upon the instrument and affording clever opportunities for the display of virtuosity of the less dazzling and imposing kind.

Of course the performance was for the majority of the audience of more consequence than the mere music, and equally of course M. Ysaye carried all before him by those strong elements of character and representation for which he has already become a celebrity. His absolute devotion and unreserve, his fervor and fullness, intensifying the freedom and facility of his method, were all recognized and his hearers gave him while he played an attention as flattering as their subsequent applause. The delicacy and elegance of M. Lachaume's technique and his quick spirit of intuition and accordance were delightfully felt when he accompanied "The Prodigal Son" at the Museum, and they shone forth again with a fine, soft, warm, penetrating light in his part of the concert. He seconded the violinist and the singer as if they had been doing a pantomime of passion and sentiment. Can we describe and praise his work better?

THE NEW BEDFORD MERCURY

THUBSDAY, JANUARY 31, 1895.

Ysaye Farewell Matinee.

The attendance at the three concerts already given in Boston, by M. Ysaye, the great violinist, has been so very large, and requests for another concert have been so very numerous, that Mr. Ellis has arranged for a farewell matinee at Music Hall, Saturday afternoon, February 9th, at popular prices, and this being the week the orchestra is away and the last opportunity to hear the great artist at a recital, a tremendous sale is anticipated. M. Ysaye will be heard in works by Raff, Greig, Vieuxtemps, Joachim, and M. Lachaume will also assist.

The vocalist on this occasion will be Watkin Mills, the celebrated English baritone, who makes his first concert appearance in Boston at this recital, although his work in the Christmas performances of the Handel and Haydn society was the subject of great praise and fine notices from the entire Boston press. Mr. Mills divides with Santley and Green the bass work at all the prominent English festivals and concerts, and is today one of the most popular singers known in England or America.

Saturday VoxPopuli

LOWELL, MASS., FEB. 2, 1895.

The attendance at the three concerts already given in Boston, by M. Ysaye, the great violinist, has been so very large, and requests for another concert so numerous, that Mr. Ellis has arranged for a farewell matinee at Music hall, next Saturday afternoon, at popular prices, and this being the week the orchestra is away and the last opportunity to hear the great artist at a recital, a tremendous sale is anticipated. M. Ysaye will be heard in works by Raff, Greig, Vieuxtemps, Joachim, and M. Lachaume will also assist. The vocalist on this occasion will be Mr. Watkins Mills, the celebrated English baritone, who makes his first concert appearance in Boston at this recital.

MUSICAL COURIER COMPANY.

BOSTON, Mass., January 13, 1895.

Music Hall was crowded yesterday afternoon, for Ysaye fiddled. He was assisted by Miss Pfafflin and Mr. Aimé Lachaume. The program was as follows:

Sonata for violin and piano (first time).....César Franck
Messrs. Ysaye and Lachaume.
Air, "Samson et Dalila".....Saint-Saëns
Miss Pfafflin.
Fantasia Appassionata.....Vieuxtemps
Mr. Ysaye.
Ballade, in A flat major.....Chopin
Mr. Lachaume.
Sonata, in D minor.....Bach
Mr. Ysaye.
Pastorale.....Bizet
"Les filles de Cadiz".....Delibes
Miss Pfafflin.
Scene au Berceau.....
Mazurka, No. 3 (Dans le lointain).....Ysaye
"Saltarelle Carnavalesque".....
Mr. Ysaye.

I have seldom heard such music of pure, sexless, unearthly intensity as the noble sonata for violin and piano by César Franck, that great musician who even now, after his death, is appreciated only by a few, although his fame is growing steadily. Here is music by a Frenchman, for Franck, although born in Liège, was practically a Frenchman, without the float and odor of hair, the delirious attraction of accentuated hips. Call not this sonata austere; call it not passionless. But it is not of the earth, earthy. Its flight is far beyond the world's din and distraction. It is the music of thoughtful purity, without regret or sigh. There is no suggestion of other composers who lived before him or by his side. Do you ask for technical skill? Examine that charming canon.

* * *

Such music agrees with the eulogy pronounced on the composer by "L'Ouvreuse du Cirque d'Été."

Franck was a pure artist. In days when so many only exist for puffery and by puffery, publish with success and pecuniary reward their works that are the most destitute of worth, make capital out of their movements, health and amorous adventures; when masters, or men at least who should deserve the name, show the spirit of fakirs; Franck remained honest without blemish, proudly devoted to the thankless labor, zealous for his art and that alone. He wished to ignore the choice of the crowd, the delights of the dilettanti, more unjust perhaps than the crowd. And had he known them, he would not have been anxious to satisfy them. He lived away from the world, a stranger to the quarry of appetites; composers hunting bravos, they that exploit the Muse and compel her to prostitute herself to all, could not sufficiently disdain, mock and pity contemptuously this poor genius.

Now he is dead, loved, oh! how devotedly and profoundly by a little band of disciples, to whom ten masterpieces of his heart and brain have revealed a new universe, sovereign impressions, ineffable emotions. When his death was reported, few really knew the loss to art. Even cultured amateurs asked in astonishment who was Franck, and what did he write? Some actually knew: he was a professor 'way over on the left bank of the Seine, a conscientious man, who charged much less for lessons than Marmontel. Even at the funeral ceremonies, in the procession to the grave, the management of the Conservatory, which he honored by teaching there, did not dream of being represented. To-day no one disputes the claim of this master. Orchestral leaders, amateurs, critics, the public, all who forgot Franck living or looked down on this admirable artist for whom the composition of a sonata was the great event of existence, try to play, appreciate and understand his works. The history of genius among us is the story of the Knight of the Swan. 'The day he is recognized he must leave you.'"

* * *

To speak of Ysaye's performance throughout would be to take down all the old familiar superlatives, brush them, furbish them and arrange them, if possible, in a new order. Of his own pieces it may be said that they are pretty and catchy as played by him.

M. Lachaume in the sonata and as an accompanist was of invaluable assistance. In ensemble, solo and accompaniment he displayed highly developed modern technic, intelligence, taste and true musical instinct.

Miss Pfafflin was heard to greater advantage in the songs than in the air from "Samson et Delila," which she delivered as though the affair were a June flirtation.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 10, 1895.

YSAYE CONCERT.

Music Hall was crowded yesterday afternoon at the last concert of the renowned violinist, Mr. Eugene Ysaye, assisted by Mr. Mills, the English baritone. Mr. Lachaume was to have played, but was delayed by the storm in Pennsylvania, which necessitated a slight change in the programme, although Mr. Mollenhauer was secured to appear at the last moment. Mr. Ysaye played with his accustomed finish and artistic technical detail, and all his efforts were heartily applauded. Some slight changes were made in the programme, but all the selections were most pleasing.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 10.

The Ysaye Concert.

The last matinee of Mr. Eugene Ysaye was given in Music Hall, yesterday afternoon, but the published programme was changed, owing to the absence of Mr. Lachaume. The programme, as given, included Vieuxtemps' E-major Concerto for violin and piano; Spohr's D-minor Concerto; Walther's Prize Song, Wagner-Wilhelmj; Prelude and Fugue, G-minor, Bach, and two movements from a suite, by Vieuxtemps. Mr. Watkin Mills sang a number of songs, and Mr. E. Mollenhauer was the accompanist.

The playing of Mr. Ysaye lost none of its charm and power to stir an audience into enthusiasm, even though Mr. Thompson has appeared in Boston. It is very difficult to resist the temptation to draw a comparison between the two artists, but as, thus far, Mr. Thompson has been heard only once, the Plutarch vein would be unjust to him.

As for Mr. Ysaye, criticism can only repeat itself, and praise be heaped on praise. He is the artist from every viewpoint. His technical knowledge may not be so great as that of Mr. Thompson, but it is ample for all the needs of true art, after which superfluity is simply waste.

The Vieuxtemps concerto gave Mr. Ysaye opportunity to display one aspect of his many moods, the romantic, and herein he stands easily first. The fine Bach prelude and fugue gave the chance for a display of classicism, and again demonstrated, if demonstration were needed, that the artist of many moods is the artist of many styles. Mr. Ysaye possesses the rare merit, born of faultless taste, of not confounding the classic with the cold, and of treating classic compositions as if the music died with the composers. The Bach playing was of surpassing merit throughout. It was broad, dignified and human, which, after all, is better than the so-called "angelic" playing, about which we have heard something of late; that is, the bodiless, soulless playing addressed to cherubs faulty in their anatomy, and to saints struggling with demons. It is Mr. Ysaye's merit—some consider it is fault—that he puts, at need, grace, feeling, calm beauty and passionate fire into his playing; and, while under the spell, one can readily forgive him for not standing as impassive as a granite sphinx while he is indulging in double stopping and in double octaves. Nothing finer than Mr. Ysaye's Bach playing has been heard in Boston. The Spohr concerto proved a most charming work in Mr. Ysaye's hands. The first movement begins well, but it is padded out to make it of the requisite length. The second movement is thoroughly delightful; the rondo was charming, and it was played with dazzling brilliancy by Mr. Ysaye, who aroused additional enthusiasm by refraining from treating double stopping as if it were a problem in Euclid. In all his concerts Mr. Ysaye has proved himself the thorough, conscientious artist, and it is to be hoped that in a short time Boston music lovers may again have the pleasure of hearing him.

Mr. Watkin Mills has a fine, cultivated voice. The perfect manner in which he enunciates his words is a pleasurable novelty. His intonation is not always pure, and his singing of the "Erl King" was singularly and painfully insufficient. He was more successful in the Gounod song, and appeared at his best in the "O tu Palermo," from the Sicilian Vespers, and in "Still as Night," by Bohm.

Great praise is due to the accompanist, Mr. E. Mollenhauer, who assumed his duties at a moment's notice, yet showed himself the thoroughly competent artist.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCVII., NO. 41.

SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 10, 1895.

THE YSAYE RECITAL.

M. Ysaye played before another large audience in Music Hall yesterday afternoon. Mr. Lachaume, who was to have assisted on this occasion, having been, according to the announcement made, snowed up somewhere in the wilds surrounding Philadelphia, a change was necessitated in the programme, so, instead of the Raff sonata for piano and violin, was given Vieuxtemps' concerto No. 1 in E, op 10; and for another number Spohr's 9th concerto in D minor was substituted and the Grieg sonata in G minor was replaced by the Vieuxtemps Suite in the old style. There is nothing new that can be said regarding the playing of M. Ysaye. It can be spoken of only in superlatives and these have been exhausted on it. Nothing could have been more pure in taste, style, tone and execution than his performance of the still beautiful Spohr concerto, especially in the more cantabile moments of the first movement, and notably throughout the whole of the charming slow movement, which was given with exquisite warmth, delicacy and tenderness and with a finesse of bowing that was fascinating. The artist was not in his best mood, probably owing to the suddenness with which he was compelled to change his selections, but his playing was none the less masterly and none the less satisfying. That he was enthusiastically applauded and recalled will, of course, be taken for granted. Mr. Emil Mollenhauer, who replaced the absent Mr. Lachaume, acquitted himself with admirable technical skill and in a thoroughly musicianly manner. It was a difficult task that unexpectedly fell to his lot, but he proved fully equal to it, and is entitled to the heartiest compliments for the precision, the artistic quality and the ability of his efforts.

Mr. Watkin Mills sang songs by Gounod, Verdi and Bohm, in his first group, and Handel's "O Ruddier Than the Cherry," Schubert's "The Erl King" and Pinsuti's "The Bedouin's Love Song" in his second. He has a full and resonant baritone voice of large compass and excellent in its clearness. He sings with ease, with perfect intonation and with well-trained technique; but, unfortunately, his style is dry and rigid and is monotonous in color. Something more of life and expression in his singing would make it really worth the hearing. As it is, however, his performances are far from interesting. He received very cordial applause, and was also recalled. The hall was inadequately heated, and the artists seemed to be as much disturbed by the chilly atmosphere as did the audience. Something should be attempted to make the place more comfortable during the frigid season.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 10, 1895.

The Last Ysaye Recital in Music Hall—A Sudden Change of Program on Account of the Blizzard.

Music Hall was cold and full of draughts yesterday afternoon. Although the concert was announced as beginning at 2.30, it was 2.45 before Mr. Arthur appeared on the platform and said that Mr. Lachaume was detained by the snow "somewhere in the wilderness that surrounds Philadelphia." As the music of the Raff sonata, op. 70, was in Mr. Lachaume's trunk, bag or pocket, the program was changed materially.

Mr. Emil Mollenhauer, the excellent and versatile musician, took Mr. Lachaume's place at short notice; and he played the accompaniments to violinist and singer exceedingly well.

Mr. Ysaye played the great first movement from Vieuxtemps's E major concerto, the one that envious musicians about 1840 falsely declared was composed by Charles Mayer; Spohr's D minor concerto; a fugue in G minor by Bach; Wilhelmj's arrangement of the Preislied from "the Mastersingers;" and a suite by Vieuxtemps. There is nothing to be said at this late day about Mr. Ysaye's playing. Vieuxtemps once said that Marsick of Paris understood his E major concerto better than any other violinist; but he said this before Ysaye had shown his strength. Having heard Ysaye, one knows why Vieuxtemps in his old age, far from home, longed to listen again to Ysaye's chanterelle. Beautiful, too, was the performance of the old-fashioned concerto of Spohr. All in all, perhaps it was the most delightful exhibition of the violinist's peculiar qualities that has been given at these recitals.

Mr. Watkin Mills sang the bass air from Gounod's "Queen of Sheba," "O tu Palermo," Verdi; "Calm Is the Night," Bohm; "O Ruddier Than the Cherry," Schubert's "Erl King," Pinsuti's "Bedouin Song." He showed, as do so many English singers, excellent enunciation. Furthermore, his technique was adequate, and his phrasing artistic. But his singing was for the most part dry and phlegmatic. The hearer could say constantly "Well done. You sing like a manly Englishman, who probably plays cricket and golf, and reverences his Queen." It's a pity that Mr. Mills has apparently neither by birth nor purchase a temperament.

PHILIP HALE.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, FEB. 10, 1895.

Ysaye's Concert.

The renowned Belgian violinist Ysaye attracted another large audience to Music hall yesterday afternoon, when he gave his last matinee performance in this city. The superb work of the artist was received with as much favor as at the previous concerts, and the pleasure of the audience was doubly enhanced by the vocalizing of the distinguished English baritone Watkin Mills, whose numbers evoked most hearty applause.

Mr. Aime Lachaume was unable to appear, being storm-bound somewhere in the west, and the piano accompaniments were played by Mr Emil Mollenhauer. The program was slightly changed in consequence, manager Arthur announcing the changes from the platform.

Mr Ysaye's selections were a movement from E major concerto, and suite in old style, by Vieuxtemps, concerto in D minor by Spohr, a Bach prelude and fugue, and the prize song from "The Meistersinger." The command this artist has over the violin is wonderful, and no difficulties of fingering appear to be obstacles to him. His runs are true in tone, even, and light and shades are preserved without sacrificing rapidity of execution. The encomiums showered upon Mr Ysaye in this city are deserved, and to state briefly that yesterday he repeated his former successes is giving him praise of the highest order.

The magnificent singing by Mr Watkin Mills evoked hearty applause. His voice is rich and sweet, with a bass quality which imparts a resonance to his vocalizing only found in artists of the front rank. Equal commendation is due Mr Mills for his singing of an aria from Gounod's "Queen of Sheba," Schubert's "Ere King" and the Bedouin love song, by Pinsuti.

The flexibility and evenness of his voice is quite marked for a baritone, and his phrasing and enunciation shows that not only is his method admirable, but his control of his tones is as nearly perfect as one can expect to achieve. The concert was thoroughly enjoyable in every way.

[13]

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 13, 1895.

If anything could reconcile one to making a part of even a large and yet not densely crowded audience in Music Hall at a concert of strictly solo music, it would be when Mr. Ysaye was the chief performer, as he was yesterday afternoon on the occasion of his second Boston appearance. Full enjoyment is usually possible there only when either an orchestral or choral band performs or when so many people are present that there are no great gaps among them which a common feeling cannot cross unitingly. But this artist's tone is so continuously large, rich, persuasive and commanding and the magnetism of his absorption into his playing of the soul of his music, that even scattered and remote hearers are touched by his personality and respond to the musical message he diffuses among them. There was a better test of his quality and his authority in this concert than at his debut, when he had a crowded and eager assembly before him and a sympathetic and encouraging orchestral support around him. Accordingly he newly demonstrated his right to stand somewhat apart by reason of his personal values in the small group of pre-eminent contemporary masters of the violin. His list of selections named: The "Fantasia Appassionata" of Vieuxtemps; a sonata and three dance forms by Bach; a pastoral scene, a mazurka and a saltarello of his own writing, and a sonata for violin and piano, by Cesar Franck, which was new to Boston. In this last he had the assistance of M. Lachaume, who also played Chopin's B-minor Ballade, No. 30. Singing varied the progress of the programme, as Miss Theodora Pfafflin contributed the familiar scene from Saint Saens's "Sampson and Delilah," and a couple of songs by Bizet and Delibes. She came a stranger, but her sweet and sympathetic voice and nice, although not forcible style, made friends for her at once and insured her a welcome when she shall return.

The sonata, which had its first presentation, proved to be a thoughtful work, polished in style, not over-rich in material or much varied in style, but well considered in detail and having one movement—a "fantasia-recitative"—particularly suiting with the violinist's emotional disposition and manner of expression by the shifting phases of its romantic roaming. M. Ysaye's own pieces were pleasant and graceful, setting out their notions in smooth periods well placed upon the instrument and affording clever opportunities for the display of virtuosity of the less dazzling and imposing kind.

Of course the performance was for the majority of the audience of more consequence than the mere music, and equally of course M. Ysaye carried all before him by those strong elements of character and representation for which he has already become a celebrity. His absolute devotion and unreserve, his fervor and fullness, intensifying the freedom and facility of his method, were all recognized and his hearers gave him while he played an attention as flattering as their subsequent applause. The delicacy and elegance of M. Lachaume's technique and his quick spirit of intuition and accordance were delightfully felt when he accompanied "The Prodigal Son" at the Museum, and they shone forth again with a fine, soft, warm, penetrating light in his part of the concert. He seconded the violinist and the singer as if they had been doing a pantomime of passion and sentiment. Can we describe and praise his work better?

THE NEW BEDFORD MERCURY

THUBSDAY, JANUARY 31, 1895.

Ysaye Farewell Matinee.

The attendance at the three concerts already given in Boston, by M. Ysaye, the great violinist, has been so very large, and requests for another concert have been so very numerous, that Mr. Ellis has arranged for a farewell matinee at Music Hall, Saturday afternoon, February 9th, at popular prices, and this being the week the orchestra is away and the last opportunity to hear the great artist at a recital, a tremendous sale is anticipated. M. Ysaye will be heard in works by Baff, Greig, Vieuxtemps, Joachim, and M. Lachaume will also assist.

The vocalist on this occasion will be Watkin Mills, the celebrated English baritone, who makes his first concert appearance in Boston at this recital, although his work in the Christmas performances of the Handel and Haydn society was the subject of great praise and fine notices from the entire Boston press. Mr. Mills divides with Santley and Green the bass work at all the prominent English festivals and concerts, and is today one of the most popular singers known in England or America.

Saturday VoxPopuli

LOWELL, MASS., FEB. 2, 1895.

The attendance at the three concerts already given in Boston, by M. Ysaye, the great violinist, has been so very large, and requests for another concert so numerous, that Mr. Ellis has arranged for a farewell matinee at Music hall, next Saturday afternoon, at popular prices, and this being the week the orchestra is away and the last opportunity to hear the great artist at a recital, a tremendous sale is anticipated. M. Ysaye will be heard in works by Raff, Greig, Vieuxtemps, Joachim, and M. Lachaume will also assist. The vocalist on this occasion will be Mr. Watkins Mills, the celebrated English baritone, who makes his first concert appearance in Boston at this recital.

MUSICAL COURIER COMPANY.

BOSTON, Mass., January 13, 1895.

Music Hall was crowded yesterday afternoon, for Ysaye fiddled. He was assisted by Miss Pfafflin and Mr. Aimé Lachaume. The program was as follows:

Sonata for violin and piano (first time).....César Franck
Messrs. Ysaye and Lachaume.
Air, "Samson et Dalila".....Saint-Saëns
Miss Pfafflin.
Fantasia Appassionata.....Vieuxtemps
Mr. Ysaye.
Ballade, in A flat major.....Chopin
Mr. Lachaume.
Sonata, in D minor.....Bach
Mr. Ysaye.
Pastorale.....Bizet
"Les filles de Cadiz".....Delibes
Miss Pfafflin.
Scene au Berceau.....
Mazurka, No. 3 (Dans le lointain).....Ysaye
"Saltarelle Carnavalesque".....
Mr. Ysaye.

I have seldom heard such music of pure, sexless, unearthly intensity as the noble sonata for violin and piano by César Franck, that great musician who even now, after his death, is appreciated only by a few, although his fame is growing steadily. Here is music by a Frenchman, for Franck, although born in Liège, was practically a Frenchman, without the float and odor of hair, the delirious attraction of accentuated hips. Call not this sonata austere; call it not passionless. But it is not of the earth, earthy. Its flight is far beyond the world's din and distraction. It is the music of thoughtful purity, without regret or sigh. There is no suggestion of other composers who lived before him or by his side. Do you ask for technical skill? Examine that charming canon.

* * *

Such music agrees with the eulogy pronounced on the composer by "L'Ouvreuse du Cirque d'Été."

Franck was a pure artist. In days when so many only exist for puffery and by puffery, publish with success and pecuniary reward their works that are the most destitute of worth, make capital out of their movements, health and amorous adventures; when masters, or men at least who should deserve the name, show the spirit of fakirs; Franck remained honest without blemish, proudly devoted to the thankless labor, zealous for his art and that alone. He wished to ignore the choice of the crowd, the delights of the dilettanti, more unjust perhaps than the crowd. And had he known them, he would not have been anxious to satisfy them. He lived away from the world, a stranger to the quarry of appetites; composers hunting bravos, they that exploit the Muse and compel her to prostitute herself to all, could not sufficiently disdain, mock and pity contemptuously this poor genius.

Now he is dead, loved, oh! how devotedly and profoundly by a little band of disciples, to whom ten masterpieces of his heart and brain have revealed a new universe, sovereign impressions, ineffable emotions. When his death was reported, few really knew the loss to art. Even cultured amateurs asked in astonishment who was Franck, and what did he write? Some actually knew: he was a professor 'way over on the left bank of the Seine, a conscientious man, who charged much less for lessons than Marmontel. Even at the funeral ceremonies, in the procession to the grave, the management of the Conservatory, which he honored by teaching there, did not dream of being represented. To-day no one disputes the claim of this master. Orchestral leaders, amateurs, critics, the public, all who forgot Franck living or looked down on this admirable artist for whom the composition of a sonata was the great event of existence, try to play, appreciate and understand his works. The history of genius among us is the story of the Knight of the Swan. 'The day he is recognized he must leave you.'"

* * *

To speak of Ysaye's performance throughout would be to take down all the old familiar superlatives, brush them, furbish them and arrange them, if possible, in a new order. Of his own pieces it may be said that they are pretty and catchy as played by him.

M. Lachaume in the sonata and as an accompanist was of invaluable assistance. In ensemble, solo and accompaniment he displayed highly developed modern technic, intelligence, taste and true musical instinct.

Miss Pfafflin was heard to greater advantage in the songs than in the air from "Samson et Delila," which she delivered as though the affair were a June flirtation.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 10, 1895.

YSAYE CONCERT.

Music Hall was crowded yesterday afternoon at the last concert of the renowned violinist, Mr. Eugene Ysaye, assisted by Mr. Mills, the English baritone. Mr. Lachaume was to have played, but was delayed by the storm in Pennsylvania, which necessitated a slight change in the programme, although Mr. Mollenhauer was secured to appear at the last moment. Mr. Ysaye played with his accustomed finish and artistic technical detail, and all his efforts were heartily applauded. Some slight changes were made in the programme, but all the selections were most pleasing.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 10.

The Ysaye Concert.

The last matinee of Mr. Eugene Ysaye was given in Music Hall, yesterday afternoon, but the published programme was changed, owing to the absence of Mr. Lachaume. The programme, as given, included Vieuxtemps' E-major Concerto for violin and piano; Spohr's D-minor Concerto; Walther's Prize Song, Wagner-Wilhelmj; Prelude and Fugue, G-minor, Bach, and two movements from a suite, by Vieuxtemps. Mr. Watkin Mills sang a number of songs, and Mr. E. Mollenhauer was the accompanist.

The playing of Mr. Ysaye lost none of its charm and power to stir an audience into enthusiasm, even though Mr. Thompson has appeared in Boston. It is very difficult to resist the temptation to draw a comparison between the two artists, but as, thus far, Mr. Thompson has been heard only once, the Plutarch vein would be unjust to him.

As for Mr. Ysaye, criticism can only repeat itself, and praise be heaped on praise. He is the artist from every viewpoint. His technical knowledge may not be so great as that of Mr. Thompson, but it is ample for all the needs of true art, after which superfluities simply waste.

The Vieuxtemps concerto gave Mr. Ysaye opportunity to display one aspect of his many moods, the romantic, and herein he stands easily first. The fine Bach prelude and fugue gave the chance for a display of classicism, and again demonstrated, if demonstration were needed, that the artist of many moods is the artist of many styles. Mr. Ysaye possesses the rare merit, born of faultless taste, of not confounding the classic with the cold, and of treating classic compositions as if the music died with the composers. The Bach playing was of surpassing merit throughout. It was broad, dignified and human, which, after all, is better than the so-called "angelic" playing, about which we have heard something of late; that is, the bodiless, soulless playing addressed to cherubs faulty in their anatomy, and to saints struggling with demons. It is Mr. Ysaye's merit—some consider it is fault—that he puts, at need, grace, feeling, calm beauty and passionate fire into his playing; and, while under the spell, one can readily forgive him for not standing as impassive as a granite sphinx while he is indulging in double stopping and in double octaves. Nothing finer than Mr. Ysaye's Bach playing has been heard in Boston. The Spohr concerto proved a most charming work in Mr. Ysaye's hands. The first movement begins well, but it is padded out to make it of the requisite length. The second movement is thoroughly delightful; the rondo was charming, and it was played with dazzling brilliancy by Mr. Ysaye, who aroused additional enthusiasm by refraining from treating double stopping as if it were a problem in Euclid. In all his concerts Mr. Ysaye has proved himself the thorough, conscientious artist, and it is to be hoped that in a short time Boston music lovers may again have the pleasure of hearing him.

Mr. Watkin Mills has a fine, cultivated voice. The perfect manner in which he enunciates his words is a pleasurable novelty. His intonation is not always pure, and his singing of the "Erl King" was singularly and painfully insufficient. He was more successful in the Gounod song, and appeared at his best in the "O tu Palermo," from the Sicilian Vespers, and in "Still as Night," by Bohm.

Great praise is due to the accompanist, Mr. E. Mollenhauer, who assumed his duties at a moment's notice, yet showed himself the thoroughly competent artist.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCVII., NO. 41.

SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 10, 1895.

THE YSAYE RECITAL.

M. Ysaye played before another large audience in Music Hall yesterday afternoon. Mr. Lachaume, who was to have assisted on this occasion, having been, according to the announcement made, snowed up somewhere in the wilds surrounding Philadelphia, a change was necessitated in the programme, so, instead of the Raff sonata for piano and violin, was given Vieuxtemps' concerto No. 1 in E, op 10; and for another number Spohr's 9th concerto in D minor was substituted and the Grieg sonata in G minor was replaced by the Vieuxtemps Suite in the old style. There is nothing new that can be said regarding the playing of M. Ysaye. It can be spoken of only in superlatives and these have been exhausted on it. Nothing could have been more pure in taste, style, tone and execution than his performance of the still beautiful Spohr concerto, especially in the more cantabile moments of the first movement, and notably throughout the whole of the charming slow movement, which was given with exquisite warmth, delicacy, and tenderness and with a finesse of bowing that was fascinating. The artist was not in his best mood, probably owing to the suddenness with which he was compelled to change his selections, but his playing was none the less masterly and none the less satisfying. That he was enthusiastically applauded and recalled will, of course, be taken for granted. Mr. Emil Mollenhauer, who replaced the absent Mr. Lachaume, acquitted himself with admirable technical skill and in a thoroughly musicianly manner. It was a difficult task that unexpectedly fell to his lot, but he proved fully equal to it, and is entitled to the heartiest compliments for the precision, the artistic quality and the ability of his efforts.

Mr. Watkin Mills sang songs by Gounod, Verdi and Bohm, in his first group, and Handel's "O Ruddier Than the Cherry," Schubert's "The Erl King" and Pinsuti's "The Bedouin's Love Song" in his second. He has a full and resonant baritone voice of large compass and excellent in its clearness. He sings with ease, with perfect intonation and with well-trained technique; but, unfortunately, his style is dry and rigid and is monotonous in color. Something more of life and expression in his singing would make it really worth the hearing. As it is, however, his performances are far from interesting. He received very cordial applause, and was also recalled. The hall was inadequately heated, and the artists seemed to be as much disturbed by the chilly atmosphere as did the audience. Something should be attempted to make the place more comfortable during the frigid season.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 10, 1895.

The Last Ysaye Recital in Music Hall—A Sudden Change of Program on Account of the Blizzard.

Music Hall was cold and full of draughts yesterday afternoon. Although the concert was announced as beginning at 2.30, it was 2.45 before Mr. Arthur appeared on the platform and said that Mr. Lachaume was detained by the snow "somewhere in the wilderness that surrounds Philadelphia." As the music of the Raff sonata, op. 70, was in Mr. Lachaume's trunk, bag or pocket, the program was changed materially.

Mr. Emil Mollenhauer, the excellent and versatile musician, took Mr. Lachaume's place at short notice; and he played the accompaniments to violinist and singer exceedingly well.

Mr. Ysaye played the great first movement from Vieuxtemps's E major concerto, the one that envious musicians about 1840 falsely declared was composed by Charles Mayer; Spohr's D minor concerto; a fugue in G minor by Bach; Wilhelmj's arrangement of the Preislied from "the Mastersingers;" and a suite by Vieuxtemps. There is nothing to be said at this late day about Mr. Ysaye's playing. Vieuxtemps once said that Marsick of Paris understood his E major concerto better than any other violinist; but he said this before Ysaye had shown his strength. Having heard Ysaye, one knows why Vieuxtemps in his old age, far from home, longed to listen again to Ysaye's chanterelle. Beautiful, too, was the performance of the old-fashioned concerto of Spohr. All in all, perhaps it was the most delightful exhibition of the violinist's peculiar qualities that has been given at these recitals.

Mr. Watkin Mills sang the bass air from Gounod's "Queen of Sheba," "O tu Palermo," Verdi; "Calm Is the Night," Bohm; "O Ruddier Than the Cherry," Schubert's "Erl King," Pinsuti's "Bedouin Song." He showed, as do so many English singers, excellent enunciation. Furthermore, his technique was adequate, and his phrasing artistic. But his singing was for the most part dry and phlegmatic. The hearer could say constantly "Well done. You sing like a manly Englishman, who probably plays cricket and golf, and reverences his Queen." It's a pity that Mr. Mills has apparently neither by birth nor purchase a temperament.

PHILIP HALE.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, FEB. 10, 1895.

Ysaye's Concert.

The renowned Belgian violinist Ysaye attracted another large audience to Music hall yesterday afternoon, when he gave his last matinee performance in this city. The superb work of the artist was received with as much favor as at the previous concerts, and the pleasure of the audience was doubly enhanced by the vocalizing of the distinguished English baritone Watkin Mills, whose numbers evoked most hearty applause.

Mr Aime Lachaume was unable to appear, being storm-bound somewhere in the west, and the piano accompaniments were played by Mr Emil Mollenhauer. The program was slightly changed in consequence, manager Arthur announcing the changes from the platform.

Mr Ysaye's selections were a movement from E major concerto, and suite in old style, by Vieuxtemps, concerto in D minor by Spohr, a Bach prelude and fugue, and the prize song from "The Meistersinger." The command this artist has over the violin is wonderful, and no difficulties of fingering appear to be obstacles to him. His runs are true in tone, even, and light and shades are preserved without sacrificing rapidity of execution. The encomiums showered upon Mr Ysaye in this city are deserved, and to state briefly that yesterday he repeated his former successes is giving him praise of the highest order.

The magnificent singing by Mr Watkin Mills evoked hearty applause. His voice is rich and sweet, with a bass quality which imparts a resonance to his vocalizing only found in artists of the front rank. Equal commendation is due Mr Mills for his singing of an aria from Gounod's "Queen of Sheba," Schubert's "Ere King" and the Bedouin love song, by Pinsuti.

The flexibility and evenness of his voice is quite marked for a baritone, and his phrasing and enunciation shows that not only is his method admirable, but his control of his tones is as nearly perfect as one can expect to achieve. The concert was thoroughly enjoyable in every way.

[13]

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 10 1895.

The blizzard upset the programme for Mr. Ysaye's last concert—given in Music Hall yesterday afternoon before a very large audience—by blockading M. Lachaume somewhere in Pennsylvania. At short notice Mr. E. Mollenhauer was induced to act for him; but in consequence of the extremely short time which could be had for rehearsal, it was necessary to make a substitution of a suite of Vieuxbemps in place of a Grieg concerto which had been proposed and to rearrange the remaining numbers. But Mr. Mollenhauer proved himself so ready and capable at the piano that the great violinist could play with all fullness and freedom, demonstrating to the renewed delight of his hearers how deep and fine is his talent, how broad and beautiful his art and how sincere is his devotion of his talent and his accomplishments to the cause of what is best in musical art. Indeed, he seemed at times to be giving himself with unusual fervor, strength and grace to his work, as if determined to compensate in his single self for any disappointment which might be felt on account of the absence of his usual adjutor. He carried his auditors with him in every bar he played and received the warmest tributes of applause in return. The vocalist of the day was Mr. Watkins Mills, who sang the popular bass air from "The Queen of Sheba," an air from Verdi's "Sicilian Vespers," "O Ruddier than the Cherry," "The Erl King," Pinsuti's "Bedouin Love Song," and a ditty by Bohm. In all of these he was successful and approved, and he availed himself quickly and surely to show far better than he could in "The Messiah," the quality and cultivation of his voice and the spirit in which he could approach and treat with authors so diverse. He left the impression of a first-rate "all-round" singer, intelligent and correct in rendering various styles of music faithfully, and also possessed of energy and animation, although not quite impassioned in his delivery and some times a bit formal in his vocalization.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 11, 1895.

Music Hall: The Ysaye Concert.

Mr. Eugène Ysaÿe, assisted by Mr. Watkin Mills, gave a concert before a large audience in the Music Hall on Saturday afternoon, the programme being as follows:

First Movement from the Violin Concerto in E major.....Vieuxtemps
Mr. Ysaye.
Air, "She alone charmeth my sadness," from "The Queen of Sheba".....Gounod
Air, "O tu Palermo," from "I Vespri Siciliani"...Verdi
Song, "Still as the night".....Bohm
Mr. Mills.
Violin Concerto No. 3, in D minor.....Spohr
Mr. Ysaye.
Air, "O ruddier than the cherry," from "Acis and Galatea".....Handel
The Erl-King.....Schubert
The Bedouin's Love Song.....Pinsuti
Mr. Mills.
Prelude and Fugue in G minor, for Violin alone..Bach
Walther's Prize Song.....Wagner-Wilhelmj
Mr. Ysaye.

The great violinist again worked wonders. Both in the Vieuxtemps movement and in the Spohr concerto,—only the Finale of which sounded antiquated and out of date—his playing was immensely fine. Such brilliancy of bravura, such grace and charm of phrasing, come only from a great artist. His playing of the prelude and fugue by Bach—and most especially of the latter—seemed to us far and away the finest Bach playing he has done here; in vigor of accent, manliness, and ever-growing force, it left nothing to be desired. He also played Wilhelmj's transcription of the Preislied from the "Meistersinger" exquisitely, if with somewhat less power of effect than the "Parsifal" and "Siegfried" transcriptions he gave us on his last visit.

Mr. Watkin Mills has a fine baritone voice, which he uses uncommonly well; in all that pertains to the production of tone his singing is fairly masterly, and his coloratura—as shown in Polyphemus's song from "Acis and Galatea" is fluent, smooth, clear, and true to pitch. The trail of the oratorio is, however, over him to a considerable extent; there is a certain Anglo-Saxon stiffness in his singing of the French and Italian things which distorts their true character. He sings them as with the conviction of an Englishman that true excellence does not need to be charming. In the songs by Bohm and Pinsuti his manner is more germane to the matter; and in the Handel song he was distinctly admirable.

A word of high praise is due Mr. Mollenhauer for his excellent playing of the often complex and difficult accompaniments.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

The Official Paper of the State.

MONDAY MORNING, FEB. 11, 1895.

THE YSAYE CONCERT.

STORM OCCASIONS SOME CHANGE OF PROGRAMME.

Not Even Unfavoring Elements Can Prevent the Violinist from Giving a Concert and a Good One—Mr. Watkin Mills in Good and Bad Numbers—Musical Notes.

Music Hall was well filled Saturday afternoon on the occasion of the last Ysaye matinee. The concert began molto ritenuto, about 20 minutes later. Just as the audience were wondering how many more measures of rest they were to count, a speech was made in which it was stated that M. Lachaume, the utility pianist, was lost somewhere in the storm, and that substitutions were therefore necessary. These substitutions resulted in Mr. Emil Mollenhauer becoming the pianist, in Grieg and Raff disappearing from the programme, and in a little more Vieuxtemps and a Spohr concerto endeavoring to take their place. Mr. Mollenhauer did his part commendably, considering that he was called to the task without rehearsal, and in the "Preislied" and in a Vieuxtemps Gavotte he was as effective as M. Lachaume could have been. But the audience felt the rechauffée-like character of the programme, and refused to grow enthusiastic. Possibly M. Ysaye also felt the "Boston chill" with which outsiders charge our audiences, and was not at his ease, for he certainly played out of tune once or twice in the earlier numbers of the concert. The revised programme began with the first movement of Vieuxtemps violin concerto in E major. This work, although allopathic in showy passages, is homœopathic in ideas, and has very little to say to the auditor of classical proclivities. It gave opportunity for M. Ysaye to do some wonderful work in glissando double-stopped phrases, in harmonics, in very delicate scale-work, and especially in some martellato bowing.

Now followed Mr. Watkin Mills, who made such a good impression here in oratorio recently. It was made evident, on this occasion, that in spite of the possession of certain estimable qualities, the singer lacks emotional power. His singing is sturdy, sometimes too sturdy, but also stolid. Nevertheless, in the appropriate pieces, one can heartily enjoy his manly power, his sure intonation, and, above all, his careful phrasing and distinct enunciation. A selection from Gounod's "Queen of Sheba" failed to reveal any romance or emotion. Verdi's "O tu Palermo" was much better, and Bohm's best song, "Still as the Night" (the accompaniment of which revels in the very depths of the modern pianoforte), was excellently sung.

Now followed Spohr's concerto for violin, in D minor, in which M. Ysaye did some very fine playing. The slow movement was given with ineffable sweetness, and there was a praiseworthy delicacy and caprice in the finale, but Spohr is not a name to conjure with in these latter days, and the calm of the audience was not greatly disturbed, although the violinist was recalled twice or thrice.

Mr. Watkin Mills then came again, and this time in force, for he sang "Oh Ruddier Than the Cherry" in a most masterly manner. This number has not been sung so well here since Santley came among us in his prime. Every phrase was intact, uncut, and every word was intelligible. The difficult accompaniment was well rendered; it contains some florid work for flute, which nowadays misguided conductors give on piccolo. After this number Mr. Mills boldly attacked Schubert's "Erl-king." One could recognize the fact that it was the "Erl-king" by the triplets in the accompaniment rather than by anything done by the voice. Liberties were taken with the tempo, the erl-king coaxed the child with an eminently proper Sunday-school-teacher sweetness, and the youngster, although spasmodic, was still robust and rather unconcerned; it was altogether the worst piece of work that this excellent artist has given us, and came in the nature of a most disagreeable surprise. The present writer is unfamiliar with the translation used, but in one or two points it resembled that horrible one in the Pauer edition of Schubert. In that edition Goethe is "upset into English" in a manner that abolishes Schubert's intentions finely. Where Schubert has given a sentence to the father the translator gives it to the child, where the child should speak one hears the sturdy tones of the father; and there is one verse which must make the superintendent of our weather bureau green with envy; it runs thus:—

"'O father, my father, and saw you not plain
The erlking's pale daughter glide fast through the rain?'
'O no, my heart's treasure, I knew it full soon,
It was the grey willow that danced to the moon.'"

In which we have a rainstorm by moonlight, which even our blizzard makers have not yet succeeded in producing.

Following this number Mr. Mills sang with excellent effect Pinsuti's "Bedouin Love Song," (a setting inferior to that made by the unfortunate Pease) after which he was recalled with well deserved fervor. Now came Ysaye at his very best. In Bach's prelude and Fugue in G minor the great artist reached his height. Of course some concessions have to be made when a fugue is played on an instrument which, like the violin, is intended rather for melody than for polyphonic work, but such clearness in double stopping one may not hear often in a lifetime. It was one of the greatest exhibitions of his art that M. Ysaye has yet given here. Now followed "Walther's Prize-song" from "The Mastersingers," and it was played with great expression and beauty. Not since Wilhelmj played it in Boston has it been so well rendered here upon the violin. At the end of this the public, which had become dazed at the changes made upon the programme, thought the concert ended and began filing out. There was, however, one number announced to follow, and this number was an especially interesting one. It was a Suite in the old style, by Vieuxtemps, and it displayed that florid composer in a much better light than some of his concertos do. Unfortunately, seeing the mistake made by the audience, M. Ysaye felt that he could not [illegible] entire composition, therefore only two of the four movements were given. These were an aria and a gavotte, and it was astonishing to see how well the composer had entered into the spirit of the old school; the aria was quaint and preluding in style, and formed an excellent foil to the skipping character of the gavotte. This latter gave some fine passages on the G string, and was a perfect etude in long skips, which were all given with absolute surety. The classical purity of the two movements given made one long to hear the complete work, but with this dainty specimen of Vieuxtemps' best handiwork and of Ysaye's most effective playing this almost impromptu concert came to an untimely end. Yet it was all very enjoyable, and when M. Lachaume is thawed out of the snowdrifts he will learn with astonishment that not even the loss of a pianist, not the elements themselves, can stop M. Ysaye when he desires to give a concert.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

MUSICAL COURIER.

Ysaye gave the last of his recitals in Music Hall the 9th. Mr. Lachaume was detained by the blizzard, and Mr. Emil Mollenhauer, that most excellent and versatile musician, took his place at short notice. He played the accompaniments delightfully.

Ysaye played the first movement from Vieuxtemps' E major concerto; Spohr's concerto in D minor; fugue, G minor, Bach; Wilhelmj's arrangement of the Preislied, and Vieuxtemps' Suite in the Old Manner. There is nothing new to be said about his performance. The tone was beautiful in sensuousness or in crystalline purity, and technic was forgotten in the ease with which he conquered difficulties.

Mr. Watkin Mills sang "She Alone Charmeth My Sadness," Gounod; "O tu Palermo," Verdi; "Still as the Night," Bohm; "O Ruddier than the Cherry," Händel; "The Erl King," Schubert, and "The Bedouin's Love Song," Pinsuti. His enunciation was a pleasure, and his vocal technic was almost always admirable. In the air from "The Queen of Sheba" he did not shake off the constitutional English phlegm, but his phrasing was artistic and his bearing manly.

* * *

Mr. E. Mollenhauer, who was to play the accompaniments for Mr. Watkin Mills' songs this afternoon at the Ysaye concert, was obliged at a moment's notice to also play the accompaniments for Ysaye. The greater portion of the music could not be rehearsed, the concerto being the only piece they ran through—no, "rushed through."

[14]

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 10 1895.

The blizzard upset the programme for Mr. Ysaye's last concert—given in Music Hall yesterday afternoon before a very large audience—by blockading M. Lachaume somewhere in Pennsylvania. At short notice Mr. E. Mollenhauer was induced to act for him; but in consequence of the extremely short time which could be had for rehearsal, it was necessary to make a substitution of a suite of Vieuxbemps in place of a Grieg concerto which had been proposed and to rearrange the remaining numbers. But Mr. Mollenhauer proved himself so ready and capable at the piano that the great violinist could play with all fullness and freedom, demonstrating to the renewed delight of his hearers how deep and fine is his talent, how broad and beautiful his art and how sincere is his devotion of his talent and his accomplishments to the cause of what is best in musical art. Indeed, he seemed at times to be giving himself with unusual fervor, strength and grace to his work, as if determined to compensate in his single self for any disappointment which might be felt on account of the absence of his usual coadjutor. He carried his auditors with him in every bar he played and received the warmest tributes of applause in return. The vocalist of the day was Mr. Watkins Mills, who sang the popular bass air from "The Queen of Sheba," an air from Verdi's "Sicilian Vespers," "O Ruddier than the Cherry," "The Erl King," Pinsuti's "Bedouin Love Song," and a ditty by Bohm. In all of these he was successful and approved, and he availed himself quickly and surely to show far better than he could in "The Messiah," the quality and cultivation of his voice and the spirit in which he could approach and treat with authors so diverse. He left the impression of a first-rate "all-round" singer, intelligent and correct in rendering various styles of music faithfully, and also possessed of energy and animation, although not quite impassioned in his delivery and some times a bit formal in his vocalization.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 11, 1895.

Music Hall: The Ysaye Concert.

Mr. Eugène Ysaÿe, assisted by Mr. Watkin Mills, gave a concert before a large audience in the Music Hall on Saturday afternoon, the programme being as follows:

First Movement from the Violin Concerto in E major.....Vieuxtemps
Mr. Ysaye.
Air, "She alone charmeth my sadness," from "The Queen of Sheba".....Gounod
Air, "O tu Palermo," from "I Vespri Siciliani"...Verdi
Song, "Still as the night".....Bohm
Mr. Mills.
Violin Concerto No. 3, in D minor.....Spohr
Mr. Ysaye.
Air, "O ruddier than the cherry," from "Acis and Galatea".....Handel
The Erl-King.....Schubert
The Bedouin's Love Song.....Pinsuti
Mr. Mills.
Prelude and Fugue in G minor, for Violin alone..Bach
Walther's Prize Song.....Wagner-Wilhelmj
Mr. Ysaye.

The great violinist again worked wonders. Both in the Vieuxtemps movement and in the Spohr concerto,—only the Finale of which sounded antiquated and out of date—his playing was immensely fine. Such brilliancy of bravura, such grace and charm of phrasing, come only from a great artist. His playing of the prelude and fugue by Bach—and most especially of the latter—seemed to us far and away the finest Bach playing he has done here; in vigor of accent, manliness, and ever-growing force, it left nothing to be desired. He also played Wilhelmj's transcription of the Preislied from the "Meistersinger" exquisitely, if with somewhat less power of effect than the "Parsifal" and "Siegfried" transcriptions he gave us on his last visit.

Mr. Watkin Mills has a fine baritone voice, which he uses uncommonly well; in all that pertains to the production of tone his singing is fairly masterly, and his coloratura—as shown in Polyphemus's song from "Acis and Galatea" is fluent, smooth, clear, and true to pitch. The trail of the oratorio is, however, over him to a considerable extent; there is a certain Anglo-Saxon stiffness in his singing of the French and Italian things which distorts their true character. He sings them as with the conviction of an Englishman that true excellence does not need to be charming. In the songs by Bohm and Pinsuti his manner is more germane to the matter; and in the Handel song he was distinctly admirable.

A word of high praise is due Mr. Mollenhauer for his excellent playing of the often complex and difficult accompaniments.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.

MONDAY MORNING, FEB. 11, 1895.

THE YSAYE CONCERT.

STORM OCCASIONS SOME CHANGE OF PROGRAMME.

Not Even Unfavoring Elements Can Prevent the Violinist from Giving a Concert and a Good One—Mr. Watkin Mills in Good and Bad Numbers—Musical Notes.

Music Hall was well filled Saturday afternoon on the occasion of the last Ysaye matinee. The concert began molto ritenuto, about 20 minutes later. Just as the audience were wondering how many more measures of rest they were to count, a speech was made in which it was stated that M. Lachaume, the utility pianist, was lost somewhere in the storm, and that substitutions were therefore necessary. These substitutions resulted in Mr. Emil Mollenhauer becoming the pianist, in Grieg and Raff disappearing from the programme, and in a little more Vieuxtemps and a Spohr concerto endeavoring to take their place. Mr. Mollenhauer did his part commendably, considering that he was called to the task without rehearsal, and in the "Preislied" and in a Vieuxtemps Gavotte he was as effective as M. Lachaume could have been. But the audience felt the re-hanffée-like character of the programme, and refused to grow enthusiastic. Possibly M. Ysaye also felt the "Boston chill" with which outsiders charge our audiences, and was not at his ease, for he certainly played out of tune once or twice in the earlier numbers of the concert. The revised programme began with the first movement of Vieuxtemps violin concerto in E major. This work, although allopathic in showy passages, is homœopathic in ideas, and has very little to say to the auditor of classical proclivities. It gave opportunity for M. Ysaye to do some wonderful work in glissando double-stopped phrases, in harmonics, in very delicate scale-work, and especially in some martellato bowing.

Now followed Mr. Watkin Mills, who made such a good impression here in oratorio recently. It was made evident, on this occasion, that in spite of the possession of certain estimable qualities, the singer lacks emotional power. His singing is sturdy, sometimes too sturdy, but also stolid. Nevertheless, in the appropriate pieces, one can heartily enjoy his manly power, his sure intonation, and, above all, his careful phrasing and distinct enunciation. A selection from Gounod's "Queen of Sheba" failed to reveal any romance or emotion. Verdi's "O tu Palermo" was much better, and Bohm's best song, "Still as the Night" (the accompaniment of which revels in the very depths of the modern pianoforte), was excellently sung.

Now followed Spohr's concerto for violin, in D minor, in which M. Ysaye did some very fine playing. The slow movement was given with ineffable sweetness, and there was a praiseworthy delicacy and caprice in the finale, but Spohr is not a name to conjure with in these latter days, and the calm of the audience was not greatly disturbed, although the violinist was recalled twice or thrice.

Mr. Watkin Mills then came again, and this time in force, for he sang "Oh Ruddier Than the Cherry" in a most masterly manner. This number has not been sung so well here since Santley came among us in his prime. Every phrase was intact, uncut, and every word was intelligible. The difficult accompaniment was well rendered; it contains some florid work for flute, which nowadays misguided conductors give on piccolo. After this number Mr. Mills boldly attacked Schubert's "Erl-king." One could recognize the fact that it was the "Erl-king" by the triplets in the accompaniment rather than by anything done by the voice. Liberties were taken with the tempo, the erlking coaxed the child with an eminently proper Sunday-school-teacher sweetness, and the youngster, although spasmodic, was still robust and rather unconcerned; it was altogether the worst piece of work that this excellent artist has given us, and came in the nature of a most disagreeable surprise. The present writer is unfamiliar with the translation used, but in one or two points it resembled that horrible one in the Pauer edition of Schubert. In that edition Goethe is "upset into English" in a manner that abolishes Schubert's intentions finely. Where Schubert has given a sentence to the father the translator gives it to the child, where the child should speak one hears the sturdy tones of the father; and there is one verse which must make the superintendent of our weather bureau green with envy; it runs thus:—

"'O father, my father, and saw you not plain
The erlking's pale daughter glide fast through the rain?'
'O no, my heart's treasure, I knew it full soon,
It was the grey willow that danced to the moon.'"

In which we have a rainstorm by moonlight, which even our blizzard makers have not yet succeeded in producing.

Following this number Mr. Mills sang with excellent effect Pinsuti's "Bedouin Love Song," (a setting inferior to that made by the unfortunate Pease) after which he was recalled with well deserved fervor. Now came Ysaye at his very best. In Bach's prelude and Fugue in G minor the great artist reached his height. Of course some concessions have to be made when a fugue is played on an instrument which, like the violin, is intended rather for melody than for polyphonic work, but such clearness in double stopping one may not hear often in a lifetime. It was one of the greatest exhibitions of his art that M. Ysaye has yet given here. Now followed "Walther's Prize-song" from "The Mastersingers," and it was played with great expression and beauty. Not since Wilhelmj played it in Boston has it been so well rendered here upon the violin. At the end of this the public, which had become dazed at the changes made upon the programme, thought the concert ended and began filing out. There was, however, one number announced to follow, and this number was an especially interesting one. It was a Suite in the old style, by Vieuxtemps, and it displayed that florid composer in a much better light than some of his concertos do. Unfortunately, seeing the mistake made by the audience, M. Ysaye felt that he could not detain them with the entire composition, therefore only two of the four movements were given. These were an aria and a gavotte, and it was astonishing to see how well the composer had entered into the spirit of the old school; the aria was quaint and preluding in style, and formed an excellent foil to the skipping character of the gavotte. This latter gave some fine passages on the G string, and was a perfect etude in long skips, which were all given with absolute surety. The classical purity of the two movements given made one long to hear the complete work, but with this dainty specimen of Vieuxtemps' best handiwork and of Ysaye's most effective playing this almost impromptu concert came to an untimely end. Yet it was all very enjoyable, and when M. Lachaume is thawed out of the snowdrifts he will learn with astonishment that not even the loss of a pianist, not the elements themselves, can stop M. Ysaye when he desires to give a concert.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

MUSICAL COURIER.

Ysaye gave the last of his recitals in Music Hall the 9th. Mr. Lachaume was detained by the blizzard, and Mr. Emil Mollenhauer, that most excellent and versatile musician, took his place at short notice. He played the accompaniments delightfully.

Ysaye played the first movement from Vieuxtemps' E major concerto; Spohr's concerto in D minor; fugue, G minor, Bach; Wilhelmj's arrangement of the Preislied, and Vieuxtemps' Suite in the Old Manner. There is nothing new to be said about his performance. The tone was beautiful in sensuousness or in crystalline purity, and technic was forgotten in the ease with which he conquered difficulties.

Mr. Watkin Mills sang "She Alone Charmeth My Sadness," Gounod; "O tu Palermo," Verdi; "Still as the Night," Bohm; "O Ruddier than the Cherry," Händel; "The Erl King," Schubert, and "The Bedouin's Love Song," Pinsuti. His enunciation was a pleasure, and his vocal technic was almost always admirable. In the air from "The Queen of Sheba" he did not shake off the constitutional English phlegm, but his phrasing was artistic and his bearing manly.

* * *

Mr. E. Mollenhauer, who was to play the accompaniments for Mr. Watkin Mills' songs this afternoon at the Ysaye concert, was obliged at a moment's notice to also play the accompaniments for Ysaye. The greater portion of the music could not be rehearsed, the concerto being the only piece they ran through—no, "rushed through."

[14]

BLANK PAGE

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCVI., NO. 57.

SUNDAY, AUGUST 26, 1894.

Element of Lightness to Be Infused Into the Symphony Programmes—

While it is yet too early to announce in detail the concert projects in contemplation for the forthcoming musical season, enough is already known to justify the statement that it will be an exceptionally busy one. Of course, and as usual, the 24 concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra are of the first importance. We understand that Mr. Emil Paur in arranging the programmes for this year's series, has been moved by a desire to maintain their classical character, and yet, at the same time, to infuse into them an element of lightness that has been lacking hitherto. These concerts last only 1½ hours each, but it has been found that much musical weariness of ear and of soul can be compressed into that brief space of time. The wish to make the concerts educational, primarily, seems to have pushed into the background the thought of making them interesting as well, and while the result has been much fine music there has also been much that was dreary in effect. It requires no little skill and discretion to combine the educational and the entertaining, and these qualities have not always been brought to bear on the Symphony orchestra programmes. Then, too, there has not been a broad and generous recognition of the fact that genius, musical or otherwise, is of no nationality, but is the possession of the whole world. It is indisputable that to Germany belongs the foremost rank as the producer of the master composers for the orchestra; but there are, nevertheless, composers of note in other lands, who have recently come prominently to the front, and whose works have not, as yet, had a hearing in this city. In fact, at the present moment it is questionable if Germany holds with as firm a hand as she has held it in the past the supremacy on which she justly prided herself. The revolution that has overtaken the modern French school and also the modern Italian school has given a powerful impetus to musical art in both countries, and now their leading composers turn their attention to orchestral music with a zeal and an ambition they have not before manifested in this direction. Their works are certainly entitled to a hearing here.

We understand that Mr. Paur has taken these facts into serious consideration and that it is his intention to impart a large spirit of eclecticism to the symphony programmes this season. Composers, French and Italian, are to have a fair representation in important orchestral works, and we have heard that large compositions by Chabrier, Reber and Sgambati are to be among the more striking novelties of the season. Most surprising of all, and not the least welcome, if rumor may be believed, there are to be from time to time, light overtures of the French school, and possibly, mirabile dictu, an Auber overture, occasionally. Soloists of established rank, several of whom have not yet been heard in this country, will, it is said on good authority, appear at these concerts, in addition to many of the more prominent artists of home repute.

Chamber concerts, from present indications, will be in great profusion, the most important of which, however, will be the Kneisel concerts. Among the

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 9, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its fourteenth season on Oct. 12. The scheme for the season includes the usual series of concerts in Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, Brooklyn, Providence and Cambridge, with single concerts in several other cities. Very few changes have been made in the membership of the organization since last season. The most important new men are the clarinetists, who are believed to be admirable artists.

The orchestra has been maintained for thirteen years exclusively for concert purposes. It now holds undisputedly the first place among the musical organizations of the country. The plans for the home concerts are already nearly completed. As usual, twenty-four public rehearsals will be given on Friday afternoons and twenty-four concerts on Saturday evenings.

The programs have been carefully chosen, and the added interest of great and famous soloists will make the concerts brilliant and attractive. The scale of prices for season tickets both for concerts and rehearsals will be the same as in former seasons, $12 and $7 50, according to location. All tickets will be sold by auction at Music Hall. The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold on Monday, Sept. 24, at 10 A. M.; the $7 50 seats for the rehearsals on Tuesday, Sept. 25, at 10 A. M.; the $12 seats for the concerts on Thursday, Sept. 27, at 10 A. M., and the $7 50 seats for the concerts on Friday, Sept. 28, at the same hour. Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice, and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a large diagram, and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered in the hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be immediately resold.

"Ten years ago, when the position of concert-meister of the great Philharmonic Orchestra in Berlin was vacant, two talented young violinists were taken under consideration for the place. One was Herr Fritz Kneisel, who at the time was concert-meister of a small orchestra in Berlin. The other was Herr Ludwig Bleuer. The rivalry between these young artists was strong, and one of them was bound to be bitterly disappointed when the choice was made. It was Fritz Kneisel who had to drink from the cup of disappointment, for Bleuer received the coveted appointment. Herr Kneisel remained in Berlin only for a few seasons after his rival was made concert-meister of the great orchestra there. Then he came to America. In this country he prospered, and soon became concert-meister of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, an organization undoubtedly superior to the one in Berlin. * * * Wouldn't it be funny if these two eminent violinists should some day become rivals for the position which Herr Kneisel now holds in the Boston orchestra! It is no secret that Conductor Paur and Concert-Meister Kneisel are not friends. Paur has a long contract. Supposing that the ill-feeling should increase during the present season, and a successor to Kneisel should be thought advisable. What more natural than that the man who was chosen in preference to him for the Berlin orchestra should be considered for the position? To be sure, this is rather far-fetched supposition, and it may never be more than that. But wilder prophecies have been fulfilled." It is not likely, however, that Mr. Kneisel will lose flesh because Mr. Bleuer has chosen to live in Detroit, although it is highly probable that the laurels of Kneisel will not let Bleuer sleep.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, SEPT. 9, 1894.

Symphony Concerts.

The Boston symphony orchestra will give the first concert of its 14th season at Music hall Saturday evening, Oct 13, preceded by the public rehearsal on Friday afternoon, Oct 12. The changes in the membership of the organization have been few since last season, in fact there seemed to be little room for improvement in the makeup of this splendid body of players.

Conductor Paur has devoted himself this summer to the selection of the most attractive and varied program possible. With everything at his command that goes to make ideal performances and with the disposition to give the public the best in the field of orchestral music, it is expected that he will make the coming series of concerts the most satisfactory in the history of the organization. The superb ability of the orchestra is too well known to require comment. It will be supplemented by the services of many eminent soloists, some of whom have never been heard in this city.

Twenty-four public rehearsals and 24 concerts will be given, as usual. The scale of prices for season tickets both for rehearsals and concerts will be the same as in former seasons, $12 and $7.50, according to location. All tickets will be sold by auction at Music hall. The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold on Monday, Sept 24, at 10 a m, the $7.50 seats for the rehearsals Tuesday, Sept 25, at 10 a m, the $12 seats for the concerts Thursday, Sept 27, at 10 a m, and the $7.50 seats for the concerts Friday, Sept 28, at the same hour.

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice, and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a large diagram, and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered in the hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought or they will be immediately resold.

Boston Journal.

TEN PAGES.

THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 13, 1894.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The arrangements made for the fourteenth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra insure a series of brilliant performances. Great care has been exercised in the selection of programs, and many famous names figure in the list of soloists who have been engaged. Twenty-four public rehearsals will be given at Music Hall on Friday afternoons and twenty-four concerts on Saturday evenings, beginning Oct. 12 and 13. The scale of prices for season tickets will be the same as in past seasons—$12 and $7 50, according to location. All tickets will be sold by auction. The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold on Monday, Sept. 24, the $7 50 seats for rehearsals on Tuesday, Sept. 26, the $12 seats for concerts on Thursday, Sept. 27, and the $7 50 concert seats on Friday, Sept. 28. The auction sales will be held at Music Hall, and will begin each day at 10 A. M.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.

THURSDAY MORNING, SEPT. 13, 1894.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its 14th season Oct. 12, and will give the customary series of 24 public rehearsals on Friday afternoons and 24 concerts on Saturday evenings at Music Hall. Great care has been exercised in the selection of programmes and many novelties have been secured for performance during the season. The list of soloists, it is believed, is more attractive than in any previous year and embraces many famous artists, several of whom will make their Boston debut in these concerts. The scale of prices for season tickets will be the same as usual, $12 and $7 50, according to location. All tickets will be sold by auction. The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold Monday, Sept. 24; the $7 50 seats for rehearsals, Tuesday, Sept. 25; the $12 seats for concerts on Thursday, Sept. 27, and the $7 50 concert seats on Friday, Sept. 28. The auction sales will be held in Music Hall, and will begin each day at 10 A.M.

BOSTON POST.

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

THURSDAY MORNING, SEPT. 13, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY AUCTION SALE OF SEASON TICKETS.

The annual auction sale of season tickets for the twenty-four public rehearsals and twenty-four Saturday evening concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Emil Paur, conductor, will take place in Music Hall on Sept. 24, 25, 27 and 28, beginning at 10 o'clock each morning. The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold on Monday, Sept. 24; the $7.50 seats for the rehearsals on Tuesday, Sept. 25; on Thursday, Sept. 27, the $12 seats for the concerts and on Friday, Sept. 28, the $7.50 seats for the concerts. As in past years, bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for choice, and no more than four will be sold on one bid. The seats to be sold will be shown on a diagram and marked off as sold.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCVI., NO. 64

SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 2, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The 14th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open Oct. 13, and the arrangements already completed give promise of a series of concerts that for interest and attractiveness will go quite beyond those of any previous year of the orchestra's existence. The expressed intention of Mr. Paur to lighten the programmes will probably meet the approval of a majority of his patrons, as will also his disposition to include more French and American compositions than has hitherto been customary.

The orchestra has been strengthened, it is believed, at some few points, notably in the clarinets, though it long ago reached a standard of excellence that left little room for improvement in its membership. Indeed it may truly be said that Boston possesses an orchestra which has hardly an equal on either side of the Atlantic. The performances of the superb body of 85 musicians will be supplemented by the services of the best soloists available, including many eminent artists, some of whom will be heard in these concerts for the first time here.

The number of performances will be the same as usual: Twenty-four public rehersals on Friday afternoons and 24 concerts on Saturday evenings. Season tickets will be sold by auction at Music Hall, for rehearsals on Monday and Tuesday, Sept. 24 and 25, and for concerts on Thursday and Friday, Sept. 27 and 28.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCVI., NO. 71.

SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 9, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The Boston Symphony orchestra will enter upon its 14th season with practically the same magnificent body of artists that has composed its membership for the last three years. This organization, by the superiority of its performances, may be said to have placed itself beyond all rivalry, and the series of concerts that it offers to Boston music lovers cannot be matched in any city of the world. Rehearsals will begin about Oct. 1, and by the time of the first concert (the date of which is Oct. 13) the orchestra will be in the best possible form. Mr. Paur's single season as conductor has given him an acquaintance with the tastes of the public and has enabled him to arrange programmes which in interest and attractiveness are far beyond those of last season. He has devoted himself during the summer to the study of new compositions which have been played abroad with success as well as to the examination of scores submitted to him by native composers, and has found in both classes enough meritorious works to justify the promise of a goodly number of novelties during the season. Engagements have been made with many distinguished soloists, whose appearances will prove a feature of notable interest. As usual, 24 public rehearsals will be given on Friday afternoons, and 24 concerts on Saturday evenings. The scale of prices both for concerts and rehearsals will be the same as in former seasons, $12 and $7.50, according to location. All tickets will be sold by auction at Music Hall. The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold on Monday, Sept. 24, at 10 A. M., the $7.50 seats for the rehearsals on Tuesday, Sept. 25, at 10 A. M., the $12 seats for the concerts on Thursday, Sept. 27, at 10 A. M., and the $7.50 seats for the concerts on Friday, Sept. 28, at the same hour. Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice, and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a large diagram, and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered in the hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought or they will be immediately resold.

HOME JOURNAL

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 15, 1894.

MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

14th Season, 1894-95.

24 PUBLIC REHEARSALS

on Friday Afternoons, beginning Oct. 12 (omitting Nov. 2, Dec. 7, Jan. 11, Feb. 8, and March 15).

24 CONCERTS

on Saturday Evenings, beginning, Oct. 13 (omitting Nov. 3, Dec. 8, Jan. 12, Feb. 9, and March 16).

Tickets for the series of Concerts and for the series of Rehearsals, $12 and $7.50, according to location.

The $12 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, MONDAY, Sept 24, at 10 A. M.

The $7.50 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, TUESDAY, Sept. 25, at 10 A. M.

The $12 Seats for the Concerts will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, on THURSDAY, Sept. 27, at 10 A. M.

The $7.50 Seats for the Concerts will be sold in like manner, at the same place, on FRIDAY, Sept. 28, at 10 A. M.

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

Tickets will be delivered in the Hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be immediately resold. 37m

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its fourteenth season at Music Hall on Oct. 13. As in past seasons, there will be twenty-four Friday afternoon public rehearsals and twenty-four Saturday evening concerts. Both in an artistic sense and considered as a popular attraction, this organization has long held first place among the musical enterprises of this country. Judging from the large number of inquiries made at Music Hall the past week, regarding the annual sale of season tickets by auction, there will be a lively demand for seats.

.....

The dates for this sale are announced as Sept. 24, 25, 27 and 28. On Monday, Sept. 24, the $12 season tickets for the Friday afternoon public Rehearsals will be sold. Tuesday, Sept. 25, the $7.50 Rehearsal tickets. On Thursday, Sept. 27, the $12 Concert tickets, and Friday the $7.50 Concert tickets. The sale begins at 10 o'clock each morning, and no more than four seats will be sold to one bidder.

.....

The members of the orchestra, with very few exceptions, will remain the same as last year. Mr. Paur has spent a large portion of his time during the summer months in the preparation of programs to be given. A large number of novelties are to be heard in addition to standard works. American composers will also have a place on the programs. A number of distinguished soloists new to Boston audiences are engaged, and will be announced during the coming week. The orchestra is in fine condition, and the season of 1894-95 promises to be as interesting as any in the history of the concerts.

.....

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, SEPT. 16, 1894.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The annual auction sale of season tickets for the twenty-four public rehearsals and twenty-four Saturday evening concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Emil Paur, conductor, will take place in Music hall on Sept. 24, 25, 27 and 28, beginning at ten o'clock each morning. The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold on Monday, Sept. 24; the $7.50 seats for the rehearsals on Tuesday, Sept. 25; on Thursday, Sept. 27, the $12 seats for the concerts and on Friday, Sept. 28, the $7.50 seats for the concerts. As in past years, bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for choice, and no more than four will be sold on one bid. The seats to be sold will be shown on a diagram and marked off as sold.

The coming season promises to be the equal of any in the brilliant past record. The best available soloists have been engaged and Mr. Paur has devoted much time and thought to the preparation and arrangement of the programmes. Many novelties will be introduced in addition to the standard works. The makeup of the orchestra is essentially the same as last year, although there is to be a slight change among the clarinets. It may not be generally known that outside of the twenty-four public rehearsals and twenty-four Saturday evening concerts in Music hall each season there are also nearly fifty performances given at various intervals, divided among the cities of New York, Brooklyn, Baltimore, Washington, Philadelphia and Cambridge.

[16]

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XOVL, NO. 57.

SUNDAY, AUGUST 26, 1894.

Element of Lightness to Be Infused Into the Symphony Programmes—

While it is yet too early to announce in detail the concert projects in contemplation for the forthcoming musical season, enough is already known to justify the statement that it will be an exceptionally busy one. Of course, and as usual, the 24 concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra are of the first importance. We understand that Mr. Emil Paur in arranging the programmes for this year's series, has been moved by a desire to maintain their classical character, and yet, at the same time, to infuse into them an element of lightness that has been lacking hitherto. These concerts last only 1½ hours each, but it has been found that much musical weariness of ear and of soul can be compressed into that brief space of time. The wish to make the concerts educational, primarily, seems to have pushed into the background the thought of making them interesting as well, and while the result has been much fine music there has also been much that was dreary in effect. It requires no little skill and discretion to combine the educational and the entertaining, and these qualities have not always been brought to bear on the Symphony orchestra programmes. Then, too, there has not been a broad and generous recognition of the fact that genius, musical or otherwise, is of no nationality, but is the possession of the whole world. It is indisputable that to Germany belongs the foremost rank as the producer of the master composers for the orchestra; but there are, nevertheless, composers of note in other lands, who have recently come prominently to the front, and whose works have not, as yet, had a hearing in this city. In fact, at the present moment it is questionable if Germany holds with as firm a hand as she has held it in the past the supremacy on which she justly prided herself. The revolution that has overtaken the modern French school and also the modern Italian school has given a powerful impetus to musical art in both countries, and now their leading composers turn their attention to orchestral music with a zeal and an ambition they have not before manifested in this direction. Their works are certainly entitled to a hearing here.

We understand that Mr. Paur has taken these facts into serious consideration and that it is his intention to impart a large spirit of eclecticism to the symphony programmes this season. Composers, French and Italian, are to have a fair representation in important orchestral works, and we have heard that large compositions by Chabrier, Reber and Sgambati are to be among the more striking novelties of the season. Most surprising of all, and not the least welcome, if rumor may be believed, there are to be from time to time, light overtures of the French school, and possibly, mirabile dictu, an Auber overture, occasionally. Soloists of established rank, several of whom have not yet been heard in this country, will, it is said on good authority, appear at these concerts, in addition to many of the more prominent artists of home repute.

Chamber concerts, from present indications, will be in great profusion, the most important of which, however, will be the Kneisel concerts. Among the

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XOVI., NO. 64.

SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 2, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The 14th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open Oct. 13, and the arrangements already completed give promise of a series of concerts that for interest and attractiveness will go quite beyond those of any previous year of the orchestra's existence. The expressed intention of Mr. Paur to lighten the programmes will probably meet the approval of a majority of his patrons, as will also his disposition to include more French and American compositions than has hitherto been customary.

The orchestra has been strengthened, it is believed, at some few points, notably in the clarinets, though it long ago reached a standard of excellence that left little room for improvement in its membership. Indeed it may truly be said that Boston possesses an orchestra which has hardly an equal on either side of the Atlantic. The performances of the superb body of 85 musicians will be supplemented by the services of the best soloists available, including many eminent artists, some of whom will be heard in these concerts for the first time here.

The number of performances will be the same as usual: Twenty-four public rehersals on Friday afternoons and 24 concerts on Saturday evenings. Season tickets will be sold by auction at Music Hall, for rehearsals on Monday and Tuesday, Sept. 24 and 25, and for concerts on Thursday and Friday, Sept. 27 and 28.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 9, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its fourteenth season on Oct. 12. The scheme for the season includes the usual series of concerts in Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, Brooklyn, Providence and Cambridge, with single concerts in several other cities. Very few changes have been made in the membership of the organization since last season. The most important new men are the clarinetists, who are believed to be admirable artists.

The orchestra has been maintained for thirteen years exclusively for concert purposes. It now holds undisputedly the first place among the musical organizations of the country. The plans for the home concerts are already nearly completed. As usual, twenty-four public rehearsals will be given on Friday afternoons and twenty-four concerts on Saturday evenings.

The programs have been carefully chosen, and the added interest of great and famous soloists will make the concerts brilliant and attractive. The scale of prices for season tickets both for concerts and rehearsals will be the same as in former seasons, $12 and $7 50, according to location. All tickets will be sold by auction at Music Hall. The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold on Monday, Sept. 24, at 10 A. M.; the $7 50 seats for the rehearsals on Tuesday, Sept. 25, at 10 A. M.; the $12 seats for the concerts on Thursday, Sept. 27, at 10 A. M., and the $7 50 seats for the concerts on Friday, Sept. 28, at the same hour. Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice, and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a large diagram, and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered in the hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be immediately resold.

"Ten years ago, when the position of concert-meister of the great Philharmonic Orchestra in Berlin was vacant, two talented young violinists were taken under consideration for the place. One was Herr Fritz Kneisel, who at the time was concert-meister of a small orchestra in Berlin. The other was Herr Ludwig Bleuer. The rivalry between these young artists was strong, and one of them was bound to be bitterly disappointed when the choice was made. It was Fritz Kneisel who had to drink from the cup of disappointment, for Bleuer received the coveted appointment. Herr Kneisel remained in Berlin only for a few seasons after his rival was made concert-meister of the great orchestra there. Then he came to America. In this country he prospered, and soon became concert-meister of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, an organization undoubtedly superior to the one in Berlin: * * * Wouldn't it be funny if these two eminent violinists should some day become rivals for the position which Herr Kneisel now holds in the Boston orchestra! It is no secret that Conductor Paur and Concert-Meister Kneisel are not friends. Paur has a long contract. Supposing that the ill-feeling should increase during the present season, and a successor to Kneisel should be thought advisable. What more natural than that the man who was chosen in preference to him for the Berlin orchestra should be considered for the position? To be sure, this is rather far-fetched supposition, and it may never be more than that. But wilder prophecies have been fulfilled." It is not likely, however, that Mr. Kneisel will lose flesh because Mr. Bleuer has chosen to live in Detroit, although it is highly probable that the laurels of Kneisel will not let Bleuer sleep.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XOVI., NO. 71.

SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 9, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The Boston Symphony orchestra will enter upon its 14th season with practically the same magnificent body of artists that has composed its membership for the last three years. This organization, by the superiority of its performances, may be said to have placed itself beyond all rivalry, and the series of concerts that it offers to Boston music lovers cannot be matched in any city of the world. Rehearsals will begin about Oct. 1, and by the time of the first concert (the date of which is Oct. 13) the orchestra will be in the best possible form. Mr. Paur's single season as conductor has given him an acquaintance with the tastes of the public and has enabled him to arrange programmes which in interest and attractiveness are far beyond those of last season. He has devoted himself during the summer to the study of new compositions which have been played abroad with success as well as to the examination of scores submitted to him by native composers, and has found in both classes enough meritorious works to justify the promise of a goodly number of novelties during the season. Engagements have been made with many distinguished soloists, whose appearances will prove a feature of notable interest. As usual, 24 public rehearsals will be given on Friday afternoons, and 24 concerts on Saturday evenings. The scale of prices both for concerts and rehearsals will be the same as in former seasons, $12 and $7.50, according to location. All tickets will be sold by auction at Music Hall. The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold on Monday, Sept. 24, at 10 A. M., the $7.50 seats for the rehearsals on Tuesday, Sept. 25, at 10 A. M., the $12 seats for the concerts on Thursday, Sept. 27, at 10 A. M., and the $7.50 seats for the concerts on Friday, Sept. 28, at the same hour. Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice, and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a large diagram, and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered in the hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought or they will be immediately resold.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, SEPT. 9, 1894.

Symphony Concerts.

The Boston symphony orchestra will give the first concert of its 14th season at Music hall Saturday evening, Oct 13, preceded by the public rehearsal on Friday afternoon, Oct 12. The changes in the membership of the organization have been few since last season, in fact there seemed to be little room for improvement in the makeup of this splendid body of players.

Conductor Paur has devoted himself this summer to the selection of the most attractive and varied program possible. With everything at his command that goes to make ideal performances and with the disposition to give the public the best in the field of orchestral music, it is expected that he will make the coming series of concerts the most satisfactory in the history of the organization. The superb ability of the orchestra is too well known to require comment. It will be supplemented by the services of many eminent soloists, some of whom have never been heard in this city.

Twenty-four public rehearsals and 24 concerts will be given, as usual. The scale of prices for season tickets both for rehearsals and concerts will be the same as in former seasons, $12 and $7.50, accrding to location. All tickets will be sold by auction at Music hall. The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold on Monday, Sept 24, at 10 a m, the $7.50 seats for the rehearsals Tuesday, Sept 25, at 10 a m, the $12 seats for the concerts Thursday, Sept 27, at 10 a m, and the $7.50 seats for the concerts Friday, Sept 28, at the same hour.

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice, and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a large diagram, and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered in the hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought or they will be immediately resold.

Boston Journal.

TEN PACES.

THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 13, 1894.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The arrangements made for the fourteenth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra insure a series of brilliant performances. Great care has been exercised in the selection of programs, and many famous names figure in the list of soloists who have been engaged. Twenty-four public rehearsals will be given at Music Hall on Friday afternoons and twenty-four concerts on Saturday evenings, beginning Oct. 12 and 13. The scale of prices for season tickets will be the same as in past seasons—$12 and $7 50, according to location. All tickets will be sold by auction. The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold on Monday, Sept. 24, the $7 50 seats for rehearsals on Tuesday, Sept. 26, the $12 seats for concerts on Thursday, Sept. 27, and the $7 50 concert seats on Friday, Sept. 28. The auction sales will be held at Music Hall, and will begin each day at 10 A. M.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.

THURSDAY MORNING, SEPT. 13, 1894.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its 14th season Oct. 12, and will give the customary series of 24 public rehearsals on Friday afternoons and 24 concerts on Saturday evenings at Music Hall. Great care has been exercised in the selection of programmes and many novelties have been secured for performance during the season. The list of soloists, it is believed, is more attractive than in any previous year and embraces many famous artists, several of whom will make their Boston debut in these concerts. The scale of prices for season tickets will be the same as usual, $12 and $7 50, according to location. All tickets will be sold by auction. The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold Monday, Sept. 24; the $7 50 seats for rehearsals, Tuesday, Sept. 25; the $12 seats for concerts on Thursday, Sept. 27, and the $7 50 concert seats on Friday, Sept. 28. The auction sales will be held in Music Hall, and will begin each day at 10 A.M.

BOSTON POST.

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

THURSDAY MORNING, SEPT. 13, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY AUCTION SALE OF SEASON TICKETS.

The annual auction sale of season tickets for the twenty-four public rehearsals and twenty-four Saturday evening concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Emil Paur, conductor, will take place in Music Hall on Sept. 24, 25, 27 and 28, beginning at 10 o'clock each morning. The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold on Monday, Sept. 24; the $7.50 seats for the rehearsals on Tuesday, Sept. 25; on Thursday, Sept. 27, the $12 seats for the concerts and on Friday, Sept. 28, the $7.50 seats for the concerts. As in past years, bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for choice, and no more than four will be sold on one bid. The seats to be sold will be shown on a diagram and marked off as sold.

HOME JOURNAL

A PAPER FOR EVERY DAY OF THE WEEK.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 15, 1894.

MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

14th Season, 1894-95.

24 PUBLIC REHEARSALS

on Friday Afternoons, beginning Oct. 12 (omitting Nov. 2, Dec. 7, Jan. 11, Feb. 8, and March 15).

24 CONCERTS

on Saturday Evenings, beginning, Oct. 13 (omitting Nov. 3, Dec. 8, Jan. 12, Feb. 9, and March 16).

Tickets for the series of Concerts and for the series of Rehearsals, $12 and $7.50, according to location.

The $12 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, MONDAY, Sept 24, at 10 A. M.

The $7.50 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, TUESDAY, Sept. 25, at 10 A. M.

The $12 Seats for the Concerts will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, on THURSDAY, Sept. 27, at 10 A. M.

The $7.50 Seats for the Concerts will be sold in like manner, at the same place, on FRIDAY, Sept. 28, at 10 A. M.

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

Tickets will be delivered in the Hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be immediately resold. 37m

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its fourteenth season at Music Hall on Oct. 13. As in past seasons, there will be twenty-four Friday afternoon public rehearsals and twenty-four Saturday evening concerts. Both in an artistic sense and considered as a popular attraction, this organization has long held first place among the musical enterprises of this country. Judging from the large number of inquiries made at Music Hall the past week, regarding the annual sale of season tickets by auction, there will be a lively demand for seats.

.....

The dates for this sale are announced as Sept. 24, 25, 27 and 28. On Monday, Sept. 24, the $12 season tickets for the Friday afternoon public Rehearsals will be sold. Tuesday, Sept. 25, the $7.50 Rehearsal tickets. On Thursday, Sept. 27, the $12 Concert tickets, and Friday the $7.50 Concert tickets. The sale begins at 10 o'clock each morning, and no more than four seats will be sold to one bidder.

.....

The members of the orchestra, with very few exceptions, will remain the same as last year. Mr. Paur has spent a large portion of his time during the summer months in the preparation of programs to be given. A large number of novelties are to be heard in addition to standard works. American composers will also have a place on the programs. A number of distinguished soloists new to Boston audiences are engaged, and will be announced during the coming week. The orchestra is in fine condition, and the season of 1894-95 promises to be as interesting as any in the history of the concerts.

.....

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, SEPT. 16, 1894.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The annual auction sale of season tickets for the twenty-four public rehearsals and twenty-four Saturday evening concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Emil Paur, conductor, will take place in Music hall on Sept. 24, 25, 27 and 28, beginning at ten o'clock each morning. The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold on Monday, Sept. 24; the $7.50 seats for the rehearsals on Tuesday, Sept. 25; on Thursday, Sept. 27, the $12 seats for the concerts and on Friday, Sept. 28, the $7.50 seats for the concerts. As in past years, bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for choice, and no more than four will be sold on one bid. The seats to be sold will be shown on a diagram and marked off as sold.

The coming season promises to be the equal of any in the brilliant past record. The best available soloists have been engaged and Mr. Paur has devoted much time and thought to the preparation and arrangement of the programmes. Many novelties will be introduced in addition to the standard works. The makeup of the orchestra is essentially the same as last year, although there is to be a slight change among the clarinets. It may not be generally known that outside of the twenty-four public rehearsals and twenty-four Saturday evening concerts in Music hall each season there are also nearly fifty performances given at various intervals, divided among the cities of New York, Brooklyn, Baltimore, Washington, Philadelphia and Cambridge.

[16]

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XOVI., NO. 76.

SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 16, 1894.

BOSTON SYMPHONY SEASON.

What Conductor Paur Will Offer the Musical Public.

Attractive List of Novelties and a Fine Selection of Standard Works—Complete Programmes of the First Five Concerts—Distinguished Artists Who Are to Appear—Sale of Seats.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, which now ranks prominently among the finest organizations of its kind in the world, and is the largest, the most prosperous, as well as the oldest permanent orchestra in America, is on the verge of beginning its 14th season. For nearly a decade and a half its concerts have exercised a marked influence on musical progress here, and it may be justly claimed that it has accomplished more than has any other one factor for the advancement of musical art in this country. It has given Boston the foremost rank among the musical centres of the nation, and its fame is scarcely less excelled abroad than it is at home. The highest standard attainable has been established for these concerts, and the arrangements made for 1894-95 show that this standard is to be fully maintained, and bids fair to make this season the most notable in the history of the organization. As the opening of the new season is so close at hand, the particulars that follow cannot fail to prove welcome to that very large community here to which the Symphony concerts appeal with special force.

Twenty-four Public Rehearsals will be given at Music Hall on Friday afternoons, beginning Oct. 12, and 24 concerts will be given on Saturday evenings, beginning Oct. 13. On Friday afternoons, Nov. 2 and Dec. 7, Jan. 11, Feb. 8 and March 19 there will be no public rehearsals, as the orchestra will be on the road; and there will be no concerts on Saturday evenings, Nov. 3, Dec. 8, Jan. 12, Feb. 9 and March 16, for the same reason.

EMIL PAUR.

In addition to the performances in this city, five concerts will be given at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York; five at the Academy of Music, Philadelphia; five at the new Music Hall, Baltimore; five at Metzerott Hall, Washington; four public rehearsals and four concerts under the aupices of the Philharmonic Society, at the Academy of Music, Brooklyn; 10 concerts at Sanders' Theatre, Cambridge; six concerts at Infantry Hall, Providence, and single concerts in various other cities.

THE ORCHESTRA

will number 82 musicians, and is made up as follows: Sixteen 1st violins, 14 2d violins, 10 violas, 8 violoncellos, 8 bassos, 1 harp, 3 flutes, 2 oboes, 1 English horn, 2 clarinets, 1 bass clarinet, 2 bassoons, 1 contra bassoon, 4 horns, 3 trumpets, 3 trombones, 1 tuba and 4 percussion instruments. The engagement of 10 new members, it is believed, will improve the orchestra at certain points. The most important acquisition is the new 1st clarinet player, M. Pourtan, who has filled a similar position in the Symphony orchestra and the Grand Opera at Lyons, where he is held in high esteem by his fellow artists.

FRANZ KNEISEL.

The following list, showing in full the personnel of the orchestra, may not prove without interest:

First violins—Messrs. Kneisel, Loeffler, Adamowski, Schnitzler, Roth, Kuntz, Mo[illegible]ger, Fiedler Ondricek, Krafft, Hoffmann, Mahn, Strube, Eichheim, Knoch[illegible]

Violins—Messrs. Sy[illegible]nski, Zach, H. Heindl, Barleben, Gruenberg, Kolster, Hoyer, Kluge, Sauer, Krauss.

Violoncellos—Messrs. Schroeder, Schulz, J. Adamowski, Mi[illegible]els, Rose, E. Loeffler, C. Barth, Nagel.

Basses—Messrs. A. Goldstein, Elkind, Barcither, Seydel, Barth, Gerhardt, Reinhardt, Butler.

Harp—Mr. H. Schnecker.
Flutes—Messrs. Mo e, E. M. Heindl, Fox.
Oboes—Messrs. Sautet, Demuth.
English horn—Mr. F. Muller.
Drums—Mr. H. D. Simpson.
Clarinets—Messrs. Pourtan and Metzger.
Bassoons—Messrs. Litke and Guenzel.
Horns—Messrs. Hackebarth, Lorbeer, Hain and Schumann.
Trumpets—Messrs. P. Mueller and Mand.
Trombones: Messrs. Hampe, Ablo[illegible]scher and Rigg.
Tuba—Mr. E. Golde.
Tympani—C. R. Ludwig.

Mr. Paur's experience during his first year as conductor made him acquainted with the tastes of his public, and has been a great aid to him in the preparation of his programmes. He has devoted a great deal of time to this important duty during the summer. From a very large number of scores which he has examined he has chosen for performance during the season:

THE FOLLOWING NOVELTIES

Symphony No. 6	Tschaikowsky
Symphony in D	Sgambati
Wallenstein symphony	D'Indy
New prize symphony	Geo. W. Chadwick
Overture, "Sappho"	Goldmark
Overture, "Wem die Krone"	Ritter
Overture, "Corsaire"	Berlioz
Overture, "Carneval"	Dvorak
Overture, "Otello"	Dvorak
Overture, "In der Natur"	Dvorak
Overture, "Elegie"	Kahn
Overture	Rietz
Prelude, "Dornroeschen"	Langer
Seebilder	J. K. Paine
Variations for orchestra	Knorr

M. YSAYE.

Symphonic poem	Smetana
Entr'acte, "Gouverneur von Tours"	Reinecke
Poeme symphonique for flute and orchestra,	Benoit

STANDARD WORKS.

Among the standard works are:

Beethoven	Symphonies Nos. 2, 3 and 7
Haydn	Symphonies G major, E flat
Ph. Em. Bach	Symphonies D major
Mozart	Symphonies E flat
Schubert	Unfinished symphony B minor
Schumann	Symphonies C major and Rhenish
Mendelssohn	Symphonies A major
Raff	Symphonies "Im Walde"
Volkman	Symphonies
Brahms	Symphonies No. 3
Rubinstein	Symphonies "Ocean"
Dvorak	Symphonies "From the New World"
Saint-Saens	Symphonies A minor
Overture, "Fidelio"	Beethoven
Overture, "Lenore No. 2"	Beethoven
Overture, "Anacreon"	Cherubini
Overture, "Carneval Romaine"	Berlioz
Overture, "Don Giovanni"	Mozart
Overture, "Freischuetz"	Weber
Overture, "Die Meistersingers"	Wagner
Overture, "Melusine"	Mendelssohn
Overture, "Die Verkaufte Braut"	Smetana
Overture, "Hans Heiling"	Marschner
Overture, "Carlo Broski"	Auber
Overture, "L'Enfant Prodigue"	Auber
Overture, "Jessonda"	Spohr
Hirtenmusik	J. Seb. Bach
Symphonic poem, "Les Preludes"	Liszt
Hungarian Rhapsody	Liszt
Carneval in Paris	Svendsen
Serenade	Brahms
Suite, "Aus Holbergs Zeit"	Grieg
Suite	Lachner
Suite, "Aus Thuringen"	Raff
Suite, "L'Arlesienne"	Bizet
Serenade No. 2	Volkmann

CESAR THOMSON.

Serenade for wind instruments	Mozart
Kaisermarsch	Wagner
Entr'Acte, "Rosamunde"	Schubert
Ballet music, "Demon"	Rubinstein

As will be seen, the season's music will be not lacking in agreeable variety, strong contrasts and a welcome representation of the different musical nationalities.

ALL THE SOLOISTS

have not yet signed contracts, but those who have are Mmes. Emma Eames, Emma Juch, H. H. A. Beach, Messrs. Ben Davies, M. Ysaye, Cesar Thomson, Carl Baermann, C. Mole, Franz Kneisel and A. Schroeder. Several other distinguished native and foreign artists will also appear, and their names will be announced as soon as their contracts are signed. Of those named, the famous violinists, Ysaye and Thomson, have not yet been heard in this country.

Mons. Ysaye after graduating at the conservatory in Liege, and studying for a year with Wieniawski, completed his education under Vieuxtemps, and is said by constant association to have imbibed the manners and methods of that great genius. The characteristics of his playing are broadness of conception, a clearness of execution rarely heard, and great personal magnetism. He is a young man of striking appearance, and has won an almost sensational success in his various concert tours in Europe.

Mr. Thompson, like Ysaye, is a Belgian who comes to us with the prestige of a long series of successes in Europe. His technique is said to be astounding, and is the envy of all violinists who hear him.

COMPLETE PROGRAMMES

for the first five concerts are appended:

FIRST CONCERT.

Overture, "Anacreon"	Cherubini
Symphony No. 7	Beethoven
Tambourin, gavotte and chaconne	Gluck
Entr'acte, "Gwendoline"	Chabrier
Kaisermarsch	Wagner

SECOND CONCERT.

Soloist, Mme. Emma Juch.

Overture, "Carneval Romaine"	Berlioz
Aria
Symphony (new)	G. W. Chadwick
Aria
Ballet music, "Demon"	Rubinstein

EMMA EAMES.

THIRD CONCERT.

Soloist, Mr. Carl Baermann.

Unfinished symphony in B minor	Schubert
Concerto for pianoforte in E flat major	Beethoven
Symphony in C major	Schumann

FOURTH CONCERT.

Overture, "Die Verkaufte Braut"	Smetana
Symphony in D (first time)	Sgambati
Suite, "L'Arlesienne"	Bizet

FIFTH CONCERT.

Soloist, Mme. Emma Eames.

Symphony in E flat	Mozart
Aria
Entr'acte from "Rosamunde"	Schubert
March in B minor	Schubert-Liszt
Aria
Overture, "Carlo Broski"	Auber

THE SCALE OF PRICES

for season tickets for rehearsals or for concerts will be the same as last year, $12 and $7.50, according to location of seats. All tickets will be sold by auction. The sales will be held at Music Hall, and will be conducted by Mr. H. W. Jackson. The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold on Monday, Sept. 24, at 10 A. M.; the $7.50 seats for rehearsals on Tuseday, Sept. 25, at 10 A. M.; the $12 seats for concerts on Thursday, Sept. 27, at 10 A. M., and the $7.50 concert seats on Friday, Sept. 28, at the same hour. Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice, and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a large diagram, and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered in the hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be immediately resold.

EMMA JUCH.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, Sept. 15, 1894.

MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

14th Season, 1894-95.

24 PUBLIC REHEARSALS

on Friday Afternoons, beginning Oct. 12 (omitting Nov 2, Dec. 7, Jan. 11, Feb. 8, and March 15).

24 CONCERTS

on Saturday Evenings, beginning Oct. 13, (omitting Nov. 3, Dec. 8, Jan. 12, Feb. 9 and March 16).

Tickets for the series of Concerts and for the series of Rehearsals, $12 and $7.50, according to location.

The $12 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, MONDAY, Sept 24, at 10 A. M.

The $7.50 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, TUESDAY, Sept. 25, at 10 A. M.

The $12 Seats for the Concerts will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, on THURSDAY, Sept. 27, at 10 A. M.

The $7.50 Seats for the Concerts will be sold in like manner, at the same place, on FRIDAY, Sept. 28, at 10 A. M.

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

Tickets will be delivered in the Hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be immediately resold.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The musical people of Boston may well feel proud of the world-famed organization which had its birth in this city fourteen years ago. It has grown from year to year, until now, not only in this country but in Europe, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is recognized as one of the leading organizations for the performance of orchestral music. The coming season promises to be the equal of any in the brilliant past record. The best available soloists have been engaged, and Mr. Paur has devoted much time and thought in the preparation of the different programmes. Many novelties will be introduced, together with the standard works.

The make-up of the orchestra is essentially the same as last year, although there is to be a slight change among the clarinets. It may not be generally known that outside of the twenty-four public rehearsals and twenty-four Saturday evening concerts in Music Hall each season there are also nearly fifty performances given at various intervals, divided among the cities of New York, Brooklyn, Baltimore, Washington, Philadelphia and Cambridge.

The annual auction sale of season tickets for the concerts and public rehearsals to be given in Boston is announced to take place at Music Hall on September 24, 25, 27 and 28. On September 24 and 25 the public rehearsal tickets will be sold and on the 27th and 28th the concert tickets. The same rules as in past seasons will govern the sale.

BOSTON POST.

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, SEPT. 16, 1894.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The musical season in Boston will begin with the opening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is announced for Oct. 13. This fine body of instrumentalists is not only a local pride to Bostonians, but to all music lovers in this country. Celebrated musicians from the art centres of Europe, who have heard them in the performance of the works of the great composers, attest that this is the equal of any orchestra in the world.

With the opening concert it enters upon the fourteenth season. As in the past, this season promises much of interest to our local music lovers.

There will be twenty-four Friday afternoon public rehearsals on consecutive Friday afternoons from Oct. 12, 1894, to April 26, 1895, omitting Nov. 2, Dec. 7, 1894, Jan. 11, Feb. 8 and March 15, 1895, and twenty-four Saturday evening concerts from Oct. 13, 1894, to March 16, 1895, omitting Nov. 3, Dec. 8, 1894, Jan. 12, Feb. 9 and March 16, 1895.

Able soloists have been secured, and Mr. Paur promises many new compositions never before given in Boston.

The annual auction sale of season tickets is announced to take place in Music Hall on Sept. 24, 25, 27 and 28. On Monday and Tuesday, Sept. 24 and 25, the rehearsal tickets will be sold, and on Thursday and Friday, the concert tickets, beginning at 10 o'clock each morning.

Gazette

SUNDAY MORNING EDITION.

BOSTON, SEPT. 16, 1894.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The fourteenth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, will begin on October 12, Friday afternoon, public rehearsal, and on October 13, Saturday night. It will, as usual, include twenty-four concerts, and as many public rehearsals, at weekly intervals, with some lapses, to be hereafter announced. The sales, by auction, of the season tickets, are thus appointed: Monday, September 24, twelve dollar seats for the public rehearsals; September 25, seven dollar and a half rehearsal seats; September 27, twelve dollar concert seats; September 28, seven dollar and a half concert seats. The bids will be for premiums, and not more than four seats will be sold to a single bidder. The sale will be held in Music Hall.

[17]

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCVI., NO. 76.

SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 16, 1894.

BOSTON SYMPHONY SEASON.

What Conductor Paur Will Offer the Musical Public.

Attractive List of Novelties and a Fine Selection of Standard Works—Complete Programmes of the First Five Concerts—Distinguished Artists Who Are to Appear—Sale of Seats.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, which now ranks prominently among the finest organizations of its kind in the world, and is the largest, the most prosperous, as well as the oldest permanent orchestra in America, is on the verge of beginning its 14th season. For nearly a decade and a half its concerts have exercised a marked influence on musical progress here, and it may be justly claimed that it has accomplished more than has any other one factor for the advancement of musical art in this country. It has given Boston the foremost rank among the musical centres of the nation, and its fame is scarcely less excelled abroad than it is at home. The highest standard attainable has been established for these concerts, and the arrangements made for 1894-95 show that this standard is to be fully maintained, and bids fair to make this season the most notable in the history of the organization. As the opening of the new season is so close at hand, the particulars that follow cannot fail to prove welcome to that very large community here to which the Symphony concerts appeal with special force.

Twenty-four Public Rehearsals will be given at Music Hall on Friday afternoons, beginning Oct. 12, and 24 concerts will be given on Saturday evenings, beginning Oct. 13. On Friday afternoons, Nov. 2 and Dec. 7, Jan. 11, Feb. 8 and March 19 there will be no public rehearsals, as the orchestra will be on the road; and there will be no concerts on Saturday evenings, Nov. 3, Dec. 8, Jan. 12, Feb. 9 and March 16, for the same reason.

EMIL PAUR.

In addition to the performances in this city, five concerts will be given at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York; five at the Academy of Music, Philadelphia; five at the new Music Hall, Baltimore; five at Metzerott Hall, Washington; four public rehearsals and four concerts under the auspices of the Philharmonic Society, at the Academy of Music, Brooklyn; 10 concerts at Sanders' Theatre, Cambridge; six concerts at Infantry Hall, Providence, and single concerts in various other cities.

THE ORCHESTRA

will number 82 musicians, and is made up as follows: Sixteen 1st violins, 14 2d violins, 10 violas, 8 violoncellos, 8 bassos, 1 harp, 3 flutes, 2 oboes, 1 English horn, 2 clarinets, 1 bass clarinet, 2 bassoons, 1 contra bassoon, 4 horns, 3 trumpets, 3 trombones, 1 tuba and 4 percussion instruments. The engagement of 10 new members, it is believed, will improve the orchestra at certain points. The most important acquisition is the new 1st clarinet player, M. Pourtan, who has filled a similar position in the Symphony orchestra and the Grand Opera at Lyons, where he is held in high esteem by his fellow artists.

FRANZ KNEISEL.

The following list, showing in full the personnel of the orchestra, may not prove without interest:

First violins—Messrs. Kneisel, Loeffler, Adamowski, Schnitzler, Roth, Kuntz, Mosdauer, Fiedler Ondricek, Krafft, Hoffmann, Malm, Strube, Eichheim, Knecht, Hahn.

Second violins—Messrs. Akeroyd, Fiumara, Sverensky, Marble, Schuchmann, J. Kneisel, Tischer-Zietz, S. Goldstein, Zahn, Kurth, Reisland, Eichler, Michael, Berger.

Violas—Messrs. Svecenski, Zach, H. Heindl, Barleben, Gruenberg, Kolster, Hoyer, Kluge, Sauer, Krauss.

Violoncellos—Messrs. Schroeder, Schulz, J. Adamowski, Minkels, Rose, E. Loeffler, C. Barth, Nagel.

Basses—Messrs. A. Goldstein, Elkind, Barzthes, Seydel, Barth, Gerhardt, Reinhardt, Butler.

Harp—Mr. H. Schuecker.
Flutes—Messrs. Moe, E. M. Heindl, Fox.
Oboes—Messrs. Sautet, Demuth.
English horn—Mr. F. Muller.
Drums—Mr. H. D. Simpson.
Clarinets—Messrs. Pourtan and Metzger.
Bassoons—Messrs. Litke and Guenzel.
Horns—Messrs. Hackebarth, Lorbeer, Hein and Schumann.
Trumpets—Messrs. P. Mueller and Mand.
Trombones: Messrs. Hampe, Abloescher and Rigg.
Tuba—Mr. E. Golde.
Tympani—C. R. Ludwig.

Mr. Paur's experience during his first year as conductor made him acquainted with the tastes of his public, and has been a great aid to him in the preparation of his programmes. He has devoted a great deal of time to this important duty during the summer. From a very large number of scores which he has examined he has chosen for performance during the season:

THE FOLLOWING NOVELTIES

Symphony No. 6	Tschaikowsky
Symphony in D	Sgambati
Wallenstein symphony	D'Indy
New prize symphony	Geo. W. Chadwick
Overture, "Sappho"	Goldmark
Overture, "Wem die Krone"	Ritter
Overture, "Corsaire"	Berlioz
Overture, "Carneval"	Dvorak
Overture, "Otello"	Dvorak
Overture, "In der Natur"	Dvorak
Overture, "Elegie"	Kahn
Overture	Rietz
Prelude, "Dornroeschen"	Langer
Seebilder	J. K. Paine
Variations for orchestra	Knorr

M. YSAYE.

Symphonic poem	Smetana
Entr'acte, "Gouverneur von Tours"	Reinecke
Poeme symphonique for flute and orchestra,	Benoit

STANDARD WORKS.

Among the standard works are:

Beethoven	Symphonies Nos. 2, 3 and 7
Haydn	Symphonies G major, E flat
Ph. Em. Bach	Symphonies D major
Mozart	Symphonies E flat
Schubert	Unfinished symphony B minor
Schumann	Symphonies C major and Rhenish
Mendelssohn	Symphonies A major
Raff	Symphonies "Im Walde"
Volkman	Symphonies
Brahms	Symphonies No. 3
Rubinstein	Symphonies "Ocean"
Dvorak	Symphonies "From the New World"
Saint-Saens	Symphonies A minor
Overture, "Fidelio"	Beethoven
Overture, "Lenore No. 2"	Beethoven
Overture, "Anacreon"	Cherubini
Overture, "Carneval Romaine"	Berlioz
Overture, "Don Giovanni"	Mozart
Overture, "Freischuetz"	Weber
Overture, "Die Meistersingers"	Wagner
Overture, "Melusine"	Mendelssohn
Overture, "Die Verkaufte Braut"	Smetana
Overture, "Hans Helling"	Marschner
Overture, "Carlo Broski"	Auber
Overture, "L'Enfant Prodigue"	Auber
Overture, "Jessonda"	Spohr
Hirtenmusik	J. Seb. Bach
Symphonic poem, "Les Preludes"	Liszt
Hungarian Rhapsody	Liszt
Carneval in Paris	Svendsen
Serenade	Brahms
Suite, "Aus Holbergs Zeit"	Grieg
Suite	Lachner
Suite, "Aus Thuringen"	Raff
Suite, "L'Arlesienne"	Bizet
Serenade No. 2	Volkmann

CESAR THOMSON.

Serenade for wind instruments	Mozart
Kaisermarsch	Wagner
Entr'Acte, "Rosamunde"	Schubert
Ballet music, "Demon"	Rubinstein

As will be seen, the season's music will be not lacking in agreeable variety, strong contrasts and a welcome representation of the different musical nationalities.

ALL THE SOLOISTS

have not yet signed contracts, but those who have are Mmes. Emma Eames, Emma Juch, H. H. A. Beach, Messrs. Ben Davies, M. Ysaye, Cesar Thomson, Carl Baermann, C. Mole, Franz Kneisel and A. Schroeder. Several other distinguished native and foreign artists will also appear, and their names will be announced as soon as their contracts are signed. Of those named, the famous violinists, Ysaye and Thomson, have not yet been heard in this country.

Mons. Ysaye after graduating at the conservatory in Liege, and studying for a year with Wieniawski, completed his education under Vieuxtemps, and is said by constant association to have imbibed the manners and methods of that great genius. The characteristics of his playing are broadness of conception, a clearness of execution rarely heard, and great personal magnetism. He is a young man of striking appearance, and has won an almost sensational success in his various concert tours in Europe.

Mr. Thompson, like Ysaye, is a Belgian who comes to us with the prestige of a long series of successes in Europe. His technique is said to be astounding and is the envy of all violinists who hear him.

COMPLETE PROGRAMMES

for the first five concerts are appended:

FIRST CONCERT.

Overture, "Anacreon"	Cherubini
Symphony No. 7	Beethoven
Tambourin, gavotte and chaconne	Gluck
Entr'acte, "Gwendoline"	Chabrier
Kaisermarsch	Wagner

SECOND CONCERT.

Soloist, Mme. Emma Juch.

Overture, "Carneval Romaine"	Berlios
Aria
Symphony (new)	G. W. Chadwick
Aria
Ballet music, "Demon"	Rubinstein

EMMA EAMES.

THIRD CONCERT.

Soloist, Mr. Carl Baermann.

Unfinished symphony in B minor	Schubert
Concerto for pianoforte in E flat major	Beethoven
Symphony in C major	Schumann

FOURTH CONCERT.

Overture, "Die Verkaufte Braut"	Smetana
Symphony in D (first time)	Sgambati
Suite, "L'Arlesienne"	Bizet

FIFTH CONCERT.

Soloist, Mme. Emma Eames.

Symphony in E flat	Mozart
Aria
Entr'acte from "Rosamunde"	Schubert
March in B minor	Schubert-Liszt
Aria
Overture, "Carlo Broski"	Auber

THE SCALE OF PRICES

for season tickets for rehearsals or for concerts will be the same as last year, $12 and $7.50, according to location of seats. All tickets will be sold by auction. The sales will be held at Music Hall, and will be conducted by Mr. H. W. Jackson. The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold on Monday, Sept. 24, at 10 A. M.; the $7.50 seats for rehearsals on Tuseday, Sept. 25, at 10 A. M.; the $12 seats for concerts on Thursday, Sept. 27, at 10 A. M., and the $7.50 concert seats on Friday, Sept. 28, at the same hour. Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice, and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a large diagram, and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered in the hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be immediately resold.

EMMA JUCH.

Gazette

SUNDAY MORNING EDITION.

BOSTON, SEPT. 16, 1894

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The fourteenth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, will begin on October 12, Friday afternoon, public rehearsal, and on October 13, Saturday night. It will, as usual, include twenty-four concerts, and as many public rehearsals, at weekly intervals, with some lapses, to be hereafter announced. The sales, by auction, of the season tickets, are thus appointed: Monday, September 24, twelve dollar seats for the public rehearsals; September 25, seven dollar and a half rehearsal seats; September 27, twelve dollar concert seats; September 28, seven dollar and a half concert seats. The bids will be for premiums, and not more than four seats will be sold to a single bidder. The sale will be held in Music Hall.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, Sept. 15, 1894.

MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

14th Season, 1894-95.

24 PUBLIC REHEARSALS

on Friday Afternoons, beginning Oct. 12 (omitting Nov 2, Dec. 7, Jan. 11, Feb. 8, and March 15).

24 CONCERTS

on Saturday Evenings, beginning Oct. 13, (omitting Nov. 3, Dec. 8, Jan. 12, Feb. 9 and March 16).

Tickets for the series of Concerts and for the series of Rehearsals, $12 and $7.50, according to location.

The $12 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, MONDAY, Sept 24, at 10 A. M.

The $7.50 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, TUESDAY, Sept. 25, at 10 A. M.

The $12 Seats for the Concerts will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, on THURSDAY, Sept. 27, at 10 A. M.

The $7.50 Seats for the Concerts will be sold in like manner, at the same place, on FRIDAY, Sept. 28, at 10 A. M.

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

Tickets will be delivered in the Hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be immediately resold.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The musical people of Boston may well feel proud of the world-famed organization which had its birth in this city fourteen years ago. It has grown from year to year, until now, not only in this country but in Europe, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is recognized as one of the leading organizations for the performance of orchestral music. The coming season promises to be the equal of any in the brilliant past record. The best available soloists have been engaged, and Mr. Paur has devoted much time and thought in the preparation of the different programmes. Many novelties will be introduced, together with the standard works.

The make-up of the orchestra is essentially the same as last year, although there is to be a slight change among the clarinets. It may not be generally known that outside of the twenty-four public rehearsals and twenty-four Saturday evening concerts in Music Hall each season there are also nearly fifty performances given at various intervals, divided among the cities of New York, Brooklyn, Baltimore, Washington, Philadelphia and Cambridge.

The annual auction sale of season tickets for the concerts and public rehearsals to be given in Boston is announced to take place at Music Hall on September 24, 25, 27 and 28. On September 24 and 25 the public rehearsal tickets will be sold and on the 27th and 28th the concert tickets. The same rules as in past seasons will govern the sale.

BOSTON POST.

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, SEPT. 16, 1894.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The musical season in Boston will begin with the opening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is announced for Oct. 13. This fine body of instrumentalists is not only a local pride to Bostonians, but to all music lovers in this country. Celebrated musicians from the art centres of Europe, who have heard them in the performance of the works of the great composers, attest that this is the equal of any orchestra in the world.

With the opening concert it enters upon the fourteenth season. As in the past, this season promises much of interest to our local music lovers.

There will be twenty-four Friday afternoon public rehearsals on consecutive Friday afternoons from Oct. 12, 1894, to April 26, 1895, omitting Nov. 2, Dec. 7, 1894, Jan. 11, Feb. 8 and March 15, 1895, and twenty-four Saturday evening concerts from Oct. 13, 1894, to March 16, 1895, omitting Nov. 3, Dec. 8, 1894, Jan. 12, Feb. 9 and March 16, 1895.

Able soloists have been secured, and Mr. Paur promises many new compositions never before given in Boston.

The annual auction sale of season tickets is announced to take place in Music Hall on Sept. 24, 25, 27 and 28. On Monday and Tuesday, Sept. 24 and 25, the rehearsal tickets will be sold, and on Thursday and Friday, the concert tickets, beginning at 10 o'clock each morning.

[17]

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, SEPT. 16, 1894.

MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. EMIL PAUR. Conductor.

14th Season, 1894-5.

24 PUBLIC REHEARSALS

on Friday Afternoons, beginning Oct. 12, (omitting Nov. 2, Dec. 7, Jan. 11, Feb. 8, and March 15).

24 CONCERTS

on Saturday Evenings, beginning Oct. 13, (omitting Nov. 3, Dec. 8, Jan. 12, Feb. 9 and March 16),

Tickets for the series of Concerts and for the series of Rehearsals, $12 and $7.50, according to location.

The $12 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction at Music Hall, MONDAY, Sept. 24, at 10 A. M.

The $7.50 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, TUESDAY, Sept. 25, at 10 A.M.

The $12 Seats for the Concerts will be sold at auction at Music Hall, on THURSDAY, Sept. 27, at 10 A.M.

The $7.50 Seats for the Concerts will be sold in like manner, at the same place, on FRIDAY, Sept. 28, at 10 A. M.

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

Tickets will be delivered in the Hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be immediately resold.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The arrangements made for the fourteenth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra insure a series of brilliant performances. Great care has been exercised in the selections of programmes, and many famous names figure in the list of soloists who have been engaged. Twenty-four public rehearsals will be given at Music Hall on Friday afternoons and twenty-four concerts on Saturday evenings, beginning Oct. 12 and 13. The scale of prices for season tickets will be the same as in past seasons—$12 and $7.50, according to location. All tickets will be sold by auction. The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold on Monday, Sept. 24, the $7.50 seats for rehearsals on Tuesday, Sept. 26, the $12 seats for concerts on Thursday, Sept. 27, and the $7.50 concert seats on Friday, September 28. The auction sales will be held at Music Hall, and will begin each day at 10 A. M. As usual, bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The same great interest attending the Symphonies in former years is again to be demonstrated in this the fourteenth season and the concerts by this unrivalled orchestra, will be the great feature in musical and social circles during the winter.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, SEPT. 16, 1894.

Boston Symphony Concerts.

The Boston Symphony orchestra will give the first of its annual series of 24 concerts at Music hall on Saturday evening, Oct 13, preceded by the usual public rehearsal on Friday afternoon, Oct 12. The plans, as far as completed, indicate that the 14th season of this organization will be in many respects of exceptional brilliancy and interest. The efficiency of the orchestra has been improved in some departments by the engagement of 10 new members.

The most important changes are in the positions of first clarinet and first bassoon. The unrivaled body of first violins will be the same as last season, and the size of the orchestra will be the same It will number 84 players.

The management has been fortunate in being able to secure a number of soloists whose appearance will add very much to the attractiveness of the concerts. Among these are Messrs Ysaye and Cesar Thompson, two Belgians who rank among the greatest of living violinists. Neither of these artists has yet been heard in America, but each comes with the prestige of extraordinary successes won in European capitals.

Engagements have also been made with Mmes Eames, Juch, Beach, Messrs Ben Davis, Baermann, Kneisel, Schroder and others.

The program will include besides the usual variety of standard works the following novelties:

Symphony No. 6	Tschaikowsky
Symphony in D	Sgambati
Wallenstein symphony	d'Indy
Prize symphony (new)	Geo. W. Chadwick
Seebilder	J. K. Paine
Overture, Sappho	Goldmark
Corsaire	Berlioz
Wem die Krone	Ritter
Carneval	Dvorak
Otello	Dvorak
In der Natur	Dvorak
Elegie	Kahn
Variations for orchestra	Knorr
Entr'acte, Gouveneur von Tours	Reinecke

The prices of season tickets for the series of 24 concerts and for the series of 24 rehearsals will be $12 and $7.50, according to the location of seats. All season tickets will be sold by auction at Music hall.

The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold on Monday, Sept 24, the $7.50 seats for rehearsals on Tuesday, Sept 25, the $12 seats for concerts on Thursday, Sept 27, and the $7.50 concert seats on Friday, Sept 28. The sales will begin each day at 10 a m. Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only and not for the choice. The seats open to competition will be shown on a large diagram and will be marked off as sold. Circulars giving full information may be had at Music hall.

Boston ...

SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 16, 1894.

UNDER PAUR.

Soloists That Will Appear at the Symphony Concerts.

Sketches of the Great Fiddlers, Thomson and Ysaye.

Nove'ties of Interest That Will Be Played Here.

The arrangements made for the fourteenth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are well calculated to maintain the great interest which its concerts have attracted for so many years.

The orchestra will be the same in size as last season, and will number 84 players. Of these 10 will be new-comers. The most important acquisitions are a first clarinet, Mr. Pourtan, who comes from Lyons, and a first bassoon player, Mr. Litke, from one of the New York orchestras.

YSAYE.

The Boston season will consist as usual of 24 public rehearsals on Friday afternoons, beginning October 12, and 24 concerts on Saturday evenings, beginning October 13. In addition to these performances the monthly performances will be continued in New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn, with the customary series in Cambridge and Providence, and single concerts in other cities. Among the novelties or works not played before in the Boston concerts, which will be given this season, are the following:

CESAR THOMSON.

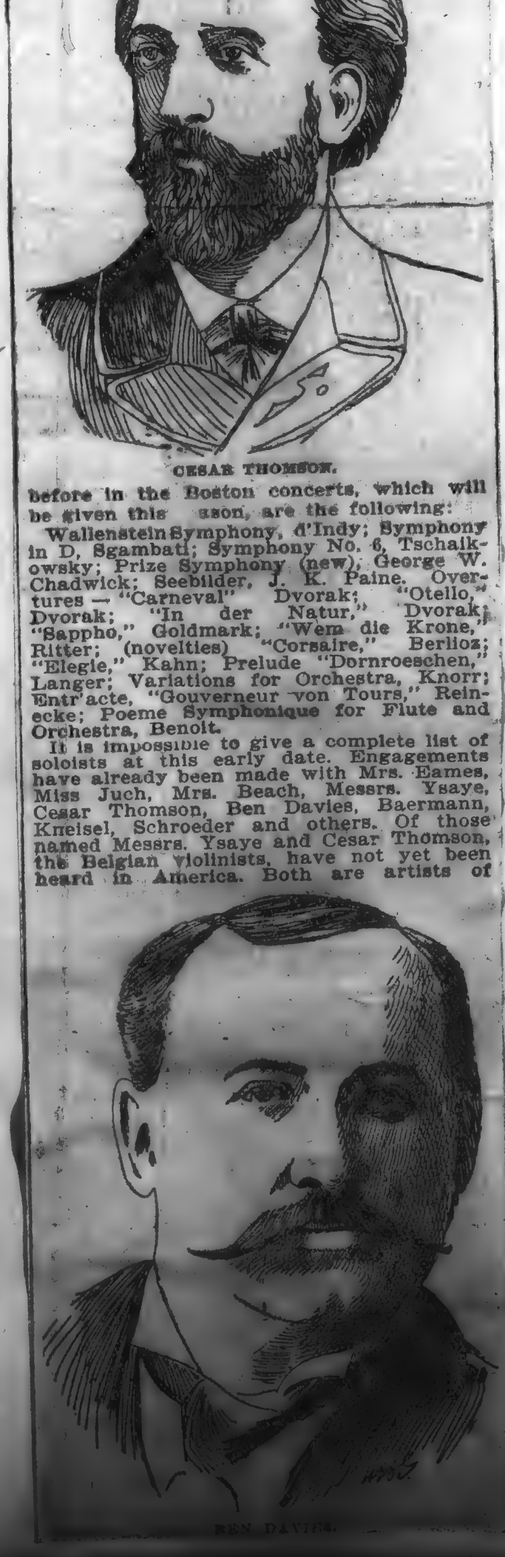
Wallenstein Symphony, d'Indy; Symphony in D, Sgambati; Symphony No. 6, Tschaikowsky; Prize Symphony (new), George W. Chadwick; Seebilder, J. K. Paine. Overtures — "Carneval" Dvorak; "Otello," Dvorak; "In der Natur," Dvorak; "Sappho," Goldmark; "Wem die Krone," Ritter; (novelties) "Corsaire," Berlioz; "Elegie," Kahn; Prelude "Dornroeschen," Langer; Variations for Orchestra, Knorr; Entr'acte, "Gouverneur von Tours," Reinecke; Poeme Symphonique for Flute and Orchestra, Benoit.

It is impossible to give a complete list of soloists at this early date. Engagements have already been made with Mrs. Eames, Miss Juch, Mrs. Beach, Messrs. Ysaye, Cesar Thomson, Ben Davies, Baermann, Kneisel, Schroeder and others. Of those named Messrs. Ysaye and Cesar Thomson, the Belgian violinists, have not yet been heard in America. Both are artists of



BEN. DAVIES.

Cesar Thomson, mentioned above, is one of the most distinguished violinists now living. He was born in Luettich, Belgium, March 17, 1857. His father taught him at first, and the boy, when 7 years old, went to the Luettich Conservatory, where he studied under Dupuis and Leonard. In 1873 he went as "chamber musician" to the Baron von Derwiest to Lugano, Italy, and there in 1877 he was married. Afterward he was concert-meister of Bilse's Orchestra in Berlin. In 1883 he was appointed a teacher of the violin at the Luettich Conservatory, where he has since remained, with the exception of concert-tours.

Eugene Ysaye, a most famous violin virtuoso, was born July 16, 1858, in Luettich, Belgium. His first lessons were taken at the Luettich Conservatory, and afterward he studied under Vieuxtemps in Brussels. He was afterward and until '81 concert-meister of the Bilse Orchestra in Berlin. He then traveled extensively, and in 1886 he was appointed first teacher of the violin at the Brussels Conservatory, where he is still engaged. Ysaye has written six violin concertos, variations on a theme of Paganini, and other pieces, but few have been published.

Mr. Davies, the Welsh tenor, was heard here last season at Handel and Haydn concerts and he then made a favorable impression.

There is naturally speculation concerning the auction sale of season tickets for the Boston Symphony Concerts.

Some—they are in all probability few in number—object to the proposed introduction of "light" music. By "light" they mean French; for to certain hearers who have been led to believe that music was invented and patented for all time by the Germans, light or French are synonyms. Therefore they shy at the announcement that Mr. Paur purposes to broaden and enliven his programs.

These same objectors have listened patiently in the past to "light" music, or stupid music composed by Germans or Americans. Do they then prefer Humperdink to Massenet or Chabrier, and Mr. Clayton Jones to Auber?

There will be natural curiosity also to see and hear the new members of the orchestra. The first clarinet is a Frenchman, Mr. Pourton, from Lyons. Let us trust that his performance will belie the pun that occurs to even the humblest.

Mr. Chadwick's new symphony, which won the prize offered in competition by the National Conservatory, will be played at an early date. Thomson and Ysaye, the celebrated Belgian fiddlers, will be heard during the season.

THE SYMPHONY SEATS.

The arrangements made for the fourteenth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra insure a series of brilliant performances. Great care has been exercised in the selection of programs, and many famous names figure in the list of soloists who have been engaged. Twenty-four public rehearsals will be given in Music Hall on Friday afternoons and twenty-four concerts on Saturday evenings, beginning Oct. 12 and 13. The scale of prices for season tickets will be the same as in past seasons—$12 and $7 50, according to location. All tickets will be sold by auction. The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold on Monday, Sept. 24, the $7 50 seats for rehearsals on Tuesday, Sept. 26, the $12 seats for concerts on Thursday, Sept. 27, and the $7 50 concert seats on Friday, Sept. 28. The auction sales will be held at Music Hall, and will begin each day at 10 A. M.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 17, 1894.

The Symphony Concerts.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its fourteenth season at Music Hall on Oct. 12, and will give the usual series of twenty-four public rehearsals on Friday afternoons and twenty-four concerts on Saturday evenings. The orchestra will comprise eighty-four players, ten of the number being new-comers. The most important changes are in the positions of first clarinet and first bassoon. With these exceptions, all the principal artists have been reëngaged. The concerts extend over so many weeks that it is impossible to give at this time all the programmes or a complete list of soloists, but sufficient is known to warrant the belief that the coming season will equal in interest and attractiveness any in the history of the organization.

Conductor Paur's programmes will cover a wide range of orchestral literature and the adherents of each school will find especially attractive features in them. The standard works of the great composers will, of course, be fully represented. A partial list of the novelties to be given is as follows:

Symphony No. 6	Tschaikowsky
Wallenstein Symphony	D'Indy
Symphony in D	Sgambati
New (Prize) Symphony	George W. Chadwick
Overture "Sappho"	Goldmark
"Carneval"	Dvorak
"Otello"	Dvorak
"In der Natur"	Dvorak
"Corsaire"	Berlioz
"Wem die Krone"	Ritter
"Elegie"	Kahn
Prelude "Dornroeschen"	Langer
Seebilder	J. K. Paine
Variations for Orchestra	Knorr
Symphonic Poem	Smetana
Entr'Acte "Gouverneur von Tours"	Reinecke
Poeme Symphonique for Flute and Orchestra	Benoit

The list of solo artists is particularly attractive. Among those already engaged are Messrs. Ysaye and Cesar Thomson, who are to visit America for the first time this season These Belgian artists rank among the greatest of living violinists and come to us with the prestige of extraordinary success in European cities. Mmes. Eames, Juch, Beach, Messrs. Davies, Baermann, Kneisel, Schroeder and others will also appear.

The scale of prices for season tickets for the series of twenty-four concerts and for the series of twenty-four rehearsals will be $12 and $7.50 according to the location of seats. All tickets will be sold by auction at Music Hall. The $12 seats for rehearsals will be sold on Monday, Sept. 24; the $7.50 seats for rehearsals on Tuesday, Sept. 25; the $12 seats for concerts, on Thursday, Sept. 27; and the $7.50 concert seats, on Friday, Sept. 28. The sale will begin each day at 10 A. M. Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice, and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a large diagram and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered in the hall and must be paid for as soon as bought or they will be resold.

MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 17, 1894.

SYMPHONY AUCTION NEXT MONDAY

The fourteenth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall will begin on Oct. 12 with the public rehearsal. As in past seasons, there will be 24 public rehearsals and 24 Saturday evening concerts.

The auction sale of season tickets is to take place in Music Hall beginning Monday, Sept. 24, when the $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold, following on Tuesday with the $7 50 seats. Thursday, Sept. 27, the $12 seats for the concerts, and on Friday, the 28th, the $7 50 seats.

Boston Daily Globe.

TUESDAY, SEPT. 18, 1894.

The number of inquiries daily received at Music hall augurs well for the success of the coming series of Symphony concerts. These concerts have now been an established and valued institution for 13 years, and have been attended by an ever widening circle of music lovers. While the chief interest lies in the playing of this superb body of 80 artists, the appearance of many famous soloists engaged for the coming season will add much to the enjoyment of subscribers. The sales of season tickets for both rehearsals and concerts will be held next week at Music hall.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

The Official Paper of the State.

TUESDAY MORNING, SEPT. 18, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's announcement for the coming season is most attractive, and there is every indication that the coming concerts will prove as attractive as in any previous year. The auction sale of season tickets takes place in Music Hall, beginning next Monday morning at 10 o'clock, when the $12 seats for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals will be sold. On Tuesday, Sept. 25, the cheaper or $7 50 tickets, and on Thursday and Friday, Sept. 27 and 28, the concert seats. Ladies who are unfamiliar with auction sales need not hesitate to attend these, for their bids will be carefully watched for, and it is unnecessary to say every advantage will be given them by their gentlemen competitors.

Boston Journal.

TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 18, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT AUCTION.

Next Monday morning at 10 o'clock the sale of the $12 seats for the Symphony rehearsals will begin at Music Hall. The tickets will be sold at auction and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. To those not acquainted with these sales it may be mentioned that the seats are sold in their regular order, and not for choice. A large diagram is erected on the stage, showing the exact location of each seat. Mr. Jackson, who has been the auctioneer in past seasons, will officiate in the same capacity at the coming sale.

The bid is the premium to be added to the price of the seat. On Tuesday, Sept. 25, the $7 50 rehearsal tickets will be sold. Thursday and Friday, the Saturday evening concert tickets. It must be remembered that the tickets are delivered at time of sale, and must be paid for as soon as bought, otherwise they will be immediately resold. It is the custom for ladies to attend and bid.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.

VOL. XCVI., NO. 80.

TUESDAY, SEPT. 18, 1894.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The announcements that have been published concerning the coming series of Symphony concerts have aroused a great deal of interest and are being widely discussed in musical circles. Mr. Paur's programmes cover a wide range of orchestral literature and the adherents of each school will find especially attractive features in them. A number of distinguished artists have been engaged as soloists. Subscribers to these concerts will be offered a series of performances which for excellence, variety and attractiveness it is safe to say can be surpassed in no other city in the world.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

The Official Paper of the State.

THURSDAY MORNING, SEPT. 20, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT TICKETS.

The announcement for the 14th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been commented on most favorably. The programme for the series of 24 Friday afternoon public rehearsals and 24 Saturday evening concerts will be of genuine excellence. The soloists already engaged will add greatly to the enjoyment of the concerts.

The scale of prices for season tickets will be the same as in past years, $12, and $7 50, according to location. The sale of season tickets by auction will be held in Music Hall, commencing next Monday morning, when the $12 seats for the public rehearsals will be sold. The $7 50 rehearsal tickets will be sold on Tuesday, Sept. 25. The $12 season tickets for the concerts on Thursday, Sept. 27, and the $7 50 season tickets for the concerts on Friday, Sept. 28, will be sold.

[18]

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, SEPT. 16, 1894.

MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. EMIL PAUR. Conductor.

14th Season, 1894-5.

24 PUBLIC REHEARSALS

on Friday Afternoons, beginning Oct. 12, (omitting Nov. 2, Dec. 7, Jan. 11, Feb. 8, and March 15).

24 CONCERTS

on Saturday Evenings, beginning Oct. 13, (omitting Nov. 3, Dec. 8, Jan. 12, Feb. 9 and March 16),

Tickets for the series of Concerts and for the series of Rehearsals, $12 and $7.50, according to location.

The $12 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction at Music Hall, MONDAY, Sept. 24, at 10 A. M.

The $7.50 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, TUESDAY, Sept. 25, at 10 A.M.

The $12 Seats for the Concerts will be sold at auction at Music Hall, on THURSDAY, Sept. 27, at 10 A.M.

The $7.50 Seats for the Concerts will be sold in like manner, at the same place, on FRIDAY, Sept. 28, at 10 A. M.

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

Tickets will be delivered in the Hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be immediately resold.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The arrangements made for the fourteenth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra insure a series of brilliant performances. Great care has been exercised in the selections of programmes, and many famous names figure in the list of soloists who have been engaged. Twenty-four public rehearsals will be given at Music Hall on Friday afternoons and twenty-four concerts on Saturday evenings, beginning Oct. 12 and 13. The scale of prices for season tickets will be the same as in past seasons—$12 and $7.50, according to location. All tickets will be sold by auction. The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold on Monday, Sept. 24, the $7.50 seats for rehearsals on Tuesday, Sept. 26, the $12 seats for concerts on Thursday, Sept. 27, and the $7.50 concert seats on Friday, September 28. The auction sales will be held at Music Hall, and will begin each day at 10 A. M. As usual, bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The same great interest attending the Symphonies in former years is again to be demonstrated in this the fourteenth season and the concerts by this unrivalled orchestra, will be the great feature in musical and social circles during the winter.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, SEPT. 16, 1894.

Boston Symphony Concerts.

The Boston Symphony orchestra will give the first of its annual series of 24 concerts at Music hall on Saturday evening, Oct 13, preceded by the usual public rehearsal on Friday afternoon, Oct 12. The plans, as far as completed, indicate that the 14th season of this organization will be in many respects of exceptional brilliancy and interest. The efficiency of the orchestra has been improved in some departments by the engagement of 10 new members.

The most important changes are in the positions of first clarinet and first bassoon. The unrivaled body of first violins will be the same as last season, and the size of the orchestra will be the same It will number 84 players.

The management has been fortunate in being able to secure a number of soloists whose appearance will add very much to the attractiveness of the concerts. Among these are Messrs Ysaye and Cesar Thompson, two Belgians who rank among the greatest of living violinists. Neither of these artists has yet been heard in America, but each comes with the prestige of extraordinary successes won in European capitals.

Engagements have also been made with Mmes Eames, Juch, Beach, Messrs Ben Davis, Baerman, Kneisel, Schroder and others.

The program will include besides the usual variety of standard works the following novelties:

Symphony No. 6	Tschaikowsky
Symphony in D	Sgambati
Wallenstein symphony	d'Indy
Prize symphony (new)	Geo. W. Chadwick
Seebilder	J. K. Paine
Overture, Sappho	Goldmark
Corsaire	Berlioz
Wem die Krone	Ritter
Carneval	Dvorak
Otello	Dvorak
In der Natur	Dvorak
Elegie	Kahn
Variations for orchestra	Knorr
Entr'acte, Gouverneur von Tours	Reinecke

The prices of season tickets for the series of 24 concerts and for the series of 24 rehearsals will be $12 and $7.50, according to the location of seats. All season tickets will be sold by auction at Music hall.

The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold on Monday, Sept 24, the $7.50 seats for rehearsals on Tuesday, Sept 25, the $12 seats for concerts on Thursday, Sept 27, and the $7.50 concert seats on Friday, Sept 28. The sales will begin each day at 10 a m. Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only and not for the choice. The seats open to competition will be shown on a large diagram and will be marked off as sold. Circulars giving full information may be had at Music hall.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 16, 1894.

UNDER PAUR.

Soloists That Will Appear at the Symphony Concerts.

Sketches of the Great Fiddlers, Thomson and Ysaye.

Nove'ties of Interest That Will Be Played Here.

The arrangements made for the fourteenth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are well calculated to maintain the great interest which its concerts have attracted for so many years.

The orchestra will be the same in size as last season, and will number 84 players. Of these 10 will be new-comers. The most important acquisitions are a first clarinet, Mr. Pourtan, who comes from Lyons, and a first bassoon player, Mr. Litke, from one of the New York orchestras.

YSAYE.

The Boston season will consist as usual of 24 public rehearsals on Friday afternoons, beginning October 12, and 24 concerts on Saturday evenings, beginning October 13. In addition to these performances the monthly performances will be continued in New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn, with the customary series in Cambridge and Providence, and single concerts in other cities. Among the novelties or works not played before in the Boston concerts, which will be given this season, are the following:

CESAR THOMSON.

Wallenstein Symphony, d'Indy; Symphony in D, Sgambati; Symphony No. 6, Tschaikowsky; Prize Symphony (new), George W. Chadwick; Seebilder, J. K. Paine. Overtures — "Carneval" Dvorak; "Otello," Dvorak; "In der Natur," Dvorak; "Sappho," Goldmark; "Wem die Krone," Ritter; (novelties) "Corsaire," Berlioz; "Elegie," Kahn; Prelude "Dornroeschen," Langer; Variations for Orchestra, Knorr; Entr'acte, "Gouverneur von Tours," Reinecke; Poeme Symphonique for Flute and Orchestra, Benoit.

It is impossible to give a complete list of soloists at this early date. Engagements have already been made with Mrs. Eames, Miss Juch, Mrs. Beach, Messrs. Ysaye, Cesar Thomson, Ben Davies, Baermann, Kneisel, Schroeder and others. Of those named Messrs. Ysaye and Cesar Thomson, the Belgian violinists, have not yet been heard in America. Both are artists of great distinction, who have made sensational successes in Europe.

BEN DAVIES.

The program of the first concert, Saturday, Oct. 13, will be as follows:

Overture, "Anacreon"	Cherubini
Symphony No. 7	Beethoven
Tambourin, Gavotte and Chaconne	Gluck
Entr'acte, "Gwendoline"	Chabrier
Kaisermarsch	Wagner

***

Cesar Thomson, mentioned above, is one of the most distinguished violinists now living. He was born in Luettich, Belgium, March 17, 1857. His father taught him at first, and the boy, when 7 years old, went to the Luettich Conservatory, where he studied under Dupuis and Leonard. In 1873 he went as "chamber musician" to the Baron von Derwiest to Lugano, Italy, and there in 1877 he was married. Afterward he was concert-meister of Bilse's Orchestra in Berlin. In 1883 he was appointed a teacher of the violin at the Luettich Conservatory, where he has since remained, with the exception of concert-tours.

***

Eugene Ysaye, a most famous violin virtuoso, was born July 16, 1858, in Luettich, Belgium. His first lessons were taken at the Luettich Conservatory, and afterward he studied under Vieuxtemps in Brussels. He was afterward and until '81 concert-meister of the Bilse Orchestra in Berlin. He then traveled extensively, and in 1886 he was appointed first teacher of the violin at the Brussels Conservatory, where he is still engaged. Ysaye has written six violin concertos, variations on a theme of Paganini, and other pieces, but few have been published.

***

Mr. Davies, the Welsh tenor, was heard here last season at Handel and Haydn concerts and he then made a favorable impression.

There is naturally speculation concerning the auction sale of season tickets for the Boston Symphony Concerts.

Some—they are in all probability few in number—object to the proposed introduction of "light" music. By "light" they mean French; for to certain hearers who have been led to believe that music was invented and patented for all time by the Germans, light or French are synonyms. Therefore they shy at the announcement that Mr. Paur purposes to broaden and enliven his programs.

These same objectors have listened patiently in the past to "light" music, or stupid music composed by Germans or Americans Do they then prefer Humperdink to Massenet or Chabrier, and Mr. Clayton Jones to Auber?

There will be natural curiosity also to see and hear the new members of the orchestra. The first clarinet is a Frenchman, Mr. Pourton, from Lyons. Let us trust that his performance will belie the pun that occurs to even the humblest.

Mr. Chadwick's new symphony, which won the prize offered in competition by the National Conservatory, will be played at an early date. Thomson and Ysaye, the celebrated Belgian fiddlers, will be heard during the season.

***

THE SYMPHONY SEATS.

The arrangements made for the fourteenth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra insure a series of brilliant performances. Great care has been exercised in the selection of programs, and many famous names figure in the list of soloists who have been engaged. Twenty-four public rehearsals will be given in Music Hall on Friday afternoons and twenty-four concerts on Saturday evenings, beginning Oct. 12 and 13. The scale of prices for season tickets will be the same as in past seasons —$12 and $7 50, according to location. All tickets will be sold by auction. The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold on Monday, Sept. 24, the $7 50 seats for rehearsals on Tuesday, Sept. 26, the $12 seats for concerts on Thursday, Sept. 27, and the $7 50 concert seats on Friday, Sept. 28. The auction sales will be held at Music Hall, and will begin each day at 10 A. M.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 17, 1894.

The Symphony Concerts.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its fourteenth season at Music Hall on Oct. 12, and will give the usual series of twenty-four public rehearsals on Friday afternoons and twenty-four concerts on Saturday evenings. The orchestra will comprise eighty-four players, ten of the number being new-comers. The most important changes are in the positions of first clarinet and first bassoon. With these exceptions, all the principal artists have been reëngaged. The concerts extend over so many weeks that it is impossible to give at this time all the programmes or a complete list of soloists, but sufficient is known to warrant the belief that the coming season will equal in interest and attractiveness any in the history of the organization.

Conductor Paur's programmes will cover a wide range of orchestral literature and the adherents of each school will find especially attractive features in them. The standard works of the great composers will, of course, be fully represented. A partial list of the novelties to be given is as follows:

Symphony No. 6	Tschaikowsky
Wallenstein Symphony	D'Indy
Symphony in D	Sgambati
New (Prize) Symphony	George W. Chadwick
Overture "Sappho"	Goldmark
"Carneval"	Dvorak
"Otello"	Dvorak
"In der Natur"	Dvorak
"Corsaire"	Berlioz
"Wem die Krone"	Ritter
"Elegie"	Kahn
Prelude "Dornroeschen"	Langer
Seebilder	J. K. Paine
Variations for Orchestra	Knorr
Symphonic Poem	Smetana
Entr'Acte "Gouverneur von Tours"	Reinecke
Poeme Symphonique for Flute and Orchestra	Benoit

The list of solo artists is particularly attractive. Among those already engaged are Messrs. Ysaye and Cesar Thomson, who are to visit America for the first time this season These Belgian artists rank among the greatest of living violinists and come to us with the prestige of extraordinary success in European cities. Mmes. Eames, Juch, Beach, Messrs. Davies, Baermann, Kneisel, Schroeder and others will also appear.

The scale of prices for season tickets for the series of twenty-four concerts and for the series of twenty-four rehearsals will be $12 and $7.50 according to the location of seats. All tickets will be sold by auction at Music Hall. The $12 seats for rehearsals will be sold on Monday, Sept. 24; the $7.50 seats for rehearsals on Tuesday, Sept, 25; the $12 seats for concerts, on Thursday, Sept. 27; and the $7.50 concert seats, on Friday, Sept. 28. The sale will begin each day at 10 A. M. Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice, and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a large diagram and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered in the hall and must be paid for as soon as bought or they will be resold.

[18]

Boston Journal.

MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 17, 1894.

SYMPHONY AUCTION NEXT MONDAY

The fourteenth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall will begin on Oct. 12 with the public rehearsal. As in past seasons, there will be 24 public rehearsals and 24 Saturday evening concerts.

The auction sale of season tickets is to take place in Music Hall beginning Monday, Sept. 24, when the $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold, following on Tuesday with the $7 50 seats. Thursday, Sept. 27, the $12 seats for the concerts, and on Friday, the 28th, the $7 50 seats.

Boston Daily Globe.

TUESDAY, SEPT. 18, 1894.

The number of inquiries daily received at Music hall augurs well for the success of the coming series of Symphony concerts. These concerts have now been an established and valued institution for 13 years, and have been attended by an ever widening circle of music lovers. While the chief interest lies in the playing of this superb body of 80 artists, the appearance of many famous soloists engaged for the coming season will add much to the enjoyment of subscribers. The sales of season tickets for both rehearsals and concerts will be held next week at Music hall.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

The Official Paper of the State.

TUESDAY MORNING, SEPT. 18, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's announcement for the coming season is most attractive, and there is every indication that the coming concerts will prove as attractive as in any previous year. The auction sale of season tickets takes place in Music Hall, beginning next Monday morning at 10 o'clock, when the $12 seats for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals will be sold. On Tuesday, Sept. 25, the cheaper or $7 50 tickets, and on Thursday and Friday, Sept. 27 and 28, the concert seats. Ladies who are unfamiliar with auction sales need not hesitate to attend these, for their bids will be carefully watched for, and it is unnecessary to say every advantage will be given them by their gentlemen competitors.

Boston Journal.

TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 18, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT AUCTION.

Next Monday morning at 10 o'clock the sale of the $12 seats for the Symphony rehearsals will begin at Music Hall. The tickets will be sold at auction and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. To those not acquainted with these sales it may be mentioned that the seats are sold in their regular order, and not for choice. A large diagram is erected on the stage, showing the exact location of each seat. Mr. Jackson, who has been the auctioneer in past seasons, will officiate in the same capacity at the coming sale.

The bid is the premium to be added to the price of the seat. On Tuesday, Sept. 25, the $7 50 rehearsal tickets will be sold. Thursday and Friday, the Saturday evening concert tickets. It must be remembered that the tickets are delivered at time of sale, and must be paid for as soon as bought, otherwise they will be immediately resold. It is the custom for ladies to attend and bid.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.

VOL. XCVI., NO. 80.

TUESDAY, SEPT. 18, 1894.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The announcements that have been published concerning the coming series of Symphony concerts have aroused a great deal of interest and are being widely discussed in musical circles. Mr. Paur's programmes cover a wide range of orchestral literature and the adherents of each school will find especially attractive features in them. A number of distinguished artists have been engaged as soloists. Subscribers to these concerts will be offered a series of performances which for excellence, variety and attractiveness it is safe to say can be surpassed in no other city in the world.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

The Official Paper of the State.

THURSDAY MORNING, SEPT. 20, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT TICKETS.

The announcement for the 14th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been commented on most favorably. The programme for the series of 24 Friday afternoon public rehearsals and 24 Saturday evening concerts will be of genuine excellence. The soloists already engaged will add greatly to the enjoyment of the concerts.

The scale of prices for season tickets will be the same as in past years, $12, and $7 50, according to location. The sale of season tickets by auction will be held in Music Hall, commencing next Monday morning, when the $12 seats for the public rehearsals will be sold. The $7 50 rehearsal tickets will be sold on Tuesday, Sept. 25. The $12 season tickets for the concerts on Thursday, Sept. 27, and the $7 50 season tickets for the concerts on Friday, Sept. 28, will be sold.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, SEPT. 16, 1894.

MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. EMIL PAUR. Conductor.

14th Season, 1894-5.

24 PUBLIC REHEARSALS

on Friday Afternoons, beginning Oct. 12, (omitting Nov. 2, Dec. 7, Jan. 11, Feb. 8, and March 15).

24 CONCERTS

on Saturday Evenings, beginning Oct. 13, (omitting Nov. 3, Dec. 8, Jan. 12, Feb. 9 and March 16),

Tickets for the series of Concerts and for the series of Rehearsals, $12 and $7.50, according to location.

The $12 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction at Music Hall, MONDAY, Sept. 24, at 10 A. M.

The $7.50 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, TUESDAY, Sept. 25, at 10 A.M.

The $12 Seats for the Concerts will be sold at auction at Music Hall, on THURSDAY, Sept. 27, at 10 A.M.

The $7.50 Seats for the Concerts will be sold in like manner, at the same place, on FRIDAY, Sept. 28, at 10 A. M.

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

Tickets will be delivered in the Hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be immediately resold.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The arrangements made for the fourteenth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra insure a series of brilliant performances. Great care has been exercised in the selections of programmes, and many famous names figure in the list of soloists who have been engaged. Twenty-four public rehearsals will be given at Music Hall on Friday afternoons and twenty-four concerts on Saturday evenings, beginning Oct. 12 and 13. The scale of prices for season tickets will be the same as in past seasons—$12 and $7.50, according to location. All tickets will be sold by auction. The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold on Monday, Sept. 24, the $7.50 seats for rehearsals on Tuesday, Sept. 26, the $12 seats for concerts on Thursday, Sept. 27, and the $7.50 concert seats on Friday, September 28. The auction sales will be held at Music Hall, and will begin each day at 10 A. M. As usual, bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The same great interest attending the Symphonies in former years is again to be demonstrated in this the fourteenth season and the concerts by this unrivalled orchestra, will be the great feature in musical and social circles during the winter.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, SEPT. 16, 1894.

Boston Symphony Concerts.

The Boston Symphony orchestra will give the first of its annual series of 24 concerts at Music hall on Saturday evening, Oct 13, preceded by the usual public rehearsal on Friday afternoon, Oct. 12. The plans, as far as completed, indicate that the 14th season of this organization will be in many respects of exceptional brilliancy and interest. The efficiency of the orchestra has been improved in some departments by the engagement of 10 new members.

The most important changes are in the positions of first clarinet and first bassoon. The unrivaled body of first violins will be the same as last season, and the size of the orchestra will be the same It will number 84 players.

The management has been fortunate in being able to secure a number of soloists whose appearance will add very much to the attractiveness of the concerts. Among these are Messrs Ysaye and Cesar Thompson, two Belgians who rank among the greatest of living violinists. Neither of these artists has yet been heard in America, but each comes with the prestige of extraordinary successes won in European capitals.

Engagements have also been made with Mmes Eames, Juch, Beach, Messrs Ben Davis, Baerman, Kneisel, Schroder and others.

The program will include besides the usual variety of standard works the following novelties:

Symphony No.6	Tschaikowsky
Symphony in D	Sgambati
Wallenstein symphony	d'Indy
Prize symphony (new)	Geo. W. Chadwick
Seebilder	J. K. Paine
Overture, Sappho	Goldmark
Corsaire	Berlioz
Wem die Krone	Ritter
Carneval	Dvorak
Otello	Dvorak
In der Natur	Dvorak
Elegie	Kahn
Variations for orchestra	Knorr
Entr'acte, Gouveneur von Tours	Reinecke

The prices of season tickets for the series of 24 concerts and for the series of 24 rehearsals will be $12 and $7.50, according to the location of seats. All season tickets will be sold by auction at Music hall.

The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold on Monday, Sept 24, the $7.50 seats for rehearsals on Tuesday, Sept 25, the $12 seats for concerts on Thursday, Sept 27, and the $7.50 concert seats on Friday, Sept 28. The sales will begin each day at 10 a m. Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only and not for the choice. The seats open to competition will be shown on a large diagram and will be marked off as sold. Circulars giving full information may be had at Music hall.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 16, 1894.

UNDER PAUR.

Soloists That Will Appear at the Symphony Concerts.

Sketches of the Great Fiddlers, Thomson and Ysaye.

Nove'ties of Interest That Will Be Played Here.

The arrangements made for the fourteenth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are well calculated to maintain the great interest which its concerts have attracted for so many years.

The orchestra will be the same in size as last season, and will number 84 players. Of these 10 will be new-comers. The most important acquisitions are a first clarinet, Mr. Pourtan, who comes from Lyons, and a first bassoon player, Mr. Litke, from one of the New York orchestras.

YSAYE.

The Boston season will consist as usual of 24 public rehearsals on Friday afternoons, beginning October 12, and 24 concerts on Saturday evenings, beginning October 13. In addition to these performances the monthly performances will be continued in New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn, with the customary series in Cambridge and Providence, and single concerts in other cities. Among the novelties or works not played before in the Boston concerts, which will be given this season, are the following:

CESAR THOMSON.

Wallenstein Symphony, d'Indy; Symphony in D, Sgambati; Symphony No. 6, Tschaikowsky; Prize Symphony (new), George W. Chadwick; Seebilder, J. K. Paine. Overtures — "Carneval" Dvorak; "Otello," Dvorak; "In der Natur," Dvorak; "Sappho," Goldmark; "Wem die Krone," Ritter; (novelties) "Corsaire," Berlioz; "Elegie," Kahn; Prelude "Dornroeschen," Langer; Variations for Orchestra, Knorr; Entr'acte, "Gouverneur von Tours," Reinecke; Poeme Symphonique for Flute and Orchestra, Benoit.

It is impossible to give a complete list of soloists at this early date. Engagements have already been made with Mrs. Eames, Miss Juch, Mrs. Beach, Messrs. Ysaye, Cesar Thomson, Ben Davies, Baermann, Kneisel, Schroeder and others. Of those named Messrs. Ysaye and Cesar Thomson, the Belgian violinists, have not yet been heard in America. Both are artists of great distinction, and have made sensational successes in Europe.

BEN DAVIES.

The program of the first concert, Saturday, Oct. 13, will be as follows:

Overture, "Anacreon"	Cherubini
Symphony No. 7	Beethoven
Tambourin, Gavotte and Chaconne	Gluck
Entr'acte, "Gwendoline"	Chabrier
Kaisermarsch	Wagner

***

Cesar Thomson, mentioned above, is one of the most distinguished violinists now living. He was born in Luettich, Belgium, March 17, 1857. His father taught him at first, and the boy, when 7 years old, went to the Luettich Conservatory, where he studied under Dupuis and Leonard. In 1873 he went as "chamber musician" to the Baron von Derwiest to Lugano, Italy, and there in 1877 he was married. Afterward he was concert-meister of Bilse's Orchestra in Berlin. In 1883 he was appointed a teacher of the violin at the Luettich Conservatory, where he has since remained, with the exception of concert-tours.

***

Eugene Ysaye, a most famous violin virtuoso, was born July 16, 1858, in Luettich, Belgium. His first lessons were taken at the Luettich Conservatory, and afterward he studied under Vieuxtemps in Brussels. He was afterward and until '81 concert-meister of the Bilse Orchestra in Berlin. He then traveled extensively, and in 1886 he was appointed first teacher of the violin at the Brussels Conservatory, where he is still engaged. Ysaye has written six violin concertos, variations on a theme of Paganini, and other pieces, but few have been published.

***

Mr. Davies, the Welsh tenor, was heard here last season at Handel and Haydn concerts and he then made a favorable impression.

***

There is naturally speculation concerning the auction sale of season tickets for the Boston Symphony Concerts.

Some—they are in all probability few in number—object to the proposed introduction of "light" music. By "light" they mean French; for to certain hearers who have been led to believe that music was invented and patented for all time by the Germans, light or French are synonyms. Therefore they shy at the announcement that Mr. Paur purposes to broaden and enliven his programs.

These same objectors have listened patiently in the past to "light" music, or stupid music composed by Germans or Americans Do they then prefer Humperdink to Massenet or Chabrier, and Mr. Clayton Jones to Auber?

There will be natural curiosity also to see and hear the new members of the orchestra. The first clarinet is a Frenchman, Mr. Pourton, from Lyons. Let us trust that his performance will belie the pun that occurs to even the humblest.

Mr. Chadwick's new symphony, which won the prize offered in competition by the National Conservatory, will be played at an early date. Thomson and Ysaye, the celebrated Belgian fiddlers, will be heard during the season.

***

THE SYMPHONY SEATS.

The arrangements made for the fourteenth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra insure a series of brilliant performances. Great care has been exercised in the selection of programs, and many famous names figure in the list of soloists who have been engaged. Twenty-four public rehearsals will be given in Music Hall on Friday afternoons and twenty-four concerts on Saturday evenings, beginning Oct. 12 and 13. The scale of prices for season tickets will be the same as in past seasons —$12 and $7 50, according to location. All tickets will be sold by auction. The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold on Monday, Sept. 24, the $7 50 seats for rehearsals on Tuesday, Sept. 26, the $12 seats for concerts on Thursday, Sept. 27, and the $7 50 concert seats on Friday, Sept. 28. The auction sales will be held at Music Hall, and will begin each day at 10 A. M.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 17, 1894.

The Symphony Concerts.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its fourteenth season at Music Hall on Oct. 12, and will give the usual series of twenty-four public rehearsals on Friday afternoons and twenty-four concerts on Saturday evenings. The orchestra will comprise eighty-four players, ten of the number being new-comers. The most important changes are in the positions of first clarinet and first bassoon. With these exceptions, all the principal artists have been reëngaged. The concerts extend over so many weeks that it is impossible to give at this time all the programmes or a complete list of soloists, but sufficient is known to warrant the belief that the coming season will equal in interest and attractiveness any in the history of the organization.

Conductor Paur's programmes will cover a wide range of orchestral literature and the adherents of each school will find especially attractive features in them. The standard works of the great composers will, of course, be fully represented. A partial list of the novelties to be given is as follows:

Symphony No. 6	Tschaikowsky
Wallenstein Symphony	D'Indy
Symphony in D	Sgambati
New (Prize) Symphony	George W. Chadwick
Overture "Sappho"	Goldmark
"Carneval"	Dvorak
"Otello"	Dvorak
"In der Natur"	Dvorak
"Corsaire"	Berlioz
"Wem die Krone"	Ritter
"Elegie"	Kahn
Prelude "Dornroeschen"	Langer
Seebilder	J. K. Paine
Variations for Orchestra	Knorr
Symphonic Poem	Smetana
Entr'Acte "Gouverneur von Tours"	Reinecke
Poeme Symphonique for Flute and Orchestra	Benoit

The list of solo artists is particularly attractive. Among those already engaged are Messrs. Ysaye and Cesar Thomson, who are to visit America for the first time this season These Belgian artists rank among the greatest of living violinists and come to us with the prestige of extraordinary success in European cities. Mmes. Eames, Juch, Beach, Messrs. Davies, Baermann, Kneisel, Schroeder and others will also appear.

The scale of prices for season tickets for the series of twenty-four concerts and for the series of twenty-four rehearsals will be $12 and $7.50 according to the location of seats. All tickets will be sold by auction at Music Hall. The $12 seats for rehearsals will be sold on Monday, Sept. 24; the $7.50 seats for rehearsals, on Tuesday, Sept, 25; the $12 seats for concerts, on Thursday, Sept. 27; and the $7.50 concert seats, on Friday, Sept. 28. The sale will begin each day at 10 A. M. Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice, and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a large diagram and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered in the hall and must be paid for as soon as bought or they will be resold.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 17, 1894.

SYMPHONY AUCTION NEXT MONDAY.

The fourteenth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall will begin on Oct. 12 with the public rehearsal. As in past seasons, there will be 24 public rehearsals and 24 Saturday evening concerts.

The auction sale of season tickets is to take place in Music Hall beginning Monday, Sept. 24, when the $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold, following on Tuesday with the $7 50 seats. Thursday, Sept. 27, the $12 seats for the concerts, and on Friday, the 28th, the $7 50 seats.

Boston Daily Globe.

TUESDAY, SEPT. 18, 1894.

The number of inquiries daily received at Music hall augurs well for the success of the coming series of Symphony concerts. These concerts have now been an established and valued institution for 13 years, and have been attended by an ever widening circle of music lovers. While the chief interest lies in the playing of this superb body of 80 artists, the appearance of many famous soloists engaged for the coming season will add much to the enjoyment of subscribers. The sales of season tickets for both rehearsals and concerts will be held next week at Music hall.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

The Official Paper of the State.

TUESDAY MORNING, SEPT. 18, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's announcement for the coming season is most attractive, and there is every indication that the coming concerts will prove as attractive as in any previous year. The auction sale of season tickets takes place in Music Hall, beginning next Monday morning at 10 o'clock, when the $12 seats for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals will be sold. On Tuesday, Sept. 25, the cheaper or $7 50 tickets, and on Thursday and Friday, Sept. 27 and 28, the concert seats. Ladies who are unfamiliar with auction sales need not hesitate to attend these, for their bids will be carefully watched for, and it is unnecessary to say every advantage will be given them by their gentlemen competitors.

Boston Journal.

TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 18, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT AUCTION.

Next Monday morning at 10 o'clock the sale of the $12 seats for the Symphony rehearsals will begin at Music Hall. The tickets will be sold at auction and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. To those not acquainted with these sales it may be mentioned that the seats are sold in their regular order, and not for choice. A large diagram is erected on the stage, showing the exact location of each seat. Mr. Jackson, who has been the auctioneer in past seasons, will officiate in the same capacity at the coming sale.

The bid is the premium to be added to the price of the seat. On Tuesday, Sept. 25, the $7 50 rehearsal tickets will be sold. Thursday and Friday, the Saturday evening concert tickets. It must be remembered that the tickets are delivered at time of sale, and must be paid for as soon as bought, otherwise they will be immediately resold. It is the custom for ladies to attend and bid.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.

VOL. XCVI., NO. 80.

TUESDAY, SEPT. 18, 1894.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The announcements that have been published concerning the coming series of Symphony concerts have aroused a great deal of interest and are being widely discussed in musical circles. Mr. Paur's programmes cover a wide range of orchestral literature and the adherents of each school will find especially attractive features in them. A number of distinguished artists have been engaged as soloists. Subscribers to these concerts will be offered a series of performances which for excellence, variety and attractiveness it is safe to say can be surpassed in no other city in the world.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

The Official Paper of the State.

THURSDAY MORNING, SEPT. 20, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT TICKETS.

The announcement for the 14th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been commented on most favorably. The programme for the series of 24 Friday afternoon public rehearsals and 24 Saturday evening concerts will be of genuine excellence. The soloists already engaged will add greatly to the enjoyment of the concerts.

The scale of prices for season tickets will be the same as in past years, $12, and $7 50, according to location. The sale of season tickets by auction will be held in Music Hall, commencing next Monday morning, when the $12 seats for the public rehearsals will be sold. The $7 50 rehearsal tickets will be sold on Tuesday, Sept. 25. The $12 season tickets for the concerts on Thursday, Sept. 27, and the $7 50 season tickets for the concerts on Friday, Sept. 28, will be sold.

[18]

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 19, 1894.

* * *

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its fourteenth season October 12-13. The new first clarinet is Mr. Pourtan, of Lyons, and the new first bassoon, Mr. Litke, is no stranger to you.

Mr. Paur contemplates giving the following novelties (in Boston) during the season:

Symphony No. 6, Tschaikowsky; symphony in D, Sgambati; Wallenstein symphony, D'Indy; new prize symphony, Geo. W. Chadwick; overture, "Sappho," Goldmark; overture, "Wem die Krone," Ritter; overture, "Corsaire," Berlioz; overture, "Carneval," Dvorák; overture, "Otello," Dvorák; overture, "In der Natur," Dvorák; overture, "Élégie," Kahn; overture, Rietz; prelude, "Dornroeschen," Langer; Seebilder, J. K. Paine; variations for orchestra, Knorr; symphonic poem, Smetana; Entr'acte, "Gouverneur von Tours," Reinecke; poème symphonique for flute and orchestra, Benoit.

All the soloists have not yet signed contracts, but those who have are Mmes. Emma Eames, Emma Juch, H. H. A. Beach, Messrs. Ben Davies, Ysaye, César Thomson, Carl Baermann, C. Molé, Franz Kneisel and A. Schroeder.

These are the programs of the first five concerts:

FIRST CONCERT.

Overture, "Anacreon"	Cherubini
Symphony No. 7	Beethoven
Tambourin, gavot and chaconne	Gluck
Entr'acte, "Gwendoline"	Chabrier
"Kaisermarsch"	Wagner

SECOND CONCERT.

Soloist, Emma Juch.

Overture, "Carneval Romaine"	Berlioz
Aria
Symphony (new)	G. W Chadwick
Aria
Ballet music, "Demon"	Rubinstein

THIRD CONCERT.

Soloist, Carl Baermann.

Unfinished symphony in B minor	Schubert
Concerto for piano in E flat major	Beethoven
Symphony in C major	Schumann

FOURTH CONCERT.

Overture, "Die Verkaufte Braut"	Smetana
Symphony in D (first time)	Sgambati
Suite, "L'Arlésienne"	Bizet

FIFTH CONCERT.

Soloist, Emma Eames.

Symphony in E flat	Mozart
Aria
Entr'acte from "Rosamunde"	Schubert
March in B minor	Schubert-Liszt
Aria
Overture, "Le Part du Diable"	Auber

* * *

Boston Journal.

TEN PAGES.

THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 20, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Next week will be largely taken up with the auction sales of tickets for the Symphony rehearsals and concerts. On Monday morning, Sept. 24, at 10 o'clock, in Music Hall, the $12 seats for the public rehearsals will be offered at auction, on Tuesday morning, Sept. 25, the $7 50 seats for the public rehearsals.

The same rule will apply as in former years; not more than four seats will be offered at a single bid, the seats being sold in regular order, beginning at the stage line.

On Thursday, Sept. 27, at 10 o'clock, the $12 seats for the concerts will be sold, and on Friday the $7 50 seats for the concerts, under the same rules as those governing the public rehearsals. Diagrams of Music Hall showing the division between the $12 and $7 50 seats, also circulars giving full particulars, may be had at Music Hall.

BOSTON POST.

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

THURSDAY MORNING, Sept. 20, 1894.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The thousands of patrons of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are reminded that the auction sale of season tickets for the public rehearsals and Saturday evening concerts will be held in Music Hall on Monday, Tuesday, Thursday and Friday of next week. Mr. Paur has spent a great deal of his time this summer in examining new works, many of which will be produced with a fair proportion of standard works by the old masters. Circulars giving full particulars at Music Hall.

Boston Daily Globe.

THURSDAY, SEPT. 20, 1894.

The sale of seats for the symphony concerts will begin next Monday morning at Music hall. The first rehearsal and concert will be given Oct 12 and 13.

Boston Transcript

THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER, 20, 1894.

Next week will be largely taken up with the auction sales of tickets for the Symphony rehearsals and concerts. On Monday morning, Sept. 24, at ten o'clock, in Music Hall, the $12 seats for the public rehearsals will be offered at auction; on Tuesday morning, Sept. 25, the $7.50 seats for the public rehearsals. The same rule will apply as in former years; not more than four seats will be offered at a single bid, the seats being sold in regular order, beginning at the stage line. On Thursday, Sept. 27, at ten o'clock, the $12 seats for the concerts will be sold, and on Friday the $7.50 seats for the concerts under the same rules as those governing the public rehearsals. Diagrams of Music Hall showing the division between the $12 and $7.50 seats, also circulars giving full particulars, may be had at Music Hall.

BOSTON DAILY TRAVELLER.

PUBLISHED BY TRAVELLER PUBLISHING CO., AT 307 WASHINGTON STREET, OPP. OLD SOUTH MEETING HOUSE.

MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 17, 1894.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

First Public Rehearsal to be Held Oct. 12.

DIRECTOR PAUR'S WORK

Has Shown Himself to be a Popular Conductor.

Many Soloists of Great Prominence Engaged for this Season—Prices of Seats.

The time for the opening of the 14th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is close at hand, the date of the first public rehearsal being Friday afternoon, Oct. 12, and the first concert Saturday evening, Oct. 13.

The inquiries concerning this season's series and the already large number of orders placed with the ticket speculators indicate that the interest of the public in these opportunities offered by Mr. Higginson is as active as in past seasons, and the probabilities are that good financial results will follow the annual auction sale of tickets for the rehearsals and concerts both. The success of Mr. Emil Paur with the orchestra last season established his reputation as an able and competent conductor, a musician of fine musical instincts and deep feeling and master, as well, of the forces under his baton, the orchestra under his guidance playing with precision and with dynamic effect quite in contrast with the manner in which it drifted or moved at its own will under Mr. Paur's predecessor.

Mr. Paur's weak point last season was the monotonous character of his programmes, but he has promised to remedy that matter during the coming season, by extending the scope of his selections, and becoming to a marked degree more catholic in the character of the works to be presented.

This is most encouraging evidence of the desire upon the part of Mr. Paur to shake off the shackles of his German antecedents, and become cosmopolite in his sojourn among us, as regards his intention not to be nationally partisan in the composers to be represented in his programmes. With such liberal, progressive and broadminded competitors as Theodore Thomas and Walter Damrosch, it would be professional suicide for Mr. Paur to do otherwise than try to meet the demands of the advanced taste of critical, unpartisan American audiences.

When we consider this promise of a liberal course upon the part of Conductor Paur to meet every taste of his audience, and also the high degree of excellence to which he raised the concerted efforts of the superb body of players under his guidance, after four years of slipshod work under his predecessor, there is every reason to believe that the public will recognize its good fortune in the possession of such an able and conscientious musician and conductor, and their appreciation thereof in eagerly obtaining places at the sales of the coming series of rehearsals and concerts.

The composition of the orchestra this season will be essentially the same as last year. There will be about 10 new members only, and mostly among the second violins and lower stringed instruments. Among the principal instruments the only changes will be in the engagement of a new first clarinet and a new first bassoon player.

The former, M. Pourtan, comes from Lyons, France, and enjoys a good reputation as first clarinet in both the Symphony Orchestra and the Grand Opera of that city.

With the advent of Mr. Nikisch the Boston Symphony Orchestra was unfortunate in the possession of a first clarinet player whose ability was that only of a clever amateur. It was said that he came here as a personal friend of Nikisch, and was but a graduate from the Leipsic conservatory without the necessary skill and experience for the position he assumed.

Whether this be true or not, he certainly was not equal to the situation, for he had not the technical skill to cope with the difficulties of his part and he played often a little flat of the pitch, thereby putting the woodwind out of tune, for of what use was the correct intimation of his associate players if his own efforts were untuneful? The false intonation of one player alone among the woodwind would ruin the ensemble. It must have been extremely exasperating to such artists as M. Moll and M. Sautet to have to perform under such trying circumstances.

With the coming of M. Pourtan the first flute, oboe and clarinet players will be Frenchmen, and it is acknowledged by the Germans themselves that the French excel as wind players.

The new bassoon player is Mr. Litke, who has held first positions with both Thomas and Damrosch.

Among the soloists to appear will be Mrs. Emma Eames, Mrs. Emma Juch and Mr. Ben Davies as vocalists; Mr. Carl Baermann and Mrs. Beach as pianists; the renowned violinists, Cesar Thomson and M. Ysaye, and other eminent foreign performers, besides our local artists, Mr. Kneisel, Schroeder and others.

It will be seen that the season at hand, as regards the work of the orchestra and the ability of the soloists, must prove a most brilliant one.

The sale of the seats at auction will be as follows: The $12 seats for rehearsals will take place at Music Hall on Monday, Sept. 24, at 10 o'clock; the $7.50 rehearsal seats, on Tuesday, Sept. 25, at 10 o'clock; the $12 concert seats, on Thursday, Sept. 27, and the $7.50 seats, on Friday, Sept. 28, at the same time and place. The conditions that have governed the auction sales of previous seasons will prevail on these occasions.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, Sept. 22, 1894.

Among the soloists engaged for the coming Symphony season are Emma Eames, Emma Juch, Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, M. Ysaye and Messrs. Kneisel, Schroeder and Molé. The novelties in the way of musical compositions promised are overtures by Dvorak, Symphony No. 6 by Tschaikowsky, new prize Symphony by George W. Chadwick and works by J. K. Paine, Goldmark, Reinecke and Benoit. The sale of seats for rehearsals begins at Music Hall next Monday morning at 10 A. M., the sale for the concerts opening on Thursday morning at the same hour.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCVI., NO. 84.

SATURDAY, SEPT. 22, 1894.

The Symphony rehearsal girls are doing a good deal of thinking these days. Some of them, as the auction draws near, are afraid their natural bankers may not deem it absolutely necessary that they have the best seats in Music Hall, and they won't get the same places that knew them last season. So many girls want the best seats! Now, considering how little a Symphony rehearsal girl cares about the playing of the orchestra, why should they be so very particular? At all events, the annual excitement waxeth, and the omnipresent speculator is girding up his loins for the coming battle. The concerts are going to be unusually interesting, just the same, whether the girls like it or not!

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

The Official Paper of the State.

SATURDAY MORNING, SEPT. 22, 1894.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Director Paur has given much of his summer vacation time to the preparatory work of the coming season, and from the mass of compositions of all classes forwarded from Europe and submitted by American composers, has shown a large amount of new music, a performance of which has been duly arranged for in the season's programmes. The soloists engaged will add much to the interest felt in the coming season's concerts. The first public rehearsal will be Oct. 12, and the first concert Oct. 13. The annual auction sale, as before announced in these columns, takes place in Music Hall next week, beginning on Monday morning, when the $12 seats for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals will be sold, followed on Tuesday by the $7 50 seats. On Thursday the $12 concert seats, and on Friday the $7 50 concert seats, will be sold. Ladies who attend the auction will find no difficulty in securing the seats they desire.

Boston Journal.

TEN PAGES.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 22, 1894.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The plans made for the coming season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are more comprehensive than ever before, and have been read with interest by the many patrons of this fine organization. It should be borne in mind that the annual auction sale of season tickets takes place in Music Hall, beginning next Monday morning, when the $12 rehearsal tickets will be sold. Tuesday the $7 50 rehearsal seats. On Thursday, Sept. 27, the $12 concert seats, and on Friday, Sept. 28, the $7 50 concert seats will be sold. The sale begins at 10 o'clock each morning. Every indication points toward a large attendance, as many patrons who in seasons past have delegated outside parties to purchase their tickets have signified their intention of being present and selecting their own seats.

BOSTON POST.

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

SATURDAY MORNING, SEPT. 22, 1894.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The recent announcements regarding the Boston Symphony Orchestra have awakened great interest, and there is every indication that its coming season will be as successful as any in its career. Mr. Paur is alive to his opportunities, and is disposed to find a place in the concerts for worthy compositions of all schools. The auction sale of season tickets takes up the greater part of next week, beginning on Monday with the $12 rehearsal tickets. On Tuesday the $7.50 rehearsal tickets, and on Thursday and Friday the concert seats.

Boston Daily Globe.

SATURDAY, SEPT. 22, 1894.

Next Monday, at 10 a m, the sale for the symphony rehearsals and concerts will begin at Music hall, the sale continuing Tuesday, Thursday and Friday at the same hour. Tickets will be delivered at the hall and must be paid for as soon as purchased, or they will be resold. The first program will be given Oct 12 and 13.

THE CHRONICLE.

A Weekly Journal of Local Events, with "Abstracts and Brief Chronicles of the Times."

C. A. W. SPENCER, PUBLISHER.

TELEPHONE: 16 BROOKLINE.

Entered at the Boston post office, for transmission by mail as second class matter.

BROOKLINE, MASS., SEPT. 22, 1894.

Boston Symphony Season.—The Boston Symphony orchestra, which, under the leadership of Mr. Emil Paur, ranks prominently among the finest organizations of its kind in the world, and is the largest, the most prosperous, as well as the oldest permanent orchestra in America, will soon begin its 14th season. Twenty-four public rehearsals will be given at Music Hall on Friday afternoons, beginning Oct. 12, and 24 concerts will be given on Saturday evenings, beginning Oct. 13. On Friday afternoons, Nov. 2 and Dec. 7, Jan. 11, Feb. 8 and March 19 there will be no public rehearsals, as the orchestra will be on the road; and there will be no concerts on Saturday evenings, Nov. 3, Dec. 8, Jan. 12, Feb. 9 and March 16, for the same reason. The orchestra will number 82 musicians, having been strengthened by the engagement of ten new members. Among the soloists will be Mmes. Emma Eames, Emma Juch, H. H. A. Beach, Messrs. Ben Davies, M. Ysaye, Cesar Thomson, Carl Baermann, C. Mole, Franz Kneisel and A. Schroeder. Several other distinguished native and foreign artists will also appear. The scale of prices for season tickets for rehearsals or for concerts will be the same as last year, $12 and $7.50, according to location of seats. All tickets will be sold by auction, at Music Hall, and will be conducted by Mr. H. W. Jackson. The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold on Monday, Sept. 24, at 10 A. M.; the $7.50 seats for rehearsals on Tuesday, Sept. 25, at 10 A. M.; the $12 seats for concerts on Thursday, Sept. 27, at 10 A. M., and the $7.50 concert seats on Friday, Sept. 28, at the some hour.

BRO...

HOME JOURNAL

BOSTON'S PAPER FOR TO-DAY

The Saturday Evening Paper.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 22, 1894.

Many indications justify a belief that the fourteenth season of the Boston Symphony will be one of unusual importance, and it is extremely gratifying to know that the interest in the concerts of this organization, both in this city and in those visited at stated periods, was never more pronounced. The maintenance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for such an extended period is in itself the most convincing evidence of its value as an organization, and the position it has gained throughout the country is a just cause for local pride.

At no time since its formation has the orchestra been in better shape for its season work, than at present. The summer leisure has been well improved by Mr. Paur in the examination of new compositions, and he has secured so many attractive novelties that the concerts will afford a constant succession of interesting features. Among the soloists already announced to assist in the coming concerts are Mesdames Eames, Juch, Beach, Messrs. Davies, Ysaye, Thomson, Baermann, Kneisel, Mole, Schroeder and others who have not as yet signed contracts.

Beginning next Monday morning the annual auction sale of season tickets will take place at Music Hall. Only $12 seats for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals on that day; Tuesday, Sept. 25, the $7.50 rehearsal tickets; Thursday, Sept. 27, the $12 concert seats, and on Friday, Sept. 28, the $7.50 concert tickets will be sold. Mr. Jackson will be the auctioneer.

[19]

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 19, 1894.

* *

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its fourteenth season October 12–13. The new first clarinet is Mr. Pourtan, of Lyons, and the new first bassoon, Mr. Litke, is no stranger to you.

Mr. Paur contemplates giving the following novelties (in Boston) during the season:

Symphony No. 6, Tschaikowsky; symphony in D, Sgambati; Wallenstein symphony, D'Indy; new prize symphony, Geo. W. Chadwick; overture, "Sappho," Goldmark; overture, "Wem die Krone," Ritter; overture, "Corsaire," Berlioz; overture, "Carneval," Dvorák; overture, "Otello," Dvorák; overture, "In der Natur," Dvorák; overture, "Élégie," Kahn; overture, Rietz; prelude, "Dornroeschen," Langer; Seebilder, J. K. Paine; variations for orchestra, Knorr; symphonic poem, Smetana; Entr'acte, "Gouverneur von Tours," Reinecke; poème symphonique for flute and orchestra, Benoit.

All the soloists have not yet signed contracts, but those who have are Mmes. Emma Eames, Emma Juch, H. H. A. Beach, Messrs. Ben Davies, Ysaye, César Thomson, Carl Baermann, C. Molé, Franz Kneisel and A. Schroeder.

These are the programs of the first five concerts:

FIRST CONCERT.

Overture, "Anacreon".....Cherubini
Symphony No. 7.....Beethoven
Tambourin, gavot and chaconne.....Gluck
Entr'acte, "Gwendoline".....Chabrier
"Kaisermarsch".....Wagner

SECOND CONCERT.

Soloist, Emma Juch.

Overture, "Carneval Romaine".....Berlioz
Aria.....
Symphony (new).....G. W. Chadwick
Aria.....
Ballet music, "Demon".....Rubinstein

THIRD CONCERT.

Soloist, Carl Baermann.

Unfinished symphony in B minor.....Schubert
Concerto for piano in E flat major.....Beethoven
Symphony in C major.....Schumann

FOURTH CONCERT.

Overture, "Die Verkaufte Braut".....Smetana
Symphony in D (first time).....Sgambati
Suite, "L'Arlésienne".....Bizet

FIFTH CONCERT.

Soloist, Emma Eames.

Symphony in E flat.....Mozart
Aria.....
Entr'acte from "Rosamunde".....Schubert
March in B minor.....Schubert-Liszt
Aria.....
Overture, "Le Part du Diable".....Auber

* *

Boston Journal.

TEN PAGES.

THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 20, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Next week will be largely taken up with the auction sales of tickets for the Symphony rehearsals and concerts. On Monday morning, Sept. 24, at 10 o'clock, in Music Hall, the $12 seats for the public rehearsals will be offered at auction, on Tuesday morning, Sept. 25, the $7 50 seats for the public rehearsals.

The same rule will apply as in former years; not more than four seats will be offered at a single bid, the seats being sold in regular order, beginning at the stage line.

On Thursday, Sept. 27, at 10 o'clock, the $12 seats for the concerts will be sold, and on Friday the $7 50 seats for the concerts, under the same rules as those governing the public rehearsals. Diagrams of Music Hall showing the division between the $12 and $7 50 seats, also circulars giving full particulars, may be had at Music Hall.

BOSTON POST.

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

THURSDAY MORNING, Sept. 20, 1894.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The thousands of patrons of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are reminded that the auction sale of season tickets for the public rehearsals and Saturday evening concerts will be held in Music Hall on Monday, Tuesday, Thursday and Friday of next week. Mr. Paur has spent a great deal of his time this summer in examining new works, many of which will be produced with a fair proportion of standard works by the old masters. Circulars giving full particulars at Music Hall.

Boston Daily Globe.

THURSDAY, SEPT. 20, 1894.

The sale of seats for the symphony concerts will begin next Monday morning at Music hall. The first rehearsal and concert will be given Oct 12 and 13.

Boston Transcript

THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER, 20, 1894.

Next week will be largely taken up with the auction sales of tickets for the Symphony rehearsals and concerts. On Monday morning, Sept. 24, at ten o'clock, in Music Hall, the $12 seats for the public rehearsals will be offered by auction; on Tuesday morning, Sept. 25, the $7.50 seats for the public rehearsals. The same rule will apply as in former years; not more than four seats will be offered at a single bid, the seats being sold in regular order, beginning at the stage line. On Thursday, Sept. 27, at ten o'clock, the $12 seats for the concerts will be sold, and on Friday the $7.50 seats for the concerts, under the same rules as those governing the public rehearsals. Diagrams of Music Hall, showing the division between the $12 and $7.50 seats, also circulars giving full particulars, may be had at Music Hall.

BOSTON DAILY TRAVELLER.

PUBLISHED BY TRAVELLER PUBLISHING CO., AT 307 WASHINGTON STREET, OPP. OLD SOUTH MEETING HOUSE.

MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 17, 1894.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

First Public Rehearsal to be Held Oct. 12.

DIRECTOR PAUR'S WORK

Has Shown Himself to be a Popular Conductor.

Many Soloists of Great Prominence Engaged for this Season—Prices of Seats.

The time for the opening of the 14th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is close at hand, the date of the first public rehearsal being Friday afternoon, Oct. 12, and the first concert Saturday evening, Oct. 13.

The inquiries concerning this season's series and the already large number of orders placed with the ticket speculators indicate that the interest of the public in these opportunities offered by Mr. Higginson is as active as in past seasons, and the probabilities are that good financial results will follow the annual auction sale of tickets for the rehearsals and concerts both. The success of Mr. Emil Paur with the orchestra last season established his reputation as an able and competent conductor, a musician of fine musical instincts and deep feeling and master, as well, of the forces under his baton, the orchestra under his guidance playing with precision and with dynamic effect quite in contrast with the manner in which it drifted or moved at its own will under Mr. Paur's predecessor.

Mr. Paur's weak point last season was the monotonous character of his programmes, but he has promised to remedy that matter during the coming season, by extending the scope of his selections, and becoming to a marked degree more catholic in the character of the works to be presented.

This is most encouraging evidence of the desire upon the part of Mr. Paur to shake off the shackles of his German antecedents, and become cosmopolite in his sojourn among us, as regards his intention not to be nationally partisan in the composers to be represented in his programmes. With such liberal, progressive and broadminded competitors as Theodore Thomas and Walter Damrosch, it would be professional suicide for Mr. Paur to do otherwise than try to meet the demands of the advanced taste of critical, unpartisan American audiences.

When we consider this promise of a liberal course upon the part of Conductor Paur to meet every taste of his audience, and also the high degree of excellence to which he raised the concerted efforts of the superb body of players under his guidance, after four years of slipshod work under his predecessor, there is every reason to believe that the public will recognize its good fortune in the possession of such an able and conscientious musician and conductor, and their appreciation thereof in eagerly obtaining places at the sales of the coming series of rehearsals and concerts.

The composition of the orchestra this season will be essentially the same as last year. There will be about 10 new members only, and mostly among the second violins and lower stringed instruments. Among the principal instruments the only changes will be in the engagement of a new first clarinet and a new first bassoon player.

The former, M. Pourtan, comes from Lyons, France, and enjoys a good reputation as first clarinet in both the Symphony Orchestra and the Grand Opera of that city.

With the advent of Mr. Nikisch the Boston Symphony Orchestra was unfortunate in the possession of a first clarinet player whose ability was that only of a clever amateur. It was said that he came here as a personal friend of Nikisch, and was but a graduate from the Leipsic conservatory without the necessary skill and experience for the position he assumed.

Whether this be true or not, he certainly was not equal to the situation, for he had not the technical skill to cope with the difficulties of his part and he played often a little flat of the pitch, thereby putting the woodwind out of tune, for of what use was the correct intimation of his associate players if his own efforts were untuneful? The false intonation of one player alone among the woodwind would ruin the ensemble. It must have been extremely exasperating to such artists as M. Moll and M. Sautet to have to perform under such trying circumstances.

With the coming of M. Pourtan the first flute, oboe and clarinet players will be Frenchmen, and it is acknowledged by the Germans themselves that the French excel as wind players.

The new bassoon player is Mr. Litke, who has held first positions with both Thomas and Damrosch.

Among the soloists to appear will be Mrs. Emma Eames, Mrs. Emma Juch and Mr. Ben Davies as vocalists; Mr. Carl Baermann and Mrs. Beach as pianists; the renowned violinists, Cesar Thomson and M. Ysaye, and other eminent foreign performers, besides our local artists, Mr. Kneisel, Schroeder and others.

It will be seen that the season at hand, as regards the work of the orchestra and the ability of the soloists, must prove a most brilliant one.

The sale of the seats at auction will be as follows: The $12 seats for rehearsals will take place at Music Hall on Monday, Sept. 24, at 10 o'clock; the $7.50 rehearsal seats, on Tuesday, Sept. 25, at 10 o'clock; the $12 concert seats, on Thursday, Sept. 27, and the $7.50 seats, on Friday, Sept. 28, at the same time and place. The conditions that have governed the auction sales of previous seasons will prevail on these occasions.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, Sept. 22, 1894.

Among the soloists engaged for the coming Symphony season are Emma Eames, Emma Juch, Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, M. Ysaye and Messrs. Kneisel, Schroeder and Molé. The novelties in the way of musical compositions promised are overtures by Dvorak, Symphony No. 6 by Tschaikowsky, new prize Symphony by George W. Chadwick and works by J. K. Paine, Goldmark, Reinecke and Benoit. The sale of seats for rehearsals begins at Music Hall next Monday morning at 10 A. M, the sale for the concerts opening on Thursday morning at the same hour.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCVI, NO. 84.

SATURDAY, SEPT. 22, 1894.

The Symphony rehearsal girls are doing a good deal of thinking these days. Some of them, as the auction draws near, are afraid their natural bankers may not deem it absolutely necessary that they have the best seats in Music Hall, and they won't get the same places that knew them last season. So many girls want the best seats! Now, considering how little a Symphony rehearsal girl cares about the playing of the orchestra, why should they be so very particular? At all events, the annual excitement waxeth, and the omnipresent speculator is girding up his loins for the coming battle. The concerts are going to be unusually interesting, just the same, whether the girls like it or not!

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

The Official Paper of the State.

SATURDAY MORNING, SEPT. 22, 1894.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Director Paur has given much of his summer vacation time to the preparatory work of the coming season, and from the mass of compositions of all classes forwarded from Europe and submitted by American composers, has shown a large amount of new music, a performance of which has been duly arranged for in the season's programmes. The soloists engaged will add much to the interest felt in the coming season's concerts. The first public rehearsal will be Oct. 12, and the first concert Oct. 13. The annual auction sale, as before announced in these columns, takes place in Music Hall next week, beginning on Monday morning, when the $12 seats for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals will be sold, followed on Tuesday by the $7 50 seats. On Thursday the $12 concert seats, and on Friday the $7 50 concert seats, will be sold. Ladies who attend the auction will find no difficulty in securing the seats they desire.

Boston Journal.

TEN PAGES.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 22, 1894.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The plans made for the coming season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are more comprehensive than ever before, and have been read with interest by the many patrons of this fine organization. It should be borne in mind that the annual auction sale of season tickets takes place in Music Hall, beginning next Monday morning, when the $12 rehearsal tickets will be sold. Tuesday the $7 50 rehearsal seats. On Thursday, Sept. 27, the $12 concert seats, and on Friday, Sept. 28, the $7 50 concert seats will be sold. The sale begins at 10 o'clock each morning. Every indication points toward a large attendance, as many patrons who in seasons past have delegated outside parties to purchase their tickets have signified their intention of being present and selecting their own seats.

BOSTON POST.

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

SATURDAY MORNING, SEPT. 22, 1894.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The recent announcements regarding the Boston Symphony Orchestra have awakened great interest, and there is every indication that its coming season will be as successful as any in its career. Mr. Paur is alive to his opportunities, and is disposed to find a place in the concerts for worthy compositions of all schools. The auction sale of season tickets takes up the greater part of next week, beginning on Monday with the $12 rehearsal tickets. On Tuesday the $7.50 rehearsal tickets, and on Thursday and Friday the concert seats.

Boston Daily Globe.

SATURDAY, SEPT. 22, 1894.

Next Monday, at 10 a m, the sale for the symphony rehearsals and concerts will begin at Music hall, the sale continuing Tuesday, Thursday and Friday at the same hour. Tickets will be delivered at the hall and must be paid for as soon as purchased, or they will be resold. The first program will be given Oct 12 and 13.

THE CHRONICLE.

A Weekly Journal of Local Events, with "Abstracts and Brief Chronicles of the Times."

C. A. W. SPENCER, PUBLISHER.

TELEPHONE: 16 BROOKLINE.

Entered at the Boston post office, for transmission by mail as second class matter.

BROOKLINE, MASS., SEPT. 22, 1894.

Boston Symphony Season.—The Boston Symphony orchestra, which, under the leadership of Mr. Emil Paur, ranks prominently among the finest organizations of its kind in the world, and is the largest, the most prosperous, as well as the oldest permanent orchestra in America, will soon begin its 14th season. Twenty-four public rehearsals will be given at Music Hall on Friday afternoons, beginning Oct. 12, and 24 concerts will be given on Saturday evenings, beginning Oct. 13. On Friday afternoons, Nov. 2 and Dec. 7, Jan. 11, Feb. 8 and March 19 there will be no public rehearsals, as the orchestra will be on the road; and there will be no concerts on Saturday evenings, Nov. 3, Dec. 8, Jan. 12, Feb. 9 and March 16, for the same reason. The orchestra will number 82 musicians, having been strengthened by the engagement of ten new members. Among the soloists will be Mmes. Emma Eames, Emma Juch, H. H. A. Beach, Messrs. Ben Davies, M. Ysaye, Cesar Thomson, Carl Baermann, C. Mole, Franz Kneisel and A. Schroeder. Several other distinguished native and foreign artists will also appear. The scale of prices for season tickets for rehearsals or for concerts will be the same as last year, $12 and $7.50, according to location of seats. All tickets will be sold by auction, at Music Hall, and will be conducted by Mr. H. W. Jackson. The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold on Monday, Sept. 24, at 10 A. M.; the $7.50 seats for rehearsals on Tuesday, Sept. 25, at 10 A. M.; the $12 seats for concerts on Thursday, Sept. 27, at 10 A. M., and the $7.50 concert seats on Friday, Sept. 28, at the some hour.

BOSTON HOME JOURNAL

The Saturday Evening Paper.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 22, 1894.

Many indications justify a belief that the fourteenth season of the Boston Symphony will be one of unusual importance, and it is extremely gratifying to know that the interest in the concerts of this organization, both in this city and in those visited at stated periods, was never more pronounced. The maintenance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for such an extended period is in itself the most convincing evidence of its value as an organization, and the position it has gained throughout the country is a just cause for local pride.

At no time since its formation has the orchestra been in better shape for its season work, than at present. The summer leisure has been well improved by Mr. Paur in the examination of new compositions, and he has secured so many attractive novelties that the concerts will afford a constant succession of interesting features. Among the soloists already announced to assist in the coming concerts are Mesdames Eames, Juch, Beach, Messrs. Davies, Ysaye, Thomson, Baermann, Kneisel, Mole, Schroeder and others who have not as yet signed contracts.

Beginning next Monday morning the annual auction sale of season tickets will take place at Music Hall. Only $12 seats for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals on that day; Tuesday, Sept. 25, the $7.50 rehearsal tickets; Thursday, Sept. 27, the $12 concert seats, and on Friday, Sept. 28, the $7.50 concert tickets will be sold. Mr. Jackson will be the auctioneer.

[19]

SATURDAY, [illegible]

The Symphony Concerts.

Next week will be largely taken up with the auction sale of tickets for the Symphony rehearsals and concerts. On Monday morning, Sept. 24, at ten o'clock, in Music Hall, the $12 seats for the public rehearsals will be offered by auction; on Tuesday morning, Sept. 25, the $7.50 seats for the public rehearsals. The same rule will apply as in former years—not more than four seats will be offered at a single bid, the seats being sold in regular order, beginning at the stage line. On Thursday, Sept. 27, at ten o'clock, the $12 seats for the concerts will be sold, and on Friday the $7.50 seats for the concerts, under the same rules as those governing the public rehearsals. Diagrams of Music Hall, showing the division between the $12 and $7.50 seats, also circulars giving full particulars, may be had at Music Hall.

The plan of selling the tickets by auction is one that suits all purses. The fact that these tickets command a premium gives many the impression of high prices, but it should be borne in mind that the starting prices, $12 and $7.50, for twenty-four high-class concerts, are absurdly low. The prices quoted from year to year in the newspapers are invariably the highest and are exceptional. The truth is that the cost of each seat in the best of years averaged less per concert than is commonly paid for other public entertainments, musical and dramatic, which do not involve a tithe of the expense connected with a large orchestra. There has never yet been a year when many hundred seats have not been sold at trifling premiums, and anyone desiring to secure them can do so by attending personally the auctions. It should be remembered that ladies will find no difficulty in making their own purchases; and anybody will do better by attending the sale personally than by ordering through brokers.

Negotiations are pending with Mme. Nordica, and though no engagement has been closed, there is little doubt that she will be the bright particular star in a grand Wagner concert to be included in the regular series. Other new engagements with soloists are those of Miss Franklin and Mr. Huss. The list, not yet complete, also includes Mmes. Eames, Juch, Beach, Messrs. Davies, Ysaye, Cesar Thomson, Baermann, Mole, Kneisel, Schnitzler, Schroeder and others.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 23, 1894.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The announcements made last week have awakened a widespread interest in the coming season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the opinion is freely expressed that it will be the most brilliant in the career of the organization. The partial list of music already published indicates that Mr. Paur is fully alive to the occasion, and that worthy compositions of all schools will find a place in his programs. It is impossible to present a complete list of the soloists engaged, but the names of Mmes. Eames, Juch, Beach, Franklin, Messrs. Ysaye, Thomson, Davies, Baermann, Kneisel, Schroeder, Huss, who have already signed contracts, show that a liberal policy will be pursued in this respect. Though it can be no longer necessary to speak of the quality of the orchestra and of the carefulness in every detail which characterizes all the work of perparation, it is well again to remind the town that the orchestra has few rivals in the world. In the individual excellence of the players and in the completeness of its equipment it is superlatively fine. The fourteenth season of concerts will open in Music Hall Saturday evening, Oct. 13. The auction sale of tickets commences in Music Hall tomorrow (Monday) morning, with the $12 rehearsal seats, continuing on Tuesday with the $7 50 rehearsal seats. On Thursday and Friday the Saturday evening concert seats will be sold. The sale begins at 10 o'clock each morning.

The first sign of returning society will take place at Music Hall on Monday, but it will be by proxy. If signs may be believed, there will be fewer society people at the sale in person than usual. Last season Mrs. Gardner deigned to put in an appearance during one day of the auction, but unless she is preparing a surprise for every one, and coming home surreptitiously for the event, she will be missed this season. It looks as if quite a number of well-known people would not return to town until the third or fourth concert of this season. But for all that the times are unmistakably better and the Symphony season will be enjoyed with freer minds than a large percentage of Boston people had last year.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, SEPT. 23.

Symphony Concerts.

Patrons of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are reminded that the annual auction sale of season tickets takes place in Music Hall, beginning tomorrow morning, at ten o'clock, when the $12 seats for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals will be sold. The announcements made during the past week have created a widespread interest in the coming concerts of this organization, and Music Hall will undoubtedly contain a good audience when the auctioneer calls for bids at the opening of the sale.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XVI., NO. 85.

SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 23, 1894.

Symphony Programme to Have a Vein of Lightness.

THE NEW DEPARTURE.

Mr. Paur is to be thanked for his intention to brighten the programmes of the Symphony concerts by an occasional infusion into them of music of a somewhat lighter character than has appeared in them fer nine years, or, in other words, since the time of Mr. Henschel. While it is right that these concerts should be educational to a large extent, there is no reason why they should not also be entertaining, within proper limitations, nor why what is severe in them should not be contrasted judiciously with good music of a lighter cast, in which the ear can be pleased and the understanding be left untaxed. Some will, of course, object to the innovation on which Mr. Paur has ventured, but their sincerity may be questioned. Good music is good music, whether it be light or heavy, and it does not always follow that what is incomprehensible is necessarily great, and what at once appeals to the comprehension is necessarily little.

There is affectation in a professed love for music as there is in everything else in which an appeal is made to the taste. Even Symphony audiences are not wholly free from it, as has been evidenced by the hearty applause bestowed by the majority of those present on music which, on a first hearing, has baffled the understanding of professional musicians. It would seem that the guiding principle has been that not to applaud that which is drearily profound is to manifest ignorance of the fundamental principles of classical music, and hence, not having the courage of their convictions, listeners simulate a delight which they do not feel, in order to show the readiness with which they are able to "palpitate with the right emotion." They are afraid to let any one see how bored they have been, in the dread that they may be thought not know a thing when they hear it. The hypocrisy is laid bare whenever a piece of music is played in which simplicity prevails and a rhythmical tune breaks on their ears. Then the applause has none of the perfunctory air that attends the playing of the incomprehensible, it is spontaneous and genuinely enthusiastic. Down in its heart a Symphony audience likes a tune as heartily as Tommy Moore loved a lord. And why should it not? It is not pleasing to be ever on stilts, even though it may lift one bodily above the level of one's fellows who walk on the ground. While it is well that we should be grave at times and take our music seriously, it is equally well that we should smile now and then and have music to gratify our more refined lighter moods. Even the pedagogue looks gleefully toward his hours of relaxation. One may pore over the sombreness of Eschylus and yet not be sinful if one also finds welcome diversion in the humor of Dickens. One can be enraptured with the grandeur of Beethoven's ninth symphony and not become wholly contemptible for listening with pleasure to a brilliant overture by Auber, or for that matter to a waltz of Johann Strauss. The true musical nature appreciates and enjoys the best in its kind, whether it appeals to his gayer or to his more solemn sentiments. There is comedy as well as tragedy.

There are people who, if the "Dance of Nymphs" in the "Damnation of Faust" by Berlioz had been written by Strauss—and there is nothing in it, even its commonplace that is above the power of the dance-writer to achieve—would feel that it would be out of place on a Symphony concert programme, and would be scandalized at the very suggestion of applauding it there; and yet as it bears Berlioz' name, they go even to the extent of attempting to encore it whenever it is performed at these concerts. The beautiful in art has as much claim on the attention as does the profound that is not beautiful, and after all a wearisome work, signed by a great name, and whose meaning is not to be grasped, except after frequent hearing, often recalls the remonstrance of the dull school boy, who, after he had been flogged into learning the alphabet, was in doubt whether it was worth while to go through so much for so little.

There is a wide misapprehension regarding what is and what is not classical music. According to the general belief, what is classical must of necessity be profound, and demands a special education to appreciate it; and yet gay Horace is no less a classic than is sombre Sophocles. If Beethoven's "Fidelio" is a classic, so is Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro." Because there be precisians who are musically virtuous, shall we have no more tuneful cakes and ale? It is true that a Symphony programme comes clearly within that rule which demands a place for everything and everything in its place, and such a programme is not to be broadened and made lighter injudiciously and with a disregard for the eternal fitness of things. Nevertheless, there is much good and pleasing music that has hitherto been denied a place on these same programmes that might appear there without sacrifice of dignity or even of the educational principle that lies at the foundation of the concerts. Mr. Paur, in his resolve to admit music of this class, will meet with general approval. It will relieve the selections of a certain heaviness that has characterized them for some years, and the flavor of what is light will enable the palate the better to appreciate what is heavy. As at a banquet, a choice and dainty little entremet is no drawback to the enjoyment of the more solid fare, and something of French champagne sparkle will not mingle badly with the heavier, still wines of Germany—always provided that both are of the best quality.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The interesting announcements made in these columns last Sunday in reference to the coming season of the Boston Symphony orchestra have been widely discussed in musical circles during the week, and the opinion is general that the prospectus for the 14th season is the most attractive ever issued by the management. The standard works and novelties to be performed are well chosen, and for variety, catholicity and musical worth Mr. Paur's programmes leave little to be desired. Two more American compositions which have been accepted [illegible] concerto for violoncello by Arthur [illegible] to be played by Mr. Schroeder, and a [illegible] concerto by Henry Holden Huss, to be played by the com-

[illegible] a gratifying showing [illegible] powers. Negotiations [illegible] Mme. Nordica, and though the engagement is not yet closed, there is little doubt that she will be the principal singer in a grand Wagner concert to be included in the regular series. Other additions to the force of soloists are Miss Gertrude Franklin and Mr. Huss. The list, not yet complete, also includes Mmes. Eames, Juch, Beach, Messrs. Davies, Ysaye, Cesar, Thomson, Baermann, Mole, Kneisel, Schnitzler, Schroeder and others.

The sales of season tickets are to be held during the coming week. All tickets will be sold by auction, experience having shown this method to be the fairest that can be devised. It creates a wide range of prices and suits all purses. The fact that the tickets command a premium gives many the impression of high prices, but it should be remembered that the starting prices, $12 and $7.50 for 24 high-class concerts, is ridiculously low. While a few exceptionally desirable seats have usually brought stiff prices, the average cost has always been less than the usual prices for other public performances, both musical and dramatic. The number of seats in Music Hall is 2397, and of these many hundreds have been sold each season at trifling premiums. These can be secured by any one by attending personally the auctions. It should be stated that ladies will find no difficulty in making their own purchases. The $12 seats for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals will be sold at Music Hall tomorrow (Monday), the $7.50 seats for rehearsals on Tuesday, the $12 seats for the Saturday evening concerts on Thursday and the $7.50 concert tickets on Friday. The sales will begin each day at 10 A. M.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, SEPT. 23, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

RENEWED INTEREST MANIFESTED IN THE COMING SYMPHONY SALES—A REMARKABLE LIST OF SOLOISTS—MR. PAUR'S PLANS AND PROGRAMMES.

Present indications all justify the belief that the fourteenth season of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to be one of unusual importance both musically and socially. Interest in the Symphonies was never more pronounced than this year, and the position of this grand organization in the world of music never more apparent. The orchestra has received several important additions to its ranks and was never in better shape for the season's work than at present. Mr. Kneisel will occupy his old seat as leader of the violins.

Conductor Paur's last season's work amply demonstrated his ability as a conductor and programme maker, and the list of interesting features which he has planned for the coming concerts will prove most gratifying to music lovers. He has spent the greater part of the summer in looking over new compositions and in arranging the many details which go to make up a successful season. The five programmes already planned are thoroughly meritorious and interesting and indicate a line which is sure to give the greatest possible enjoyment.

The soloists already engaged include: Mmes. Eames, Juch, Beach, Messrs. Ysaye, Cesar Thomson, Ben Davies, Baermann, Mole, Kneisel, Schroeder, and others who have not yet signed contracts. The auction sale at Music Hall beginning Monday for rehearsal and Thursday for concert tickets will be as usual under the charge of Mr. Jackson.

The same rule as in previous years will be carried out and bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered in the Hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be immediately resold. The indications are that individual buyers will be more in evidence than ever before and that speculators will be correspondingly less. If this proves true the floor of Music Hall will present an even more animated appearance than usual on the auction days.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, SEPT. 23, 1894.

Symphony Concerts.

The Boston symphony orchestra, Mr Emil Paur, conductor, enters upon its 14th season with the beginning of the first concert in Music hall, Oct 13. The annual series of 24 Friday afternoon public rehearsals and 24 Saturday evening concerts has become an almost indispensible feature of each musical season in this city, and the orchestra is so well known that it is hardly necessary to speak of the quality of its performances. The individual players are artists of the highest rank who have been in constant training under the best conductors for the past 13 years.

No musical events of the year offer greater attractions to the public. The audiences which attend represent the best social elements of our city. As already announced, Mr Paur promises some delightful programs, the selection including many novelties never before heard in Boston, together with works by American composers. The analytical program book will be prepared by Mr William F. Apthorp.

That the management intend a liberal policy in securing able solo artists to assist at these concerts is shown by the following list already engaged: Mms Eames, Juch, Beach, Franklin, Messrs Ysaye, Thomson, Davies, Huss, Baermann, Mole, Kneisel, Schroeder and other prominent soloists.

The auction sale for season tickets takes place in Music hall, beginning tomorrow morning, when the $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold, following on Tuesday with the $7.50 seats for the rehearsals. The Saturday evening concert seats will be sold Thursday and Friday, Sept 27 and 28.

THE BOSTON TRAVELLER

BOSTON, SUNDAY, SEPT. 23, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

This week will be largely taken up with the auction sales of tickets for the Symphony rehearsals and concerts. On Monday morning, Sept. 24, at 10 o'clock, in Music hall, the $12 seats for the public rehearsals will be offered at auction, on Tuesday morning, Sept. 25, the $7.50 seats for the public rehearsals. The same rule will apply as in former years; not more than four seats will be offered at a single bid, the seats being sold in regular order, beginning at the stage line.

On Thursday, Sept. 27, at 10 o'clock, the $12 seats for the concerts will be sold, and on Friday the $7.50 seats for the concerts, under the same rules as those governing the public rehearsals. Diagrams of Music hall showing the division between the $12 and the $7.50 seats, also circulars giving full particulars, may be had at Music hall.

The first public rehearsal will be held Friday, Oct. 12. It is expected that Mr. Paur will extend the scope of his selections, and become more liberal to meet the more advanced tastes of American audiences. Among the soloists to appear will be Mrs. Emma Eames, Mrs. Emma Juch and Mr. Ben Davies as vocalists; Mr. Carl Baermann and Mrs. Beach as pianists; the renowned violinists, Cesar Thomson and M. Ysaye, and other eminent foreign performers, besides our local artists. Mr. Kneisel Schroeder and others.

BOSTON EVENING RECORD.

SEPTEMBER 22, 1894.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Director Paur has given much of his summer vacation time to the preparatory work of the coming season, and from the mass of compositions of all classes forwarded from Europe and submitted by American composers, has shown a large amount of new music, a performance of which has been duly arranged for in the season's programmes. The soloists engaged will add much to the interest felt in the coming season's concerts. The first public rehearsal will be Oct. 12, and the first concert Oct. 13. The annual auction sale, as before announced in these columns, takes place in Music Hall next week, beginning on Monday morning, when the $12 seats for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals will be sold, followed on Tuesday by the $7 50 seats. On Thursday the $12 concert seats, and on Friday the $7 50 concert seats, will be sold. Ladies who attend the auction will find no difficulty in securing the seats they desire.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 24, 1894.

SALE OF SYMPHONY SEATS.

The Highest Premium Paid Today Was $66—Bidding Was Fairly Brisk.

There was a good crowd at the opening of the sale of Symphony Concert seats this morning. Today's sale was of $12 seats for the afternoon rehearsals. The highest premium paid was $66, and as usual was for seats in J, four of them, Nos. 16 to 19, the pick of the whole house, going at that price. The bidding was brisk all the way through, and equal to that of any year since the custom of selling these seats by auction has been inaugurated. The sale began with the seats nearest the stage. Those on the right sold for only $5 or $6 premium, in the first row, as they were on the same side as the wind instruments, while on the other side $13 was the highest premium paid. For some reason the seats on the extreme left sold lower than those on the extreme right, 32 to 34 bringing only $4, the lowest premium paid. The prices went up slowly as the seats went back. In B $25 was the highest paid; in C $26; in D $28; in E $34; and in F $46. Then the price went up with a jump, and $60 was paid for 18 and 19 in G and the same for 18 in H; 18 and 19 in I brought $64, and then came the highest price of the sale, $66 for the four seats in J. At this point the bidding dropped off suddenly, and for four of the best seats in the next row only $41 was paid.

[20]

Boston Transcript

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 23, 1894.

The Symphony Concerts.

Next week will be largely taken up with the auction sale of tickets for the Symphony rehearsals and concerts. On Monday morning, Sept. 24, at ten o'clock, in Music Hall, the $12 seats for the public rehearsals will be offered by auction; on Tuesday morning, Sept. 25, the $7.50 seats for the public rehearsals. The same rule will apply as in former years—not more than four seats will be offered at a single bid, the seats being sold in regular order, beginning at the stage line. On Thursday, Sept. 27, at ten o'clock, the $12 seats for the concerts will be sold, and on Friday the $7.50 seats for the concerts, under the same rules as those governing the public rehearsals. Diagrams of Music Hall, showing the division between the $12 and $7.50 seats, also circulars giving full particulars, may be had at Music Hall.

The plan of selling the tickets by auction is one that suits all purses. The fact that these tickets command a premium gives many the impression of high prices, but it should be borne in mind that the starting prices, $12 and $7.50, for twenty-four high-class concerts, are absurdly low. The prices quoted from year to year in the newspapers are invariably the highest and are exceptional. The truth is that the cost of each seat in the best of years averaged less per concert than is commonly paid for other public entertainments, musical and dramatic, which do not involve a tithe of the expense connected with a large orchestra. There has never yet been a year when many hundred seats have not been sold at trifling premiums, and anyone desiring to secure them can do so by attending personally the auctions. It should be remembered that ladies will find no difficulty in making their own purchases; and anybody will do better by attending the sale personally than by ordering through brokers.

Negotiations are pending with Mme. Nordica, and though no engagement has been closed, there is little doubt that she will be the bright particular star in a grand Wagner concert to be included in the regular series. Other new engagements with soloists are those of Miss Franklin and Mr. Huss. The list, not yet complete, also includes Mmes. Eames, Juch, Beach, Messrs. Davies, Ysaye, Cesar Thomson, Baermann, Mole, Kneisel, Schnitzler, Schroeder and others.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 23, 1894.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The announcements made last week have awakened a widespread interest in the coming season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the opinion is freely expressed that it will be the most brilliant in the career of the organization. The partial list of music already published indicates that Mr. Paur is fully alive to the occasion, and that worthy compositions of all schools will find a place in his programs. It is impossible to present a complete list of the soloists engaged, but the names of Mmes. Eames, Juch, Beach, Franklin, Messrs. Ysaye, Thomson, Davies, Baermann, Kneisel, Schroeder, Huss, who have already signed contracts, show that a liberal policy will be pursued in this respect. Though it can be no longer necessary to speak of the quality of the orchestra and of the carefulness in every detail which characterizes all the work of perparation, it is well again to remind the town that the orchestra has few rivals in the world. In the individual excellence of the players and in the completeness of its equipment it is superlatively fine. The fourteenth season of concerts will open in Music Hall Saturday evening, Oct. 13. The auction sale of tickets commences in Music Hall tomorrow (Monday) morning, with the $12 rehearsal seats, continuing on Tuesday with the $7 50 rehearsal seats. On Thursday and Friday the Saturday evening concert seats will be sold. The sale begins at 10 o'clock each morning.

The first sign of returning society will take place at Music Hall on Monday, but it will be by proxy. If signs may be believed, there will be fewer society people at the sale in person than usual. Last season Mrs. Gardner deigned to put in an appearance during one day of the auction, but unless she is preparing a surprise for every one, and coming home surreptitiously for the event, she will be missed this season. It looks as if quite a number of well-known people would not return to town until the third or fourth concert of this season. But for all that the times are unmistakably better and the Symphony season will be enjoyed with freer minds than a large percentage of Boston people had last year.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, SEPT. 23.

Symphony Concerts.

Patrons of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are reminded that the annual auction sale of season tickets takes place in Music Hall, beginning tomorrow morning, at ten o'clock, when the $12 seats for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals will be sold. The announcements made during the past week have created a widespread interest in the coming concerts of this organization, and Music Hall will undoubtedly contain a good audience when the auctioneer calls for bids at the opening of the sale.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCVI., NO. 85.

SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 23, 1894.

Symphony Programme to Have a Vein of Lightness.

THE NEW DEPARTURE.

Mr. Paur is to be thanked for his intention to brighten the programmes of the Symphony concerts by an occasional infusion into them of music of a somewhat lighter character than has appeared in them for nine years, or, in other words, since the time of Mr. Henschel. While it is right that these concerts should be educational to a large extent, there is no reason why they should not also be entertaining, within proper limitations, nor why what is severe in them should not be contrasted judiciously with good music of a lighter cast, in which the ear can be pleased and the understanding be left untaxed. Some will, of course, object to the innovation on which Mr. Paur has ventured, but their sincerity may be questioned. Good music is good music, whether it be light or heavy, and it does not always follow that what is incomprehensible is necessarily great, and what at once appeals to the comprehension is necessarily little.

There is affectation in a professed love for music as there is in everything else in which an appeal is made to the taste. Even Symphony audiences are not wholly free from it, as has been evidenced by the hearty applause bestowed by the majority of those present on music which, on a first hearing, has baffled the understanding of professional musicians. It would seem that the guiding principle has been that not to applaud that which is drearily profound is to manifest ignorance of the fundamental principles of classical music, and hence, not having the courage of their convictions, listeners simulate a delight which they do not feel, in order to show the readiness with which they are able to "palpitate with the right emotion." They are afraid to let any one see how bored they have been, in the dread that they may be thought not know a thing when they hear it. The hypocrisy is laid bare whenever a piece of music is played in which simplicity prevails and a rhythmical tune breaks on their ears. Then the applause has none of the perfunctory air that attends the playing of the incomprehensible, it is spontaneous and genuinely enthusiastic. Down in its heart a Symphony audience likes a tune as heartily as Tommy Moore loved a lord. And why should it not? It is not pleasing to be ever on stilts, even though it may lift one bodily above the level of one's fellows who walk on the ground. While it is well that we should be grave at times and take our music seriously, it is equally well that we should smile now and then and have music to gratify our more refined lighter moods. Even the pedagogue looks gleefully toward his hours of relaxation. One may pore over the sombreness of Eschylus and yet not be sinful if one also finds welcome diversion in the humor of Dickens. One can be enraptured with the grandeur of Beethoven's ninth symphony and not become wholly contemptible for listening with pleasure to a brilliant overture by Auber, or for that matter to a waltz of Johann Strauss. The true musical nature appreciates and enjoys the best in its kind, whether it appeals to his gayer or to his more solemn sentiments. There is comedy as well as tragedy.

There are people who, if the "Dance of Nymphs" in the "Damnation of Faust" by Berlioz had been written by Strauss—and there is nothing in it, even its commonplace that is above the power of the dance-writer to achieve—would feel that it would be out of place on a Symphony concert programme, and would be scandalized at the very suggestion of applauding it there; and yet as it bears Berlioz' name, they go even to the extent of attempting to encore it whenever it is performed at these concerts. The beautiful in art has as much claim on the attention as does the profound that is not beautiful, and after all a wearisome work, signed by a great name, and whose meaning is not to be grasped, except after frequent hearing, often recalls the remonstrance of the dull school boy, who, after he had been flogged into learning the alphabet, was in doubt whether it was worth while to go through so much for so little.

There is a wide misapprehension regarding what is and what is not classical music. According to the general belief, what is classical must of necessity be profound, and demands a special education to appreciate it; and yet gay Horace is no less a classic than is sombre Sophocles. If Beethoven's "Fidelio" is a classic, so is Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro." Because there be precisians who are musically virtuous, shall we have no more tuneful cakes and ale? It is true that a Symphony programme comes clearly within that rule which demands a place for everything and everything in its place, and such a programme is not to be broadened and made lighter injudiciously and with a disregard for the eternal fitness of things. Nevertheless, there is much good and pleasing music that has hitherto been denied a place on these same programmes that might appear there without sacrifice of dignity or even of the educational principle that lies at the foundation of the concerts. Mr. Paur, in his resolve to admit music of this class, will meet with general approval. It will relieve the selections of a certain heaviness that has characterized them for some years, and the flavor of what is light will enable the palate the better to appreciate what is heavy. As at a banquet, a choice and dainty little entremet is no drawback to the enjoyment of the more solid fare, and something of French champagne sparkle will not mingle badly with the heavier, still wines of Germany—always provided that both are of the best quality.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The interesting announcements made in these columns last Sunday in reference to the coming season of the Boston Symphony orchestra have been widely discussed in musical circles during the week, and the opinion is general that the prospectus for the 14th season is the most attractive ever issued by the management. The standard works and novelties to be performed are well chosen, and for variety, catholicity and musical worth Mr. Paur's programmes leave little to be desired. Two more American compositions which have been accepted are a concerto for violoncello by Arthur Foote, to be played by Mr. Schroeder, and a piano-forte concerto by Henry Holden Huss, to be played by the composer. These, with [illegible] phony, Mr. Paine's "Seth[illegible]" and one or two works not yet finished, will make a gratifying showing for native composers. Negotiations are pending with Mme. Nordica, and though the engagement is not yet closed there is little doubt that she will be the principal singer in a grand Wagner concert to be included in the regular series. Other additions to the force of soloists are Miss Gertrude Franklin and Mr. Huss. The list, not yet complete, also includes Mmes. Eames, Juch, Beach, Messrs. Davies, Ysaye, Cesar, Thomson, Baermann, Mole, Kneisel, Schnitzler, Schroeder and others.

The sales of season tickets are to be held during the coming week. All tickets will be sold by auction, experience having shown this method to be the fairest that can be devised. It creates a wide range of prices and suits all purses. The fact that the tickets command a premium gives many the impression of high prices, but it should be remembered that the starting prices, $12 and $7.50 for 24 high-class concerts, is ridiculously low. While a few exceptionally desirable seats have usually brought stiff prices, the average cost has always been less than the usual prices for other public performances, both musical and dramatic. The number of seats in Music Hall is 2397, and of these many hundreds have been sold each season at trifling premiums. These can be secured by any one by attending personally the auctions. It should be stated that ladies will find no difficulty in making their own purchases. The $12 seats for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals will be sold at Music Hall tomorrow (Monday), the $7.50 seats for rehearsals on Tuesday; the $12 seats for the Saturday evening concerts on Thursday and the $7.50 concert tickets on Friday. The sales will begin each day at 10 A. M.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, SEPT. 23, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

RENEWED INTEREST MANIFESTED IN THE COMING SYMPHONY SALES—A REMARKABLE LIST OF SOLOISTS—MR. PAUR'S PLANS AND PROGRAMMES.

Present indications all justify the belief that the fourteenth season of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to be one of unusual importance both musically and socially. Interest in the Symphonies was never more pronounced than this year, and the position of this grand organization in the world of music never more apparent. The orchestra has received several important additions to its ranks and was never in better shape for the season's work than at present. Mr. Kneisel will occupy his old seat as leader of the violins.

Conductor Paur's last season's work amply demonstrated his ability as a conductor and programme maker, and the list of interesting features which he has planned for the coming concerts will prove most gratifying to music lovers. He has spent the greater part of the summer in looking over new compositions and in arranging the many details which go to make up a successful season. The five programmes already planned are thoroughly meritorious and interesting and indicate a line which is sure to give the greatest possible enjoyment.

The soloists already engaged include: Mmes. Eames, Juch, Beach, Messrs. Ysaye, Cesar Thomson, Ben Davies, Baermann, Mole, Kneisel, Schroeder, and others who have not yet signed contracts. The auction sale at Music Hall beginning Monday for rehearsal and Thursday for concert tickets will be as usual under the charge of Mr. Jackson.

The same rule as in previous years will be carried out and bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered in the Hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be immediately resold. The indications are that individual buyers will be more in evidence than ever before and that speculators will be correspondingly less. If this proves true the floor of Music Hall will present an even more animated appearance than usual on the auction days.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, SEPT. 23, 1894.

Symphony Concerts.

The Boston symphony orchestra, Mr Emil Paur, conductor, enters upon its 14th season with the beginning of the first concert in Music hall, Oct 13. The annual series of 24 Friday afternoon public rehearsals and 24 Saturday evening concerts has become an almost indispensible feature of each musical season in this city, and the orchestra is so well known that it is hardly necessary to speak of the quality of its performances. The individual players are artists of the highest rank who have been in constant training under the best conductors for the past 13 years.

No musical events of the year offer greater attractions to the public. The audiences which attend represent the best social elements of our city. As already announced, Mr Paur promises some delightful programs, the selection including many novelties never before heard in Boston, together with works by American composers. The analytical program book will be prepared by Mr William F. Apthorp.

That the management intend a liberal policy in securing able solo artists to assist at these concerts is shown by the following list already engaged: Mms Eames, Juch, Beach, Franklin, Messrs Ysaye, Thomson, Davies, Huss, Baermann, Mole, Kneisel, Schroeder and other prominent soloists.

The auction sale for season tickets takes place in Music hall, beginning tomorrow morning, when the $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold, following on Tuesday with the $7.50 seats for the rehearsals. The Saturday evening concert seats will be sold Thursday and Friday, Sept 27 and 28.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, SEPT. 23, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

This week will be largely taken up with the auction sales of tickets for the Symphony rehearsals and concerts. On Monday morning, Sept. 24, at 10 o'clock, in Music hall, the $12 seats for the public rehearsals will be offered at auction, on Tuesday morning, Sept. 25, the $7.50 seats for the public rehearsals. The same rule will apply as in former years; not more than four seats will be offered at a single bid, the seats being sold in regular order, beginning at the stage line.

On Thursday, Sept. 27, at 10 o'clock, the $12 seats for the concerts will be sold, and on Friday the $7.50 seats for the concerts, under the same rules as those governing the public rehearsals. Diagrams of Music hall showing the division between the $12 and the $7.50 seats, also circulars giving full particulars, may be had at Music hall.

The first public rehearsal will be held Friday, Oct. 12. It is expected that Mr. Paur will extend the scope of his selections, and become more liberal to meet the more advanced tastes of American audiences. Among the soloists to appear will be Mrs. Emma Eames. Mrs. Emma Juch and Mr. Ben Davies as vocalists; Mr. Carl Baermann and Mrs. Beach as pianists; the renowned violinists, Cesar Thomson and M. Ysaye, and other eminent foreign performers, besides our local artists. Mr. Kneisel Schroeder and others.

BOSTON EVENING RECORD.

SEPTEMBER 22, 1894.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Director Paur has given much of his summer vacation time to the preparatory work of the coming season, and from the mass of compositions of all classes forwarded from Europe and submitted by American composers, has shown a large amount of new music, a performance of which has been duly arranged for in the season's programmes. The soloists engaged will add much to the interest felt in the coming season's concerts. The first public rehearsal will be Oct. 12, and the first concert Oct. 13. The annual auction sale, as before announced in these columns, takes place in Music Hall next week, beginning on Monday morning, when the $12 seats for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals will be sold, followed on Tuesday by the $7 50 seats. On Thursday the $12 concert seats, and on Friday the $7 50 concert seats, will be sold. Ladies who attend the auction will find no difficulty in securing the seats they desire.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 24, 1894.

SALE OF SYMPHONY SEATS.

The Highest Premium Paid Today Was $66—Bidding Was Fairly Brisk.

There was a good crowd at the opening of the sale of Symphony Concert seats this morning. Today's sale was of $12 seats for the afternoon rehearsals. The highest premium paid was $66, and as usual was for seats in J, four of them, Nos. 16 to 19, the pick of the whole house, going at that price. The bidding was brisk all the way through, and equal to that of any year since the custom of selling these seats by auction has been inaugurated. The sale began with the seats nearest the stage. Those on the right sold for only $5 or $6 premium, in the first row, as they were on the same side as the wind instruments, while on the other side $11 was the highest premium paid. For some reason the seats on the extreme left sold lower than those on the extreme right, 32 to 34 bringing only $4, the lowest premium paid. The prices went up slowly as the seats went back. In B $25 was the highest paid; in C $26; in D $28; in E $34; and in F $46. Then the price went up with a jump, and $60 was paid for 18 and 19 in G and the same for 18 in H; 18 and 19 in I brought $64, and then came the highest price of the sale, $66 for the four seats in J. At this point the bidding dropped off suddenly, and for four of the best seats in the next row only $41 was paid.

[20]

BOSTON EVENING RECORD.

SEPTEMBER 24, 1894.

LIKE HOT CAKES

Went Seats for the Symphony Rehearsals This Morning.

The largest crowd in several years struggled bidfully in Music Hall this morning for the $12 seats to the Friday rehearsals of the Symphony Orchestra. The premiums paid were a little higher on the average than usual, though no records were broken.

The bidding went along briskly, and before noon blue marks adorned the chart back to the K ais e. Most of the seats were sold to individuals buying but the four limit or less, and people came, bought and departed.

Probably less than a third of the house went to the speculators, who were apparently doing all their own buying.

Genuine purchasers had sent agents for the most part, though many society women were in the hall, and a few of the men. Everybody was happy and rich, and few checks were written, though one for $68 was passed in.

The biggest premium paid was $66, for the seats 16 and 17 in J, on the middle aisle; they went to a speculator. When the sale opened there were 28 seats marked off.

No high prices were paid for seats in the front row, but four in C brought $25 apiece. Two aisle seats in D brought $28, and in E they ran $16, $27, $24, $25, $34. F brought a $31, a $32, two $33, a $34 and a $46. G went for $29, $37, $28, $31, $38, $60 (aisle left); $43, $32 and $39. H finished the costly rows with $34, $37, $38, $60 and $61. After that the only high prices were for middle aisle end seats.

Boston Daily Globe.

TUESDAY, SEPT. 25, 1894.

Sale of Symphony Seats.

The $12 seats for the Symphony orchestra public rehearsals were sold at auction yesterday at Music hall. About 600 people attended the sale. All the seats on the floor brought a premium, the lowest being $2 and the highest $92. This seat was in row R, on the center aisle.

BOSTON POST.

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

TUESDAY MORNING, SEPT. 25, 1894.

SYMPHONY SEATS

For the Orchestra Rehearsals Brought High Premiums Yesterday.

The first day's sale of seats for the Symphony Orchestra rehearsals was a decided success. It far exceeded the records of previous years. The $12 seats were on sale, and the premiums paid ranged from $6 up to $92. This latter, including the $12, makes $104 for one seat. It is situated in the centre of the house, in row K. The possessor only secured it after a spirited battle.

The second highest premium was $76, paid by C. James Connolly of the Adams House. In fact, all the positions brought large bids. Seats that in previous years brought only a dollar premium, at yesterday's sale were sold for $6 and $8 advance.

At the afternoon sale Auctioneer Jackson had got his coat off, figuratively, and was hard at work. The seats on the floor were quickly disposed of, and a flutter of excitement passed through the hall as charts bearing the list of balcony seats were tacked up.

The purchasers had to speak quickly. Premiums of from $35 to $70 were in order. Frequently two persons would express bids almost simultaneously. With pleasing diplomacy the auctioneer settled these trifling disputes in a manner which left no ill feeling behind.

Sitting close by the Post man was a man for whom the figure three had a peculiar fascination. As each seat was announced he would start the bidding at $3. The writer watched him for over an hour, and during that time he did not make a purchase.

The managers say truthfully that yesterday's crowd was the largest to visit the hall during any of the sales previously held.

The speculators were heavy buyers during the afternoon session. One of them told the Post man that he purchased the greater part of his tickets upon orders.

The $7.50 seats will be the next offered for sale.

The sale continues Tuesday, when the $7.50 rehearsal seats will be offered. The $12 concert seats will be sold Thursday, and on Friday the $7.50 concert seats will be disposed of.

Boston Journal.

TEN PAGES.

TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 25, 1894.

PREMIUM OF $92.

That Was the Highest Price Paid for Symphony Rehearsal Tickets.

Financially, the success of the approaching season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is assured. The auction of the $12 rehearsal seats took place Monday, and throughout, the steady, almost uniform, prices of last year were equaled.

Somehow the dazing flights of the prices of four and five auctions ago are becoming infrequent. Some attribute this change to the decadence of cliques, the passing of idol-worship; others to the directorship of Mr. Paur. It was so noticeable last year that financial success was doubted, but the management declared that the proceeds were as large as ever.

At the conclusion of the sale of the floor seats Monday the same declaration was made. The receipts thus far are really from 10 to 15 per cent. larger than those of last year. Chiefly through Mr. Jackson's efforts, the auction proceeded expeditiously. The starters were surprisingly prodigal at times.

The entire first section had been disposed of, and nothing extraordinary had occurred. The speculators usually got what they wanted, only one quitting after having reached an attractive figure. The premiums had ranged from $6 50 to $66. Once $64 had been bid, once $61 and twice $60, and the average premium of the majority of rows in the first section was about $40.

But the climax came in the second section in row R. The two seats bordering on the central aisle and the second seat to the left of the aisle brought $92 apiece.

Not long afterward one of the speculators paced the Hamilton Place corridor fretfully. It was he who had purchased the seats for which, he said, he had paid $150 too much. The opposing bidder was another speculator who wanted the single seat only. The eventual buyer had been ordered to secure the other two.

Every purchaser may select four seats, no more. The man who wanted the two seats feared that the other would take the limit; the man who was bidding for the single seat imagined that there was a confliction of orders. He had unlimited backing. So had the other. Neither could see the other, and both realized that it was unsafe to leave their seats. "If I only could have got his eye," said the buyer, referring to the other.

The seats in the first balcony brought prices corresponding to the high figures of the floor. The premiums in the first row varied from $20 to $45. The veterans were astonished; those who relied on the "hard times" prophets were mightily disappointed.

Today the $7 50 rehearsal seats will be put up.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCVI., NO. 87.

TUESDAY, SEPT. 25, 1894.

BEST SALE IN HISTORY.

Every Ticket to the Friday Afternoon Symphony Rehearsals Sold at the Auction.

The first auction sale of tickets for the Friday afternoon rehearsals of the Symphony orchestra began in Music Hall yesterday morning, and at the time for the beginning of the sale there was a large crowd present, which grew until the management stated that it was one of the largest which ever attended the sales of rehearsal tickets.

Not only was it a large crowd, but it was a business crowd, there, not as lookers on, but to purchase tickets, and it hung together until late in the afternoon, so that even when the seats were almost gone there were a good many people there holding up their hands and calling out their bids. The sale lasted until almost 5 o'clock, when the last three seats were sold and the officials closed up their sheets.

The sale is characterized as one of the most healthy ever held, and while there was no very great competition there was a steady demand, at good premiums. There was plenty of sharp bidding at times, up to a certain point. The "gilt-edged" seats were those in the centre, and the first row of the balcony, and these brought the "gilt-edged" prices.

The tip top premium of the day was $92, which was bid for three seats, R 17, 18 and 19, 17 being on one side of the centre aisle and 18 and 19 on the other. This premium of $92 made the cost of each ticket $104. The second highest premium of the day was $76, for a seat in K. The seats from H down to O were in greatest demand, and the prices in these rows ranged from $35 to $65 or $70. In some cases a seat in a row would bring a high premium, with lively bidding, and then the seats next to them would not bring near the amount of those previously sold.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

The Official Paper of the State.

TUESDAY, MORNING, SEPT. 25, 1894.

SYMPHONY SEATS.

They Sold High for Friday Rehearsals, But No Records Were Broken.

The largest crowd in several years struggled bidfully in Music Hall yesterday for the $12 seats to the Friday rehearsals of the Symphony Orchestra. The premiums paid were a little higher on the average than usual, though no records were broken.

The bidding went along briskly, and before noon blue marks adorned the chart back to the K ais e. Most of the seats were sold to individuals buying but the four limit or less, and people came, bought and departed.

Probably less than a third of the house went to the speculators, who were apparently doing all their own buying.

Genuine purchasers had sent agents for the most part, though many society women were in the hall, and a few of the men. Everybody was happy and rich, and few checks were written, though one for $68 was passed in.

The biggest premium paid was $92, for the seats 16 and 17 in J, on the middle aisle; they went to a speculator. When the sale opened there were 28 seats marked off.

No high prices were paid for seats in the front row, but four in C brought $26 apiece. Two aisle seats in D brought $28, and in E they ran $16, $27, $24, $25, $34. F brought a $31, a $32, two $33, a $34 and a $46. G went for $29, $37, $28, $31, $38, $60 (aisle left); $43, $32 and $39. H finished the costly rows with $34, $37, $38, $60 and $61. After that the only high prices were for middle aisle end seats.

The auction sale of $12 seats for concerts will take place Thursday, Sept. 27, and for the $7 50 seats for concerts Friday, Sept. 28.

Boston Transcript

TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER, 25, 1894.

HIGH PRICES FOR SYMPHONY SEATS.

Second Day's Sale of the Seats for the Concerts as Satisfactory as the First.

There was another successful sale of the symphony tickets today, and prices were fairly high all the way through; in fact the sale was about as good a one of the seats, which were the $7.50 ones, as has ever been held. Every seat was sold, and many more could have been disposed of, as the bidding was strong to the end. The last seats sold, a couple of undesirable ones, brought $10, which was as high as had been received previously by much better ones. Seats which last year sold for a couple of dollars, brought $10 and $12 at this sale. As the seats were cheaper ones the premiums paid were of course not so high as those of yesterday, the highest being $27 paid for 131 to 134 in the right balcony. The crowd was a larger one than yesterday, and was made up largely of symphony girls, who is as well-defined a character as the matinée girl. The girls caused a good deal of confusion by the reckless manner in which they ran the bids up twenty-five and fifty cents at a time, and then indignantly denied any knowledge of making such bids. There was never any trouble in selling the tickets over again, however, as there were plenty of other persons ready to take them. Some of the girls got nervous as the last seats were put up, and one or two of them bid against themselves in a most vigorous manner.

The first seats sold were those under the balcony. They went off steadily, but no one wanted to pay large premiums on them. The highest price paid in the first row was $11.50, in the second $10.50, in the third $8.50, in the fourth $7, in the fifth $5.50 and in the sixth $5. Then the auctioner turned his attention to the seats in the back of the right balcony, and they went rapidly. The first sold was 103, pretty well up toward the stage. It went for $25, and was, perphaps, relatively the highest sale of the day, when the position is considered. Then the prices went down as the seats nearer the stage were sold, and rose as the auctioneer went away from it again, until the highest figure was reached, not quite half-way down to the middle of the hall. The seats in the left balcony, for some reason, sold for less than those in the right. The highest price there was $23.50, and seat 572, which is in exactly the same relative position as the one on the other side which sold for $25, brought only $13.50. The seats in the balcony at the extreme back of the hall went off very well, as by the time those were reached, people were beginning to feel anxious about getting a seat at all, and were ready to take almost anything that came along. The highest price paid there was $14, while $10, $11 and $12 ruled all the way through. Some of the seats sold late yesterday afternoon, brought the highest premiums ever paid at a symphony sale. Three in particular, seats 17, 18, and 19 in R, brought $92 each, which brought the whole cost of each seat up to $104. The second highest premium was $76, and $50, and $60 was frequently paid.

BOSTON EVENING RECORD.

SEPTEMBER 25, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY AUCTION.

About 500 people attended the auction of the Boston symphony Friday afternoon $7 50 public rehearsal seats. Prices ranged fully 20 p c. higher than last year, the highest premium for the $7 50 seats early in the day being about $30. Average premium for balcony seats is about $18, while the average premium for seats under the balcony is about $7.50.

The result of this year's sale is somewhat of a surprise, but occasioned, no doubt, by the success of Conductor Paur, while last year his abilities were somewhat unknown

Boston Journal.

TEN PAGES.

WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 26, 1894.

THOSE SYMPHONY SEATS.

Sale Will Surpass All Previous Auctions, Says the Management—Such Premiums Never Brought Before.

All expectations regarding the present auction sale of Symphony seats have thus far been exceeded. The management stated on Tuesday that, judging by the sale of the rehearsal seats, this auction will surpass all previous auctions. Such uniform high premiums have never been brought. Even the sale of two seasons ago, when a few astonishingly high premiums almost outweighed the remainder, will have been forgotten by Friday.

The sale of $7 50 rehearsal seats has customarily been a drowsy occasion. Tuesday the majority of the floor seats were occupied by buyers, few of whom left until the sale was over. The rear floor seats, which were sold first, brought fair premiums. There were certain signs of a "healthy" financial state, however. Even the tickets for the recesses of the last row were eagerly sought.

A premium of $27 on seats in the last row of the first balcony led the procession of surprises. The seat next the right front wall, back of the orchestra, drew $11, and its neighbors $14 50 and $16. The average for the wall row was about $22, which makes the row higher priced than the one in front of it. So it was with most of the $7 50 seats in the balcony.

The sale of $12 concert seats will begin on Thursday morning.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

The Official Paper of the State.

WEDNESDAY MORNING, SEPT. 26, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY AUCTION.

About 500 people attended the auction of the Boston symphony Friday afternoon $7 50 public rehearsal seats. Prices ranged fully 20 p.c. higher than last year, the highest premium for the $7 50 seats early in the day being about $30. Average premium for balcony seats is about $18, while the average premium for seats under the balcony is about $7.50.

The result of this year's sale is somewhat of a surprise, but occasioned, no doubt, by the success of Conductor Paur, while last year h s abilities were somewhat unknown.

Tomorrow morning at ten o'clock, in Music Hall, the $12 seats for the 24 Saturday evening concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be sold at auction. On Friday the $7 50 seats will be sold. Every seat for the rehearsals was sold on Monday and Tuesday.

Boston Journal.

TEN PAGES.

THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 27, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY SALES.

The $12 seats for the series of 24 Saturday evening concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be sold at auction today in Music Hall, commencing at 10 o'clock. There are 1423 of these seats located on the floor and in the first balcony. The $7 50 seats, which are on the floor, first balcony and the whole of the second balcony, will be sold tomorrow (Friday). The popularity of this organization was fully shown on Monday and Tuesday, when all the season tickets for the Friday afternoon rehearsals were sold.

When the Symphony concerts open there will be two violins in the orchestra that will represent a total of $9000 cash. During the past summer, Mr. Franz Kneisel, the concert master, purchased a genuine Stradivarius in Europef for $5000, and Mr C. M. Loeffler, who also plays firstviolin at the same desk with Mr. Kneisel, purchased a similar instrument for $4000.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

The Official Paper of the State.

THURSDAY MORNING, SEPT. 27, 1894.

SYMPHONY AUCTION SALE.

The auction sale of $12 seats for the Saturday evening concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra takes place in Music Hall this morning, beginning at 10 o'clock. There are 1423 seats to be sold today. The balance of the house, 974 seats, will be sold tomorrow (Friday). The extreme popularity of this organization was shown on Monday and Tuesday of the present week when all of the $12 and $7 50 seats for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals were sold.

[21]

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCVI., NO. 89.

THURSDAY, SEPT. 27, 1894.

It has been great fun at the Symphony auctions this week, and how some of the bidders ever secured what they wanted is a marvel to cool headed spectators. The sale for the rehearsal seats can scarcely be beaten by that for Saturday night. Girls will be girls, and the rehearsals are the joy of their lives because so many of them are Brookline, Longwood and Jamaica Plain girls, who have other matters to occupy their evenings beside coming into the city, unless it be for a party or the theatre. The real music-loving community, the young people who have "come out," the rank and fashion, that hold sittings as they take a pew at Trinity and go when they please, are the chief Saturday nighters, and no two audiences could be more distinct in character. Perhaps, this is one reason why the Symphonies are such a constant excitement for society, for the public, and the stranger that is within our gates.

And speaking of these concerts brings up a vision of a terrible fuss and fret of nearly a year ago, or is it longer? That time when Boston was told it should have no more orchestral performances in old Music Hall, that unless it shelled out and bought land and built a hall, there should be no more music, as far as Mr. Higginson was concerned. Well, Boston trembled in its shoes, and immediately subscribed a goodly amount. It purchased the land and it got as far as looking at a model for a hall suitable for its magnificent orchestra, and then it came to a full stop. Financial depression upset its apple cart. When we sit in that dear, draughty Music Hall again this winter, will it be any consolation to think how near we came to having a finer place, and by what a mischance the best laid plans of men, or mice, have gone aglee? The new Music Hall is still in the air, but the Symphony orchestra is a reality for which Bostonians are truly grateful.

The auction sale of 12 season tickets for the Saturday evening concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra takes place in Music Hall this morning, beginning at 10 o'clock. There are 1423 seats to be sold today. The $7.50 seats, or balance of the house, will be sold tomorrow.

Boston Transcript

THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER, 27, 1894.

AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERT SALE.

Bids for Premiums on the Twelve Dollar Seats Did Not Run Very High this Forenoon.

A stranger happening in at Music Hall this forenoon might have thought at first glance that some grand convention was in progress. There was noise enough, to be sure, and not a little contention; but the people were there simply to bid premiums on the twelve dollar seats for the symphony concerts. That is, most of the people were there for that; there were men here who came merely to look on, and several girls who came evidently to read novels, while a great many of those present spent a large share of their time receiving friends.

Bids were moderate today. Speculators made themselves felt to a certain extent, and as a rule paid the highest prices for seats. Places under the galleries in the front rows brought premiums, on the average, of six to ten dollars. Farther back bids on these side seats increased, until in rows J, K and L the prices ranged from $17 to $19.

The most desirable seats, those near the middle aisle, were knocked down at $15 or $18 so long as the auctioneer was concerned with the front rows; but as he came to row G the bids were higher, ranging from $20 to $29, and in row J seats numbered 18 and 19 brought premiums of $38. The highest bid registered previous to noon was for the single seat at the left of the middle aisle in row H. That seat brought a bid of $42. Other premiums ranged on the average from $18 to $25.

The Salem Daily Gazette

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 22, 1894.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which ranks with the finest musical organizations in the world, will open its 14th season of 24 public recitals, at Music Hall on Friday afternoons, and 24 concerts to be given on Saturday evenings, the latter beginning Oct. 13.

The orchestra will number 82 musicians, and is made up as follows: Sixteen 1st violins, 14 2d violins, 10 violas, 8 violoncellos, 8 bassos, 1 harp, three flutes, 2 oboes, 1 English horn, 2 clarinets, 1 bass clarinet, 2 bassoons, 1 contra bassoon, 4 horns, 3 trumpets, 3 trombones, 1 tuba and 4 percussion instruments. The engagement of 10 new members, it is believed, will improve the orchestra at certain points. The most important acquisition is the new 1st clarinet player, M. Fourtan, who has filled a similar position in the symphony orchestra and the Grand Opera at Lyons, where he is held in high esteem by his fellow artists.

All the soloists have not yet signed contracts, but those who have are Mmes. Emma Eames, Emma Juch, H. H. A. Beach, Messrs. Ben Davies, M. Ysaye, Cesar Thomson, Carl Baermann, C. Mole, Franz Kneisel and A. Schroeder. Several other distinguished native and foreign artists will also appear, and their names will be announced as soon as their contracts are signed. Of those named, the famous violinists, Ysaye and Thomson, have not yet been heard in this country.

BOSTON POST.

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

FRIDAY MORNING, SEPT. 28, 1894.

ASTUTE AGENTS

Flourished at Symphony Concert Ticket Sale.

This is the way the Symphony $12 seats went yesterday:

"Now we come to No. 18, in I. What am I bid? What am I bid? Start them right up, now, someone, please!"

"Ten dollars," in a weak voice from the rear.

"Ten, ten—I'm offered; $10—eleven, d'ye say it—ten, ten—"

"Eleven," from a speculator in the front seats.

"'Leven', 'leven—I'm bid; 'leven—"

"Eleven, fifty," from the same modest person in the rear.

"'Leven, fifty—'leven, fifty. Twelve is

THE AUCTIONEER.

it? I'm bid 'leven fifty—twelve, if you want it—'leven fifty—"

"Twelve," says the speculator.

"Thirteen," says a second speculator.

"Fourteen," says a third speculator—and the vigorous auctioneer hops around, catches the eye of each speculator who sends it up another peg by nodding his head once. By the time the speculators and the auctioneer are through with the seat it has gone up to $41 premium, and a flouting and rustling of skirts is heard in the rear, and a couple of flushed and angry ladies bounce out of Music Hall just as the auctioneer cries out, "All done at 41."

WELL CHAPERONED.

In fact, yesterday, of all the days of the sale, the agents, although there were not more than half a dozen of them, had things pretty much their own way.

WANTED THEIR OLD CHAIRS.

People who occupied certain seats last year wanted the same seats this year. Take for instance, Mrs. John L. Gardner, who is now abroad, but whose agent kept his eye alternately on the audience and on Mrs. Jack's last season's seat in the lower balcony, and who did not take it off till Mrs. Jack Gardner's possession of the seat this year was assured beyond the skeleton of a doubt.

Mr. Alexander Porter was said, also, to have secured his old place, and Mrs. J. V.

A HEAVY INVESTOR.

Apthorp, too, with the same list of last season's Symphony frequenters. The consequence of all of which was that the proceedings, so far as those seats were concerned, were dull for everybody but the agents, for the people of less means than those of the absent clients dropped out of the struggle after the first one or two rounds.

It was, nevertheless, the case that the prices yesterday were in general from 25 to 30 per cent greater than those of last season. In some cases, where a certain seat was to be got at all hazards, the agent simply anticipated the weaker efforts of the private competitors in the rear by making their first bid some points higher than those at which the seats would ordinarily have been started.

The fancy figures of former years, however, did not turn up. The highest premium of the day was $52 (in H), bid by Mr. Herrick for a client, which, with the ticket price added, brought the outlay up to $64.

The next highest was $42 premium, bid by Mr. Wadsworth of 40 State street, who bid only upon orders.

An estimate of average for the premiums of the day was $12. Some of the lower balcony seats were very low toward the close of the sale, many of them being disposed of at from $1 to $3 premium. The agents handled most of the seats in the centre of the hall, but several in the floor front row realized high prices—four or five times greater than those of last year.

In all, 1398 seats were sold during the day, but twenty-five on the floor remaining undisposed of. The proceeds amounted to in the vicinity of $30,000. The attendance was larger than had been expected and was greater than that of last year.

This morning at the same hour the $7.50 seats, 974 in number, comprising the whole of the upper balcony and portions of the lower and the floor, will be sold.

The management is very well satisfied with the sale thus far.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.

FRIDAY MORNING, SEPT. 28, 1894.

SALE OF SYMPHONY CONCERT SEATS.

At Music Hall yesterday bids were made for the $12 seats for the symphony concerts. Speculators made themselves felt to a certain extent, and as a rule paid the highest prices for seats. Places under the galleries in the front rows brought premiums, on the average, of $6 to $10. Farther back bids on these side seats increased, until in rows J, K and L the prices ranged from $17 to $19.

The most desirable seats, those near the middle aisle, were knocked down at $15 or $18 so long as the auctioneer was concerned with the front rows; but as he came to row G the bids were higher, ranging from $20 to $29, and in row J seats numbered 18 and 19 brought premiums of $38. The highest bid registered previous to noon was for the single seat at the left of the middle aisle in row H. That seat brought a bid of $42. Other premiums ranged on the average from $18 to $25.

Today the $7 50 seats for the concerts will be sold.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCVI., NO. 90.

FRIDAY, SEPT. 28, 1894.

CLOSE OF THE SYMPHONY AUCTION.

The $7.50 Seats Brought a Little More Than They Did Last Year.

The $7.50 seats for the Saturday evening Symphony concerts were sold this morning at Music Hall. This winds up the auction.

The prices ruled a little better than last year. As is usually the case, some seats brought no premiums at all, and remained unsold. There were about 100 of these unsold seats in the rear of the hall, under the balcony. In one of the rows there, not a seat was disposed of.

In the first balcony the seats on the side brought, as a general thing, from $8 to 11. The seats in the back rows went for $4 or $5.

In the second balcony the highest bids were for the front seats in the side rows. Nnos. 26 to 29 brought $13.50, and Nos. 30 and 31 brought $15.50 apiece. Prices on each side tapered gradually off.

CASHING IN AT THE WINDOW.

The North American

PHILADELPHIA, PA.

WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 26, 1894.

SOME MUSICAL NOTES.

Anncuncements for the Coming Season That Will Be of Interest to Concert and Opera-Goers.

If all the announcements that have been made are duly carried out, the musical season of 1894-95 will include much that is interesting and valuable, a good deal more so than last season, which was not particularly fertile in events of importance. The promise is made of two series of first-class orchestral concerts; there is to be grand opera at the Academy of Music by the company from the Metropolitan Opera House, New York; and there will be rather more than the usual efflorescence of famous vocal and instrumental artists. Every connoisseur will be gratified to know that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its usual course of symphony concerts at the Academy of Music. The first of these will occur on Monday evening, October 29, and the remaining four of the five to be given will take place on December 3, January 17, February 4 and March 11. As heretofore, a solo artist of eminence will take part in each concert, but in this respect the arrangements have not yet been perfected. One engagement consummated, however, is that of M. Isaye, the famous Belgian player, who has been called the Paderewski of the violin, and who in Europe is one of the latest lions.

Boston Transcript

FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 28, 1894.

SOME SYMPHONY SEATS LEFT.

A Few Under the Balcony Were Not Taken at the Sale This Morning.

This morning, for the first time during this year's sale by auction of seats for the Symphony concerts, there were a few seats upon which no one could be induced to bid. These were the ones at the extreme rear of the hall. They are under the balcony, and are undesirable, and a whole row of them remained unsold, besides a number scattered about in different places. There were two reasons for this, one being that the concerts are not so popular as the Friday afternoon rehearsals; and the other, that the whole of the second balcony was sold for reserved seats, while at the rehearsals these are left for what are known as "rush" seats, the word being vividly descriptive to anyone who has ever tried to occupy one of them at a Friday afternoon rehearsal. The sale this morning was of $7.50 seats, and the crowd was rather a different one from that at the sale of rehearsal tickets. There were more men, and both men and women looked as if they knew what it was to work for a living. The bidding was clever, with the exception of one man, who insisted on raising his own bid, and would not be driven out of it by the auctioneer. He was so persistent that he was finally allowed to have his way. Taking an average of the seats throughout the hall, they did not sell for much over half what the same ones brought at the rehearsal sales. The highest premium paid during the forenoon was $16 for seats 32 and 33, about half-way down the second balcony, in the front row. The highest price paid in the first balcony was $14.25, and good seats were secured in both balconies for from $5 to $10. The seats at the extreme back of the first balcony went for rather low prices. There are some desirable seats there in the back row. They are raised a little above the others and have an aisle in front of them. They sold for $4 and $5 each. The highest price paid for floor seats was $6.50 for 1183 and 1184, in the fourth row under the balcony. Most of the seats in this row sold for $5, and in the row back of it for $2.50.

Boston Journal.

TEN PAGES.

THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 27, 1894.

THOSE SYMPHONY SEATS.

Prices Will Equal Those of Several Previous Years, Says the Management.

The predictions of a few days ago regarding the complete success of the auction sale of Symphony seats are fulfilling. Today the $12 seats for the Saturday evening performances were sold at prices corresponding to those of Monday and surpassing those of past years.

The first seat in row A, for instance—one of the least desirable seats on the floor—brought five times the premium of last year. The steadiness of the bidding and the uniformity of the premiums obviously disappointed the few spectators, who soon left the hall. The buyers were not nearly so numerous as on the early days of the week. They were dismayed, too, by the speculators or ticket agents.

Not within the memory of those who have attended many Symphony sales have these agents been so omnivorous as they were today. Frequently four or more bidders withdrew at the bid of at least two of them. This accounts for the low premiums on many of the best seats. Only when two agents bid against each other did the premium amount to more than $30.

Half a dozen rows had been disposed of and $42 was the highest premium. It remained the highest during the remainder of the sale. The average price for the middle seats was a trifle over $20. The side end seats, though more sought than they were last year, were sold cheap. But almost every middle end seat was knocked down at a uniform figure to the speculators.

The privilege of taking four seats at a time was almost invariably accepted by the agents, sometimes by orders, but more often for speculation. One of the group bought all but few of the seats in rows N and O.

The unprecedented satisfaction of the management remains undiminished.

[22]

BOSTON POST.
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.
SATURDAY MORNING, SEPT. 29, 1894.

"ALL SOLD."

Symphony Season Tickets All Disposed Of—A Highly Successful Season Assured.

The auction sale of the remaining seats for the Symphony concerts was resumed yesterday. These consisted only of the $7.50 seats, the $12 ones having all been disposed of on Thursday. Manager Ellis told a Post man yesterday that the sale of tickets this season had been very satisfactory. Much more so, indeed, that was last year's sale. A highly successful season was already insured. Good prices were obtained for the forty or fifty seats which remained.

BOSTON HOME JOURNAL
The Saturday Evening Paper.
SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 29, 1894.

I am glad to see that a "healthier tone" prevailed at the symphony auction this year than is usual. That is, there were no such fancy premiums as have been paid. There was no such feverish and faddish anxiety to get in just because it was "the thing," and while good prices were obtained it was not impossible to get good seats for a comparatively small sum.

The fact is "the fad" is wearing out, and while the symphonies will undoubtedly remain very fashionable, there will not be that furor over them which was really so laughable. And it will be all the better for the real interests of orchestral music in Boston.

Not a little of this change is due to Mr. Paur, I fancy. He has shown himself to be a non-sensational, earnest student of music, and he has devoted himself more to his orchestra than to sipping tea and nibbling wafers in fashionable drawing rooms. As a lion he refused to roar, and we have been musically more peaceful ever since.

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, SEPT. 30, 1894.

The 14th season of the symphony concerts will attract the usual large audiences, all the seats being sold for the 48 performances. The first rehearsal and concert, Oct 12-13, in Music hall, will be given with the following program: Overture, "Anacreon," Cherubini; symphony No. 7, Beethoven; tambourin, gavotte and chaconne, Gluck; entr'acte, "Gwendoline," Chabrier; Kaisermarsch, Wagner.

Jamaica Plain News.
SEPTEMBER 29, 1894.

BOSTON SYMPHONY SEASON.

Brilliant Array of Talent.

Conductor Paur Has Some Novelties and a Fine List of Standard Works to Offer. Personnel of the Orchestra.

This section takes an especial interest in the Boston Symphony Orchestra on account of the residence in its midst of its eminent conductor, Mr. Emil Paur, and of a great many of the members.

The season will commence with a public rehearsal on Friday afternoon, Oct. 12th, and twenty-four Friday afternoon public rehearsals and twenty-four concerts on Saturday evenings will be given at Music Hall. Ten new members have been engaged and will improve and strengthen the orchestra at certain points. The most important acquisition is the new 1st clarinet player, M. Pourtan, who has filled a similar position in the Symphony Orchestra and the Grand Opera at Lyons.

Among the soloists so far engaged are Mmes. Emma Eames, Emma Juch, H. H. A. Beach, Messrs. Ben Davies, M. Ysaye, Cesar Thomson, Carl Baermann, C. Mole, Franz Kneisel and A. Schroeder, which array of talent promises a most brilliant season. Several other distinguished native and foreign artists will also appear, and their names will be announced as soon as their contracts are signed. Of those named, the famous violinists, Ysaye and Thomson, have not yet been heard in this country.

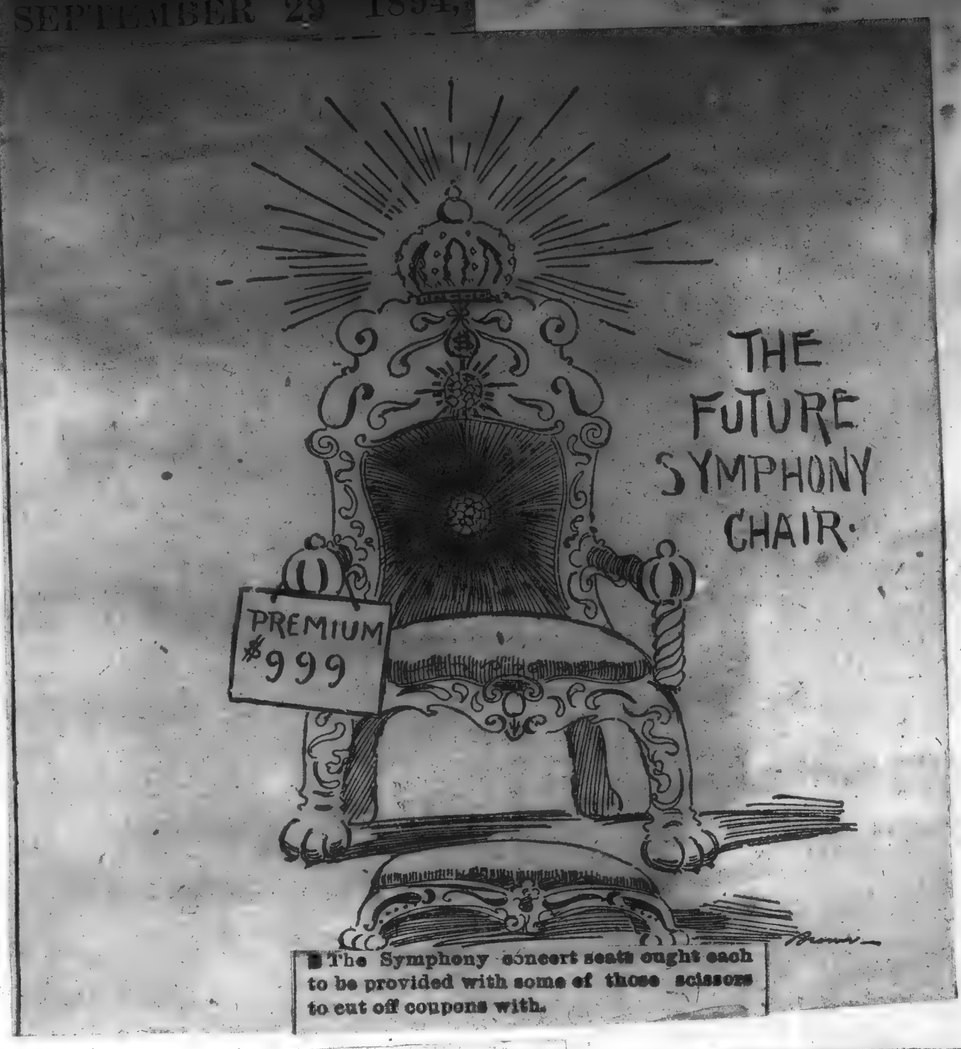
Mr. Paur has devoted a great deal of time this summer in preparing an attractive programme and has arranged for the performance of several novelties, beside the standard works. Mr. Paur, during the past year, which was his first as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has exercised a marked influence on musical progress and has accomplished a great deal for the advancement of musical art. This of course, through the orchestra as a body, under his capable direction and because of his wise discrimination in the matter of selections.

There will be two violins in the orchestra that will represent a total of $9000 cash. During the past summer, Mr. Franz Kneisel, the concert master, purchased a genuine Stradivarius in Europe for $5000, and Mr. C. M. Loeffler, who also plays first violin at the same desk with Mr. Kneisel, purchased a similar instrument for $4000.

The following list, showing in full the personnel of the orchestra, contains the names of many people counted as friends and neighbors:

Conductor—Mr. Emil Paur.
First violins—Messrs. Kneisel, Loeffler, Adamowski, Schnitzler, Roth, Kuntz, Moldaner, Fiedler Ondrierek, Krafft, Hoffmann, Mann, Strube, Eichheim, Knecht, Hahn.
Second violins—Messrs. Akeroyd, Finmara Swornsbourne, Marble, Schuchmann, J. Kneisel, Tischer-Zietz, S. Goldstein, Zahn, Kurth, Reisland, Eichler, Michael, Berger.
Violas—Messrs. Svecenski, Zach, H. Heindl, Barleben, Gruenberg, Kolster, Hoyer, Kluge, Sauer, Krauss.
Violoncellos—Messrs. Schroeder, Schulz, J. Adamowski, Mingels, Rose, E. Loeffler, C. Barth, Nagel.
Basses—Messrs. A. Goldstein, Elkind, Bareither, Seydel, Barth, Gerhardt, Reinhardt, Butler.
Harp—Mr. H. Schuecker.
Flutes—Messrs. Mole, E. M. Heindl, Fox.
Oboes—Messrs. Sautet, Demuth.
English horn—Mr. F. Muller.
Drums—Mr. H. D. Simpson.
Clarinets—Messrs. Pourtan and Metzger.
Bassoons—Messrs. Litke and Guenzel.
Horns—Messrs. Hackebarth, Lorbeer, Hein and Schumann.
Trumpets—Messrs. P. Mueller and Mand.
Trombones—Messrs. Hampe, Ahloescher and Rigg.
Tuba—Mr. E. Golde.
Tympani—C. R. Ludwig.

SEPTEMBER 29 1894.



The Symphony concert seats ought each to be provided with some of those scissors to cut off coupons with.

American Art Journal.
NEW YORK, SATURDAY, SEPT. 29. 1894.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The fourteenth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, Boston, will begin on Oct. 12, Friday afternoon, public rehearsal, and on Oct. 13, Saturday night. It will, as usual, include 24 concerts, and as many public rehearsals, at weekly intervals, with some lapses, to be hereafter announced. The sales by auction of the season tickets are thus appointed: Monday, Sept. 24, $12 seats for the public rehearsals; Sept. 25, $7.50 rehearsal seats; Sept. 27, $12 concert seats; Sept. 28, $7.50 concert seats. The bids will be for premiums, and not more than four seats will be sold to a single bidder.

The Musical Courier.
NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 3, 1894.

The sale of the Symphony tickets was sane and steady. To quote from the Boston "Herald" apropos of the first sale for the Friday afternoon rehearsals: "While there was no very great competition there was a steady demand at good premiums There was plenty of sharp bidding at times up to a certain point. The 'gilt edged' seats were those in the centre and the first row of the balcony, and these brought the 'gilt edged' prices. The tiptop premium of the day was $92, which was bid for three seats, R 17, 18 and 19, 17 being on one side of the centre aisle and 18 and 19 on the other. This premium of $92 made the cost of each ticket $104. The second highest premium of the day was $76 for a seat in K. The seats from H down to O were in greatest demand, and the prices in these rows ranged from $35 to $65 or $70."

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, OCT. 7, 1894.

Symphony Concerts Begin This Week.

The symphony concerts, under the leadership of Mr Emil Paur, will begin the 14th series in Music hall this week, the rehearsal Friday afternoon being followed by the usual concert Saturday evening. There will be 24 of each at weekly intervals, with these omissions: Friday afternoon, Dec 2, Dec 7, Jan 11, Feb 8, March 15; Saturday nights, Nov 3, Dec 8, Jan 12, Feb 9, March 16.

The program for the opening concert includes these works: Overture, "Anacreon," Cherubini; seventh symphony, Beethoven; tambourine, gavotte and chaconne, Gluck; entr'acte, "Gwendoline," Chabrier (new); Kaisermarsch, Wagner. The programs of the four succeeding concerts follow:

Second, Oct 20—Overture, "Roman Carnival," Berlioz; symphony, Chadwick, new; ballet music from "The Renaissance," Rubinstein. Mrs Emma Juch will sing.

Third, Oct 27—Unfinished symphony, Schubert; symphony in C major, Schumann; concerto for pianoforte in E-flat, Beethoven, Mr Baermann, solo pianist.

Fourth, Nov 10—Overture to "The Bartered Bride," Smetana, new; symphony in D, Sgambati, new; suite, "L'Arlesienne," Bizet.

Fifth, Nov 17—Symphony in E-flat, Mozart; entr'acte from "Rosamunde," Schubert; march in B minor, Schubert-Liszt; overture to "Carlo Broschi," Adam.

Other solo artists engaged are: Singers, Miss Emma Eames and Mr Ben Davies. Instrumental, Mrs H. H. A. Beach, pianoforte; Messrs E. Ysaye, Cesar Thomson and Franz Kneisel, violins; C. Mole, flute; A. Schroeder, violoncello.

In the course of the season the orchestra will give five concerts at the Metropolitan opera house, New York; five at the academy of Music, Philadelphia; five at the new music hall, Baltimore; five at Metzerott hall, Washington; four public rehearsals and four concerts under the auspices of the Philharmonic society at the academy of Music, Brooklyn; 10 concerts at Sanders theater, Cambridge; six in Infantry hall, Providence; single concerts in various other cities.

The Cambridge concerts will be given in Sanders theater Thursday evenings, Oct 18, Nov 22, Dec 13, Jan 3, Jan 24, Feb 14, March 7, April 4 and April 25. Among the solo artists to be expected are Mmes Nordica and Wyman, and Messrs Davies, Ysaye, MacDowell and Adamowski.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCVI., NO. 99.
SUNDAY, OCTOBER 7, 1894.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its 14th season at Music Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, when the following programme will be given:

Overture, "Anacreon".....Cherubini
Symphony No. 7.....Beethoven
Tambourin, Gavotte and Chaconne.....Gluck
Entr' Acte "Gwendoline".....Chabrier
Kaisermarsch .....Wagner

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

SATURDAY MORNING, SEPT. 29, 1894.

"ALL SOLD."

Symphony Season Tickets All Disposed Of—A Highly Successful Season Assured.

The auction sale of the remaining seats for the Symphony concerts was resumed yesterday. These consisted only of the $7.50 seats, the $12 ones having all been disposed of on Thursday. Manager Ellis told a Post man yesterday that the sale of tickets this season had been very satisfactory. Much more so, indeed, that was last year's sale. A highly successful season was already insured. Good prices were obtained for the forty or fifty seats which remained.

HOME JOURNAL

The Saturday Evening Paper.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 29, 1894.

I am glad to see that a "healthier tone" prevailed at the symphony auction this year than is usual. That is, there were no such fancy premiums as have been paid. There was no such feverish and faddish anxiety to get in just because it was "the thing," and while good prices were obtained it was not impossible to get good seats for a comparatively small sum.

The fact is "the fad" is wearing out, and while the symphonies will undoubtedly remain very fashionable, there will not be that furor over them which was really so laughable. And it will be all the better for the real interests of orchestral music in Boston.

Not a little of this change is due to Mr. Paur, I fancy. He has shown himself to be a non-sensational, earnest student of music, and he has devoted himself more to his orchestra than to sipping tea and nibbling wafers in fashionable drawing rooms. As a lion he refused to roar, and we have been musically more peaceful ever since.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, SEPT. 30, 1894.

The 14th season of the symphony concerts will attract the usual large audiences, all the seats being sold for the 48 performances. The first rehearsal and concert, Oct 12-13, in Music hall, will be given with the following program: Overture, "Anacreon," Cherubini; symphony No. 7, Beethoven; tambourin, gavotte and chaconne, Gluck; entr'acte, "Gwendoline," Chabrien; kaisermarsch, Wagner.

Jamaica Plain News.

SEPTEMBER 29, 1894.

BOSTON SYMPHONY SEASON.

Brilliant Array of Talent.

Conductor Paur Has Some Novelties and a Fine List of Standard Works to Offer. Personnel of the Orchestra.

This section takes an especial interest in the Boston Symphony Orchestra on account of the residence in its midst of its eminent conductor, Mr. Emil Paur, and of a great many of the members.

The season will commence with a public rehearsal on Friday afternoon, Oct. 12th, and twenty-four Friday afternoon public rehearsals and twenty-four concerts on Saturday evenings will be given at Music Hall. Ten new members have been engaged and will improve and strengthen the orchestra at certain points. The most important acquisition is the new 1st clarinet player, M. Pourtan, who has filled a similar position in the Symphony Orchestra and the Grand Opera at Lyons.

Among the soloists so far engaged are Mmes. Emma Eames, Emma Juch, H. H. A. Beach, Messrs. Ben Davies, M. Ysaye, Cesar Thomson, Carl Baermann, C. Mole, Franz Kneisel and A. Schroeder, which array of talent promises a most brilliant season. Several other distinguished native and foreign artists will also appear, and their names will be announced as soon as their contracts are signed. Of those named, the famous violinists, Ysaye and Thomson, have not yet been heard in this country.

Mr. Paur has devoted a great deal of time this summer in preparing an attractive programme and has arranged for the performance of several novelties, beside the standard works. Mr. Paur, during the past year, which was his first as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has exercised a marked influence on musical progress and has accomplished a great deal for the advancement of musical art. This of course, through the orchestra as a body, under his capable direction and because of his wise discrimination in the matter of selections.

There will be two violins in the orchestra that will represent a total of $9000 cash. During the past summer, Mr. Franz Kneisel, the concert master, purchased a genuine Stradivarius in Europe for $5000, and Mr. C. M. Loeffler, who also plays first violin at the same desk with Mr. Kneisel, purchased a similar instrument for $4000.

The following list, showing in full the personnel of the orchestra, contains the names of many people counted as friends and neighbors:

Conductor—Mr. Emil Paur.

First violins—Messrs. Kneisel, Loeffler, Adamowski, Schmitzler, Roth, Kuntz, Moldauer, Fiedler Ondrierek, Krafft, Hoffmann, Mann, Strube, Eichheim, Knecht, Hahn.

Second violins—Messrs. Akeroyd, Finmara Swornsbourne, Marble, Schuchmann, J. Kneisel, Tischer-Zietz, S. Goldstein, Zahn, Kurth, Reisland, Eichler, Michael, Berger.

Violas—Messrs. Svecenski, Zach, H. Heindl, Barleben, Gruenberg, Kolster, Hoyer, Kluge, Sauer, Krauss.

Violoncellos—Messrs. Schroeder, Schulz, J. Adamowski, Mingels, Rose, E. Loeffler, C. Barth, Nagel.

Basses—Messrs. A. Goldstein, Elkind, Bareither, Seydel, Barth, Gerhardt, Reinhardt, Butler.

Harp—Mr. H. Schuecker.

Flutes—Messrs. Mole, E. M. Heindl, Fox.

Oboes—Messrs. Sautet, Demuth.

English horn—Mr. F. Muller.

Drums—Mr. H. D. Simpson.

Clarinets—Messrs. Pourtan and Metzger.

Bassoons—Messrs. Litke and Guenzel.

Horns—Messrs. Hackebarth, Lorbeer, Heim and Schumann.

Trumpets—Messrs. P. Mueller and Mand.

Trombones—Messrs. Hampe, Ahloescher and Rigg.

Tuba—Mr. E. Golde.

Tympani—C. R. Ludwig.

BOSTON EVENING RECORD.

SEPTEMBER 29 1894.

The Symphony concert seats ought each to be provided with some of those scissors to cut off coupons with.

American Art Journal.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, SEPT. 29, 1894.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The fourteenth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, Boston, will begin on Oct. 12, Friday afternoon, public rehearsal, and on Oct. 13, Saturday night. It will, as usual, include 24 concerts, and as many public rehearsals, at weekly intervals, with some lapses, to be hereafter announced. The sales by auction of the season tickets are thus appointed: Monday, Sept. 24, $12 seats for the public rehearsals; Sept. 25, $7.50 rehearsal seats; Sept. 27, $12 concert seats; Sept. 28, $7.50 concert seats. The bids will be for premiums, and not more than four seats will be sold to a single bidder.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 3, 1894.

The sale of the Symphony tickets was sane and steady. To quote from the Boston "Herald" apropos of the first sale for the Friday afternoon rehearsals: "While there was no very great competition there was a steady demand at good premiums There was plenty of sharp bidding at times up to a certain point. The 'gilt edged' seats were those in the centre and the first row of the balcony, and these brought the 'gilt edged' prices. The tiptop premium of the day was $92, which was bid for three seats, R 17, 18 and 19, 17 being on one side of the centre aisle and 18 and 19 on the other. This premium of $92 made the cost of each ticket $104. The second highest premium of the day was $76 for a seat in K. The seats from H down to O were in greatest demand, and the prices in these rows ranged from $35 to $65 or $70."

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, OCT. 7, 1894.

Symphony Concerts Begin This Week.

The symphony concerts, under the leadership of Mr Emil Paur, will begin the 14th series in Music hall this week, the rehearsal Friday afternoon being followed by the usual concert Saturday evening. There will be 24 of each at weekly intervals, with these omissions: Friday afternoon, Dec 2, Dec 7, Jan 11, Feb 8, March 15; Saturday nights, Nov 3, Dec 8, Jan 12, Feb 9, March 16.

The program for the opening concert includes these works: Overture, "Anacreon," Cherubini; seventh symphony, Beethoven; tambourine, gavotte and chaconne, Gluck; entr'acte, "Gwendoline," Chabrier (new); Kaisermarsch, Wagner. The programs of the four succeeding concerts follow:

Second, Oct 20—Overture, "Roman Carnival," Berlioz; symphony, Chadwick, new; ballet music from "The Demon," Rubinstein. Mrs Emma Juch will sing.

Third, Oct 27—Unfinished symphony, Schubert; symphony in C major, Schumann; concerto for pianoforte in E-flat, Beethoven, Mr Baermann, solo pianist.

Fourth, Nov 10—Overture to "The Bartered Bride," Smetana, new; symphony in D, Sgambati, new; suite, "L'Arlesienne," Bizet.

Fifth, Nov 17—Symphony in E-flat, Mozart; entr'acte from "Rosamunde," Schubert; march in B minor, Schubert-Liszt; overture to "Carlo Broschi," Auber.

Other solo artists engaged are: Singers, Miss Emma Eames and Mr Ben Davies. Instrumental, Mrs H. H. A. Beach, pianoforte; Messrs E. Ysaye, Cesar Thomson and Franz Kneisel, violins; C. Mole, flute; A. Schroeder, violoncello.

In the course of the season the orchestra will give five concerts at the Metropolitan opera house, New York; five at the academy of Music, Philadelphia; five at the new music hall, Baltimore; five at Metzerott hall, Washington; four public rehearsals and four concerts under the auspices of the Philharmonic society at the academy of Music, Brooklyn; 10 concerts at Sanders theater, Cambridge; six in Infantry hall, Providence; single concerts in various other cities.

The Cambridge concerts will be given in Sanders theater Thursday evenings, Oct 18, Nov 22, Dec 13, Jan 3, Jan 24, Feb 14, March 7, April 4 and April 25. Among the solo artists to be expected are Mmes Nordica and Wyman, and Messrs Davies, Ysaye, MacDowell and Adamowski.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCVI., NO. 99.

SUNDAY, OCTOBER 7, 1894.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its 14th season at Music Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, when the following programme will be given:

Overture, "Anacreon".....Cherubini
Symphony No. 7.....Beethoven
Tambourin, Gavotte and Chaconne.....Gluck
Entr' Acte "Gwendoline".....Chabrier
Kaisermarsch.....Wagner

[23]

...NDAY HERALD
...STON, OCTOBER 7

KNEISEL QUARTET.

The Kneisel quartet, composed of Messrs. Kneisel, Roth, Svecenski and Schroeder, will give eight concerts at Union Hall, 48 Boylston street, on Monday evenings, Oct. 22, Nov. 12, Dec. 10, Dec. 31, Jan. 21, Feb. 18, March 18 and April 8.

Among the works to be included in the programmes are:

Beethoven—(Quartets) Op. 18 B flat.
Op. 74 E flat.
Op. 130 A minor.
Op. 131 B flat.
Op. 132 C sharp minor.
Brahms—Quartet G flat.
Clarinet, Quintet B minor.
Piano quintet, minor.
Mozart—Quartet A major.
Quintet G minor.
Haydn—Quartet E flat.
Quartet G major.
Svendsen—Octet for strings.
Rubinstein—Piano trio.

NOVELTIES.

Sgambati—Quartet D flat major.
Borodine—Quartet D major.
Hans Koessler—Quartet (manuscript).
C. M. Loeffler—Quintet (manuscript).
A. Kahn—Piano trio.
Ed. Schuett—Piano quartet F major.

The sale of season tickets will open at Music Hall on Monday, Oct. 15.

CAMBRIDGE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Emil Paur conductor, will give a series of 10 concerts in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, on Thursday evenings, Oct. 18, Nov. 8, Nov. 22, Dec. 13, Jan. 3, Jan. 24, March 7, April 4 and April 25. This large body of players is heard to the best possible advantage in Sanders Theatre, the fine acoustics of the room adding much to the effectiveness of the performances. Among the soloists to be expected are Mme. Nordica, Mrs. Julie M. Wyman, Messrs. Ben Davies, Ysaye, E. A. MacDowell and T. Adamowski. The programme for the first concert is: Passacaglia, Bach; overture, "Fidelio," Beethoven; symphony in E minor, No. 4, Brahms; overture, "Carneval Romaine," Berlioz. The sale of season tickets will be held at the University bookstore, Cambridge, on Saturday, Oct. 13, beginning at 8 o'clock. A limited number of seats will be reserved for college officers and invited guests.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, OCTOBER 7, 1894.

The rush seats for the second balcony at the Symphony Rehearsal will go on sale at Music Hall, Monday morning.

The first Symphony Concert of this season will be given in Music Hall Oct. 13. The program will include Cherubini's "Anacreon" overture; Beethoven's 7th Symphony; Tambourin, Gavotte and Chaconne, Gluck; Entr'acte "Gwendoline," Chabrier; Wagner's Kaisermarch.

The first of the Kneisel Quartet concerts will be given in Union Hall the 22nd. The program will include quartets by Cherubini, Mozart, and Beethoven.

CAMBRIDGE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Emil Paur, conductor, will give a series of ten concerts in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, on Thursday evenings, Oct. 18, Nov. 8, Nov. 22, Dec. 13, Jan. 3, Jan. 24, Feb. 14, March 7, April 4, and April 25. Among the soloists to be expected are Mrs. Nordica, Mrs. Julie Wyman, Messrs. Ben Davies, Ysaye, E. A. McDowell and T. Adamowski. The program for the first concert will be as follows: Passacaglia, Bach; overture, "Fidelio," Beethoven; Symphony No. 4, Brahms; overture, "Carnaval Romain," Berlioz. The sale of tickets will open at the University Bookstore, Cambridge, Saturday, Oct. 13, and at 8 A. M. A limited number of seats will be reserved for college officers and invited guests.

KNEISEL QUARTET CONCERTS.

The Kneisel Quartet (Messrs. Kneisel, Roth, Svecenski and Schroeder) will give eight concerts in Union Hall, 48 Boylston Street, on Monday evenings, Oct. 22, Nov. 12, Dec. 10, Dec. 31, Jan. 21, Feb. 18, March 18 and April 8. Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, Mrs. Emil Paur, Mr. Ernst Perabo, Mr. Arthur Whiting, Mr. Leon Pourtan and others will appear with the quartet in these concerts. The sale of season tickets will open at Music Hall on Monday, Oct. 15.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, OCT. 7, 1894.

THE CAMBRIDGE CONCERTS.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Mr. Emil Paur will begin the usual series of concerts in Sanders' Theatre, Cambridge, on Thursday evening Oct. 18, to be followed on the dates of Nov. 8 and 22, Dec. 13, Jan. 8 and 24, Feb. 14, March 7, April 4 and 25. These concerts provide the very cream of the Symphony music and the Orchestra yearly meets immense audiences of the most cultivated and distinguished people of Cambridge in addition to the large contingent from the College. Bostonians who find the two Music Hall concerts by the Orchestra insufficient, or for any reason are unable to attend them find the Cambridge concerts both a privilege and enjoyment.

PROVIDENCE TELEGRAM PUB. CO.
SUNDAY, OCTOBER 7, 1894.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA!

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

FOURTEENTH SEASON 1894-95.

6 GRAND CONCERTS
IN INFANTRY HALL,
WEDNESDAY EVENINGS, OCT. 24, NOV. 14, DEC. 19, JAN. 16, FEB. 20, MAR. 20

SOLO ARTISTS:

Mme. JULIE M. WYMAN,
Miss GERTRUDE FRANKLIN,
Mons. POL PLANCON,
(The distinguished baritone of Abbey, Schoeffel & Grau's Opera Co.)
Mr. CARL BAERMANN,
Mr. CESAR THOMPSON.
(THE FAMOUS BELGIAN VIOLINIST) AND OTHERS.

Season tickets, with reserved seats, for the series of six concerts, $5. Program books, with dscriptive notes on the works to be performed, will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets.

The sale of season tickets will open at the box office, Infantry Hall, MONDAY MORNING, Oct. 15, at 9 o'clock. To secure a fair distribution of seats no more than ten tickets will be sold to one person. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

MUSIC IN PROFUSION.

Course of Symphony Concerts—The Auditorium Concert—Items.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Emil Paur conductor, will give its usual series of six concerts in Infantry hall on Wednesday evenings, Oct. 24, Nov. 14, Dec. 19, Jan. 16, Feb. 20 and March 20.

This organization enters upon its fourteenth season with practically the same magnificent body of artists that has composed its membership for the last three years. The Boston orchestra, by the superiority of its performances, may be said to have placed itself beyond all rivalry; and the series of concerts it offers can not be excelled in any city of the world.

The rehearsals have already begun in Boston, and by the time of the first Providence concert (the date of which is Oct. 24) the orchestra will be in its best form.

Mr. Paur's single season as conductor has given him an acquaintance with the tastes of the public, and has enabled him to arrange programs which in interest and attractiveness are far beyond those of last season.

Among the soloists to be expected are Mme. Julie M. Wyman (who has just returned after a two-years operatic engagement in France), Miss Gertrude Franklin, M. Pol Plancon, the famous baritone of Abbey, Schoeffel & Grau's opera company, Mr. Casar Thomson, the famous Belgian violinist, Mr. Carl Baerman and others.

The sale of season tickets will be held in Infantry hall on Monday, Oct. 15, beginning at 8 o'clock. Circulars, giving programs and complete information, will soon be published.

Auditorium Opening.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, OCTOBER 8, 1894.

Next Saturday night, Oct. 13, the fourteenth series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall will be begun. Mr. Emil Paur remains as conductor, and this is the programme: Overture, "Anacreon," Cherubini; seventh symphony, Beethoven; tambourine-gavotte and chaconne, Gluck; entr'acte "Gwendoline," Chabrier (new); Kaisermarsch, Wagner. There will be the usual public rehearsal on Friday afternoon.

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL.

SUNDAY, OCTOBER 7, 1894.

The Symphony Season.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, which now ranks prominently among the finest organizations of its kind in the world and is the largest and most prosperous as well as the oldest permanent orchestra in America, will shortly begin its 14th season. For more than a decade its concerts have exercised a marked influence on musical progress in America, and it may be justly claimed that it has accomplished more during that time than any other single factor for the advancement of musical culture in this country. The highest standard attainable has been established for these concerts, and the arrangements made for 1894 and '95 show that this standard is to be fully maintained, and bid fair to make this season the most notable in the history of the organization. The orchestra will give its usual series of six concerts in Infantry Hall on Wednesday evenings, Oct. 24, Nov. 14, Dec. 19, Jan. 16, Feb. 20 and March 20. The engagement of 10 new members since last season has, it is believed, strengthened the organization at certain points. The most important change is in the position of first clarinet, which will be filled by Mons. Pourtan, who has lately filled a similar position in the Grand Opera and Symphony Orchestra at Lyons.

The programmes have been arranged with care by Mr. Paur, and cover a wide range of orchestral literature, including some interesting novelties. Among the works to be played are the following: Symphony in D (new), Sgambati; Symphony, "From the New World" (first time), Dvorak; Symphony No. 7, Beethoven; Smyphony in E major, Schubert; Symphony No. 3, Brahms; Overture, "Egmont," Beethoven; Overture, "Hebrides," Mendelssohn; Overture, "Carlo Broski," Auber; Overture, "Carnaval Romain," Berlioz; Tambourin, Gavotte and Chaconne, Gluck; Suite, "L'Arlesienne," Bizet; Hungarian Rhapsody, Liszt; Suite, Monsigny; Danse Macabre, Saint-Saens; Ballet Music, "Damon," Rubinstein.

One of the concerts will be devoted entirely to a Wagner programme, for which some famous vocalists will be specially engaged. Among the solo artists to be expected are Mme. Julie M. Wyman (lately returned from a two years engagement on the operatic stage in France), Miss Gertrude Franklin, Mons. Pol Plancon of Abbey, Schoeffel

CESAR THOMPSON, Th...

& Grau's Grand Opera Company, Mr. Carl Baermann, and Mr. Cesar Thompson, the famous Belgian violin virtuoso. The sale of season tickets will be held at Infantry Hall on Monday, Oct. 15. Circulars giving full particulars will shortly be published.

Boston Transcript

FRIDAY, OCTOBER 12, 1894.

The first concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Music Hall tomorrow night. This is the programme: Overture, "Anacreon," Cherubini; Seventh Symphony, Beethoven; tambourine, gavotte and chaconne, Gluck; entr'acte, "Gwendoline," Chabrier; Kaisermarsch, Wagner.

The Cambridge concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Sanders Theatre on Thursday evenings, Oct. 18, Nov. 8 and 22, Dec. 13, Jan. 3 and 24, Feb. 14, March 7, April 4 and 25. Among the solo artists announced are Mrs. Wyman and Messrs. Davies, Ysaye, MacDowell and Adamowski. The programme for the first concert is as follows: Passacaglia, Bach; overture, "Fidelio," Beethoven; fourth symphony, Brahms; overture, "Roman Carnival," Berlioz. Other works promised are these: Symphonies—seventh and eighth, Beethoven; G major, Haydn; C Major, Schumann; "Italian," Mendelssohn; D major, Sgambati; "From the New World," Dvorak; symphonic poem, Smetana. Overtures—"Magic Flute," Mozart; "Carlo Broschi," Auber; "Hebrides," Mendelssohn; "Genevra," Schumann; "Tragic," Brahms; "Carnival," Dvorak; "Sappho," Goldmark: "The Deluge," Saint Saëns. Suites—one by Lachner; "L'Arlésienne," Bizet. Miscellaneous—Concerto grosso, Handel; entracte, "Rosamunde," Schubert; overture and other partions of "A Midsummer Night's Dream," Mendelssohn; ballet music from "The Demon," Rubinstein; "Seebilder," Paine; variations, Knorr. The sale of season tickets will begin at the University Bookstore, Cambridge, tomorrow morning. A limited number of seats will be reserved for college officers and invited guests.

[24]

SUNDAY HERALD
BOSTON. OCTOBER 7

KNEISEL QUARTET.

The Kneisel quartet, composed of Messrs. Kneisel, Roth, Svecenski and Schroeder, will give eight concerts at Union Hall, 49 Boylston street, on Monday evenings, Oct. 22, Nov. 12, Dec. 10, Dec. 31, Jan. 21, Feb. 18, March 18 and April 8.

Among the works to be included in the programmes are:

Beethoven—(Quartets) Op. 18 B flat.
Op. 74 E flat.
Op. 130 A minor.
Op. 131 B flat.
Op. 132 C sharp minor.
Brahms—Quartet B flat.
Clarinet, Quintet B minor.
Piano quintet, minor.
Mozart—Quartet A major.
Quintet G minor.
Haydn—Quartet E flat.
Quartet G major.
Svendsen—Octet for strings.
Rubinstein—Piano trio.

NOVELTIES.

Sgambati—Quartet D flat major.
Borodine—Quartet D major.
Hans Koessler—Quartet (manuscript).
C. M. Loeffler—Quintet (manuscript).
A. Kahn—Piano trio.
Ed. Schuett—Piano quartet F major.

The sale of season tickets will open at Music Hall on Monday, Oct. 15.

CAMBRIDGE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Emil Paur conductor, will give a series of 10 concerts in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, on Thursday evenings, Oct. 18, Nov. 8, Nov. 22, Dec. 13, Jan. 3, Jan. 24, March 7, April 4 and April 25. This large body of players is heard to the best possible advantage in Sanders Theatre, the fine acoustics of the room adding much to the effectiveness of the performances. Among the soloists to be expected are Mme. Nordica, Mrs. Julie M. Wyman, Messrs. Ben Davies, Ysaye, E. A. MacDowell and T. Adamowski. The programme for the first concert is: Passacaglia, Bach; overture, "Fidelio," Beethoven; symphony in E minor, No. 4, Brahms; overture, "Carneval Romaine," Berlioz. The sale of season tickets will be held at the University bookstore, Cambridge, on Saturday, Oct. 13, beginning at 8 o'clock. A limited number of seats will be reserved for college officers and invited guests.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, OCTOBER 7, 1894.

The rush seats for the second balcony at the Symphony Rehearsal will go on sale at Music Hall, Monday morning.

The first Symphony Concert of this season will be given in Music Hall Oct. 18. The program will include Cherubini's "Anacreon" overture; Beethoven's 7th Symphony; Tambourin, Gavotte and Chaconne, Gluck; Entr'acte "Gwendoline," Chabrier; Wagner's Kaisermarch.

The first of the Kneisel Quartet concerts will be given in Union Hall the 22nd. The program will include quartets by Cherubini, Mozart, and Beethoven.

CAMBRIDGE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Emil Paur, conductor, will give a series of ten concerts in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, on Thursday evenings, Oct. 18, Nov. 8, Nov. 22, Dec. 13, Jan. 3, Jan. 24, Feb. 14, March 7, April 4, and April 25. Among the soloists to be expected are Mrs. Nordica, Mrs. Julie Wyman, Messrs. Ben Davies, Ysaye, E. A. McDowell and T. Adamowski. The program for the first concert will be as follows: Passacaglia, Bach; overture, "Fidelio," Beethoven; Symphony No. 4, Brahms; overture, "Carnaval Romain," Berlioz. The sale of tickets will open at the University Bookstore, Cambridge, Saturday, Oct. 13, and at 8 A. M. A limited number of seats will be reserved for college officers and invited guests.

KNEISEL QUARTET CONCERTS.

The Kneisel Quartet (Messrs. Kneisel, Roth, Svecenski and Schroeder) will give eight concerts in Union Hall, 48 Boylston Street, on Monday evenings, Oct. 22, Nov. 12, Dec. 10, Dec. 31, Jan. 21, Feb. 18, March 18 and April 8. Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, Mrs. Emil Paur, Mr. Ernst Perabo, Mr. Arthur Whiting, Mr. Leon Pourtan and others will appear with the quartet in these concerts. The sale of season tickets will open at Music Hall on Monday, Oct. 15.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, OCT. 7, 1894.

THE CAMBRIDGE CONCERTS.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Mr. Emil Paur will begin the usual series of concerts in Sanders' Theatre, Cambridge, on Thursday evening Oct. 18, to be followed on the dates of Nov. 8 and 22, Dec. 13, Jan. 8 and 24, Feb. 14, March 7, April 4 and 25. These concerts provide the very cream of the Symphony music and the Orchestra yearly meets immense audiences of the most cultivated and distinguished people of Cambridge in addition to the large contingent from the College. Bostonians who find the two Music Hall concerts by the Orchestra insufficient, or for any reason are unable to attend them find the Cambridge concerts both a privilege and enjoyment.

The Tel[illegible]
PROVIDENCE TELEGRAM PUB. CO.
SUNDAY, OCTOBER 7, 1894.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA!

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

FOURTEENTH SEASON 1894-95.

6 GRAND CONCERTS
IN INFANTRY HALL,
WEDNESDAY EVENINGS, OCT. 24, NOV. 14, DEC. 19, JAN. 16, FEB. 20, MAR. 20

SOLO ARTISTS:

Mme. JULIE M. WYMAN,
Miss GERTRUDE FRANKLIN,
Mons. POL PLANCON,
(The distinguished baritone of Abbey, Schoeffel & Grau's Opera Co.)
Mr. CARL BAERMANN,
Mr. CESAR THOMPSON.
(THE FAMOUS BELGIAN VIOLINIST) AND OTHERS.

Season tickets, with reserved seats, for the series of six concerts, $5. Program books, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed, will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets.

The sale of season tickets will open at the box office, Infantry Hall, MONDAY MORNING, Oct. 15, at 9 o'clock. To secure a fair distribution of seats no more than ten tickets will be sold to one person. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

MUSIC IN PROFUSION.

Course of Symphony Concerts—The Auditorium Concert—Items.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Emil Paur conductor, will give its usual series of six concerts in Infantry hall on Wednesday evenings, Oct. 24, Nov. 14, Dec. 19, Jan. 16, Feb. 20 and March 20.

This organization enters upon its fourteenth season with practically the same magnificent body of artists that has composed its membership for the last three years. The Boston orchestra, by the superiority of its performances, may be said to have placed itself beyond all rivalry; and the series of concerts it offers can not be excelled in any city of the world.

The rehearsals have already begun in Boston, and by the time of the first Providence concert (the date of which is Oct. 24) the orchestra will be in its best form.

Mr. Paur's single season as conductor has given him an acquaintance with the tastes of the public, and has enabled him to arrange programs which in interest and attractiveness are far beyond those of last season.

Among the soloists to be expected are Mme. Julie M. Wyman (who has just returned after a two-years operatic engagement in France), Miss Gertrude Franklin, M. Pol Plancon, the famous baritone of Abbey, Schoeffel & Grau's opera company, Mr. Casar Thomson, the famous Belgian violinist, Mr. Carl Baerman and others.

The sale of season tickets will be held in Infantry hall on Monday, Oct. 15, beginning at 8 o'clock. Circulars, giving programs and complete information, will soon be published.

Auditorium Opening.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, OCTOBER 8, 1894.

Next Saturday night, Oct. 13, the fourteenth series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall will be begun. Mr. Emil Paur remains as conductor, and this is the programme: Overture, "Anacreon," Cherubini; seventh symphony, Beethoven; tambourine-gavotte and chaconne, Gluck; entr'acte "Gwendoline," Chabrier (new); Kaisermarsch, Wagner. There will be the usual public rehearsal on Friday afternoon.

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL.

SUNDAY, OCTOBER 7, 1894.

The Symphony Season.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, which now ranks prominently among the finest organizations of its kind in the world and is the largest and most prosperous as well as the oldest permanent orchestra in America, will shortly begin its 14th season. For more than a decade its concerts have exercised a marked influence on musical progress in America, and it may justly claimed that it has accomplished more during that time than any other one factor for the advancement of musical culture in this country. The highest standard attainable has been established for these concerts, and the arrangements made for 1894 and '95 show that this standard is to be fully maintained, and bid fair to make this season the most notable in the history of the organization. The orchestra will give its usual series of six concerts in Infantry Hall on Wednesday evenings, Oct. 24, Nov. 14, Dec. 19, Jan. 16, Feb. 20 and March 20. The engagement of 10 new members since last season has, it is believed, strengthened the organization at certain points. The most important change is in the position of first clarinet, which will be filled by Mons. Pourtan, who has lately filled a similar position in the Grand Opera and Symphony Orchestra at Lyons.

The programmes have been arranged with care by Mr. Paur, and cover a wide range of orchestral literature, including some interesting novelties. Among the works to be played are the following: Symphony in D (new), Sgambati; Symphony, "From the New World" (first time), Dvorak; Symphony No. 7, Beethoven; Smyphony in E major, Schubert; Symphony No. 3, Brahms; Overture, "Egmont," Beethoven; Overture, "Hebrides," Mendelssohn; Overture, "Carlo Broski," Auber; Overture, "Carnaval Romain," Berlioz; Tambourin, Gavotte and Chaconne, Gluck; Suite, "L'Arlesienne," Bizet; Hungarian Rhapsody, Liszt; Suite, Monsigny; Danse Macabre, Saint-Saens; Ballet Music, "Damon," Rubinstein.

One of the concerts will be devoted entirely to a Wagner programme, for which some famous vocalists will be specially engaged. Among the solo artists to be expected are Mme. Julie M. Wyman (lately returned from a two years engagement on the operatic stage in France), Miss Gertrude Franklin, Mons. Pol Plancon of Abbey, Schoeffel

CESAR THOMPSON, T[illegible]

& Grau's Grand Opera Company, Mr. Carl Baermann, and Mr. Cesar Thomson, the famous Belgian violin virtuoso. The sale of season tickets will be held at Infantry Hall on Monday, Oct. 15. Circulars giving full particulars will shortly be published.

Boston Transcript

FRIDAY, OCTOBER 12, 1894.

The first concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Music Hall tomorrow night. This is the programme: Overture, "Anacreon," Cherubini; Seventh Symphony, Beethoven; tambourine, gavotte and chaconne, Gluck; entr'acte, "Gwendoline," Chabrier; Kaisermarsch, Wagner.

The Cambridge concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Sanders Theatre on Thursday evenings, Oct. 18, Nov. 8 and 22, Dec. 13, Jan. 3 and 24, Feb. 14, March 7, April 4 and 25. Among the solo artists announced are Mrs. Wyman and Messrs. Davies, Ysaye, MacDowell and Adamowski. The programme for the first concert is as follows: Passacaglia, Bach; overture, "Fidelio," Beethoven; fourth symphony, Brahms; overture, "Roman Carnival," Berlioz. Other works promised are these: Symphonies—seventh and eighth, Beethoven; G major, Haydn; C, Major, Schumann; "Italian," Mendelssohn; D major, Sgambati; "From the New World," Dvorak; symphonic poem, Smetana. Overtures—"Magic Flute," Mozart; "Carlo Broschi," Auber; "Hebrides," Mendelssohn; "Genevra," Schumann; "Tragic," Brahms; "Carnival," Dvorak; "Sappho," Goldmark; "The Deluge," Saint Saëns. Suites—one by Lachner; "L'Arlésienne," Bizet. Miscellaneous—Concerto grosso, Handel; entracte, "Rosamunde," Schubert; overture and other partions of "A Midsummer Night's Dream," Mendelssohn; ballet music from "The Demon," Rubinstein; "Seebilder," Paine; variations, Knorr. The sale of season tickets will begin at the University Bookstore, Cambridge, tomorrow morning. A limited number of seats will be reserved for college officers and invited guests.

[24]

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, Oct. 13, 1894.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The tenth season of the Kneisel Quartet will begin at Union Hall, 48 Boylston street, Monday evening, October 22, the sale of subscription tickets opening on next Monday morning, October 15, at the box office, Music Hall. As always, the series of concerts offered by this organization will be of the highest artistic merit, the works of Beethoven, Brahms, Mozart, Haydn, Svendsen and Rubinstein being included in the programme for the current season. In addition, novelties are promised by Sgambati, Borodine, Hans Koessler, C. M. Loeffler, A. Kahn and E. D. Schoett. The assisting artists will include Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, Mrs. Emil Paur, Mr. Ernst Perabo, Mr. Arthur Whiting, Mons. Leon Pourtan, and others to be announced, the leading performers being Franz Kneisel, first violin; Otto Roth, second violin; L. Svecenski, viola; Alwin Schroeder, violoncello.

The concerts are announced for the Monday evenings of October 22, November 12, December 10, December 31, January 21, February 18, March 18 and April 8.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA IN CAMBRIDGE.

The ten concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Mr. Emil Paur, will be given as usual this year in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, on Thursday evenings, beginning October 18 and ending April 25. The sale of season tickets opens at the University Bookstore, Cambridge, this Saturday morning at 8 o'clock. Among the works announced are Beethoven's Symphonies No. 7 and 8, and the overture to Fidelio; Haydn's Symphony in G-major; Mendelssohn's Italian Symphony, overture to Mozart's Magic Flute, and Bizet's suite, L'Arlesienne. Professor J. K. Paine represents the American composers with his "Seebilder." One concert will be devoted entirely to a Wagner programme. The solo artists are Mrs. Julie M. Wyman, Mr. Ben Davies, Mr. E. A. MacDowell, Mr. T. Adamowski, Mr. Eugene Ysaye, and others to be announced.

HOME JOURNAL

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 13, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA will give ten concerts in Sanders Theater, Cambridge, this season, on Thursday evenings, October 18, November 8 and 22, December 13, January 3 and 24, February 14, March 7, April 4 and 25. The solo artists are to be Mrs. Julie M. Wyman, Mr. Ben Davies, Mr. E. A. MacDowell, Mr. T. Adamowski, Mr. Eugene Ysaye, and others to be announced. The sale of season tickets opens to-day at the University Bookstore.

.....

One concert will be devoted entirely to a Wagner program, and in the other programs will be included the following works: Symphony No. 7, Beethoven; Symphony No. 8, Beethoven; Symphony in G major, Haydn; Symphony in C major, Schumann; Italian Symphony, Mendelssohn; Symphony in E minor, No. 4, Brahms; Symphony in D (first time), Sgambati; Symphony, "From the New World," Dvorak; Overture, "Fidelio," Beethoven; Overture, "Magic Flute," Mozart; Overture, "Carlo Broski," Auber; Overture, "Hebrides," Mendelssohn; Overture, "Genoveva," Schumann; Overture, "Carnaval Romain," Berlioz; Tragic Overture, Brahms; Overture "Carnaval" (new), Dvorak; Overture, "Sappho" (new), Goldmark; Prelude, "The Deluge," Saint-Saens; Passacaglia, Bach; Concerto Grosso, Handel; Entr'acts Rosamunde, Schubert; Overture, Scherzo, Notturno, and Wedding March from "Midsummer Night's Dream," Mendelssohn; Suite, Lachner; Symphonic Poem, Smetana; Ballet Music, "Daemon," Rubinstein; Suite L'Arlesienne, Bizet; Seebilder, Paine; Variations for Orchestra, Knorr.

....

The Kneisel Quartet's tenth season will begin on Monday evening, Oct. 22, and will consist of eight concerts on Monday evenings at Union Hall. The dates are October 22, November 12, December 10 and 31, January 21, February 18, March 18 and April 8. The quartet, consisting of Franz Kneisel, first violin; Otto Roth, second violin; L. Svecenski, viola; Alwin Schroeder, violoncello, will have the assistance of Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, Mrs. Emil Paur, Mr. Ernst Perabo, Mr. Arthur Whiting, Mons. Leon Pourtan, and others to be announced.

.....

A partial list of the works to be performed is as follows: Beethoven—Quartets: Op. 18, B-flat; Op. 74, E-flat; Op. 130, A minor; Op. 131, B flat; Op. 132, C-sharp minor; Brahms—Quartet, B-flat; Clarinet Quintet, B minor; Piano Quintet, F minor; Mozart—Quartet, A major; Quintet, G minor; Haydn—Quartets: E-flat; G major; Svendsen—Octet for strings; Rubinstein—Piano Trio. Several novelties will also be offered in the following: Sgambati—Quartet, D flat major; Borodine—Quartet, D major; Hans Koessler—Quartet (manuscript); C. M. Loeffler—Quintet (manuscript); A. Kahn—Piano Trio; Ed. Schuett—Piano Quartet, F major. The subscription tickets for the series will go on sale at Music Hall next Monday morning.

.....

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

The Official Paper of the State.

FRIDAY MORNING, OCT. 12, 1894.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The sale of season tickets for the series of ten concerts in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra takes place at the University Bookstore tomorrow (Saturday) morning. These concerts will be given on Thursday evenings, Oct. 18, Nov. 8, Nov. 22, Dec. 13, Jan. 3, Jan. 24, Feb. 14, March 7, April 4 and April 25.

Among the solo artists announced to appear are Mrs. Julie M. Wyman, Mr. Ben Davies, Mr. E. A. MacDavell, Mr. T. Adamowski and Mr. Eugene Ysaye. One of the above concerts will be devoted entirely to a Wagner programme.

Boston Transcript

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 13, 1894.

The Kneisel Quartet—Messrs. Kneisel, Roth, Svecenski and Schroeder—will give eight concerts in Union Hall on Monday evenings, Oct. 22, Nov. 12, Dec. 10 and 31, Jan. 21, Feb. 18, March 18 and April 8. Among the works selected for performance are the following: Beethoven—quartets, op. 18, op. 74, op. 130, op. 131, and op. 132; Brahms—quartet B-flat, clarinet quintet B minor, and piano quintet F minor; Mozart—Quartet A major and quintet G minor; Haydn—quartets, E flat and G major; Svendsen—octet for strings; Rubinstein—piano trio. These novelties will also be given: Quartet, D flat, Sgambati; quartet D major, Borodine; quintet (MS.), C. M. Loeffler; quartet (MS.), Koessler; piano trio, Kahn; piano quartet, Schuett. The list of solo artists includes Mmes. H. H. A. Beach and Emil Paur, and Messrs. Ernst Perabo, Arthur Whiting and Leon Pourtan. Season tickets will be ready at the Music Hall on Monday morning.

This is the programme for the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given in the Music Hall next Saturday night: Overture, "Roman Carnival," Berlioz; symphony, Chadwick, new; ballet music, from "The Demon," Rubinstein. Miss Emma Juch will sing an aria from Dvorak's "The Spectre's Bride," and two songs by Wagner.

Corbett's Herald.

E. A. CORBETT,

174 : Weybosset : Street,

OCTOBER 13, 1894.

Our best people will be glad to learn that the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Emil Paur, conductor, will give six grand concerts in Infantry Hall, on Wednesday evenings, as per announcement elsewhere in this issue, commencing October 24. The excellence of this famous orchestra is too well known to call for any extended comments at this time.

Among the solo artists Manager Ellis has engaged for this season are Miss Julie M. Wyman, Miss Gertrude Franklin, Mons. Pol. Plaucon (the distinguished baritone of Abbey, Schoeffel & Graus Opera Company), Mr. Carl Baermann and Mr. Caesar Thomson, the famous Belgian violinist. Surely a great treat is in store for our people. The sale of season tickets will open at the Box Office, Infantry Hall, Monday morning, at nine o'clock.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, OCT. 14, 1894.

The ten symphony concerts in Sanders theatre, Mr. Emil Paur, conductor, will be given on Thursday evenings, Oct. 18, Nov. 8, Nov. 22, Dec. 13, Jan. 3 and 24, Feb. 14, March 7, April 5 and 25. The sale of tickets will be held at Sever's University book store, on Saturday morning, Oct. 13, at 10 o'clock.

The Boston Symphony orchestra will this season give its New York concerts in the Metropolitan Opera house on Thursday evenings, Nov. 1, Dec. 6, Jan. 10, Feb. 7 and March 14. The soloist at the second of these concerts will be M. Thompson, who will play Goldmark's violin concerto in A minor, and an "Adagio Appassionato," by Max Bruch. M. Ysaye will also appear at one of the New York concerts of this organization.

The News.

DAILY AND WEEKLY.

PROVIDENCE, ... RHODE ISLAND.

BUSINESS OFFICE, 7 Weybosset St.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 13, 1894.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The Famous Boston Organization Will Give Six Concerts Here.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is without a peer in the world as a musical organization. This is the testimony of leading musicians the world over that have come in contact with Boston's pride. Indeed the love that this orchestra has engendered in the hearts of people in this city, New York, Washington and the other big centers makes it almost a national institution. In a couple of weeks this large and prosperous orchestra will begin a series of six concerts in this city and that fact makes glad the hearts of thousands that have been patrons and supporters of the orchestra hereabout for the past 12 years.

MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR.

The orchestra will begin its 14th season in this city, in Infantry Hall, on Wednesday evening, Oct. 24, and the subsequent concerts will be given on the following dates:

Nov. 14, Dec. 19, Jan. 16, Feb. 20 and March 20.

The engagement of 10 new members since last season has, it is believed, strengthened the organization at certain points. The most important change is in the position of first clarinet, which will be filled by Mons. Pourtan, who has lately filled a similar position in the Grand Opera and Symphony Orchestra at Lyons.

The programs have been arranged with care by Conductor Emil Paur, and cover a wide range of orchestral literature, including some interesting novelties. Among the works to be played are the following: Symphony in D (new), Sgambati; symphony, "From the New World" (first time), Dvorak; symphony No. 7, Beethoven; symphony in E major, Schubert; symphony No. 3, Brahms; overture, "Egmont," Beethoven; overture, "Hebrides," Mendelsshon; overture, "Carlo Broski," Auber; overture, "Carnaval Romain," Berlioz; tambourin, govotte and chaconne, Gluck; suite, "L'Arlesienne," Bizet; Hungarian rhapsody, Liszt; suite, Monsigny; Danse Macabre, Saint-Saens; Ballet Music, "Damon," Rubinstein.

One concert will be devoted to a Wagner program for which some famous vocalists have been specially engaged. Among the solo artists to be expected are Mme. Julie M. Wyman (lately returned from a two years' engagement on the operatic stage in France); Miss Gertrude

CESAR THOMSON, TENOR.

Franklin, Mons. Pol Plancon of Abbey, Schoeffel & Grau's Grand Opera Company, Mr. Carl Baerman, and Mr. Cesar Thomson, the famous Belgian violin virtuoso.

The sale of season tickets will be held at Infantry Hall on Monday, Oct. 15.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, OCT. 14.

Symphony Concerts.

Despite the rainy weather, a large audience witnessed the first concert of the Symphony Orchestra—an audience that settled down sedately to serious work, and one that determined to make amends for the frivolities of the past summer season. There was enthusiasm, o course, spontaneous outbursts of applause for favorite artists, Mr. Paur receiving a very generous share; but at heart, it was a critical audience, that loved music better than it loved display, and it was determined that approval should be governed by reason. The members of the orchestra instinctively felt that they were among the judges as well as friends, and for a first night performance their playing was wonderfully smooth, and their discipline was even better than their playing.

The programme for the first concert was:

Cherubini's Overture to Anacreon:
Beethoven's Seventh Symphony;
Gluck's Tambourin, Gavotte and Chaconne;
Chabrier's Prelude to Act II. of "Gwendoline."
Wagner's "The Emperor's March."

The well-known Cherubini overture was played with a fine dash and fire, and with perfect truth of color; the interpretation was both brilliant and effective, a needful amplification, for a large amount is brilliant without being effective, like sky-rockets and pin wheels set off in the daytime. The Beethoven symphony was another fine interpretation; it was large, dignified and graceful, the values were most artistically preserved and grace was never for a moment allowed to sink into prettiness and sentimentality. The faultless manner in which the second movement was played won for it loud applause, while the third movement, perhaps largely on account of its inherant beauty, almost provoked the audience into enthusiasm.

The little dances by Gluck were charming in themselves, and charmingly played, and half their beauty is due to respect for form. It makes little difference Tambourin is, as the programme announces, an old Provencal dance, or that the Gavotte was derived from the Gavots; but the real merit is in having ideas, and then forms into which to put them. Of course it seems cruel to fetter genius, even in such a trivial matter as dances, but it is no new thing that liberty often degenerates into license, and that the artist who is told to "make anything," frequently evils by making nothing, which is the outcome of much of our modern work. It is certain, however, that the Gluck dances are dainty little pieces of fine art work, polished, flawless and like a fine piece of Sevres ware deserving of a special little art alcove of their own. Mr. Paur treated them lovingly, lightly, tenderly, and respectfully and the little jewels flashed with a fine brilliancy that was not weakened even by their closeness to the great Kohinor.

The prelude by Chabrier is an attractive piece of work, but like a large amount of modern work it refuses to give up its meaning even on thoughtful study. It always seems on the point of saying something and then aggravatingly plays the part of sybil to the chilling of interest and the exasperation of reason. It is an invitation to the orchestra to be brilliant, even if it has nothing of value to say; in fact, the composer used the orchestra like Mr. Crummles used his tubs; he has written music for it, and the spectator sees the tubs, and wonders when the play is to begin. Of course the prelude is an introduction to an opera act, and one does not expect much profound meaning; but the aggravation is that the composer deliberately intends to say nothing, and surrounds the vacuum with brilliant and attractive flourishes. He begins at no particular place and goes nowhither. He has the greatest skill in making the finest embroidery for the gown that covers the sawdust stuffed figure; but the question is whether the sawdust is worth it. The thing is small, but it is a sample of larger specimens, and deserves an elaborate label for the sake of the family to which it belongs. Having said so much, it deserves to be added that it is a most favorable specimen of its class; that it has a certain organic beauty of its own, which causes one to regret that it is stuffed only with sawdust.

It is a striking proof of Mr. Paur's all-round talent as a conductor that the noisy Emperor march received full justice at his hands; it was the apotheosis of noise, with a nerve-jarring effect that was a good imitation of sublimity. In the entire evening's work, Mr. Paur demonstrated that he is a conductor of the rarest skill, and that he has drilled his orchestra to a point that is just this side of perfection.

The programme for the second concert is Berlioz's overture, "Carnaval Romain"; Dvorak's Aria from the "Spectre Bride"; Chadwick's Symphony in F (first time); songs from Wagner; Rubinstein's Ballet music "Daemon." The soloist is Emma Juch.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, as in past seasons, will give a series of ten concerts in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, on Thursday evenings, Oct. 18, Nov. 8, Nov. 22, Dec. 13, Jan. 3, Jan. 24, Feb. 14, March 7, April 4 and April 25. The assisting solo artists to appear are Mrs. Julie M. Wyman, Mr. Ben Davies, Mr. E. A. McDowell, Mr. T. Adamowski and Mr. Eugene Ysaye. Season tickets for the series, at $7.50, can now be secured at the University Bookstore Cambridge.

The annual series of concerts by the Kneisel Quartet will be given in Union Hall, 48 Boylston street, on Monday evenings. As in past seasons, there will be eight concerts. The assisting artists announced to appear are Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, Mrs. Emil Paur, Mr. Ernst Perabo, Mr. Arthur Whiting and Mr. Leon Pourtan. The following are among the novelties to be given: Quartet, D-flat major, Sgambati; Quartet, D-major, Borodine; Quartet (manuscript), Hans Koessler; Quintet (manuscript), C. M. Loeffler; Piano Trio, A. Kahn; Piano Quartet, F-major, Ed. Schuett. Season tickets, with reserved seats, $8, on sale at Music Hall to-morrow morning.

Pawtucket Tribune

PAWTUCKET, FRIDAY, OCT. 12, 1894.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give six grand concerts in Infantry Hall, Providence, this season. The first concert will be held Oct. 24. Season tickets are only $5. The sale of seats opens Monday at Infantry Hall.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, Oct. 13, 1894.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The tenth season of the Kneisel Quartet will begin at Union Hall, 48 Boylston street, Monday evening, October 22, the sale of subscription tickets opening on next Monday morning, October 15, at the box office, Music Hall. As always, the series of concerts offered by this organization will be of the highest artistic merit, the works of Beethoven, Brahms, Mozart, Haydn, Svendsen and Rubinstein being included in the programme for the current season. In addition, novelties are promised by Sgambati, Borodine, Hans Koessler, C. M. Loeffler, A. Kahn and E. D. Schoett. The assisting artists will include Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, Mrs. Emil Paur, Mr. Ernst Perabo, Mr. Arthur Whiting, Mons. Leon Pourtan, and others to be announced, the leading performers being Franz Kneisel, first violin; Otto Roth, second violin; L. Svecenski, viola; Alwin Schroeder, violoncello.

The concerts are announced for the Monday evenings of October 22, November 12, December 10, December 31, January 21, February 18, March 18 and April 8.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA IN CAMBRIDGE.

The ten concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Mr. Emil Paur, will be given as usual this year in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, on Thursday evenings, beginning October 18 and ending April 25. The sale of season tickets opens at the University Bookstore, Cambridge, this Saturday morning at 8 o'clock. Among the works announced are Beethoven's Symphonies No. 7 and 8, and the overture to Fidelio; Haydn's Symphony in G-major; Mendelssohn's Italian Symphony, overture to Mozart's Magic Flute, and Bizet's suite, L'Arlesienne. Professor J. K. Paine represents the American composers with his "Seebilder." One concert will be devoted entirely to a Wagner programme. The solo artists are Mrs. Julie M. Wyman, Mr. Ben Davies, Mr. E. A. MacDowell, Mr. T. Adamowski, Mr. Eugene Ysaye, and others to be announced.

HOME JOURNAL

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 13, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA will give ten concerts in Sanders Theater, Cambridge, this season, on Thursday evenings, October 18, November 8 and 22, December 13, January 3 and 24, February 14, March 7, April 4 and 25. The solo artists are to be Mrs. Julie M. Wyman, Mr. Ben Davies, Mr. E. A. MacDowell, Mr. T. Adamowski, Mr. Eugene Ysaye, and others to be announced. The sale of season tickets opens to-day at the University Bookstore.

.....

One concert will be devoted entirely to a Wagner program, and in the other programs will be included the following works: Symphony No. 7, Beethoven; Symphony No. 8, Beethoven; Symphony in G major, Haydn; Symphony in C major, Schumann; Italian Symphony, Mendelssohn; Symphony in E minor, No. 4, Brahms; Symphony in D (first time), Sgambati; Symphony, "From the New World," Dvorak; Overture, "Fidelio," Beethoven; Overture, "Magic Flute," Mozart; Overture, "Carlo Broski," Auber; Overture, "Hebrides," Mendelssohn; Overture, "Genoveva," Schumann; Overture, "Carnaval Romain," Berlioz; Tragic Overture, Brahms; Overture "Carnaval" (new), Dvorak; Overture, "Sappho" (new), Goldmark; Prelude, "The Deluge," Saint-Saens; Passacaglia, Bach; Concerto Grosso, Handel; Entr'acts Rosamunde, Schubert; Overture, Scherzo, Notturno, and Wedding March from "Midsummer Night's Dream," Mendelssohn; Suite, Lachner; Symphonic Poem, Smetana; Ballet Music, "Daemon," Rubinstein; Suite L'Arlesienne, Bizet; Seebilder, Paine; Variations for Orchestra, Knorr.

....

The Kneisel Quartet's tenth season will begin on Monday evening, Oct. 22, and will consist of eight concerts on Monday evenings at Union Hall. The dates are October 22, November 12, December 10 and 31, January 21, February 18, March 18 and April 8. The quartet, consisting of Franz Kneisel, first violin; Otto Roth, second violin; L. Svecenski, viola; Alwin Schroeder, violoncello, will have the assistance of Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, Mrs. Emil Paur, Mr. Ernst Perabo, Mr. Arthur Whiting, Mons. Leon Pourtan, and others to be announced.

.....

A partial list of the works to be performed is as follows: Beethoven—Quartets: Op. 18, B-flat; Op. 74, E-flat; Op. 130, A minor; Op. 131, B flat; Op. 132, C-sharp minor; Brahms—Quartet, B-flat; Clarinet Quintet, B minor; Piano Quintet, F minor; Mozart—Quartet, A major; Quintet, G minor; Haydn—Quartets: E-flat; G major; Svendsen—Octet for strings; Rubinstein—Piano Trio. Several novelties will also be offered in the following: Sgambati—Quartet, D flat major; Borodine—Quartet, D major; Hans Koessler—Quartet (manuscript); C. M. Loeffler—Quintet (manuscript); A. Kahn—Piano Trio; Ed. Schuett—Piano Quartet, F major. The subscription tickets for the series will go on sale at Music Hall next Monday morning.

.....

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

The Official Paper of the State.

FRIDAY MORNING, OCT. 12, 1894.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The sale of season tickets for the series of ten concerts in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra takes place at the University Bookstore tomorrow (Saturday) morning. These concerts will be given on Thursday evenings, Oct. 18, Nov. 8, Nov. 22, Dec. 13, Jan. 3, Jan. 24, Feb. 14, March 7, April 4 and April 25.

Among the solo artists announced to appear are Mrs. Julie M. Wyman, Mr. Ben Davies, Mr. E. A. MacDavell, Mr. T. Adamowski and Mr. Eugene Ysaye. One of the above concerts will be devoted entirely to a Wagner programme.

Boston Transcript

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 13, 1894.

The Kneisel Quartet—Messrs. Kneisel, Roth, Svecenski and Schroeder—will give eight concerts in Union Hall on Monday evenings, Oct. 22, Nov. 12, Dec. 10 and 31, Jan. 21, Feb. 18, March 18 and April 8. Among the works selected for performance are the following: Beethoven—quartets, op. 18, op. 74, op. 130, op. 131, and op. 132; Brahms—quartet B-flat, clarinet quintet B minor, and piano quintet F minor; Mozart—Quartet A major and quintet G minor; Haydn—quartets, E flat and G major; Svendsen—octet for strings; Rubinstein—piano trio. These novelties will also be given: Quartet, D flat, Sgambati; quartet D major, Borodine; quintet (MS.), C. M. Loeffler; quartet (MS.), Koessler; piano trio, Kahn; piano quartet, Schuett. The list of solo artists includes Mmes. H. H. A. Beach and Emil Paur, and Messrs. Ernst Perabo, Arthur Whiting and Leon Pourtan. Season tickets will be ready at the Music Hall on Monday morning.

This is the programme for the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given in the Music Hall next Saturday night: Overture, "Roman Carnival," Berlioz; symphony, Chadwick, new; ballet music, from "The Demon," Rubinstein. Miss Emma Juch will sing an aria from Dvorak's "The Spectre's Bride," and two songs by Wagner.

Corbett's Herald.

E. A. CORBETT,

174 : Weybosset : Street,

OCTOBER 13, 1894.

Our best people will be glad to learn that the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Emil Paur, conductor, will give six grand concerts in Infantry Hall, on Wednesday evenings, as per announcement elsewhere in this issue, commencing October 24. The excellence of this famous orchestra is too well known to call for any extended comments at this time.

Among the solo artists Manager Ellis has engaged for this season are Miss Julie M. Wyman, Miss Gertrude Franklin, Mons. Pol. Plaucon (the distinguished baritone of Abbey, Schoeffel & Graus Opera Company), Mr. Carl Baermann and Mr. Caesar Thomson, the famous Belgian violinist. Surely a great treat is in store for our people. The sale of season tickets will open at the Box Office, Infantry Hall, Monday morning, at nine o'clock.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, OCT. 14, 1894.

The ten symphony concerts in Sanders theatre, Mr. Emil Paur, conductor, will be given on Thursday evenings, Oct. 18, Nov. 8, Nov. 22, Dec. 13, Jan. 3 and 24, Feb. 14, March 7, April 5 and 25. The sale of tickets will be held at Sever's University book store, on Saturday morning, Oct. 13, at 10 o'clock.

The Boston Symphony orchestra will this season give its New York concerts in the Metropolitan Opera house on Thursday evenings, Nov. 1, Dec. 6, Jan. 10, Feb. 7 and March 14. The soloist at the second of these concerts will be M. Thompson, who will play Goldmark's violin concerto in A minor, and an "Adagio Appassionato," by Max Bruch. M. Ysaye will also appear at one of the New York concerts of this organization.

The News.

DAILY AND WEEKLY.

PROVIDENCE, . . . RHODE ISLAND.

BUSINESS OFFICE, 7 Weybosset St.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 13, 1894.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The Famous Boston Organization Will Give Six Concerts Here.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is without a peer in the world as a musical organization. This is the testimony of leading musicians the world over that have come in contact with Boston's pride. Indeed the love that this orchestra has engendered in the hearts of people in this city, New York, Washington and the other big centers makes it almost a national institution. In a couple of weeks this large and prosperous orchestra will begin a series of six concerts in this city and that fact makes glad the hearts of thousands that have been patrons and supporters of the orchestra hereabout for the past 12 years.

MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR.

The orchestra will begin its 14th season in this city, in Infantry Hall, on Wednesday evening, Oct. 24, and the subsequent concerts will be given on the following dates:

Nov. 14, Dec. 19, Jan. 16, Feb. 20 and March 20.

The engagement of 10 new members since last season has, it is believed, strengthened the organization at certain points. The most important change is in the position of first clarinet, which will be filled by Mons. Pourtan, who has lately filled a similar position in the Grand Opera and Symphony Orchestra at Lyons.

The programs have been arranged with care by Conductor Emil Paur, and cover a wide range of orchestral literature, including some interesting novelties. Among the works to be played are the following: Symphony in D (new), Sgambati; symphony, "From the New World" (first time), Dvorak; symphony No. 7, Beethoven; symphony in E major, Schubert; symphony No. 3, Brahms; overture, "Egmont, Beethoven; overture, "Hebrides," Mendelsshon; overture, "Carlo Broski," Auber; overture, "Carnaval Romain," Berlioz; tambourin, gavotte and chaconne, Gluck; suite, "L'Arlesienne," Bizet; Hungarian rhapsody, Liszt; suite, Monsigny; Danse Macabre, Saint-Saens; Ballet Music, "Damon," Rubinstein.

One concert will be devoted to a Wagner program for which some famous vocalists have been specially engaged. Among the solo artists to be expected are Mme. Julie M. Wyman (lately returned from a two years' engagement on the operatic stage in France); Miss Gertrude

CESAR THOMSON, TENOR.

Franklin, Mons. Pol Plancon of Abbey, Schoeffel & Grau's Grand Opera Company, Mr. Carl Baerman, and Mr. Cesar Thomson, the famous Belgian violin virtuoso.

The sale of season tickets will be held at Infantry Hall on Monday, Oct. 15.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, OCT. 14.

Symphony Concerts.

Despite the rainy weather, a large audience witnessed the first concert of the Symphony Orchestra—an audience that settled down sedately to serious work, and one that determined to make amends for the frivolities of the past summer season. There was enthusiasm, o course, spontaneous outbursts of applause for favorite artists, Mr. Paur receiving a very generous share; but at heart, it was a critical audience, that loved music better than it loved display, and it was determined that approval should be governed by reason. The members of the orchestra instinctively felt that they were among the judges as well as friends, and for a first night performance their playing was wonderfully smooth, and their discipline was even better than their playing.

The programme for the first concert was:

Cherubini's Overture to Anacreon:
Beethoven's Seventh Symphony;
Gluck's Tambourin, Gavotte and Chaconne;
Chabrier's Prelude to Act II. of "Gwendoline."
Wagner's "The Emperor's March."

The well-known Cherubini overture was played with a fine dash and fire, and with perfect truth of color; the interpretation was both brilliant and effective, a needful amplification, for a large amount is brilliant without being effective, like sky-rockets and pin wheels set off in the daytime. The Beethoven symphony was another fine interpretation; it was large, dignified and graceful, the values were most artistically preserved and grace was never for a moment allowed to sink into prettiness and sentimentality. The faultless manner in which the second movement was played won for it loud applause, while the third movement, perhaps largely on account of its inherant beauty, almost provoked the audience into enthusiasm.

The little dances by Gluck were charming in themselves, and charmingly played, and half their beauty is due to respect for form. It makes little difference Tambourin is, as the programme announces, an old Provencal dance, or that the Gavotte was derived from the Gavots; but the real merit is in having ideas, and then forms into which to put them. Of course it seems cruel to fetter genius, even in such a trivial matter as dances, but it is no new thing that liberty often degenerates into license, and that the artist who is told to "make anything," frequently evils by making nothing, which is the outcome of much of our modern work. It is certain, however, that the Gluck dances are dainty little pieces of fine art work, polished, flawless and like a fine piece of Sevres ware deserving of a special little art alcove of their own. Mr. Paur treated them lovingly, lightly, tenderly, and respectfully and the little jewels flashed with a fine brilliancy that was not weakened even by their closeness to the great Kohinor.

The prelude by Chabrier is an attractive piece of work, but like a large amount of modern work it refuses to give up its meaning even on thoughtful study. It always seems on the point of saying something and then aggravatingly plays the part of sybil to the chilling of interest and the exasperation of reason. It is an invitation to the orchestra to be brilliant, even if it has nothing of value to say; in fact, the composer used the orchestra like Mr. Crummles used his tubs; he has written music for it, and the spectator sees the tubs, and wonders when the play is to begin. Of course the prelude is an introduction to an opera act, and one does not expect much profound meaning; but the aggravation is that the composer deliberately intends to say nothing, and surrounds the vacuum with brilliant and attractive flourishes. He begins at no particular place and goes nowhither. He has the greatest skill in making the finest embroidery for the gown that covers the sawdust stuffed figure; but the question is whether the sawdust is worth it. The thing is small, but it is a sample of larger specimens, and deserves an elaborate label for the sake of the family to which it belongs. Having said so much, it deserves to be added that it is a most favorable specimen of its class; that it has a certain organic beauty of its own, which causes one to regret that it is stuffed only with sawdust.

It is a striking proof of Mr. Paur's all-round talent as a conductor that the noisy Emperor march received full justice at his hands; it was the apotheosis of noise, with a nerve-jarring effect that was a good imitation of sublimity. In the entire evening's work, Mr. Paur demonstrated that he is a conductor of the rarest skill, and that he has drilled his orchestra to a point that is just this side of perfection.

The programme for the second concert is Berlioz's overture, "Carnaval Romain"; Dvorak's Aria from the "Spectre Bride"; Chadwick's Symphony in F (first time); songs from Wagner; Rubinstein's Ballet music "Daemon." The soloist is Emma Juch.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, as in past seasons, will give a series of ten concerts in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, on Thursday evenings, Oct. 18, Nov. 8, Nov. 22, Dec. 13, Jan. 3, Jan. 24, Feb. 14, March 7, April 4 and April 25. The assisting solo artists to appear are Mrs. Julie M. Wyman, Mr. Ben Davies, Mr. E. A. McDowell, Mr. T. Adamowski and Mr. Eugene Ysaye. Season tickets for the series, at $7.50, can now be secured at the University Bookstore Cambridge.

The annual series of concerts by the Kneisel Quartet will be given in Union Hall, 48 Boylston street, on Monday evenings. As in past seasons, there will be eight concerts. The assisting artists announced to appear are Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, Mrs. Emil Paur, Mr. Ernst Perabo, Mr. Arthur Whiting and Mr. Leon Pourtan. The following are among the novelties to be given: Quartet, D-flat major, Sgambati; Quartet, D-major, Borodine; Quartet (manuscript), Hans Koessler; Quintet (manuscript), C. M. Loeffler; Piano Trio, A. Kahn; Piano Quartet, F-major, Ed. Schuett. Season tickets, with reserved seats, $8, on sale at Music Hall to-morrow morning.

Pawtucket Tribune

PAWTUCKET, FRIDAY, OCT. 12, 1894.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give six grand concerts in Infantry Hall, Providence, this season. The first concert will be held Oct. 24. Season tickets are only $5. The sale of seats opens Monday at Infantry Hall.

[25]

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, OCTOBER 14, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY.

The First Saturday Concert of the Fourteenth Season.

Messrs. Cherubini and Chabrier Enter Arm-in-Arm.

An Evening of Genuine Interest Without a Soloist.

This was the program of the Symphony concert given last evening in Music Hall:

Overture, "Anacreon".....Cherubini
Symphony No. 7.....Beethoven
Tambourin, Gavotte and Chaconne.....Gluck
Prelude to Act II., "Gwendoline".....Chabrier
Kaisermarch.....Wagner

You may wonder at Mr. Paur's choice of the "Anacreon" overture as the opening number of the season; but reflect on what he might have done; he might have chosen Beethoven's "Dedication of the House." Think of this possibility bolstered by tradition, and applaud.

They laughed in Paris 91 years ago this month when Anacreon, voluptuous to excess, so fond of wine that his statue in Athens represented him as one that was drunk and singing, the lover of Bathyllus, addressed his odalisque in a call for drink as "Interesting slave!" They laughed in Vendémiaire of the year XII. at the libretto of this opera-ballet written by Citizen Mendouze, nor could the music of Citizen Cherubini prevail against them. Seven nights they laughed at seeing the old rake, a ridiculous bore, and they hissed and they laughed. Today the overture remains.

Here is no modern musical scene painting. Here is no ruddy, riotous debauch. Love is without passion. There is no suspicion of sensuousness. Lovers and winebibbers are frozen as in Grecian relief. But how clean-cut are the forms. How noble is the artistic repression. What a sense of proportion rules the work. There is no abuse of color, but there is color from beginning to end. This overture may be well likened unto a mural decoration by Puvis de Chavannes. No wonder that when it was first played in London the audience was not content until the piece was twice repeated. No wonder that Castil Blaze wrote 40 years ago that "Anacreon" was the last complete, grand overture in the history of French opera.

⁂

It was a pleasure to hear the ballet music of Gluck, for the inherent beauty of the gavotte, which is, as Champfleury said of Boccherini's music, like a flame-colored ribbon preserved tenderly in an olden rosewood bureau; and also for the associations. The chaconne in the eighteenth century often served to conclude an opera or a ballet. When Gaetan Vestris, the great dancer and tyrant of the Paris Opera, saw a rehearsal of "Iphigenia at Aulis," he was thunderstruck.

There was no chaconne for him, no music for his famous gambades. To him enraged said Gluck, "Did the Greeks know the chaconne?" And Vestris replied, "They had no chaconne. So much the worse for them." Tradition prevailed, and Gluck was politic. Vestris danced, and Gluck added ballet music, although, to use his own homely phrase, he said, "My opera is now so full of music that it stinks."

And in these ballets not only Vestris, but Marie Madeline Guimard danced. This strange woman, at whose feet Archbishops and Bishops knelt as suppliants, this woman of wild and horrid orgies was in the dance a chaste Diana. The distinguishing feature of her art was simplicity. Even when she was of 50 years, so scraggy that she was dubbed "The Skeleton of the Graces," so haggard that she made herself up after her portrait at 20. She entranced by her grace and dignity. There are pictures of her in costume and in attitude, and we wonder when we see them at the admiration of her contemporaries. And yet the woman in the gavotte from "Armide" swayed the audience, as does the simple, haunting tune today.

⁂

The overture to "Anacreon" was played exceedingly well, with breadth, with an accuracy that was never finical, with a spirit that was the stern master of technique. Even greater was the performance of the finale of the symphony. This number is too often a confused and unrhythmic succession of noisy shocks. Under Mr. Paur the "peasants' dance" had a nobility that was almost gigantic, as though the brute joy in mere living under the sun found expression in frantic leaps, in twistings and turnings, in evolutions in which Nature itself shared lustily.

Never was there a forgetfulness of the mighty rhythm. In this finale the rhythm is a delight. The body of the hearer is one pulse that beats with it. In the first movement the rhythm is not so much the swing of Time's pendulum; there is something aggressive in its comparative pettiness. As a rule, it is the allegretto of this symphony that stands out, but last evening the movement that dominated was the finale, which, as I have said, is often a stumbling block to conductors.

⁂

It would seem as though the prelude to the second act of "Gwendoline" must suffer necessarily by being taken from its home, the opera house. It thus loses connection with that which precedes and follows. For this is a prelude, not merely an intermezzo without distinctive meaning. Even the intermezzo in "Cavelleria rusticana" by its cheap simplicity and every-day tunefulness, although it was not composed. I believe, originally for the opera, relieves the hearer, and serves as a contrast to the stormy passion that preceded and the inevitable tragedy that must follow the confession of Santuzza.

The story of "Gwendoline" is told in another column of the Journal. It might well have been told in the program-book, so that the hearer might have known the character of the act to which the music is a prelude.

This prelude is built upon a theme that may be called the Gwendoline motive, the typical melody of the girl that was to be a bride of a night. This theme given out by the clarinet—and nobly played it was—is singularly melancholy and at the same time passionate.

The upward leap from A flat to G natural is as a stab to the heart, and the theme with its harmonies is one of marked originality and character. After an extended intermezzo, the return of the theme is developed in a powerful crescendo, of overwhelming effect. Here, however, it is not a question of form, it is a question of impression, of creating a mood. Tragedy is hinted at by the murky passages of the introduction. There are suggestions of the father's murderous command, but the predominating feature of the prelude is its fervid ex-leaving the question as to pure absolute music, this prelude is of wondrous beauty in the musical stuff and in the treatment of the material. Gorgeous and at the same time fine in instrumentation, radical and daring in harmonic progressions, there is the presence of the soul of the genuine composer, who does not experiment with the orchestra, but uses it as a genius uses speech. Superbly played, the prelude made a profound impression.

⁂

As for the Kaiser march, perhaps the best criticism is that once made by Heinrich Dorn: "I regard this march as a deliberate insult to my Emperor."

⁂

Mr. Paur was received enthusiastically. The new clarinetist and the first bassoon seem valuable acquisitions to the orchestra. Mr. Pourtan, the first clarinet, has a rich and sympathetic tone, and, judging from his work last night, he phrases with masterly skill and poetic feeling. So, too, the tone of the new bassoon player was generous and his playing artistic.

PHILIP HALE.

MUSIC NOTES.

The program of the Symphony concert Oct. 20 will be as follows: Overture, "Carnival Romain," Berlioz; Symphony in F, Chadwick (new); ballet music, "The Demon," Rubenstein. Miss Juch will sing an air from "The Spectre's Bride" and two songs by Wagner.

For other musical news see Page 10.

THE CAMBRIDGE SYMPHONIES.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Paur conductor, will give ten concerts in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, these Thursday evenings: Oct. 18, Nov. 8, 22, Dec. 13, Jan. 3, 24, Feb. 14, March 7, April 4, 25. Among the soloists who will appear are Mrs. Julie Wyman, Messrs. Ben Davies, Ysaye, Adamowski, Mac Dowell. One concert will be devoted entirely to a Wagner program. Among the novelties will be a symphony by Sgambati and overtures by Dvorak and Goldmark. Season tickets are for sale at the University bookstore.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

Eight concerts will be given this season in Union Hall by the Kneisel Quartet. The dates will be Oct. 22, Nov. 12, Dec. 10, 31, Jan. 21, Feb. 18, March 18, April 8. Among those who will assist are: Mrs. Paur, Mrs. Beach, Messrs. Pourtan, Perabo and Whiting. Pieces by Sgambati, Borodine, Koessler, Loeffler, Kahn, Schuett will be played here for the first time. Subscription tickets will be for sale at Music Hall tomorrow at 9 A. M.

The Telegram.

EVENING AND SUNDAY.

SUNDAY, OCTOBER 14, 1894.

The Symphony Concerts.

The sale of season tickets for the series of six concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra opens tomorrow morning at the box office, Infantry hall. The list of soloists is the best yet announced for this city, including such great artists as Mr. Pol Plancon, baritone of the Metropolitan Opera company, New York, a most superb singer; Mr. Cesar Thomson, the noted Belgian violinist, who makes his first visit to this country, and who is easily among the greatest violinists in the world; Mrs. Julie M. Wyman, contralto, fresh from most artistic triumphs in Europe; Miss Gertrude Franklin, soprano, and Mr. Carl Baermann, pianist, the last two great local favorites.

A most noteworthy feature of the first concert is the symphony by Sgambati, which will have its first performance in this country in Providence. Sgambati is a native of Rome, Italy, and is the most noted of the Italian pianists of today, his compositions having received the indorsement of such great masters as Wagner and Liszt. The latter was Sgambati's teacher while sojourning in Rome, and while it is not necessary to enroll Sgambati on the never-ending list of "Liszt's favorite pupils," as a composer he was most warmly praised and encouraged by his famous teacher. The symphony was first performed before the king and queen of Italy at the Quirinal palace in Rome in 1882, and won instant and signal success.

The program for the first concert is as follows: Overture, "Egmont," Beethoven; Aria, Mr. Pol Plancon; symphony, No. 1, opus 16 (new), Sgambati; Aria, Mr. Pol Plancón; ballet music, "Daemon," Rubinstein.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCVI., NO. 106.

SUNDAY, OCTOBER 14, 1894.

FIRST SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Opening Performance of the Season a Great Success.

Brilliant and Enthusiastic Audience—Cordial Welcome to Mr. Paur—The Chabrier Prelude the Most Important Novelty—The Symphony Played Magnificently.

Last evening the first concert of this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given in Music Hall, before a large audience, despite the unfavorable state of the weather. Nearly every seat on the floor and in the balconies was occupied, and much of the available standing room in the side aisles on the floor was filled. The programme was:

Overture, "Anacreon,".....Cherubini
Symphony No. 7, A-major.....Beethoven
Three Ballet Movements.....Gluck
Prelude to Act II., "Gwendoline,"....Chabrier
Kaiser, Marsch.....Wagner

The audiencewas notably brilliant and enthusiastic. Mr. Paur, on his first appearance, was welcomed with a heartiness that was exceptionally spontaneous and cordial. The applause was prolonged and vigorous, and must have convinced him, if such conviction were needed, of the warm friendliness entertained for him by the patrons of these concerts. He was compelled to bow his acknowledgments some three or four times befcre he was permitted to assume his duties of the evening. The personnel of the orchestra remains essentially unchanged. There were some strange faces among the strings, and some two or three more among the wind instruments, the most important of the latter being M. Pourtan, the new first clarinet, who has a beautiful tone, pure, sympathetic and refined, that made itself felt with peculiarly gratifying results in the symphony and in the prelude by Chabrier. Judging by his playing of last night, he will ably and satisfyingly fill a void that has long been experfenced in the orchestra. The playing of this fine body of musicians was of the highest quality throughout, and showed little, if any, trace of the six months' absence from discipline from which the performers had come. The familiar precision, perfection of technique, steadiness and quick, sympathetic response to the slightest sign from the conductor were fully apparent in all the work of the orchestra.

The most important novelty in the programme was the Chabrier prelude. The composer died about a month ago, and the French press was prolific in prose monodies over his death. It claimed that a very great light in art had been extinguished untimely. His music is almost unknown in this country. He was a gifted and an able composer, and was prominent with Lamoreux in obtaining a foothold in France for Wagner's music. It was probably owing to this that his later works became strongly tinged with Wagner, though it never quite lost the characteristic spirit of French musical art. "Gwendoline" is a three-act opera, of which the libretto is by Catulle Mendez. It was first heard in its entiretyat Brussels in 1886, and was not given in Paris until the composer was too far stricken by fatal illness to enjoy the triumph of his work. The selection performed last night overflows with refined fancy and graceful warmth. It is not distinguished by any very marked original individuality, and is haunted throughout by Berlioz, Wagner and Gounod, and might pass at times for a very lofty flight of Massenet. It was wholly in the ultra-modern vein, fascinatingly rich in orchestral color, and striking in its novelty and occasionally the extreme daring of its harmonies. A very brief motive is presented with ingenious and always beautiful variety of effect. There is little of form, as it is pedagogically understood, and the meaning of the music is not invariably clear, though it unmistakably charms the ear and seizes on and holds the interest firmly. It is now sombre, now bright, but unchangingly sensuous. There is variety enough, and to spare, of detached contrasting effects, but as a whole this constant striving for such contracts results in a certain monotonous absence of real contrasts after all. The music shows a full knowledge of and a thorough command over all the resources of modern orchestration, and it has some moments of supreme and searching beauty.

The eminent French critic, Adolphe Jullien, says of him: "M. Chabrier's works show a rare power of combining all the musical material at his disposal, and his 'Espana' is a model in this respect; but in his original compositions a lack of spontaneity is apparent, and his orchestration, though not deficient in variety of coloring, is too thick. He is a gifted composer, but his attachments to various schools show him to be without settled artistic convictions." While it would be scarcely just or even discreet to judge a composer by one work, and that after a first hearing, M. Jullien's criticism seems to apply with singular felicity to the "Gwendoline" prelude. Still, it was well worth the hearing, for its undeniable beauties, and proved edifying as an example of what is characteristic of contemporary French musical art in its higher aspirations. The work was exquisitely played; the wood wind, on which the chief burden fell, acquitting itself with especial fine distinction. The music was received with great favor by the audience, on whom it seemed to make a deep impression, for it won the heartiest applause of the evening.

The three selections from Gluck were also read for the first time at these concerts. One, a "Tambourin" from "Iphigenie en Aulide," is a bright trifle, redolent of the very essence of the era of hair powder and red-heeled shoes, but delightfully fresh and piquant, and, in its graceful trio, of rare beauty. The second, a gavotte from "Armide," has the most perfect flow of dainty melody, refined and appealing in its pretty grace, and naive in its utter simplicity. The other piece was a vigorous chaconne, combined from the "Iphigenie," already named, and from "Orpheus." These pieces always keep in sight the beautiful in art, and sustain the principle of the old masters, that the foundation of art is beauty. All three selections were read in a masterly style by Mr. Paur, and in perfect sympathy with their character. Their performance by the orchestra was flawless.

The "Anacreon" overture, [illegible] question one of the noblest and most perfect works in its class ever written, was given a remarkably fine interpretation. Mr. Paur's reading of it was very flexible, and not quite along conventional lines in respect to the tempo, which was subjected by him to some mutations; but the effect was broad, clear and chaste, and, taken altogether, it is to be doubted if the overture has ever had here a more thoughful, effective and richly colored interpretation than it received on this occasion.

The symphony was dealt with throughout in the most conscientious manner. The reading varied at times from that which has become conventional, but the few liberties taken were fully in accord with the spirit of the music, and gave something more of a pleasing emphasis to it. The first movement was given with a splendid rhythmical swing, and the strings of the orchestra were heard in it at their very best. The symphony was read and played from beginning to end magnificently. It is doubtful if the wood wind was ever heard to finer advantage, especially in the allegretto, while the brass, notably the first trumpet, covered themselves with glory in the finale. This movement was taken at a furious pace, and with a fire that was splendidly sustained. The effect was almost overwhelming. It was a brilliant performance, and the storm of applause into which the audience broke after the closing chord was as appreciative as it was justly called forth. The opening concert was in all things satisfying, and it is not easy to believe that the orchestra can surpass the fine record it has made on the very threshold of the season.

The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "Carnaval Romain," Berloiz; aria, from "The Spectre's Bride," Dvorak; symphony in F (first time), Chadwick; songs with piano (a) Dreams, (b) Cradle Song, Wagner; ballet music, "Daemon," Rubinstein. Mme. Emma Juch is to be the soloist.

The Cambridge concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra, to be given in Sanders Theatre, will begin next Thursday evening. Among the soloists who are to be heard at them are Mrs. Julie M. Wyman, Mr. T. Adamowski, Mr. Ben Davies, Mr. E. A. MacDowell and Mr. Eugene Ysaye. The sale of season tickets is open at the University Bookstore, Cambridge.

The first concert of the 10th season of the Kneisel quartet will be given in Union Hall, on Monday evening, Oct. 22. The assisting artists already engaged for these concerts are Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, Mrs. Emil Paur, M. Ernst Perabo, Mr. Arthur Whiting and M. Leon Pourtan. Subscription tickets, with reserved seats for the series, will be on sale at the box office, Music Hall, tomorrow morning.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, OCT. 14, 1894.

—A first glance over the Music hall Friday afternoon would not have revealed one unoccupied place on floor or balconies, so absolutely packed did the great hall look. Later, however, one could find, more or less scattered, empty seats, but, since the rehearsals began, there has not been such a showing for the first afternoon. It promises well for the most brilliant season so far. Mr Paur had a grand welcome back, and with his hair closely cut and his beard neatly trimmed one scarcely recognized him, the improvement was so great. Indeed, he looked quite Bostonese. Although many of the old-timers were missed from their accustomed seats, because they are still out of town, there were enough of the familiar faces to make one feel at home. Mr Higginson has his seats, as usual, well in the middle of the floor. Just in front of him are the C. P. Curtises and the Lothrop Thorndikes. Mrs John Lowell and family are nearby on the right. In the balconies Dr Russell Sturgis and Dr Sturgis Bigelow, Miss Bigelow and Mrs Templeman Coolidge have the same seats as last year. Mr Harry Wainwright and his sister, Mrs Howe, are in their old seats, and Mr and Mrs Edmund Dwight in theirs near the stage, and the Misses Stackpole's are the same, also near the platform on the floor. The society set, with these few exceptions, are still to come.

[26]

BOSTON POST.
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.
SUNDAY MORNING, OCT. 14, 1894.

THE FIRST NIGHT.

Opening of the Symphony Season of '94.

CONDUCTOR PAUR'S OVATION.

Rain and Umbrellas and a Rain of Plaudits—People Who Were There---Mr. Paur's Hair Cut---Honors of the Night---The Programme.

But she would go to the Symphony last night, if it rained cats and dogs.

And she did.

Boston wore her mackintosh and went in her carriage, for it was the first night of the season, and not even the downpour could dampen the musical enthusiasm of the possessors of Symphony tickets.

There had been a rumor that Mr. Paur had had his hair cut and that Mr. Apthorp had broken into humor in the sacred columns of the Symphony programme.

Hamilton place blossomed with umbrellas before the doors of Music Hall were open. When the two little doors bobbed wide for the entering crowd the two narrow slits of light made long rays into the rainy night and brought in high relief a series of funny little pictures on the possibilities of umbrellas as man traps and workers of woe to women's finery. Nobody thought of pinioning those doors back permanently for the good of the multitude, and snap, bang! how they flew in the face of the public, upset the pose of best bonnets, knocked dignified beavers into cocked hats, tangled up the ribs of silk umbrellas and worried nervous men with a brood of women to house safely.

Rain!

The coachmen snapped at each other from their rubber mufflings, and the twinkling carriage lights crowded up the way, and the fair and their fineries were transported under umbrellas from carriage to lighted shelter with a marvellous accession of despatch when it was close to 8 o'clock, lest the doors be closed on them for the first number.

Flutter and unwrapping and emerging and hurrying down aisles after blue-coated ushers; stir of programmes and rustle of gowns and whispers and soft laughter and "Hush!"

Someone recognized a face here, there—Adamowski, Schroeder—and as each musician came in and took his accustomed place there were little bursts of applause. But Conductor Paur had an ovation.

WELCOME TO PAUR.

Society clapped its hands mightily, and the music critics in the group, left centre, nodded their heads together and smiled a little smile of satisfaction.

Mr. Paur stood up straight and tall and substantial in his evening dress, beside his music stand, which had been trimmed with white and yellow chrysanthemums and green foliage with gallant white satin streamers, and he bowed a bow.

It was the finest sort of a bow, and society acknowledged it with a double round of applause.

Mr. Paur's blonde face beamed, and when he turned it from the audience to lift his baton—

In the ecstatic hush of expectancy of that moment—

In the breathless instant of tiptoeing down aisles and sneaking in by every door at once before the first sweet note closed them to the most desperate "open sesame—"

In that moment when the standees with an eye on vacant seats turned pale and trembled lest the owners arrive betimes—

In the supended animation of all musical Boston hanging on the tip of Mr. Paur's little stick, there came a gentle murmur: "He has cut his hair."

He had.

The baton swept the horizon in a big Spencerian curleycue and—flash of bows and whisper of music, sigh of reeds and shudder of basses, the Symphony season of '94 had opened.

It was Cherubini's "Anacreon."

Mr. Emil Paur arose to the occasion throughout the programme, and the musical critics bobbed heads at each other and clapped hands and looked satisfied.

PEOPLE THERE.

Mrs. "Billy" Apthorp sat up in the first balcony at the right, with her red cloak hung over the rail, and kept time with her pretty head.

Mrs. "Jack" Gardner's place was vacant, for Mrs. "Jack" is in Europe.

Charles Adams, the musician, headed a group of musical enthusiasts. Mr. Woolf's brown hair hung over his coat collar a ride of an inch longer and he looked with an additional tinge of criticism and listened with applaudatory attention. Society was there, literature was there, the man about town was there, the Conservatory of Music girl was there, the pretty girl and the best young man were there, the people who come every year were there in their regular seats, and up in the second balcony was the music-hungry girl who had never been there before, the second edition of the Symphony girl, and all the other interesting folk who couldn't afford a seat nearer terra firma.

And the man from the suburbs who sat all through it and rushed away at the last minute to catch a train that he was sure to miss, exclaimed as he fled, "Grand! Brava!" which in Boston is the only correct expression of musical ecstasy.

God, who went to the first night of the season, even in the rain!

AMY BOISART.

Symphony Orchestra.

A Most Brilliant Opening of the Fourteenth Season.

With a house packed to the doors on a stormy night and with an audience which evinced more than its usual enthusiasm, the fourteenth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was inaugurated in Music Hall last evening. The programme offered was an entertaining and varied one, and comprised the following selections:

Overture to "Anacreon," in D major, op. 241.....Cherubini
Symphony No. 7, in A major, op. 92....Beethoven
Three Ballet Movements.....Gluck
Prelude to Act 2 of "Gwendoline".....Chabrier
Kaiser-Marsch in B-flat major....Wagner

Mr. Paur has slightly rearranged his orchestra with excellent effect. The wooden winds are on the right, the horns are in the centre and the trombones to the left. The result seems to afford a better equalization of the sound, and where last season the centre was at times weak, it is now in keeping with the rest.

Mr. Paur's year of association with his men has developed a far greater control than has ever been attained by any Symphony Orchestra leader, and the members, having learned the swing of his baton, respond promptly and accurately. Seldom if ever before has an opening concert been given with such smoothness and finish, and all the numbers were thoroughly enjoyed.

Cherubini's overture to "Anacreon" opened the programme, a rather popular selection with this and other orchestras, and was rendered in a brilliant manner, the many and elaborate violin passages being especially well handled.

It was in Beethoven's Seventh Symphony that the control of Mr. Paur over his forces was most manifest. This work is a favorite with patrons of these concerts, and it has been many times given here. It is a beautiful and elaborate work, replete with stately rhythmic measures, and developed in masterly style. The second movement, the allegretto in A minor, is particularly pleasing, with its march-like tempo and the rather mournful theme which pervades it.

EMIL PAUR.

Mr. Paur gave a singularly clear and intelligent reading of the whole work. The beauty of the music and the varying moods of the different movements were given a most thoughtful interpretation, and so great was the control over his forces that the body moved to his slightest touch. The audience quickly grasped the exhibition of his skill, and applauded vigorously.

Three ballet movements of Gluck, the first, the Tambourin from Iphigenie en Aulide," being exquisitely dainty. The prelude to the second act of "Gwendoline" brought out some rich orchestral effects and beautiful melody, and the closing number, Wagner's "Emperor's March," displayed some of the resources of the orchestra. The programme was thoroughly pleasing, and formed a most auspicious inaugural.

The programme for the rehearsal next Friday afternoon and the concert next Saturday evening will be as follows:

Overture, "Carnaval Romain".....Berlioz
Aria, from "The Spectre's Bride"..Dvorak
Symphony in F.....Chadwick
(First time.)
Songs with piano.....Wagner
(a) Dreams.
(b) Cradle Song.
Ballet Music, "Daemon".....Rubinstein

The soloist will be Miss Emma Juch.

The Symphony Orchestra will give a series of ten concerts in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, on Thursday evenings, Oct. 18, Nov. 8, Nov. 22, Dec. 13, Jan. 3, Jan. 24, Feb. 14, March 7, April 4 and April 25. The solo artists will be Mrs. Julie M. Wyman, Mr. T. Adamowski, Mr. Ben Davies, Mr. Eugene Ysaye, Mr. E. A. MacDowell and others to be announced.

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, OCT. 14, 1894.

Brilliant Opening of the Symphony Season.

Splendid Performance by Conductor Paur's Orchestra.

The 14th season of the Boston Symphony concerts has opened brilliantly. Friday afternoon and Saturday night multitudes crowded Music hall.

Every seat for the season had long ago been sold, nearly all at substantial premiums, leaving only standing room for purchase by any one who had failed to attend the auction sale of seats.

The gatherings at the opening performances were, as a matter of course, strikingly characteristic of the city's culture. Ever since the beginning of these concerts the symphony assemblages have been acknowledged as ideally characteristic of what Boston is most proud.

In other cities there are numerous occasions when the residents of innermost social circles come forth in brave array, but in Boston the symphony concerts are about the only occasions when they are brought together in large numbers.

Conductor Paur received kindly greetings at both performances. Naturally the cordiality of his reception was more pronounced at the evening concert than at the afternoon rehearsal. The rehearsal audiences are apparently compelled by tradition to be dignified always, and its applause, regardless of the enjoyment conferred, needs be intelligently considered and thoughtfully bestowed. The evening audiences are a trifle more democratic, a wee trifle to be sure, but noteworthy.

Director Paur was himself in the best of spirits, apparently delighted with the world in general, and in particular the audience and the orchestra entire. Indeed, he was almost jolly.

There was none of that serious mien and severe determination of purpose so observable when he made his first appearance on the Music hall platform a year ago; he was now all smiles, content in the knowledge that he had conquered, and that a road of pleasant prospects was before him.

Mr Paur has changed somewhat in appearance during the summer vacation. The long hair and untrammeled beard have been closely cropped, and there is no longer in his manner a suggestion of any of those eccentricities for the display of which musical geniuses are popularly granted license.

When Mr Paur first came here his ability was immediately recognized by a portion of his audience, a portion which, if not the larger, was the more intelligent, but he had to struggle long before winning favor from numerous and socially powerful patrons. His sterling merit and honest endeavors gradually overcame the prejudice consequent upon unnecessary partisan support of a former conductor and before the season ended he had gained a position of general regard equal to that held by any of his predecessors.

He begins another year amid surroundings of bright promise. He has the appreciation of his audience and the respect of his orchestra.

The orchestra was never more efficient than it is today. It is unquestionably the finest band in the world, and it is pleasant to learn that Mr Paur has succeeded in bringing all its members, however important they may be in their own estimation, under satisfactory control.

The first program arranged by Mr Paur promises for the season now beginning considerable pleasure to those of the symphony patrons who delight in the class of music they can understand. For those who find pleasure only in the incomprehensible due provision will doubtless be made, so there seems cause for general congratulation.

Yesterday's program was as follows:

Overture to Anacreon, in D major, op 241,
Luigi Cherubini
Symphony No. 7, in A major, op 92,
Ludwig van Beethoven
Tambourin, gavot and chacone,
Christoph Willibald, Ritter von Gluck
Prelude to act II. of Gwendoline.
Emmanuel Chabrier
The Emperor's March, in B-flat major,
Richard Wagner

That the above selections were welcome to a majority of the audience there is no question. The symphony was given its proper place on the program, and the selections following were of a nature to interest rather than to fatigue, and in consequence an unusually small number of people left their seats before the conclusion of the concert.

Director Paur's reading of the seventh symphony merits cordial commendation. His conception of the composer's intention is evidently different from that of Mr Nikisch, under whose direction the symphony was last performed here.

He interpreted the first movement in a much more vigorous style than did his predecessor, but this treatment detracted not at all from the impressiveness of the work, indeed, the rugged grandeur of the solemn dance motives was given added effect.

The charming second movement was exquisitely performed and the audience applauded heartily. The playing of the wind instruments, so prominent in this movement, was admirable. The graceful passages given to the strings also received delightful interpretation. The brilliant scherzo of the third movement was spiritedly played, but it has been given here with better effect in the past. The boisterous and oddly modulated dance themes of the finale received intelligent treatment from the orchestra.

The seldom-played "Anacreon" overture proved a pleasing offering, and displayed to the best advantage the unequalled resources of the string department of the orchestra.

Of the three Gluck selections the gavot proved the most interesting. The tambourin is a decidedly heavy dance, one that can scarcely be imagined as indulged in by any class of people with a spark of animation in their composition. The chacona proved more enjoyable.

One of the especially enjoyable features of the program was the prelude to Chabrier's opera, "Gwendoline." The work is scored for the full modern orchestra, and is marvelously brilliant in coloring. It is written in the freest manner without apparent endeavor to tell a connected story. There are dainty suggestions of exquisite melodies running through the succession of lovely harmonies and beautiful orchestral ef-played with splendid effect. Another of this thoroughly enjoyable first Symphony concert.

Emma Juch will be the vocal soloist at the second concert, the program of which is announced as follows:

Overture, Carnival Romain.....Berlioz
Aria, from The Spectre's Bride.....Dvorak
Symphony in F.....Chadwick
(First Time.)
Songs with Piano.....Wagner
(a) Dreams. (b) Cradle Song.
Ballet Music, Demon.....Rubinstein

The Boston symphony orchestra will give 10 concerts this season in Sanders, theater on Thursday evenings, Oct 18, Nov 18 and 22, Dec 13, Jan 3 and 24, Feb 14, March 7, April 4 and 25. The solo artists are to be Mrs Julie M. Wyman, Mr Ben Davies, Mr E. A. MacDowell, Mr T. Adamowski, Mr Eugene Ysaye and others to be announced.

The Kneisel quartet's 10th season will begin Oct 22, and will consist of eight concerts on Monday evenings at Union hall. The dates are Oct 22, Nov 12, Dec 10 and 31, Jan 21, Feb 18, March 18 and April 8. The quartet, consisting of Franz Kneisel first violin, Otto Roth second volin, L. Svecenski viola, Alwin Schroeder violoncello, will have the assistance of Mrs H. H. A. Beach, Mrs Emil Paur, Mr Ernst Perabo, Mr Arthur Whiting, Mons Leon Pourtan and others. The sale of seats will begin at Music hall tomorrow morning.

Boston Courier.
SUNDAY MORNING, OCT. 14, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The ridiculous rodomontade printed by some impertinent and injudicious New York papers last winter demanding the deposition of Mr. Paur from the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra received its fitting quietus in the generous and warm-hearted welcome extended to that able and genuine musician and director on his return to the platform of Music Hall, for the first rehearsal and concert of this new season.

Mr. Paur's programme was an excellent one for a first concert, when both audience and orchestra have to resume the habit of mutual attention which has been laid by for half a year, when the orchestra has to get into smooth working order and to assimilate to itself a dozen new members, of whom two are no less important for position and possible influence than the first clarinet and the first bassoon.

Next, as if to cool the air, heated by the fervor of the symphony finale, were placed three short illustrations of Gluck's skill in ballet music—the Tambourin from "Iphigenia in Aulis," the Gavotte from "Armida," and the Ciaconne from "Orpheus." These, although so simple and short, are so pure in style and so suggestive of the spirit of the scenes for which they were purposed, that they did not seem empty, even after Beethoven.

Mr. Paur had promised novelties for his new season, as well as remembrance that other men beside Germans could write music. He began to keep his word by putting in here the prelude to the second act of "Gwendoline," that light opera of the Frenchman, Emmanuel Chabrier, who died only a couple of months ago at the age of fifty-three. This is a charming bit of musical errantry, wandering along in pensive and tender fashion from one soft phrase to another, and displaying a rare art of instrumentation in the choice and combination of the successive votces. The wooden wind—oboe, English horn and clarinet especially—has much to do, and the upper strings, together with the harp, are principally used to bring out some brilliant but passing climax, although the deepest basses are often softly held as a murmurous support to melodies far removed from them. It made a delightful impression.

A standard overture—Cherubini's gay, melodious, fluent and ever intelligible "Anacreon"—began this programme with its full, grave, sonorous chords, its pleasant, placid intermediary phrases, and its spirited allegros.

Then, and so in a good place for freedom from disturbance during its sequence, came the symphony, which was Beethoven's seventh—that whereof he spoke himself as being "one of my best works." This surely needs no description to the Boston musical reader, who must remember its pensive, pulsating allegretto and its rushing scherzo, even if he does not so easily recall its first and last movements, the vivace and the allegro, the former more distinguished for its grace and the latter by its energy, and each thoroughly and typically Beethovenish in its way.

Wagner's tumultuous and noisy "Emperor's March," which has some stateliness in spite of all its clangor, some true brilliancy amid its pyrotechnic flashings, and which at any rate always serves to demonstrate how much noise an orchestra can make, ended the programme.

The severe and steady work of last season had not been forgotten and the men came to their work in unusually good trim. Not only were the violins, on which expectation always depends so much, clear, neat and strong, but the unity of the whole band, as shown in the broad chords and in many unison passages was affirmed. Something of delicacy was lackhere and there, but understanding earnestness prevailed. Of the new bassoon player there was no chance to judge, but in a bit of the Chabrier, the new clarinet stood out with fine tone and even style. And the drummer was modest for once!

The second programme names Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" overture, Rubenstein's "Demon" ballet music and Mr. G. W. Chadwick's new symphony, in F, to be given for the first time. Miss Juch will sing an air from Dvorak's "Spectre's Bride" and two songs (with piano) by Wagner.

HOWARD MALCOLM TICKNOR.

[27]

BOSTON POST.
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.
SUNDAY MORNING, OCT. 14, 1894.

THE FIRST NIGHT.

Opening of the Symphony Season of '94.

CONDUCTOR PAUR'S OVATION.

Rain and Umbrellas and a Rain of Plaudits—People Who Were There---Mr. Paur's Hair Cut---Honors of the Night---The Programme.

But she would go to the Symphony last night, if it rained cats and dogs.

And she did.

Boston wore her mackintosh and went in her carriage, for it was the first night of the season, and not even the downpour could dampen the musical enthusiasm of the possessors of Symphony tickets.

There had been a rumor that Mr. Paur had had his hair cut and that Mr. Apthorp had broken into humor in the sacred columns of the Symphony programme.

Hamilton place blossomed with umbrellas before the doors of Music Hall were open. When the two little doors bobbed wide for the entering crowd the two narrow slits of light made long rays into the rainy night and brought in high relief a series of funny little pictures on the possibilities of umbrellas as man traps and workers of woe to women's finery. Nobody thought of pinioning those doors back permanently for the good of the multitude, and snap, bang! how they flew in the face of the public, upset the pose of best bonnets, knocked dignified beavers into cocked hats, tangled up the ribs of silk umbrellas and worried nervous men with a brood of women to house safely.

Rain!

The coachmen snapped at each other from their rubber mufflings, and the twinkling carriage lights crowded up the way, and the fair and their fineries were transported under umbrellas from carriage to lighted shelter with a marvellous accession of despatch when it was close to 8 o'clock, lest the doors be closed on them for the first number.

Flutter and unwrapping and emerging and hurrying down aisles after blue-coated ushers; stir of programmes and rustle of gowns and whispers and soft laughter and "Hush!"

Someone recognized a face here, there—Adamowski, Schroeder—and as each musician came in and took his accustomed place there were little bursts of applause. But Conductor Paur had an ovation.

WELCOME TO PAUR.

Society clapped its hands mightily, and the music critics in the group, left centre, nodded their heads together and smiled a little smile of satisfaction.

Mr. Paur stood up straight and tall and substantial in his evening dress, beside his music stand, which had been trimmed with white and yellow chrysanthemums and green foliage with gallant white satin streamers, and he bowed a bow.

It was the finest sort of a bow, and society acknowledged it with a double round of applause.

Mr. Paur's blonde face beamed, and when he turned it from the audience to lift his baton—

In the ecstatic hush of expectancy of that moment—

In the breathless instant of tiptoeing down aisles and sneaking in by every door at once before the first sweet note closed them to the most desperate "open sesame—"

In that moment when the standees with an eye on vacant seats turned pale and trembled lest the owners arrive betimes—

In the supended animation of all musical Boston hanging on the tip of Mr. Paur's little stick, there came a gentle murmur: "He has cut his hair."

He had.

The baton swept the horizon in a big Spencerian curleycue and—flash of bows and whisper of music, sigh of reeds and shudder of basses, the Symphony season of '94 had opened.

It was Cherubini's "Anacreon."

Mr. Emil Paur arose to the occasion throughout the programme, and the musical critics bobbed heads at each other and clapped hands and looked satisfied.

PEOPLE THERE.

Mrs. "Billy" Apthorp sat up in the first balcony at the right, with her red cloak hung over the rail, and kept time with her pretty head.

Mrs. "Jack" Gardner's place was vacant, for Mrs. "Jack" is in Europe.

Charles Adams, the musician, headed a group of musical enthusiasts. Mr. Woolf's brown hair hung over his coat collar a trifle of an inch longer and he looked with an additional tinge of criticism and listened with applaudatory attention. Society was there, literature was there, the man about town was there, the Conservatory of Music girl was there, the pretty girl and the best young man were there, the people who come every year were there in their regular seats, and up in the second balcony was the music-hungry soul who had never been there before, the second edition of the Symphony girl, and all the other interesting folk who couldn't afford a seat nearer terra firma.

And the man from the suburbs who stood all through it and rushed away at the last minute to catch a train that he was sure to miss, exclaimed as he fled, "Brava! Brava!" which in Boston is the only really correct expression of musical enthusiasm.

Lucky folk who went to the first night of the Symphony, even in the rain!

AMY ROBSART.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

A Most Brilliant Opening of the Fourteenth Season.

With a house packed to the doors on a stormy night and with an audience which evinced more than its usual enthusiasm, the fourteenth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was inaugurated in Music Hall last evening. The programme offered was an entertaining and varied one, and comprised the following selections:

Overture to "Anacreon," in D major, op. 241.....Cherubini
Symphony No. 7, in A major, op. 92.....Beethoven
Three Ballet Movements.....Gluck
Prelude to Act 2 of "Gwendoline".....Chabrier
Kaiser-Marsch in B-flat major....Wagner

Mr. Paur has slightly rearranged his orchestra with excellent effect. The wooden winds are on the right, the horns are in the centre and the trombones to the left. The result seems to afford a better equalization of the sound, and where last season the centre was at times weak, it is now in keeping with the rest.

Mr. Paur's year of association with his men has developed a far greater control than has ever been attained by any Symphony Orchestra leader, and the members, having learned the swing of his baton, respond promptly and accurately. Seldom if ever before has an opening concert been given with such smoothness and finish, and all the numbers were thoroughly enjoyed.

Cherubini's overture to "Anacreon" opened the programme, a rather popular selection with this and other orchestras, and was rendered in a brilliant manner, the many and elaborate violin passages being especially well handled.

It was in Beethoven's Seventh Symphony that the control of Mr. Paur over his forces was most manifest. This work is a favorite with patrons of these concerts, and it has been many times given here. It is a beautiful and elaborate work, replete with stately rhythmic measures, and developed in masterly style. The second movement, the allegretto in A minor, is particularly pleasing, with its march-like tempo and the rather mournful theme which pervades it.

EMIL PAUR.

Mr. Paur gave a singularly clear and intelligent reading of the whole work. The beauty of the music and the varying moods of the different movements were given a most thoughtful interpretation, and so great was the control over his forces that the body moved to his slightest touch. The audience quickly grasped the exhibition of his skill, and applauded vigorously.

Three ballet movements of Gluck, the first, the Tambourin from Iphigenie en Aulide," being exquisitely dainty. The prelude to the second act of "Gwendoline" brought out some rich orchestral effects and beautiful melody, and the closing number, Wagner's "Emperor's March," displayed some of the resources of the orchestra. The programme was thoroughly pleasing, and formed a most auspicious inaugural.

The programme for the rehearsal next Friday afternoon and the concert next Saturday evening will be as follows:

Overture, "Carnaval Romain".....Berlioz
Aria, from "The Spectre's Bride"..Dvorak
Symphony in F.....Chadwick
(First time.)
Songs with piano.....Wagner
(a) Dreams.
(b) Cradle Song.
Ballet Music, "Daemon".....Rubinstein

The soloist will be Miss Emma Juch.

The Symphony Orchestra will give a series of ten concerts in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, on Thursday evenings, Oct. 18, Nov. 8, Nov. 22, Dec. 13, Jan. 3, Jan. 24, Feb. 14, March 7, April 4 and April 25. The solo artists will be Mrs. Julie M. Wyman, Mr. T. Adamowski, Mr. Ben Davies, Mr. Eugene Ysaye, Mr. E. A. MacDowell and others to be announced.

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, OCT. 14, 1894.

Brilliant Opening of the Symphony Season.

Splendid Performance by Conductor Paur's Orchestra.

The 14th season of the Boston Symphony concerts has opened brilliantly. Friday afternoon and Saturday night multitudes crowded Music hall.

Every seat for the season had long ago been sold, nearly all at substantial premiums, leaving only standing room for purchase by any one who had failed to attend the auction sale of seats.

The gatherings at the opening performances were, as a matter of course, strikingly characteristic of the city's culture. Ever since the beginning of these concerts the symphony assemblages have been acknowledged as ideally characteristic of what Boston is most proud.

In other cities there are numerous occasions when the residents of innermost social circles come forth in brave array, but in Boston the symphony concerts are about the only occasions when they are brought together in large numbers.

Conductor Paur received kindly greetings at both performances. Naturally the cordiality of his reception was more pronounced at the evening concert than at the afternoon rehearsal. The rehearsal audiences are apparently compelled by tradition to be dignified always, and its applause, regardless of the enjoyment conferred, needs be intelligently considered and thoughtfully bestowed.. The evening audiences are a trifle more democratic, a wee trifle to be sure, but noteworthy.

Director Paur was himself in the best of spirits, apparently delighted with the world in general, and in particular the audience and the orchestra entire. Indeed, he was almost jolly.

There was none of that serious mien and severe determination of purpose so observable when he made his first appearance on the Music hall platform a year ago; he was now all smiles, content in the knowledge that he had conquered, and that a road of pleasant prospects was before him.

Mr Paur has changed somewhat in appearance during the summer vacation. The long hair and untrammeled beard have been closely cropped, and there is no longer in his manner a suggestion of any of those eccentricities for the display of which musical geniuses are popularly granted license.

When Mr Paur first came here his ability was immediately recognized by a portion of his audience, a portion which, if not the larger, was the more intelligent, but he had to struggle long before winning favor from numerous and socially powerful patrons. His sterling merit and honest endeavors gradually overcame the prejudice consequent upon unnecessary partisan support of a former conductor and before the season ended he had gained a position of general regard equal to that held by any of his predecessors.

He begins another year amid surroundings of bright promise. He has the appreciation of his audience and the respect of his orchestra.

The orchestra was never more efficient than it is today. It is unquestionably the finest band in the world, and it is pleasant to learn that Mr Paur has succeeded in bringing all its members, however important they may be in their own estimation, under satisfactory control.

The first program arranged by Mr Paur promises for the season now beginning considerable pleasure to those of the symphony patrons who delight in the class of music they can understand. For those who find pleasure only in the incomprehensible due provision will doubtless be made, so there seems cause for general congratulation.

Yesterday's program was as follows:

Overture to Anacreon, in D major, op 241,
Luigi Cherubini
Symphony No. 7, in A major, op 92,
Ludwig van Beethoven
Tambourin, gavot and chacona,
Christoph Willibald, Ritter von Gluck
Prelude to act II. of Gwendoline,
Emmanuel Chabrier
The Emperor's March, in B-flat major,
Richard Wagner

That the above selections were welcome to a majority of the audience there is no question. The symphony was given its proper place on the program, and the selections following were of a nature to interest rather than to fatigue, and in consequence an unusually small number of people left their seats before the conclusion of the conbert.

Director Paur's reading of the seventh symphony merits cordial commendation. His conception of the composer's intention is evidently different from that of Mr Nikisch, under whose direction the symphony was last performed here.

He interpreted the first movement in a much more vigorous style than did his predecessor, but this treatment detracted not at all from the impressiveness of the work, indeed, the rugged grandeur of the solemn dance motives was given added effect.

The charming second movement was exquisitely performed and the audience applauded heartily. The playing of the wind instruments, so prominent in this movement, was admirable. The graceful passages given to the strings also received delightful interpretation. The brilliant scherzo of the third movement was spiritedly played, but it has been given here with better effect in the past.

The boisterous and oddly modulated dance themes of the finale received intelligent treatment from the orchestra.

The seldom-played "Anacreon" overture proved a pleasing offering, and displayed to the best advantage the unequalled resources of the string department of the orchestra.

Of the three Gluck selections the gavot proved the most interesting. The tambourin is a decidedly heavy dance, one that can scarcely be imagined as indulged in by any class of people with a spark of animation in their composition. The chacona proved more enjoyable.

One of the especially enjoyable features of the program was the prelude to Chabrier's opera, "Gwendoline." The work is scored for the full modern orchestra, and is marvelously brilliant in coloring. It is written in the freest manner without apparent endeavor to tell a connected story. There are dainty suggestions of exquisite melodies running through the succession of lovely harmonies and beautiful orchestral ornamentations.

Wagner's stirring "Emperor's March," played with splendid spirit, concluded this thoroughly enjoyable first Symphony concert.

Emma Juch will be the vocal soloist at the second concert, the program of which is announced as follows:

Overture, Carnival Romain.....Berlioz
Aria, from The Spectre's Bride.....Dvorak
Symphony in F.....Chadwick
(First Time.)
Songs with Piano.....Wagner
(a) Dreams. (b) Cradle Song.
Ballet Music, Demon.....Rubinstein

The Boston symphony orchestra will give 10 concerts this season in Sanders, theater on Thursday evenings, Oct 18, Nov 18 and 22, Dec 13, Jan 3 and 24, Feb 14, March 7, April 4 and 25. The solo artists are to be Mrs Julie M. Wyman, Mr Ben Davies, Mr E. A. MacDowell, Mr T. Adamowski, Mr Eugene Ysaye and others to be announced.

The Kneisel quartet's 10th season will begin Oct 22, and will consist of eight concerts on Monday evenings at Union hall. The dates are Oct 22, Nov 12, Dec 10 and 31, Jan 21, Feb 18, March 18 and April 8. The quartet, consisting of Franz Kneisel first violin, Otto Roth second volin, L. Svecenski viola, Alwin Schroeder violoncello, will have the assistance of Mrs H. H. A. Beach, Mrs Emil Paur, Mr Ernst Perabo, Mr Arthur Whiting, Mons Leon Pourtan and others. The sale of seats will begin at Music hall tomorrow morning.

Boston Courier.
SUNDAY MORNING, OCT. 14, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The ridiculous rodomontade printed by some impertinent and injudicious New York papers last winter demanding the deposition of Mr. Paur from the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra received its fitting quietus in the generous and warm-hearted welcome extended to that able and genuine musician and director on his return to the platform of Music Hall, for the first rehearsal and concert of this new season.

Mr. Paur's programme was an excellent one for a first concert, when both audience and orchestra have to resume the habit of mutual attention which has been laid by for half a year, when the orchestra has to get into smooth working order and to assimilate to itself a dozen new members, of whom two are no less important for position and possible influence than the first clarinet and the first bassoon.

Next, as if to cool the air, heated by the fervor of the symphony finale, were placed three short illustrations of Gluck's skill in ballet music—the Tambourin from "Iphigenia in Aulis," the Gavotte from "Armida," and the Ciaconne from "Orpheus." These, although so simple and short, are so pure in style and so suggestive of the spirit of the scenes for which they were purposed, that they did not seem empty, even after Beethoven.

Mr. Paur had promised novelties for his new season, as well as remembrance that other men beside Germans could write music. He began to keep his word by putting in here the prelude to the second act of "Gwendoline," that light opera of the Frenchman, Emmanuel Chabrier, who died only a couple of months ago at the age of fifty-three. This is a charming bit of musical errantry, wandering along in pensive and tender fashion from one soft phrase to another, and displaying a rare art of instrumentation in the choice and combination of the successive votces. The wooden wind—oboe, English horn and clarinet especially—has much to do, and the upper strings, together with the harp, are principally used to bring out some brilliant but passing climax, although the deepest basses are often softly held as a murmurous support to melodies far removed from them. It made a delightful impression.

A standard overture—Cherubini's gay, melodious, fluent and ever intelligible "Anacreon"—began this programme with its full, grave, sonorous chords, its pleasant, placid intermediary phrases, and its spirited allegros.

Then, and so in a good place for freedom from disturbance during its sequence, came the symphony, which was Beethoven's seventh—that whereof he spoke himself as being "one of my best works." This surely needs no description to the Boston musical reader, who must remember its pensive, pulsating allegretto and its rushing scherzo, even if he does not so easily recall its first and last movements, the vivace and the allegro, the former more distinguished for its grace and the latter by its energy, and each thoroughly and typically Beethovenish in its way.

Wagner's tumultuous and noisy "Emperor's March," which has some stateliness in spite of all its clangor, some true brilliancy amid its pyrotechnic flashings, and which at any rate always serves to demonstrate how much noise an orchestra can make, ended the programme.

The severe and steady work of last season had not been forgotten and the men came to their work in unusually good trim. Not only were the violins, on which expectation always depends so much, clear, neat and strong, but the unity of the whole band, as shown in the broad chords and in many unison passages was affirmed. Something of delicacy was lack here and there, but understanding earnestness prevailed. Of the new bassoon player there was no chance to judge, but in a bit of the Chabrier, the new clarinet stood out with fine tone and even style. And the drummer was modest for once!

The second programme names Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" overture, Rubenstein's "Demon" ballet music and Mr. G. W. Chadwick's new symphony, in F, to be given for the first time. Miss Juch will sing an air from Dvorak's "Spectre's Bride" and two songs (with piano) by Wagner.

HOWARD MALCOLM TICKNOR.

[27]

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL.
SUNDAY, OCTOBER 14, 1894.

Winter Music.

A QUESTION of no small moment to a very large part of Providence is "What has the season just entered upon, in store for the music lovers of this city?" It is a question that cannot be answered off hand, for there is more of musical Providence than there once was, and the various circles and departments of musical Providence are each of considerable magnitude, with plans and prospects. And then there are, besides the efforts confined to local talent, concerts or series of concerts by organizations from out of the city that have come to be regarded as a regular thing to be expected, to such an extent that a very important part of the musical population would be grievously disappointed indeed if they were not heard.

In this line come the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. They could not be spared by Providence people. Indeed, it is demanded that the dates shall be known in advance, so that they can be marked up on the calendars as red letter days, and business and social affairs so arranged that these dates shall not be interfered with. This year the usual half-dozen Symphony concerts will take place at Infantry Hall, and the dates settled upon are as follows: Oct. 24, Nov. 14, Dec. 19, Jan. 16, Feb. 20, March 20—each one upon a Wednesday night. It has been decided that one night shall be devoted to Wagner's music, and that during the season a large number of the most celebrated compositions of the masters will be produced, and also that in the list will be Dr. Dvorak's "New World" symphony, that is included in the European programmes this season, but beyond that few details have been given. The organization includes new and talented artists and soloists never before heard in Providence. Among those promised are Cesar Thompson, the celebrated Belgian violinist, who is probably the most noted musician on tour in America this season; Mons. Pol Plancon of Abbey, Schoeffel & Grau's grand opera company; Mme. Julie M. Wyman, Miss Gertrude Franklin and Carl Baerman. A preliminary list of the works expected to be included in this season's series was published in these columns last Sunday. The sale of season tickets for the series of six concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra opens to-morrow morning at Infantry Hall at 9 o'clock. The programme for the first concert is as follows: Overture, "Egmont," Beethoven, aria by M. Pol Plancon; Symphony No. 1 (new), Sgambati, aria by M. Pol Plancon; "Ballet Music," Daemon, Rubenstein.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
MONDAY MORNING, OCT 15, 1894.

NO FALLING OFF.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA IS STILL IN FRONT.

The First Concert Given Last Saturday Night — Ovation for Conductor Paur— Cherubini, Gluck, Chabrier and Wagner Represented on the Programme.

The rain poured down and the electric cars came to a standstill in a mysterious tangle, but Jupiter Pluvius and the West End company combined could not check the successful inauguration of the symphonic season. Music Hall was entirely filled, and a goodly fringe of standing auditors were along the outer aisles, before Mr. Paur came to the conductor's stand on Saturday night. When he appeared a great outburst of applause went up and some time was consumed in repeated bows to the popular welcome. In a few moments this welcome was fully earned, for the very first chords of the overture were so crisp and clear, and the opening theme was delivered with so perfect an ensemble, that one felt immediately that our orchestra had held its own and had not receded from the excellent standard of last season. It may be tersely stated that this technical excellence was kept up throughout the concert; only in the least ambitious numbers, the Gluck Ballet Movements, was there a slight departure from perfect unity, a trifle of unsteadiness of attack and shading, and this probably proceeded from over-confidence, as the numbers were comparatively easy.

Remembering how easy it is to shout "The king is dead, long live the king," how readily past excellences are forgotten in the success of the present. It may still be stated that there has been no first concert in the long symphonic series which has given greater promise than this opening one of Saturday. There was no soloist, and this was well advised, for the initial programme should give us an opportunity to judge of our great musical organization without any extraneous or disturbing influence. The make-up of the programme furthered such an opportunity, for it presented many phases of musical construction and technique. There was the conservatism of Cherubini, the combined intellectuality and emotion of Beethoven, the quaint simplicity of Gluck, the ecstatic vein of Chabrier and the pomp of Wagner, surely sufficient diversity to test the orchestra and its conductor, and to give indices enough for judgment. There were some changes in the placing of the men which seemed to result well; one of these, however, yet remains to be tested; the contrabasses are now massed at the conductor's left hand, extending towards the front of the stage, which is apt to bring them too forcibly in evidence when such works as Beethoven's fourth or fifth symphony are given. The contrabasses sound best when their tone is heard through a mass of more delicate sounds.

A few new faces are in the orchestra, but there was no chance of judging of the value of the recent importations save in the case of the first clarinette, and here one can say emphatically that an element of strength has been added to the orchestra. M. Pourtau gives a full round tone, magnificent in Chalumeau (the deeper register) and not strident even in the highest register, and he also seems to pay due attention to ensemble, not thrusting his part into undue prominence at any time.

Cherubini's "Anacreon" overture began the concert. It is less tuneful than the composer's "Water Carrier" overture, but it is also more dashing and much more free in construction. It contains some good work for the violins, and of course this was well done, for our violins are intrenched in impeccability and may compare with the same department in any orchestra of Europe. There is also some antiphonal work between the horns and oboes, and later, horns and flutes, and this gave a glimpse at the steadiness and artistic finish in these departments with satisfactory results. In short, there is no really weak spot remaining in our orchestra as at present constituted. Beethoven's seventh symphony came next. It may be called the romantic symphony of the nine, just as its companion work, the eighth, is par excellence the humorous symphony. There was a degree of freedom in the reading of the work, a freedom which may be commended, since it never degenerated into license, yet proved that Mr. Paur is not a martinet. There was a good display of this boldness in the transition from the introduction to the chief theme of the Allegro, and the development also gained by the elasticity of tempo which was present. But one must pay especial homage to the clearness which characterized the movement; our audiences may begin to understand musical architecture when all the parts are given in such well-balanced relationship.

The Allegretto is the gem of the whole work. Berlioz for once well applies an English poetical citation to define the character of the brooding which is ever present in this movement:—

"One fatal remembrance, one sorrow that throws
Its black shade alike o'er our joys and our woes."

The movement is also one of the best instances in music of persistent rhythm. This marked rhythm was entirely effective because of the perfect ensemble with which the movement was executed. Beethoven possibly feared that the movement might be taken for a funeral march, when, after various alterations, he settled upon the word "Allegretto" as the indication of the tempo. It ends with a deep-drawn orchestral sigh, precisely as the funeral march of the heroic symphony, but for the rest one could define the distinction between the two by applying the words of Longfellow, for this allegretto

"resembles sorrow only
As the mist resembles rain."

The scherzo is scarcely less effective in a totally different way, and the striking contrast was well executed. The horn passage of the trio (practically a stationary tone with an auxiliary added) is easy to play, yet the player deserves commendation for the careful balance displayed here, since an excess of power often spoils this effect in performance. The repetition of the trio here can scarcely be called an advantage, although Beethoven twice used such repetition (the minuet of the fourth symphony affording the other example, but it promptly led to the introduction of two trios in scherzo, as employed by Schumann. The bold caprice of the end of this movement was excellently rendered. The finale was taken at a slashing pace, possibly a little too fast, but it was not unclear. Its spirited interpretation and the extreme power of some of the louder passages made it seem a new work. The trumpet rang out with a force which was exciting, and the whole movement was fiery in the extreme.

Now followed the dainty Gluck Ballet numbers. It has already been intimated that the ensemble here was not so absolutely perfect as in the more difficult parts of the programme, yet the impression must not be given that there wery any blunders or marked flaws, there was simply a trifling lack of unity of attack occasionally perceptible.

Chabrier's prelude to the second act of "Gwendoline" sounded very much like "Tristan and Isolde" filtered through a Gallic brain. It presented no definite form, yet was very impressive; it gave many "roses and raptures" and "lilies and languors," but did not become cloying or oversaccharine. It worked up to a very broad climax in the manner in which several moderns apotheosize a theme or a figure, and then died away in dejection, also after the modern manner. Yet one felt that the composer had something to say, and said it well and with a thorough mastery of his vehicle of expression. Its performance was magnificent, a triumph especially for the wood-wind, to which instruments much of modern ecstacy is committed.

Now came the final number of this varied programme, in Wagner's "Kaiser Marsch." Wagner's marches are not his greatest bits of orchestration, although they are his loudest, and his ideas do not run very copiously in them; yet the Emperor March is one of the best of the lot, and the introduction of "Ein Feste Burg" ("A Strong Castle is Our Lord") as one of the motives, shows how intelligent the composer was in historical matters. "Ein Feste Burg" was in fact the war-cry of the Reformation; the besieged citizens of Protestant faith sang it in their dire distress, the soldier intoned it as he marched to battle, the martyr made it his death-song as he walked to the stake. It is more thoroughly the voice of Germany of the present than "Die Wacht am Rhein" or that conundrum-song, "What is the German Fatherland?" and it is a thrilling phrase for treatment in the present instance. Wagner's counterpoint to it would scarcely be approved of by an Albrechtsberger, but it is effective nevertheless. Before twenty measures had been played it was evident that the conductor fully intended to carry out the composer's force-marks to the letter. He began about fffff and added a few *f*s more before the end. Wagner himself once said to his brass band in a similar work,—"Gentlemen, you are not blowing out candles!" The brasses blew on this occasion till their lips must have bled and their lungs cracked. Mr. Paur fully carried out the injunction of the Psalmist,—"Play skilfully and with a loud noise." If the German emperor ever heard this march, then his mysterious ear troubles are accounted for.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

BOSTON HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCVI., NO. 107.
MONDAY, OCTOBER 15, 1894.

The first Symphony concert of the season opened the heavenly reservoirs and flooded the town with the wettest rain it had had for many a day. It rained vehemently, with malice prepense, and Boston, true to itself, didn't mind a bit, but, arrayed in mackintosh and umbrella, went forth to enjoy itself of a Saturday night as of yore. A wild snarl of cabs and herdics and hacks tore in and out of Hamilton place and Winter street, and the electrics stood in dense repose the length of Tremont mall to the Granary burying ground, while the crowds swam out like O'Grady to the sidewalk, unable to wait the block's good pleasure. Such a night as it was! Eventually everybody arrived, but the magnificent overture had been played before half the holders of floor seats reached them. The unmanageable element does complicate the West End system terribly, and if all Symphony nights are to be so "dem'd moist and unpleasant," patrons must start for Music Hall early in the afternoon.

There is to be no diminution in the patronage of these concerts, if Saturday's audience is a guarantee of the coming season. Many new faces among the familiars were observed, and to say that representative men and women were conspicuous is to put it mildly, for is not Boston's flower sure to flourish at these choicest musical symposiums? If you wish to know the sort of people who really love music here, only look at those who stand during a whole concert; note their absorbed expression and their unflinching courage in enduring fatigue; is there any make-believe in their enjoyment of the orchestra, and do they not represent the musical taste of the city in a higher degree than the pleasure loving season ticket holder?

No public gathering in the entertainment line brings out so many good looking citizens as the Symphony concerts. Boston men may not put on so much style as some of their neighbors, but taken in the concrete, from a bird's eye point of view the majority of them are imposing! If it would not bring a blush to the cheek of some of these "belles" their names should be written out in full, but knowing how modestly sensitive the true Bostonian always is, how afraid of being made conspicuous, we refrain. Suffice it, that a good deal of the "effect" of Symphony concert audience, is due to the masculine element.

Mr. Paur had on a well-fitting dress suit, which did credit to some Boston tailor, and a fine hair-cut. The changes became his honest, musicianly individuality well.

Shoot the drummer! What an energetic chap he is, and how he does pound the very dickens out of those pig skins. No member of the orchestra works harder for his money, but if he has little discretion, he is one of the least self-conscious players of the 60. There he stands the entire evening silhouetted on the old rose back ground, with Beethoven towering above him. Sometimes I have expected and half hoped the Master would swoop down and put an extinguisher on his disciple. But no! the drum goes on forever, and, then, Beethoven was deaf.

---

[28]

...ston Symphony Orchestra.

...programme of the first symphony con-... given in the Music Hall last Saturday even-... was as follows:

...herubini: Overture to "Anacréon," in D major, opus 24.
...eethoven: Symphony No. 7, in A major, opus 92.
...luck: Tambourin, Gavotte and Chaconne.
...abrier: Prelude to Act II. of "Gwendoline."
...agner: Kaiser-Marsch.

If our somewhat over-full musical seasons tend to give one a sensation of tone-plethora as they draw toward their end, in early spring each year, and make one not disinclined to add his name to the list of "people who hate music," for the time being, this feeling of musical surfeit wears off with the summer's vacation; the appetite with which one goes to, and the gusto with which one enjoys, the first symphony concert in the autumn is wholly normal; and exhibits no traces of previous indigestion. And, such being one's musical appetite, no better dish could be chosen as soup to the first feast than Cherubini's overture to "Anacréon." Lovers of the grandiose and strenuous may carp at this "Anacréon" overture as old-fashioned and out-of-date; even classicists have sneered at its incomplete form, arising from a singular paucity of thematic material—for the Allegro of the overture has but one single real theme, and the full overture form demands at least three. But say what you please about the shortcomings of this "Anacréon," the work is none the less full of true genius and shows the master hand on every page. It is light music, if you will; but its lightness is not that of emptiness. How every note tells! How every phrase falls into its place as if it, and nothing else, would fit there! And what a magical charm there is in that one theme and its working-out, not to speak of the sparkling counter-theme with which the violins surround it, as with a halo of eternal laughter and brightness! How some of those horn-like passages a due in the wind instruments recall Mozart! If not great music it is thoroughly healthy and pure music, such as none but a great man could have written. It was capitally played, the violins distinguishing themselves as of yore, and did just what the first dish of a banquet should do—put one into tiptop humor and whetted the appetite for more.

And there could have been no better "more" than Beethoven's A major symphony. One does not care to criticise the performance at a first concert of the season too sharply; the orchestra have just come together and have not got well into the traces again; it is almost impossible that some few things should not be a little at sixes and sevens. Still, the performance, if not ideal, was for the most part a fine one, especially in the last two movements. The wonderful Scherzo went particularly well, with good precision, admirable spirit and magnetic effectiveness; Mr. Paur's tempo in the Trio was especially good: "assai meno presto," as indicated in the score. With his tempo in the Vivace of the first movement we cannot agree so well; we have more than once expressed our dislike for applying the modern "slow allegro"—what might not inaptly be called the "Brahms" allegro—to Beethoven's quick movements; we do not think this sort of thing fits Beethoven until you come to some movements in the later string quartets; we can now recall no movement in his symphonies, not even the first movement in the Ninth, in which it seems to us really in place. We would by no means have the Vivace of the Seventh Symphony turned into a headlong scramble; but there surely ought to be no sensation of holding back!

The three ballet movements from Gluck's operas were, one and all, delightful. They were taken from one of the orchestral suites that F. A. Gevaert of Brussels put together with dance pieces from the operas of Lully, Gluck, and Rameau. The first was a Tambourin from "Iphigénie en Aulide;" the second, a Gavotte from "Armide," and the third, a Chaconne, the two parts of which were taken respectively from "Iphigénie en Aulide" and "Orphée"—though we think Mr. Paur must have omitted one of these parts; which one we do not know. This music, if unmistakably a little "old," is still free from wrinkles and retains all its pristine charm; it was capitally played and produced an effect to which we should have supposed the audience would have been more generally susceptible than it showed itself. The three numbers deserved more and heartier applause than they got.

This was, we believe, the first time anything by Chabrier had been played in Boston—certainly, at the symphony concerts. It was, no doubt, put on the programme out of respect to the composer's memory; he died on the 15th of last September. How fair an example of Chabrier's talent this prelude to the second act of "Gwendoline" is, we do not know. Some few years ago, we heard the overture to the same opera played two or three times in France, and marked it in our memory as the most absolutely inane composition we had ever heard. The prelude to the second act is, however, in a totally different vein; yet one can very well imagine its having been written by the same man. Excepting some exceedingly rare geniuses of the first water, like Franz Schubert, for instance, "self-taught" composers do not, as a rule, come to much; and, even in Schubert's case, no rational admirer of his genius can help lamenting that he did not go through a course of better and stricter schooling—he would have got nothing but good from it! With Chabrier, on the other hand, one almost trembles to think of the amount of schooling that would have been needed, not merely to develop in him a stout musical technique, but to give him a realizing sense of the essential character and limits of the art of music itself. It is well known that Chabrier did a good deal of work helping Lamoureux mount the first two acts of Wagner's "Tristan" at the Château d'Eau in Paris in 1884-85; and it may be surmised that the influence of this great work of Wagner's upon him was none of the best—that the magic draught was somewhat too strong, and went to his head, more in the way of intoxication than of healthful stimulation. It is not every head that can carry the wine of the gods with impunity. One can see at half a glance that this prelude to the second act of "Gwendoline" was inspired by the prelude to "Tristan;" not that there is anything of imitation (servile or otherwise) in it, but that Chabrier's work would never have sprung into being without Wagner's. We owe it to being not a little sur... our experience with the overture. ...of beauty there is in this prelude: ...boldness of melodic ...some, and above little distinction

...example, one can ...why a man who had mastered the ...handling of musical notation and made him-...self familiar with the modern orchestra, ...should not be able to reel off that sort of thing by ...the yard, rod, furlong, and mile without suffer-...ing much loss of brain-tissue. Organist after ...organist will do it by the hour together, in the ...way of extemporising, without any worse re-...sult (to himself) than winning a healthy appe-...tite for dinner thereby. We have read the ...score carefully, and heard the performance; ...well, considering the work from a purely musi-...cal point of view, we can see nothing in it but ...that it is one of those seeds, scattered far and ...wide by the prelude to "Tristan," that have ...found congenial soil in many an ambitious ...young composer's brain, and sprouted—in his ...portfolio. This one has got beyond the port-...folio; that is all the difference. Still there is ...undeniably something in the work that catches ...the attention and pleases the fancy. For ...one thing, one finds a certain genuine-...ness of feeling by it,—ill expressed, or only ...half-expressed, but still genuine and un-...forced. The music is not unpleasant to ...listen to: far from that! Only it gives one an ...oppressive sense of incompleteness somewhere; ...the "part of Hamlet" seems somehow to have ...been left out; it all sounds as if it were meant ...to be the accompaniment to something that is ...not there. One can imagine its being absolute-...ly entrancing as a vague accompaniment to ...something sensuously beautiful to look at, to ...supply an atmosphere of, to be sure rather in-...determinate, emotion for some visual pleasure ...—not for a dramatic action, nor anything of ...that sort, but for something wholly sensuous, ...like, say, distant fire-works, or that wonderful ...prismatic fountain that used to sparkle in ...many-colored light on the Boston Theatre stage ...in the old "Black Crook" days. Such music ...would add the thrill of emotion to one's enjoy-...ment of a sight like that; it is rather like a ...good deal of Swinburne's verse: full of true ...warmth and glowing with the most gorgeous ...and sensuous color, but of no easily discovera-...ble meaning. The performance was exceed-...ingly fine, and showed the beautiful tone and ...phrasing of our new first clarinet to excellent ...advantage.

Wagner's grand Kaiser-Marsch was, upon the whole, better played than we have yet heard it. The doubling and trebling of the snare-drum part, for one thing, was a happy idea. Berlioz once said of the snare-drum that it was distinctly one of those instruments that produce their true effect only in masses; "a single snare-drum only makes a noise; twenty snare-drums together produce a grand and imposing sonority!" In a composition like the Kaiser-Marsch, three snare-drums are far better than one; only one should be not unmindful of this, that between four walls and a roof the three should not be played too loud. Some of those grand crescendo rolls chanced to be immensely impressive; but the separate rhythmic taps were often terribly noisy. Nothing can better add volume of tone to powerful orchestration than the sustained roar of instruments of percussion,—we had some experience of that last year with the bells and drums in Tschaikowsky's "1812,"—but it is dangerous to bring the whole force of a large mass of such instruments into intermittent contrast with even the most sonorous scoring. Contrasted with the mighty drum-beats in the grand peroration of the march, even Wagner's tremendous orchestra sounded like a mere string-quartet whenever the drums were silent for a measure or so! The idea of having three snare-drums was, in itself, an admirable one; but it was over done. For another point, we must say that, for our own personal taste, we have always heard this march played too slow; we cannot believe that Wagner meant so slow a tempo by "allegro maestoso." There is not a little monotony in the Kaiser-Marsch, the second theme is a thought vague in melodic outline, and its working-out lacks something of that decision of purpose one finds in some other similar movements by Wagner; there is comparatively little modulation in the work. What is most needed to "hold the music together" and give it constant life and vitality, is the most unmistakable rhythmic pregnancy and decision in performance. We would have a lively tempo, few, if any, retards, and the most vital vigor of accent. Without these the march cannot but drag and seem vague and tedious at times. Still, as we have said, this performance was the best we have yet heard, though it fell somewhat short of being ideally fine.

The next programme is: Berlioz, overture, "Le Carnaval Romain;" Dvorak, aria, "Once did I call a lover mine," from "The Spectre's Bride;" G. W. Chadwick, symphony No. 3, in F major (new); Wagner, songs with pianoforte: "Dreams," and Cradle Song; Rubinstein, ballet-music from "Der Dämon." Miss Emma Juch will be the singer.

Philadelphia Abend-Post.

Dienstag, 16. Oktober 1894.

Boston Symphonie Orchester. Dieses berühmte Orchester wird während dieser Saison, wie aus einer Anzeige in einer andern Spalte d. Bl. hervorgeht, fünf Symphonie-Konzerte unter Mitwirkung von prominenten Solisten veranstalten. Herr Emil Paur ist auch jetzt der Dirigent des Orchesters. Unter den Solisten sind Mrs. Julie M. Wyman, (Sopran,) Miß Adele aus der Ohe (Piano), Mr. E. Ysaye (Violine) und andere mehr. Dem Letzteren, der erst kürzlich herüber gekommen ist und dem ein sehr vortheilhafter Ruf vorausgeht, ist hier noch nicht gehört worden. Der Verkauf der Subscriptions-Tickets wird am nächsten Montag bei Fisher, No. 1221 Chestnut Str. eröffnet.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 17, 1894.

The first Symphony concert of the fourteenth season was given last evening in Music Hall. By the way, what has become of the "new Music Hall" that was to be the home of the Muse and the ornament of Boston?

The program was as follows:

Overture, "Anacreon".....Cherubini
Symphony No. 7.....Gluck
Tambourin, gavotte and chaconne.....Chabrier
Prelude to Act II. of "Gwendoline".....Wagner
Kaiser March.....

It was not so long ago that I failed to grasp fully the noble beauty of Cherubini's overture. Then the supreme rake seemed lost in a perruke. Or perhaps the wretched libretto of Citizen Mendouze—for the opera was given in the year XII., and Cherubini himself was dubbed a citizen—was chiefly in mind.

Was it Pisistratus, or Philostratus, or Hipparchus who so loved Anacreon that he sent a galley of fifty oars for him, that he might see him daily? Or was the debauchery of the poet exaggerated? He must have had an iron constitution, for he lived to be eighty-five, and then was choked by a grape seed, possibly a euphemism for appendicitis. Whereas, his rival, Amurath IV., "BEING AN EXCESSIVE DRINKER OF WINE AND BURNT BRANDY," found his cup full of dust when he was only thirty-two.

But take the Anacreon of tradition, voluptuous to excess, the lover of Bathyllus, about whom he wrote an extraordinary ode, so passionate for wine that his statue represented him as drunk and singing, and see the sorry figure he cuts in this opera. He would fain drink, he that was used to cups in battalions—to use the phrase of Apuleius—and he calls to his favorite odalisque, "Interesting slave!" I should like to have examined the bumps of Citizen Mendouze.

This overture of Cherubini is no Flemish painting of debauchery. Here is the feeling of a mural decoration by Puvis de Chavannes. Grave statues in an antique gallery pledge each other solemnly. Wooing is in bas relief. But how noble the simplicity and the repression!

The feature of the performance of the Symphony was the intense spirit and the incisive rhythm given to the finale, which movement is often a stumbling block to conductors. My esteemed friend Mr. Apthorp in the program book wrote as follows concerning this movement: "Some have called it a peasants' dance, to which idea others have given a less respectful turn by calling it a dance of boors; to others again the movement has suggested the dance of the Corybantes around the infant Jupiter's cradle. To the present writer it has all the characteristics of a furious peasants' dance, but endowed with an ideal, lofty beauty that makes the Corybantic idea by no means out of place."

I should like to ask Mr. Apthorp just where he gained his information concerning the "ideal, lofty beauty" of the Corybantic dance. Why, the Corybantes "moved with a fury they called divine, celebrated their feasts in beating drums, dancing, leaping and running of every side like Mad folks." Read the Atys of Catullus. Read the strange notes of Messire Gaspar Bachet, Sr. de Meziriac to Ovid's Epistles. It is not necessary to go outside of the English language. Let us summon a few witnesses. Drumond (1649), "Those mad Corybantes." Ash (1775), "Corybantiate—to act the part of the Corybants, who were wont to make many odd noises and gestures.

Cudworth (1642): "True divine zeal is no Corybantic fury."

Huxley (1890): "That form of somewhat corybantic Christianity of which the soldiers of the Salvation Army are the militant missionaries."

Froude (1883): "Christians now howl it out like the Corybantes."

Rowbotham (1887): "And sometimes these performances were nocturnal, and then the priests of Cybele would be there, with their obscene faces and womanish hips; the drums and Phrygian pipes would roar through the lighted rooms, and what deeds were done before the evening ended!"

No, no, Mr. Apthorp, your phrase, "ideal, lofty, beauty," does not fit, but I accept the Corybantic idea in its real sense. Or this movement is the brute joy in existence under the sun, the apotheosis of mere animal vitality.

The old fashioned ballet music of Gluck, with its gavotte of gentle fragrance, brought to the mind the men and women that danced against Gluck's will, as Gaetan Vestries, the Tyrant of the Danse. Look in the "Costumes des Ballets du Roy" (Paris, 1885), and you will find three plates devoted to Marie Madeleine Guimard, as she appeared in the opera ballet, "Zelindor." As this ballet was revived the year before she danced in "Iphigenia at Aulis," we are able to form some idea of her apparition in full glory of petticoat and, again, in costume that leaves small work for the imagination. Yet there is a hint at the dignity of her movement and gesture, for this woman of wild and horrid orgies was in the dance a chaste Diana. If you care to read about her, there is her life by Edmond de Goncourt, that old mole working in cellars full of moldy records, police reports, broken contracts and false and true love letters. But are you not disappointed whenever you finish—or half read a biography by this collector of human documents. He is always a-jogging your elbow, and whispering, "Now I am going to tell you something that is not generally known. Hush!" and then he changes the subject, or drops his voice so that you only hear in part. But the gavotte brings back Guimard, the paradox, the chaste-lubricious idol of her day.

It is questionable devotion to a composer to take such a piece as the prelude to the second act of "Gwendoline" from its home and its surroundings. For this prelude is not a mere intermezzo without definite meaning. A mood must be suggested that has connection with that which has preceded and will follow. As absolute music, however, this prelude is of wondrous beauty in stuff and in treatment. Gorgeous and at the same time fine in instrumentation, radical and daring in harmonic progressions, there is the revelation of the soul of the genuine composer, who does not experiment with the orchestra, but uses it as an Elizabethan used speech. And oh! the song of "Gwendoline," the clarinet tune with that unexpected note that stabs the heart.

The new clarinet player, Mr. Pourtan, is a valuable acquisition. His tone is rich, mellow, sympathetic; and he phrases, so far as one can judge from a single hearing, with masterly skill and poetic feeling. So, too, the tone of the new bassoon player seems generous and his playing artistic.

* * *

The Hebrew Journal.

124 EAST 14th STREET,
Opposite the Academy of Music. NEW YORK

OCTOBER 19, 1894. TISHRI 19

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, whose monthly visits to this city are attractive features of each musical season, will give its concerts this year in the Metropolitan Opera House on Thursday evenings, November 1st December 6th, January 10th, February 7th, and March 14th. It enters upon its fourteenth year with a body of players that can hardly be equaled for individual ability, the result of constant selection and improvement in its membership since 1881. It numbers eighty-seven musicians, and will appear with its full complement of players at each of the five concerts. The highest standard attainable has been established for these concerts, and the arrangements for the coming season give assurance that this standard will be fully maintained. The list of solo artists includes Mme. Nordica, Mr. Pol Plancon, Mr. César Thomson, and others to be announced.

Philadelphia Abend-Post.

Published every evening, except Sunday, by
The Post Printing and Publishing Co.
Limited.
R. Friedlander.....President
406 NORTH FOURTH STREET
Served to Subscribers at 10 cents per week, $5 per annum.

Donnerstag, 18. Oktober 1894.

Boston Symphonie Orchester. Dieses berühmte Orchester wird während dieser Saison, wie aus einer Anzeige in einer andern Spalte d. Bl. hervorgeht, fünf Symphonie-Konzerte unter Mitwirkung von prominenten Solisten veranstalten. Herr Emil Paur ist auch jetzt der Dirigent des Orchesters. Unter den Solisten sind Mrs. Julie M. Wyman, (Sopran,) Miß Adele aus der Ohe (Piano), Mr. E. Ysaye (Violine) und andere mehr. Dem Letzteren, der erst kürzlich herüber gekommen ist und dem ein sehr vortheilhafter Ruf vorausgeht, ist hier noch nicht gehört worden. Der Verkauf der Subscriptions-Tickets wird am nächsten Montag bei Fisher, No. 1221 Chestnut Str. eröffnet.

Boston Transcript

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 20, 1894.

The Kneisel Quartet will give concerts in Union Hall on Monday evenings, Oct. 22, Nov. 12, Dec. 10 and 31, Jan. 21, Feb. 18, March 18 and April 8. This is the programme for next Monday night: Haydn, quartet, G major, op. 77, No. 2; Sgambati, quartet, D-flat major, op. 17, first time; Mozart, quintet, G minor. Other works selected for the season are the following: Beethoven, quartets, op. 18, op. 74, op. 130, op. 131 and op. 132; Brahms, quartet B-flat, clarinet quintet B minor, and piano quintet F minor; Mozart, quartet A major; Haydn, quartet E-flat; Svendsen, octet for strings, Rubinstein, piano trio. These novelties will also be given: Quartet D major, Borodine; quintet (MS.), C. M. Loeffler; quartet (MS.), Koessle; piano trio, Kahn; piano quartet, Schuett. The list of solo artists includes Mmes. H. H. A. Beach and Emil Paur, and Messrs. Ernst Perabo, Arthur Whiting and Leon Pourtan. Tickets at Music Hall.

The programme for the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Music Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday night is made up of the Schubert's unfinished symphony, Schumann's symphony in C major and Beethoven's concerto in E-flat major, with Mr. Baermann at the pianoforte.

[29]

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, OCTOBER 16, 1894.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the first symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Cherubini: Overture to "Anacréon," in D major, opus 241.
Beethoven: Symphony No. 7, in A major, opus 92.
Gluck: Tambourin, Gavotte and Chaconne.
Chabrier: Prelude to Act II. of "Gwendoline."
Wag er: Kaiser-Marsch.

If our somewhat over-full musical seasons tend to give one a sensation of tone-plethora as they draw toward their end, in early spring each year, and make one not disinclined to add his name to the list of "people who hate music," for the time being, this feeling of musical surfeit wears off with the summer's vacation; the appetite with which one goes to, and the gusto with which one enjoys, the first symphony concert in the autumn is wholly normal, and exhibits no traces of previous indigestion. And, such being one's musical appetite, no better dish could be chosen as soup to the first feast than Cherubini's overture to "Anacréon." Lovers of the grandiose and strenuous may carp at this "Anacréon" overture as old-fashioned and out-of-date; even classicists have sneered at its incomplete form, arising from a singular paucity of thematic material—for the Allegro of the overture has but one single real theme, and the full overture form demands at least three. But say what you please about the shortcomings of this "Anacréon," the work is none the less full of true genius and shows the master hand on every page. It is light music, if you will; but its lightness is not that of emptiness. How every note tells! How every phrase falls into its place as if it, and nothing else, would fit there! And what a magical charm there is in that one theme and its working-out, not to speak of the sparkling counter-theme with which the violins surround it, as with a halo of eternal laughter and brightness! How some of those horn-like passages a due in the wind instruments recall Mozart! If not great music it is thoroughly healthy and pure music, such as none but a great man could have written. It was capitally played, the violins distinguishing themselves as of yore, and did just what the first dish of a banquet should do—but one into tiptop humor and whetted the appetite for more.

And there could have been no better "more" than Beethoven's A major symphony. One does not care to criticise the performance at a first concert of the season too sharply; the orchestra have just come together and have not got well into the traces again; it is almost impossible that some few things should not be a little at sixes and sevens. Still, the performance, if not ideal, was for the most part a fine one, especially in the last two movements. The wonderful Scherzo went particularly well, with good precision, admirable spirit and magnetic effectiveness; Mr. Paur's tempo in the Trio was especially good: "assai meno presto," as indicated in the score. With his tempo in the Vivace of the first movement we cannot agree so well; we have more than once expressed our dislike for applying the modern "slow allegro"—what might not inaptly be called the "Brahms" allegro—to Beethoven's quick movements; we do not think this sort of thing fits Beethoven until you come to some movements in the later string quartets; we can now recall no movement in his symphonies, not even the first movement in the Ninth, in which it seems to us really in place. We would by no means have the Vivace of the Seventh Symphony turned into a headlong scramble; but there surely ought to be no sensation of holding back!

The three ballet movements from Gluck's operas were, one and all, delightful. They were taken from one of the orchestral suites that F. A. Gevaert of Brussels put together with dance pieces from the operas of Lully, Gluck, and Rameau. The first was a Tambourin from "Iphigénie en Aulide;" the second, a Gavotte from "Armide," and the third, a Chaconne, the two parts of which were taken respectively from "Iphigénie en Aulide" and "Orphée"—though we think Mr. Paur must have omitted one of these parts; which one we do not know. This music, if unmistakably a little "old," is still free from wrinkles and retains all its pristine charm; it was capitally played and produced an effect to which we should have supposed the audience would have been more generally susceptible than it showed itself. The three numbers deserved more and heartier applause than they got.

This was, we believe, the first time anything by Chabrier had been played in Boston—certainly, at the symphony concerts. It was, no doubt, put on the programme out of respect to the composer's memory; he died on the 15th of last September. How fair an example of Chabrier's talent this prelude to the second act of "Gwendoline" is, we do not know. Some few years ago, we heard the overture to the same opera played two or three times in France, and marked it in our memory as the most absolutely terrific composition we had ever heard. The prelude to the second act is, however, in a totally different vein; yet one can very well imagine its having been written by the same man. Excepting some exceedingly rare geniuses of the first water, like Franz Schubert, for instance, "self-taught" composers do not, as a rule, come to much; and, even in Schubert's case, no rational admirer of his genius can help lamenting that he did not go through a course of better and stricter schooling—he would have got nothing but good from it! With Chabrier, on the other hand, one almost trembles to think of the amount of schooling that would have been needed, not merely to develop in him a stout musical technique, but to give him a realizing sense of the essential character and limits of the art of music itself. It is well known that Chabrier did a good deal of work helping Lamoureux mount the first two acts of Wagner's "Tristan" at the Château d'Eau in Paris in 1884-85; and it may be surmised that the influence of this great work of Wagner's upon him was none of the best—that the magic draught was somewhat too strong, and went to his head, more in the way of intoxication than of healthful stimulation. It is not every head that can carry the wine of the gods with impunity! One can see at half a glance that this prelude to the second act of "Gwendoline" was inspired by the prelude to "Tristan;" not that there is anything of imitation (servile or otherwise) in it, but that Chabrier's work would never have sprung into being without Wagner's to sire it. We own to being not a little surprised, after our experience with the overture, at the amount of beauty there is in this prelude; the themes sadly lack definiteness of melodic in any way; given Wagner's example, one cannot see why a man who had mastered the handling of musical notation and made himself familiar with the modern orchestra, should not be able to reel off that sort of thing by the yard, rod, furlong, and mile without suffering much loss of brain-tissue. Organist after organist will do it by the hour together; in the way of extemporising, without any worse result (to himself) than winning a healthy appetite for dinner thereby. We have read the score carefully, and heard the performance; well, considering the work from a purely musical point of view, we can see nothing in it but that it is one of those seeds, scattered far and wide by the prelude to "Tristan," that have found congenial soil in many an ambitious young composer's brain, and sprouted—in his portfolio. This one has got beyond the portfolio; that is all the difference. Still there is undeniably something in the work that catches the attention and pleases the fancy. For one thing, one finds a certain genuineness of feeling by it,—ill expressed, or only half-expressed, but still genuine and unforced. The music is not unpleasant to listen to; far from that! Only it gives one an oppressive sense of incompleteness somewhere; the "part of Hamlet" seems somehow to have been left out; it all sounds as if it were meant to be the accompaniment to something that is not there. One can imagine its being absolutely entrancing as a vague accompaniment to something sensuously beautiful to look at, to supply an atmosphere of, to be sure rather indeterminate, emotion for some visual pleasure—not for a dramatic action, nor anything of that sort, but for something wholly sensuous, like, say, distant fire-works, or that wonderful prismatic fountain that used to sparkle in many-colored light on the Boston Theatre stage in the old "Black Crook" days. Such music would add the thrill of emotion to one's enjoyment of a sight like that; it is rather like a good deal of Swinburne's verse: full of true warmth and glowing with the most gorgeous and sensuous color, but of no easily discoverable meaning. The performance was exceedingly fine, and showed the beautiful tone and phrasing of our new first clarinet to excellent advantage.

Wagner's grand Kaiser-Marsch was, upon the whole, better played than we have yet heard it. The doubling and trebling of the snare-drum part, for one thing, was a happy idea. Berlioz once said of the snare-drum that it was distinctly one of those instruments that produce their true effect only in masses; "a single snare-drum only makes a noise; twenty snare-drums together produce a grand and imposing sonority!" In a composition like the Kaiser-Marsch, three snare-drums are far better than one; only one should be not unmindful of this, that between four walls and a roof the three should not be played too loud. Some of those grand crescendo rolls chanced to be immensely impressive; but the separate rhythmic taps were often terribly noisy. Nothing can better add volume of tone to powerful orchestration than the sustained roar of instruments of percussion,—we had some experience of that last year with the bells and drums in Tschaikowsky's "1812,"—but it is dangerous to bring the whole force of a large mass of such instruments into intermittent contrast with even the most sonorous scoring. Contrasted with the mighty drum-beats in the grand peroration of the march, even Wagner's tremendous orchestra sounded like a mere string-quartet whenever the drums were silent for a measure or so! The idea of having three snare-drums was, in itself, an admirable one; but it was over done. For another point, we must say that, for our own personal taste, we have always heard this march played too slow; we cannot believe that Wagner meant so slow a tempo by "allegro maestoso." There is not a little monotony in the Kaiser-Marsch, the second theme is a thought vague in melodic outline, and its working-out lacks something of that decision of purpose one finds in some other similar movements by Wagner; there is comparatively little modulation in the work. What is most needed to "hold the music together" and give it constant life and vitality, is the most unmistakable rhythmic pregnancy and decision in performance. We would have a lively tempo, few, if any, retards, and the most vital vigor of accent. Without these the march cannot but drag and seem vague and tedious at times. Still, as we have said, this performance was the best we have yet heard, though it fell somewhat short of being ideally fine.

The next programme is: Berlioz, overture, "Le Carnaval Romain;" Dvorak, aria, "Once did I call a lover mine," from "The Spectre's Bride;" G. W. Chadwick, symphony No. 3, in F major (new); Wagner, songs with pianoforte: "Dreams," and Cradle Song; Rubinstein, ballet-music from "Der Dämon." Miss Emma Juch will be the singer.

Philadelphia Abend-Post.

Dienstag, 16. Oktober 1894.

Boston Symphonie Orchester. Dieses berühmte Orchester wird während dieser Saison, wie aus einer Anzeige in einer andern Spalte d. Bl. hervorgeht, fünf Symphonie-Konzerte unter Mitwirkung von prominenten Solisten veranstalten. Herr Emil Paur ist auch jetzt der Dirigent des Orchesters. Unter den Solisten sind Mrs. Julie M. Wyman, (Sopran.) Miß Adele aus der Ohe (Piano), Mr. E. Ysaye (Violine) und andere mehr. Dem Letzteren, der erst kürzlich herüber gekommen ist und dem ein sehr vortheilhafter Ruf vorausgeht, ist hier noch nicht gehört worden. Der Verkauf der Subscriptions-Tickets wird am nächsten Montag bei Fisher, No. 1221 Chestnut Str. eröffnet.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 17, 1894.

The first Symphony concert of the fourteenth season was given last evening in Music Hall. By the way, what has become of the "new Music Hall" that was to be the home of the Muse and the ornament of Boston?

The program was as follows:

Overture, "Anacreon".....Cherubini
Symphony No. 7.....Beethoven
Tambourin, gavotte and chaconne.....Gluck
Prelude to Act II. of "Gwendoline".....Chabrier
Kaiser March.....Wagner

It was not so long ago that I failed to grasp fully the noble beauty of Cherubini's overture. Then the supreme rake seemed lost in a perruke. Or perhaps the wretched libretto of Citizen Mendouze—for the opera was given in the year XII., and Cherubini himself was dubbed a citizen—was chiefly in mind.

Was it Pisistratus, or Philostratus, or Hipparchus who so loved Anacreon that he sent a galley of fifty oars for him, that he might see him daily? Or was the debauchery of the poet exaggerated? He must have had an iron constitution, for he lived to be eighty-five, and then was choked by a grape seed, possibly a euphemism for appendicitis. Whereas, his rival, Amurath IV., "BEING AN EXCESSIVE DRINKER OF WINE AND BURNT BRANDY," found his cup full of dust when he was only thirty-two.

But take the Anacreon of tradition, voluptuous to excess, the lover of Bathyllus, about whom he wrote an extraordinary ode, so passionate for wine that his statue represented him as drunk and singing, and see the sorry figure he cuts in this opera. He would fain drink, he that was used to cups in battalions—to use the phrase of Apuleius—and he calls to his favorite odalisque, "Interesting slave!" I should like to have examined the bumps of Citizen Mendouze.

This overture of Cherubini is no Flemish painting of debauchery. Here is the feeling of a mural decoration by Puvis de Chavannes. Grave statues in an antique gallery pledge each other solemnly. Wooing is in bas relief. But how noble the simplicity and the repression!

The feature of the performance of the Symphony was the intense spirit and the incisive rhythm given to the finale, which movement is often a stumbling block to conductors. My esteemed friend Mr. Apthorp in the program book wrote as follows concerning this movement: "Some have called it a peasants' dance, to which idea others have given a less respectful turn by calling it a dance of boors; to others again the movement has suggested the dance of the Corybantes around the infant Jupiter's cradle. To the present writer it has all the characteristics of a furious peasants' dance, but endowed with an ideal, lofty beauty that makes the Corybantic idea by no means out of place."

I should like to ask Mr. Apthorp just where he gained his information concerning the "ideal, lofty beauty" of the Corybantic dance. Why, the Corybantes "moved with a fury they called divine, celebrated their feasts in beating drums, dancing, leaping and running of every side like Mad folks." Read the Atys of Catullus. Read the strange notes of Messire Gaspar Bachet, Sr. de Meziriac to Ovid's Epistles. It is not necessary to go outside of the English language. Let us summon a few witnesses. Drumond (1649), "Those mad Corybantes." Ash (1775), "Corybantiate—to act the part of the Corybants, who were wont to make many odd noises and gestures.

Cudworth (1642): "True divine zeal is no Corybantic fury."

Huxley (1890): "That form of somewhat corybantic Christianity of which the soldiers of the Salvation Army are the militant missionaries."

Froude (1883): "Christians now howl it out like the Corybantes."

Rowbotham (1887): "And sometimes these performances were nocturnal, and then the priests of Cybele would be there, with their obscene faces and womanish hips; the drums and Phrygian pipes would roar through the lighted rooms, and what deeds were done before the evening ended!"

No, no, Mr. Apthorp, your phrase, "ideal, lofty, beauty," does not fit, but I accept the Corybantic idea in its real sense. Or this movement is the brute joy in existence under the sun, the apotheosis of mere animal vitality.

The old fashioned ballet music of Gluck, with its gavotte of gentle fragrance, brought to the mind the men and women that danced against Gluck's will, as Gaetan Vestries, the Tyrant of the Danse. Look in the "Costumes des Ballets du Roy" (Paris, 1885), and you will find three plates devoted to Marie Madeleine Guimard, as she appeared in the opera ballet, "Zelindor." As this ballet was revived the year before she danced in "Iphigenia at Aulis," we are able to form some idea of her apparition in full glory of petticoat and, again, in costume that leaves small work for the imagination. Yet there is a hint at the dignity of her movement and gesture, for this woman of wild and horrid orgies was in the dance a chaste Diana. If you care to read about her, there is her life by Edmond de Goncourt, that old mole working in cellars full of moldy records, police reports, broken contracts and false and true love letters. But are you not disappointed whenever you finish—or half read a biography by this collector of human documents. He is always a-jogging your elbow, and whispering, "Now I am going to tell you something that is not generally known. Hush!" and then he changes the subject, or drops his voice so that you only hear in part. But the gavotte brings back Guimard, the paradox, the chaste-lubricious idol of her day.

It is questionable devotion to a composer to take such a piece as the prelude to the second act of "Gwendoline" from its home and its surroundings. For this prelude is not a mere intermezzo without definite meaning. A mood must be suggested that has connection with that which has preceded and will follow. As absolute music, however, this prelude is of wondrous beauty in stuff and in treatment. Gorgeous and at the same time fine in instrumentation, radical and daring in harmonic progressions, there is the revelation of the soul of the genuine composer, who does not experiment with the orchestra, but uses it as an Elizabethan used speech. And oh! the song of "Gwendoline," the clarinet tune with that unexpected note that stabs the heart.

The new clarinet player, Mr. Pourtan, is a valuable acquisition. His tone is rich, mellow, sympathetic; and he phrases, so far as one can judge from a single hearing, with masterly skill and poetic feeling. So, too, the tone of the new bassoon player seems generous and his playing artistic.

* * *

The Hebrew Journal.

124 EAST 14th STREET,
Opposite the Academy of Music, NEW YORK

OCTOBER 19, 1894. TISHRI 19.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, whose monthly visits to this city are attractive features of each musical season, will give its concerts this year in the Metropolitan Opera House on Thursday evenings, November 1st December 6th, January 10th, February 7th, and March 14th. It enters upon its fourteenth year with a body of players that can hardly be equaled for individual ability, the result of constant selection and improvement in its membership since 1881. It numbers eighty-seven musicians, and will appear with its full complement of players at each of the five concerts. The highest standard attainable has been established for these concerts, and the arrangements for the coming season give assurance that this standard will be fully maintained. The list of solo artists includes Mme. Nordica, Mr. Pol Plancon, Mr. César Thomson, and others to be announced.

Philadelphia Abend-Post.

Published every evening, except Sunday, by
The Post Printing and Publishing Co.
Limited,
R. Friedlander.....President
406 NORTH FOURTH STREET
Served to Subscribers at 10 cents per week, $5 per annum.

Donnerstag, 18. Oktober 1894.

Boston Symphonie Orchester. Dieses berühmte Orchester wird während dieser Saison, wie aus einer Anzeige in einer andern Spalte d. Bl. hervorgeht, fünf Symphonie-Konzerte unter Mitwirkung von prominenten Solisten veranstalten. Herr Emil Paur ist auch jetzt der Dirigent des Orchesters. Unter den Solisten sind Mrs. Julie M. Wyman, (Sopran.) Miß Adele aus der Ohe (Piano), Mr. E. Ysaye (Violine) und andere mehr. Dem Letzteren, der erst kürzlich herüber gekommen ist und dem ein sehr vortheilhafter Ruf vorausgeht, ist hier noch nicht gehört worden. Der Verkauf der Subscriptions-Tickets wird am nächsten Montag bei Fisher, No. 1221 Chestnut Str. eröffnet.

Boston Transcript

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 20, 1894.

The Kneisel Quartet will give concerts in Union Hall on Monday evenings, Oct. 22, Nov. 12, Dec. 10 and 31, Jan. 21, Feb. 18, March 18 and April 8. This is the programme for next Monday night: Haydn, quartet, G major, op. 77, No. 2; Sgambati, quartet, D-flat major, op. 17, first time; Mozart, quintet, G minor. Other works selected for the season are the following: Beethoven, quartets, op. 18, op. 74, op. 130, op. 131 and op. 132; Brahms, quartet B-flat, clarinet quintet B minor, and piano quintet F minor; Mozart, quartet A major; Haydn, quartet E-flat; Svendsen, octet for strings, Rubinstein, piano trio. These novelties will also be given: Quartet D major, Borodine; quintet (MS.), C. M. Loeffler; quartet (MS.), Koessle; piano trio, Kahn; piano quartet, Schuett. The list of solo artists includes Mmes. H. H. A. Beach and Emil Paur, and Messrs. Ernst Perabo, Arthur Whiting and Leon Pourtan. Tickets at Music Hall.

The programme for the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Music Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday night is made up of the Schubert's unfinished symphony, Schumann's symphony in C major and Beethoven's concerto in E-flat major, with Mr. Baermann at the pianoforte.

[29]

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, OCT. 21, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Up to the production of his "Phoenix Expirans" it seemed a little doubtful what was to become of Mr. George W. Chadwick's unquestionable talent for composition. What he had already produced had illustrated admirable qualities, not the least among which were sincerity, forcefulness and a determination to speak out what was upon his mind. Yet there was something lacking to a full and free command on his part and to a full and free enjoyment on that of his readers and hearers. Melodious indeed his writing was, but not without reserve, and his vocal music often gave small pleasure in comparison with the difficulty of mastering it, so that even some of his anthems would have fitted a group of instruments quite as well as a quartette of singers. His orchestral music had large thoughts, an impulsive and impressive character and dramatic disposition, and yet it had rigidity, deliberation and a smack of the academic. The question appeared to be as to whether Mr. Chadwick was to rise clear from the trammels of formality and yet control the strong individual bent which seemed to threaten making him too independent and abrupt. He had merits and faults on both sides of the safe central line, and for a time it was impossible to argue with anything like certainty, whether from his propitious and promising youth he was to pass to a proportioned and resolved maturity.

The "Phœnix" gave the assurance which his warm friends expected and the calmly critical desired. As was said here, at the time of its performance, there were found in it beautiful, sustained melody, right understanding of the possible charm and power of the human voice, instrumentation which showed learning and calculation but was without stiffness or affectation andnatural, direct, dramatic feeling. He had come into possession and command of himself, was fortifying his former excellences and turning his faults into merits. Therefore his work pleased the layman and contented the critical, encouraged singer and player to their best efforts and rewarded the average listener with substantial and well grounded pleasure.

In much such terms can we speak of Mr. Chadwick's new symphony, his third, which had the central place on Mr. Paur's second programme. It had received the prize of this year in its department from the National Conservatory of Music in New York—the only prize indeed which that institution thought fit to bestow, although aspirants for honors were not few. The programme book remarks with elaborate impressiveness, that at the very outset the horns sound three notes which, in their succession and admitting the German nomination of what we know as B-natural, are the first three letters of the composer's surname. But Mr. Chadwick is frank enough to speak out his mind—particularly his musical mind—straightway and without recourse to any Bacon-Shakespeare cryptograms for the Donnellys and Owens of the twenty-second century and to let his symphony stand for itself without any tricks of spelling to keep it in mind.

And it will stand well; for it is well knit together throughout, well conceived and well executed. It is of a just and agreeable length, occupying about thirty-five minutes in performance, of which time the first movement, as is usual, requires a little more than an even share. There is neither prolixity nor undue condensation in the thematic treatment, while the subjects themselves are not so numerous as to incline the captious to call the work a mere suite, nor so few as to weary the general, melody-loving ear by their paucity. There is good judgment in the distribution of them, the longer being cast to the slow movement and the vivace (which stands as the scherzo of the work), while the shorter and sturdier themes are assigned to the opening and closing allegros, in which the devices of orchestration and the evolution of climaxes are always expected to fill a more important function than in the intermediate movements. They are also rightly adapted to their places and purposes, and one does not feel that the composer could have made his symphony quite as good a one if he had done his themes hap-hazard from his note-book. The scoring is of our own time, but without any concession to the erratic or extravagant tastes which cannot be content without a dozen unusual instruments for which there is no artistic necessity, and the bass-tuba is the only addition to the standard orchestra of classical music. But the effects are as various, as clever and as telling as one could ask, and there is no tame or monotonous page. Indeed, apart from the intelligent and judicious handling of the separate integers of the band, there is much to admire in the unostentatious ingenuity with which the character of one or another movement is modified delightfully by some momentary change of rhythm or by some episodic influence which comes over its spirit without altering its steady flow. There are notable instances of this in the first movement, not long before its conclusion begins and after the introduction of the second subject in the larghetto.

Intellectually then the symphony is dignified, strong, sure and built up of well-ordered thoughts expressed in shapely phrase over whose polishing and adjusting judgment has presided. But this is not the only value of Mr. Chadwick's work. For while he makes no claim to be dramatic in it, as he did in his overtures, "Thalia" and "Melpomene," these movements have a distinct emotional quality. This does not indeed pervade every page, but nevertheless makes itself so distinct at times that any casual hearer, if a person of musical sensibility, would recognize these spiritual changes and respond to them. A single hearing gives no adequate opportunity for estimating the value of details or indeed for observing all of them, but it is sufficient to determine a general judgment; and so we may conclude broadly, although this symphony is not one to induce excited applause, it seems sure to obtain high approval and sincere regard for its sterling worth.

Of the other orchestral numbers one was Berlioz's "Roman Carnival," which began the programme with its merry, shuffling, scurrying Saltarello, its soft, sweet episodes—for where shall love and fancy not meet and confess if not behind the well-known mask in the unobservant whirl and hurry of the masquerade?—and its culminating rush and roar and clamor. The others were the two movements from Rubinstein's ballet music for his "Demon," in his own concert arrangements. These were put at the end of the programme, and although they are quaint rather than strong, the bright measures which come at the close of the second made a gleeful finish.

There was singing by Miss Juch, who had chosen the long scene of the Maiden from Dvorak's "Spectre's Bride," in which she bemoans the loss of her parents and the absence of her lover, to whom she entreats to be restored at any cost, and the two songs by Wagner known as "Dreams" and the "Cradle Song." The former had its orchestral accompaniment and the latter were sustained excellently at the piano by Mr. Paur. Miss Juch sang charmingly and poetically, but not very forcefully, depending rather on sweetness of tone and symmetry of phrase than on dramatic expression.

The orchestra played admirably, barring somewhat too much volume, especially from the wind choir, in Miss Juch's number and gave to Mr. Chadwick—who conducted his own work with security and simplicity—a ready and loyal assistance.

Three numbers compose the next programme—Schubert's unfinished symphony in C major and Beethoven's E-flat major pianoforte concerto in which it is pleasant to be told Mr. Baermann will take the solo part.

HOWARD MALCOLM TICKNOR.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, OCT. 21.

Symphony Concerts.

The clear weather brought a large audience to the second Symphony concert, and stimulated it into unwonted enthusiasm, and yet the good work performed by the orchestra deserved all the applause it received. The programme for the evening was:

Overture, "Carnaval Romain," Berlioz
Recitative and Aria from "The Spectre's Bride," Dvorak
Symphony No. 3, F Major, Chadwick
"Dreams" and "Cradle Song," Wagner
Ballet music from "The Demon," Rubinstein

The Berlioz overture was given with grace, dash and spirit; the local color was admirably preserved. Berlioz is always attempting to say improbable things in music, and he, of all composers, is the one who demands unquestioning sympathy in the hearer, and enthusiastic belief in the interpreter. His story may be lacking in continuity, his art may be powerless to give the finer shades of meaning, but he always needs a plot as a support to his music, and the plot must be known before the music can be appreciated. This is not the highest musical art, but Berlioz can be understood in no other way. The title of the overture suggests the needful attitude and then imagination must take the vague hints and build pictures for them. Perhaps under this system the music is apt to receive more credit than it deserves, for some of its merits may be pilfered from a sister art, but the effect produced is very stimulating, nevertheless. The little story of the Carnival overture was brilliantly told by Mr. Paur's orchestra, and, once placed in the proper hypnotic condition, we saw the holiday-loving crowd dancing, singing and making love in the approved holiday manner. It was a brilliant piece of work, brilliantly interpreted.

The novelty of the evening was Mr. Chadwick's symphony, and it was a surprise of the most genuine kind. The technical portions won the approval of the most exacting criticism. The scoring is of the highest quality. Mr. Chadwick is a master of orchestration, and the effects he produces are often of startling originality; there is no incoherence or abruptness in the statement or development ot his themes; the instruments are not treated as if they were independent individualities, but as portions of an organic whole and as a consequence there is no weak, unmeaning discursiveness, no feeble little solos chattering on their own account outside the given theme; but there is massive unity. Another praiseworthy self-denial may be noticed, Mr. Chadwick carefully avoids the affectation of mere prettiness; he is too earnest in developing his larger ideas to utter side-whispers addressed to the gallery. The working out of the ideas is always in faultless taste, always with clear, logical sequence, always with refined, artistic feeling. The intention is purely marked, there is no difficulty in following it through its various metamorphoses; the music flows in a full, limpid stream, without an effort; there is not always a continuity of idea, but the subjects are artistically varied in their restatement, and there is a hint of reserve force suggesting that all has not been said that might have been said. The style is free, more majestic than graceful, though the intervals are not rare when the latter quality is delightfully prominent. There is an admirable variety in the coloring; the brilliancy does not suggest spotlessness, although it is sometimes forced. The first movement is vigorous and striking, but the orchestration seems unduly prominent, it overburdens and oppresses the melody; the second movement is sweet and flowing, tender, dignified and passionate, fine on color contrasts, and strong in its effective orchestration; the third movement is brilliant, but somewhat monotonous, while the light and shade is brought too obviously in contrast to the detriment of the finest art; the fourth movement is large and dignified, with some rather commonplace melody elaborately worked out, and its inherent poverty concealed under the rich ornaments of orchestration.

As a whole, it remains to be said that the Symphony falls short of being a masterpiece, in that it is lacking in inspiration; the ornaments are always heavier than the ideas, the artist always more prominent than the prophet. In other words, what is said is always of less importance than the manner in which it is said. While listening to the work, the intellect receives greater pleasure than the imagination; we are moved to admiration by the great knowledge displayed in the technical portions of the symphony, but our feelings are rarely touched, and more rarely still do we catch a glimpse of that fairyland into which all the great composers lead us. Yet, uninspired as it is, Mr. Chadwick's Symphony is the finest product that American musical art has produced.

The soloist of the evening was Miss Emma Juch and she never appeared to greater advantage. Her full, rich, sympathetic voice, with its faultless method, poured out its beauties with the seeming carlessness and lavishness of the singing nightingale. There is a fine simplicity in her method, an absence of all effort, an always reliable continuity of tone, perfect attack and perfect equality throughout the register of her voice. The art was flawless, the taste exquisite, the variety of coloring perfectly adapted to the work interpreted. The selection from Dvorak was given with beautiful purity and pathos, the little "Cradle Song," which somehow or other came out of its place, was interpreted with rare simplicity and tenderness. Miss Juch was at her best, and was received with enthusiastic applause and recalled again and again to bow her thanks.

The programme for the next concert includes the unfinished Symphony by Schubert; the E-flat major Concerto for pianoforte, by Beethoven, and the Schumann C major Symphony. The soloist is Mr. Carl Baermann.

SUNDAY, OCT 21, 1894.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS.

Emma Juch Soloist at the Symphony Concert.

Last night's symphony concert attracted a large and appreciative audience, who, apart from the usual interest in the orchestral works came to hear the first performance of Chadwick's symphony in F major, and Emma Juch, the soloist of the occasion. The opening number of the concert, Berlioz' overture, "The Roman Carnival," was rendered by the orchestra with great spirit and vivacity, and Herr Paur's interpretation of it was exceedingly effective.

Mr Chadwick, who conducted his own symphony, was greeted warmly by the audience, who listened attentively to the whole performance. This composition was awarded the $300 prize offered this year by the New York national conservatory of music. It is rather long, and the first and second movements are somewhat elaborate. It is suggestive of the streaming harmonies of Wagner, and its construction is more classic than dramatic. But it has vigor and passion, and the third movement is brilliant. The melody of the first violins, accompanied by the wood winds, is very pretty, and the finale is almost replete with a turbulent grandeur. The orchestra played with great precision and interest, and the composer was the recipient of continued applause and a very flattering expression of appreciation.

Mme Emma Juch sang the recitation, "Where Art Thou, Father?" from Dvoral's "Specter's Bride," and the air "Mine Did I Once Love Call." Her voice was very sweet and soft and very effective in giving the plaintive features of the theme, but it lacked strength and range to express its dramatic points. She was more successful in Wagner's "Dreams" and "Cradle Song" which she sang with exquisite grace and charm. The "Cradle Song" in particular, which is full of delicate shades, and at the same time has a certain abandon in melody that requires especial skill in expressing, was sung with lovely effect, and Mme Juch was recalled again and again before the audience ceased applauding.

The concert ended with Rubinstein's dance music from "The Demon," a wild, weird and wonderful composition of oriental abandonment, most delightfully played by his orchestra. Mr Carl Baermann will be the soloist this week. The program will be as follows: "Unfinished symphony," Schubert; concerto for pianoforte, in E flat major, Beethoven; symphony in C major, Schumann.

Kneisel Quartet.

The first of the series of eight concerts by the Kneisel quartet will be given in Union hall, 45 Boylston st, tomorrow evening. The program is as follows: Quartet in G major, op 77, Haydn; quartet in D flat major, op 17, Sgambati (first time at these concerts); quintet in G minor, Mozart. Mr Zach will play the second viola in the Mozart quintet. Single tickets for this concert, also season tickets, can be secured at Music hall.

SUNDAY, OCTOBER 21, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The First Performance of Mr. George W. Chadwick's Symphony in F Major at the Second Concert of the Fourteenth Season.

The program of the second Symphony concert was as follows:

Overture, "Carnaval Romain".....Berlioz
Recitative and aria from "The Spectre's Bride".....Dvorak
Miss Juch.
Symphony No. 3, F major.....Chadwick
(First performance.)
Three songs, with piano.....Wagner
Miss Juch.
Ballet Music from "The Demon".....Rubinstein

The orchestra gave a brilliant performance of the overture by Berlioz, which wears well, in spite of its respectable age. The ballet music by Rubinstein is always welcome, and it was delightfully played.

The air from "The Spectre Bride" suffers from an overladen accompaniment, and when the singer has lost the freshness and strength of her voice, she is but one instrument, often subordinated, among many. In "Dreams" and the "Cradle Song" Miss Juch charmed the audience by the display of exquisite art. And I am not sure but that her singing of the former song was the feature of the concert.

* * *

There was naturally lively curiosity concerning the symphony, which was led by the composer. Mr. Chadwick for some time has been a man of performance rather than one of promise.

That this symphony won a prize is not in itself a eulogium. One is apt to shy at the thought of a prize composition, fearing lest it be either hopelessly academic or of laborious and strained originality.

The museum of music is full of prize specimens that attracted the attention of the moment and then were labeled and put away. Once in a while they are dusted, or aired. So they are not wholly in limbo.

I hasten to add that Mr. Chadwick's symphony is not dry and academic after the fashion of that which too often wins the approval of a jury of professors, doctors, and other Daniels and Solomons. On the other hand, it is eminently sincere and free from trickery.

The impression made, however, by the performance of last evening, was not altogether favorable. The first movement has agreeable passages, but neither in thematic stuff nor treatment has it the strength or the sensuous beauty, or the homogeneity that we are all so glad to acknowledge as the characteristics of the composer when at his highest flight. The movement does not seem to have been struck out at white heat. The end is not inevitable. There is, in fact, the suspicion of prolixity. There is the idea that the composer felt obliged to say a good deal about many things. Nor does the second movement, a tuneful larghetto, compare in originality with the third movement, or in strength with the finale. In this larghetto, the second theme has more strongly marked character, more individuality than the first, and it remains in the memory when the first is as though it had not been written.

To my mind the strongest and the best movements of the Symphony are the scherzo and the finale. The theme in the scherzo, first sung by the horn, has a popular character that in the absence of a more precise phrase may be described as a folk song or wandering melody that is repeated by a negro, and undergoes modifications without the specific intent of the dusky singer. This is no negro tune imported from Bohemia for use in Spillville, Iowa. It has the true mixture of reckless indifference and superficial melancholy.

The trio of the scherzo is interesting, not without genuine beauty, and, all in all, Mr. Chadwick may plume himself upon this movement, as upon much of the finale. I say "much of the finale," because in spite of clever effects produced by syncopation, and in spite of the broad and flowing second theme, there are passages that are dull and noisy.

The instrumentation is at times effective; it is often without sufficient contrast, it is often thick and monotonous. To parody the line of a French poet, "the horns are always sounding in the wood."

Mr. Chadwick was warmly received, and applauded heartily after the finale.

PHILIP HALE.

Baltimore Life.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY

THE OPENING OF THE NEW MUSIC HALL.

The grand opening of the new Music Hall, located at Mt. Royal and Maryland avenues, takes place on Wednesday evening, October 31. The inaugural attraction will be the Boston Symphony Orchestra, composed of 87 members, under the direction of Mr. Emil Paur, assisted by Mme. Melba, soprano; Mme. Scalchi, contralto; M. Maugiere, tenor; and M. Plancon, baritone; who will appear in a grand operatic concert program, especially arranged for the occasion. The completion and dedication of the hall has aroused great enthusiasm among the music lovers of Baltimore and, no doubt, the occasion will be a marked one. The main auditorium has a seating capacity o 3,000, which is adorned with a very artistic gallery, making a very fine and impressive appearance, being as the entire interior is frescoed and painted in light and attractive colors. The seats on the main floor can be removed at very short notice, in cases where a hop follows a concert; beside the large hall there are two smaller ones, each with a seating capacity of 500; there is also a very large and handsome banquet hall attached and large dressing rooms. Mr. John J. Nolen is the manager for the Auditorium Company.

The above mentioned concet will be the first of the series of five which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give at Music Hall during the winter. The subsequent dates are Wednesday evenings, December 5, January 9, February 6 and March 13. Among the artists who are to appear at the later concerts are Mme. Lillian Nordica, prima donna, soprano; Mr. Caesar Thomson, the famous Belgian violinist (his first appearance here;) Mr. Alwin Schroeder, violoncello; and several other celebrated soloist.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, OCT. 21, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Up to the production of his "Phoenix Expirans" it seemed a little doubtful what was to become of Mr. George W. Chadwick's unquestionable talent for composition. What he had already produced had illustrated admirable qualities, not the least among which were sincerity, forcefulness and a determination to speak out what was upon his mind. Yet there was something lacking to a full and free command on his part and to a full and free enjoyment on that of his readers and hearers. Melodious indeed his writing was, but not without reserve, and his vocal music often gave small pleasure in comparison with the difficulty of mastering it, so that even some of his anthems would have fitted a group of instruments quite as well as a quartette of singers. His orchestral music had large thoughts, an impulsive and impressive character and dramatic disposition, and yet it had rigidity, deliberation and a smack of the academic. The question appeared to be as to whether Mr. Chadwick was to rise clear from the trammels of formality and yet control the strong individual bent which seemed to threaten making him too independent and abrupt. He had merits and faults on both sides of the safe central line, and for a time it was impossible to argue with anything like certainty, whether from his propitious and promising youth he was to pass to a proportioned and resolved maturity.

The "Phœnix" gave the assurance which his warm friends expected and the calmly critical desired. As was said here, at the time of its performance, there were found in it beautiful, sustained melody, right understanding of the possible charm and power of the human voice, instrumentation which showed learning and calculation but was without stiffness or affectation andnatural, direct, dramatic feeling. He had come into possession and command of himself, was fortifying his former excellences and turning his faults into merits. Therefore his work pleased the layman and contented the critical, encouraged singer and player to their best efforts and rewarded the average listener with substantial and well grounded pleasure.

In much such terms can we speak of Mr. Chadwick's new symphony, his third, which had the central place on Mr. Paur's second programme. It had received the prize of this year in its department from the National Conservatory of Music in New York—the only prize indeed which that institution thought fit to bestow, although aspirants for honors were not few. The programme book remarks with elaborate impressiveness, that at the very outset the horns sound three notes which, in their succession and admitting the German nomination of what we know as B-natural, are the first three letters of the composer's surname. But Mr. Chadwick is frank enough to speak out his mind—particularly his musical mind—straightway and without recourse to any Bacon-Shakespeare cryptograms for the Donnellys and Owens of the twenty-second century and to let his symphony stand for itself without any tricks of spelling to keep it in mind.

And it will stand well; for it is well knit together throughout, well conceived and well executed. It is of a just and agreeable length, occupying about thirty-five minutes in performance, of which time the first movement, as is usual, requires a little more than an even share. There is neither prolixity nor undue condensation in the thematic treatment, while the subjects themselves are not so numerous as to incline the captious to call the work a mere suite, nor so few as to weary the general, melody-loving ear by their paucity. There is good judgment in the distribution of them, the longer being cast to the slow movement and the vivace (which stands as the scherzo of the work), while the shorter and sturdier ones are assigned to the opening and closing allegros, in which the devices of orchestration and the evolution of climaxes are always expected to fill a more important function than in the intermediate movements. They are also rightly adapted to their places and purposes, and one does not feel that the composer could have made his symphony quite as good a one if he had done his themes hap-hazard from his note-book. The scoring is of our own time, but without any concession to the erratic or extravagant tastes which cannot be content without a dozen unusual instruments for which there is no artistic necessity, and the bass-tuba is the only addition to the standard orchestra of classical music. But the effects are as various, as clever and as telling as one could ask, and there is no tame or monotonous page. Indeed, apart from the intelligent and judicious handling of the separate integers of the band, there is much to admire in the unostentatious ingenuity with which the character of one or another movement is modified delightfully by some momentary change of rhythm or by some episodic influence which comes over its spirit without altering its steady flow. There are notable instances of this in the first movement, not long before its conclusion begins and after the introduction of the second subject in the larghetto.

Intellectually then the symphony is dignified, strong, sure and built up of well-ordered thoughts expressed in shapely phrase over whose polishing and adjusting judgment has presided. But this is not the only value of Mr. Chadwick's work. For while he makes no claim to be dramatic in it, as he did in his overtures, "Thalia" and "Melpomene," these movements have a distinct emotional quality. This does not indeed pervade every page, but nevertheless makes itself so distinct at times that any casual hearer, if a person of musical sensibility, would recognize these spiritual changes and respond to them. A single hearing gives no adequate opportunity for estimating the value of details or indeed for observing all of them, but it is sufficient to determine a general judgment; and so we may conclude broadly, although this symphony is not one to induce excited applause, it seems sure to obtain high approval and sincere regard for its sterling worth.

Of the other orchestral numbers one was Berlioz's "Roman Carnival," which began the programme with its merry, shuffling, scurrying Saltarello, its soft, sweet episodes—for where shall love and fancy not meet and confess if not behind the well-known mask in the unobservant whirl and hurry of the masquerade?—and its culminating rush and roar and clamor. The others were the two movements from Rubinstein's ballet music for his "Demon," in his own concert arrangements. These were put at the end of the programme, and although they are quaint rather than strong, the bright measures which come at the close of the second made a gleeful finish.

There was singing by Miss Juch, who had chosen the long scene of the Maiden from Dvorak's "Spectre's Bride," in which she bemoans the loss of her parents and the absence of her lover, to whom she entreats to be restored at any cost, and the two songs by Wagner known as "Dreams" and the "Cradle Song." The former had its orchestral accompaniment and the latter were sustained excellently at the piano by Mr. Paur. Miss Juch sang charmingly and poetically, but not very forcefully, depending rather on sweetness of tone and symmetry of phrase than on dramatic expression.

The orchestra played admirably, barring somewhat too much volume, especially from the wind choir, in Miss Juch's number and gave to Mr. Chadwick—who conducted his own work with security and simplicity—a ready and loyal assistance.

Three numbers compose the next programme—Schubert's unfinished symphony in C major and Beethoven's E-flat major pianoforte concerto in which it is pleasant to be told Mr. Baermann will take the solo part.

HOWARD MALCOLM TICKNOR.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, OCT. 21.

Symphony Concerts.

The clear weather brought a large audience to the second Symphony concert, and stimulated it into unwonted enthusiasm, and yet the good work performed by the orchestra deserved all the applause it received. The programme for the evening was:

Overture, "Carnaval Romain," Berlioz
Recitative and Aria from "The Spectre's Bride," Dvorak
Symphony No. 3, F Major, Chadwick
"Dreams" and "Cradle Song," Wagner
Ballet music from "The Demon," Rubinstein

The Berlioz overture was given with grace, dash and spirit; the local color was admirably preserved. Berlioz is always attempting to say improbable things in music, and he, of all composers, is the one who demands unquestioning sympathy in the hearer, and enthusiastic belief in the interpreter. His story may be lacking in continuity, his art may be powerless to give the finer shades of meaning, but he always needs a plot as a support to his music, and the plot must be known before the music can be appreciated. This is not the highest musical art, but Berlioz can be understood in no other way. The title of the overture suggests the needful attitude and then imagination must take the vague hints and build pictures for them. Perhaps under this system the music is apt to receive more credit than it deserves, for some of its merits may be pilfered from a sister art, but the effect produced is very stimulating, nevertheless. The little story of the Carnival overture was brilliantly told by Mr. Paur's orchestra, and, once placed in the proper hypnotic condition, we saw the holiday-loving crowd dancing, singing and making love in the approved holiday manner. It was a brilliant piece of work, brilliantly interpreted.

The novelty of the evening was Mr. Chadwick's symphony, and it was a surprise of the most genuine kind. The technical portions won the approval of the most exacting criticism. The scoring is of the highest quality. Mr. Chadwick is a master of orchestration, and the effects he produces are often of startling originality; there is no incoherence or abruptness in the statement or development of his themes; the instruments are not treated as if they were independent individualities, but as portions of an organic whole and as a consequence there is no weak, unmeaning discursiveness, no feeble little solos chattering on their own account outside the given theme; but there is massive unity. Another praiseworthy self-denial may be noticed, Mr. Chadwick carefully avoids the affectation of mere prettiness; he is too earnest in developing his larger ideas to utter side-whispers addressed to the gallery. The working out of the ideas is always in faultless taste, always with clear, logical sequence, always with refined, artistic feeling. The intention is purely marked, there is no difficulty in following it through its various metamorphoses; the music flows in a full, limpid stream, without an effort; there is not always a continuity of idea, but the subjects are artistically varied in their restatement, and there is a hint of reserve force suggesting that all has not been said that might have been said. The style is free, more majestic than graceful, though the intervals are not rare when the latter quality is delightfully prominent. There is an admirable variety in the coloring; the brilliancy does not suggest spotlessness, although it is sometimes forced. The first movement is vigorous and striking, but the orchestration seems unduly prominent, it overburdens and oppresses the melody; the second movement is sweet and flowing, tender, dignified and passionate, fine on color contrasts, and strong in its effective orchestration; the third movement is brilliant, but somewhat monotonous, while the light and shade is brought too obviously in contrast to the detriment of the finest art; the fourth movement is large and dignified, with some rather commonplace melody elaborately worked out, and its inherent poverty concealed under the rich ornaments of orchestration.

As a whole, it remains to be said that the Symphony falls short of being a masterpiece, in that it is lacking in inspiration; the ornaments are always heavier than the ideas, the artist always more prominent than the prophet. In other words, what is said is always of less importance than the manner in which it is said. While listening to the work, the intellect receives greater pleasure than the imagination; we are moved to admiration by the great knowledge displayed in the technical portions of the symphony, but our feelings are rarely touched, and more rarely still do we catch a glimpse of that fairyland into which all the great composers lead us. Yet, uninspired as it is, Mr. Chadwick's Symphony is the finest product that American musical art has produced.

The soloist of the evening was Miss Emma Juch and she never appeared to greater advantage. Her full, rich, sympathetic voice, with its faultless method, poured out its beauties with the seeming carlessness and lavishness of the singing nightingale. There is a fine simplicity in her method, an absence of all effort, an always reliable continuity of tone, perfect attack and perfect equality throughout the register of her voice. The art was flawless, the taste exquisite, the variety of coloring perfectly adapted to the work interpreted. The selection from Dvorak was given with beautiful purity and pathos, the little "Cradle Song," which somehow or other came out of its place, was interpreted with rare simplicity and tenderness. Miss Juch was at her best, and was received with enthusiastic applause and recalled again and again to bow her thanks.

The programme for the next concert includes the unfinished Symphony by Schubert; the E-flat major Concerto for pianoforte, by Beethoven, and the Schumann C major Symphony. The soloist is Mr. Carl Baermann.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, OCT 21, 1894.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS.

Emma Juch Soloist at the Symphony Concert.

Last night's symphony concert attracted a large and appreciative audience, who, apart from the usual interest in the orchestral works came to hear the first performance of Chadwick's symphony in F major, and Emma Juch, the soloist of the occasion. The opening number of the concert, Berlioz' overture, "The Roman Carnival," was rendered by the orchestra with great spirit and vivacity, and Herr Paur's interpretation of it was exceedingly effective.

Mr Chadwick, who conducted his own symphony, was greeted warmly by the audience, who listened attentively to the whole performance. This composition was awarded the $300 prize offered this year by the New York national conservatory of music. It is rather long, and the first and second movements are somewhat elaborate. It is suggestive of the streaming harmonies of Wagner, and its construction is more classic than dramatic. But it has vigor and passion, and the third movement is brilliant. The melody of the first violins, accompanied by the wood winds, is very pretty, and the finale is almost replete with a turbulent grandeur. The orchestra played with great precision and interest, and the composer was the recipient of continued applause and a very flattering expression of appreciation.

Mme Emma Juch sang the recitation, "Where Art Thou, Father?" from Dvoral's "Specter's Bride," and the air "Mine Did I Once Love Call." Her voice was very sweet and soft and very effective in giving the plaintive features of the theme, but it lacked strength and range to express its dramatic points. She was more successful in Wagner's "Dreams" and "Cradle Song" which she sang with exquisite grace and charm. The "Cradle Song" in particular, which is full of delicate shades, and at the same time has a certain abandon in melody that requires especial skill in expressing, was sung with lovely effect, and Mme Juch was recalled again and again before the audience ceased applauding.

The concert ended with Rubinstein's dance music from "The Demon," a wild, weird and wonderful composition of oriental abandonment, most delightfully played by his orchestra. Mr Carl Baermann will be the soloist this week. The program will be as follows: "Unfinished symphony," Schubert; concerto for pianoforte, in E flat major, Beethoven; symphony in C major, Schumann.

Kneisel Quartet.

The first of the series of eight concerts by the Kneisel quartet will be given in Union hall, 48 Boylston st, tomorrow evening. The program is as follows: Quartet in G major, op 77, Haydn; quartet in D flat major, op 17, Sgambati (first time at these concerts); quintet in G minor, Mozart. Mr Zach will play the second viola in the Mozart quintet. Single tickets for this concert, also season tickets, can be secured at Music hall.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, OCTOBER 21, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The First Performance of Mr. George W. Chadwick's Symphony in F Major at the Second Concert of the Fourteenth Season.

The program of the second Symphony concert was as follows:

Overture, "Carnaval Romain".....Berlioz
Recitative and aria from "The Spectre's Bride".....Dvorak
Miss Juch.
Symphony No. 3, F major.....Chadwick
(First performance.)
Three songs, with piano.....Wagner
Miss Juch.
Ballet Music from "The Demon".....Rubinstein

The orchestra gave a brilliant performance of the overture by Berlioz, which wears well, in spite of its respectable age. The ballet music by Rubinstein is always welcome, and it was delightfully played.

The air from "The Spectre Bride" suffers from an overladen accompaniment, and when the singer has lost the freshness and strength of her voice, she is but one instrument, often subordinated, among many. In "Dreams" and the "Cradle Song" Miss Juch charmed the audience by the display of exquisite art. And I am not sure but that her singing of the former song was the feature of the concert.

***

There was naturally lively curiosity concerning the symphony, which was led by the composer. Mr. Chadwick for some time has been a man of performance rather than one of promise.

That this symphony won a prize is not in itself a eulogium. One is apt to shy at the thought of a prize composition, fearing lest it be either hopelessly academic or of laborious and strained originality.

The museum of music is full of prize specimens that attracted the attention of the moment and then were labeled and put away. Once in a while they are dusted, or aired. So they are not wholly in limbo.

I hasten to add that Mr. Chadwick's symphony is not dry and academic after the fashion of that which too often wins the approval of a jury of professors, doctors, and other Daniels and Solomons. On the other hand, it is eminently sincere and free from trickery.

The impression made, however, by the performance of last evening, was not altogether favorable. The first movement has agreeable passages, but neither in thematic stuff nor treatment has it the strength or the sensuous beauty, or the homogeneity that we are all so glad to acknowledge as the characteristics of the composer when at his highest flight. The movement does not seem to have been struck out at white heat. The end is not inevitable. There is, in fact, the suspicion of prolixity. There is the idea that the composer felt obliged to say a good deal about many things. Nor does the second movement, a tuneful larghetto, compare in originality with the third movement, or in strength with the finale. In this larghetto, the second theme has more strongly marked character, more individuality than the first, and it remains in the memory when the first is as though it had not been written.

To my mind the strongest and the best movements of the Symphony are the scherzo and the finale. The theme in the scherzo, first sung by the horn, has a popular character that in the absence of a more precise phrase may be described as a folk song or wandering melody that is repeated by a negro, and undergoes modifications without the specific intent of the dusky singer. This is no negro tune imported from Bohemia for use in Spillville, Iowa. It has the true mixture of reckless indifference and superficial melancholy.

The trio of the scherzo is interesting, not without genuine beauty, and, all in all, Mr. Chadwick may plume himself upon this movement, as upon much of the finale. I say "much of the finale," because in spite of clever effects produced by syncopation, and in spite of the broad and flowing second theme, there are passages that are dull and noisy.

The instrumentation is at times effective; it is often without sufficient contrast, it is often thick and monotonous. To parody the line of a French poet, "the horns are always sounding in the wood."

Mr. Chadwick was warmly received, and applauded heartily after the finale.

PHILIP HALE.

Baltimore Life,

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY

THE OPENING OF THE NEW MUSIC HALL.

The grand opening of the new Music Hall, located at Mt. Royal and Maryland avenues, takes place on Wednesday evening, October 31. The inaugural attraction will be the Boston Symphony Orchestra, composed of 87 members, under the direction of Mr. Emil Paur, assisted by Mme. Melba, soprano; Mme. Scalchi, contralto; M. Maugiere, tenor; and M. Plancon, baritone; who will appear in a grand operatic concert program, especially arranged for the occasion. The completion and dedication of the hall has aroused great enthusiasm among the music lovers of Baltimore and, no doubt, the occasion will be a marked one. The main auditorium has a seating capacity o 3,000, which is adorned with a very artistic gallery, making a very fine and impressive appearance, being as the entire interior is frescoed and painted in light and attractive colors. The seats on the main floor can be removed at very short notice, in cases where a hop follows a concert; beside the large hall there are two smaller ones, each with a seating capacity of 500; there is also a very large and handsome banquet hall attached and large dressing rooms. Mr. John J. Nolen is the manager for the Auditorium Company.

The above mentioned concet will be the first of the series of five which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give at Music Hall during the winter. The subsequent dates are Wednesday evenings, December 5, January 9, February 6 and March 13. Among the artists who are to appear at the later concerts are Mme. Lillian Nordica, prima donna, soprano; Mr. Caesar Thomson, the famous Belgian violinist (his first appearance here;) Mr. Alwin Schroeder, violoncello; and several other celebrated soloist.

INCOMPLETE

THE BRUNONIAN.

PROVIDENCE, R. I., OCTOBER 20, 1894. VOL

Boston Symphony Orchestra,

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.
Fourteenth Season 1894-'95.

6 GRAND CONCERTS

IN INFANTRY HALL, WEDNESDAY EVENINGS,

Oct. 24, Nov. 14, Dec. 19, Jan. 16, Feb. 20 and March 20.

SOLO ARTISTS: MME. JULIE M. WYMAN; MISS. GERTRUDE FRANKLIN; MONS. POL PLANCON (the distinguished Baritone of Abbey, Schoeffel & Grau's Opera Co.); MR. CARL BAERMANN; MR CESAR THOMSON (the famous Belgian Violinist), and others.

Season tickets, with reserved seats, for the series of six concerts, $5. Programme books, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed, will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets.

Season tickets now on sale at the box office, Infantry Hall.

Single tickets for the first concert at $1.25 each on sale Monday, Oct. 22, at 9 a. m.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.

MONDAY MORNING, OCT 22, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY.

MR. CHADWICK'S AMBITIOUS WORK HEARD.

It is Learned and Complex and Contains Much to Praise—A Flavor of Brahms, Berlioz, Dvorak, Wagner and Rubinstein Also Represented on the Programme.

Although the programme of Saturday was entirely devoted to the modern school of composition, it was varied enough, for many phases of recent musical thought were represented; the tone-coloring of Berlioz was balanced by the melody of Dvorak, the songs of Wagner by the ballets of Rubinstein, and the European school represented by these, found a counterpoise in the American classics represented by Chadwick. The last named work is a pleasant forerunner of many native works to come. While one may be thoroughly averse to pampering the American muse, by giving concerts of native compositions, as such, yet it would be much worse to discriminate against the native school, and to confine the repertoire to European works, as was done at one stage in the history of these concerts. One may commend Mr. Paur's catholicity of taste and predict that the public will be the gainers by it.

The programme began very much as the preceding one had ended, with considerable racket, but the festivity of Berlioz's "Carnaval Romaine" overture is of a higher sort than the magniloquence of Wagner's "Kaiser Marsch," which stunned the audience a week before. Mr. Paur, although not giving the acme of caprice in such a work as the "Carnaval Romaine," is wonderfully successful in bringing order out of chaos, in making passages clear that become muddled under other conductors, and it is much to be grateful for to have a work of such complexity and bizarrerie made intelligible. In the matter of bold crescendo effects, too (and Berlioz delighted in these), our orchestra has been trained to the point of audacity. Yet the ensemble in this work, and in the Dvorak accompaniment, as well as in the Chadwick symphony, was not as perfect as in the opening concert of a week before.

It is a fact well known to musicians that errors, like misfortunes, never come singly; a few slight slips in the overture led to a weak ensemble in the aria, and the doubtful points of execution in the Scherzo and finale of the symphony may be shared between the composer and the players.

The overture was, however, generally praiseworthy, and Mr. Mueller's work on the English horn gave a good introduction to the exciting number. The chromatic irruption of the woodwind might have been bolder, but the final climax was superb. In the working up of a broad climax Mr. Paur is unexcelled.

Mme. Juch came next with the melodious soprano air from "The Spectre's Bride." This was but fairly successful. Mme. Juch is every inch a musician, which many better vocalists are not, but her voice is hard and dry in the upper register, particularly when intensity or breadth is necessary. In a group of songs written by Wagner during his early period (although "Dreams" belongs to the passionate second epoch), the singer rose to her greatest height. She is a lied singer of the very first rank, and outvalues a dozen Mmes. Juchs in this field at present. She added a third Wagner song to the group for good measure, but in this connection one may protest against unannounced changes in concerts of this dignity; the habit should not be allowed to grow.

When Mr. Chadwick came upon the stage to direct his symphony there was a most spontaneous outburst of applause; but the applause was not quite so unhesitating after the first movement had come to an end. It is a symphony in which the composer has exerted all his ingenuity, and studied from the manuscript it must contain many points of profound interest to the musician, but it is quite another matter to the auditor, who lets many a bit of augmentation, of diminution and of contrary motion slip by unperceived. In the first movement the composer leads one into a development that is a jungle made up of fragments. The composer falls into the style of Brahms in giving many small thoughts rather than one continuous one, but Brahms' piece-work is the more intelligible. Nevertheless when the composer has worked his themes sufficiently to show that he is up to the symphonic standard, he becomes more natural and gives a really great climax. The end of the first movement is an instance of this. The second and third movements please the present writer best, for the Larghetto has a noble chief theme and there is good contrast in it, while the Scherzo is as dainty in its humor as if it were by that prince of Scherzo-writers, Mendelssohn. All in all, one finds much [illegible] in the work, but at the end must [illegible] the great American symphony [illegible] Mr. Chadwick directed [illegible] with much greatness and [illegible]

[illegible] concert ended with two numbers from Rubinstein's ballet music from "The Demon." Not so attractive as the "Feramors" ballet music, the numbers are yet interesting and delightful. The themes flow spontaneously, and there are many effects of orchestration that are striking and effective. The oriental flavor is well [illegible], and the numerous augmented [illegible] which form such an important factor [illegible] are frequently present. There is [illegible] in the numbers which [illegible] and not the least [illegible] the numbers won hearty ap-

BOSTON POST.
The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, OCT. 21, 1894.

SYMPHONY GIRLS

Miss Beaconstreet and Miss Nobody Together.

HOW THEY ENJOYED IT.

One Stepped From Her Carriage, the Other From an Electric—They Tell the Rest About Paur, Chadwick, Juch et al.

Miss Beaconstreet got out of her carriage at the big door, Miss Nobody walked from the electric car and got there at the same time.

Miss Beaconstreet swept into the hall a few minutes later, with her fur wrap over her arm, and it just brushed Miss Nobody's arm as she passed, and the rustle of her silken skirts went "rich-rich," and Miss Nobody sighed as the vision passed on, leaving a waft of dainty odor from sachets and the big bunch of violets that were rustling in the frills of Miss B.'s bodice.

"Where is your seat?" inquired the suave-faced, blonde usher.

Miss Nobody turned pale.

"I—I—er—"

"Oh, way over back there, anywhere underneath the balcony."

Miss Nobody was red clear up to where her curly black hair peaked out from under her seedy little velvet hat, for as she passed on she could look over the bright crowned heads and balloon-sleeved satin waists.

She saw Mrs. Sampson from her seat in the centre raise her pearl-handled lorgnette and focus it on her, and she bobbed her little velvet toqued head and crowded on.

There was a nice, empty seat, but the next was filled by Miss Beaconstreet, and she hurried by, intent on getting one over in the shadowy corner, where nobody could see her.

"Here is a seat." She felt the touch of a light hand, and the voice was low and modulated. Miss Nobody turned and, to her astonishment, found it was the white tips of Miss Beaconstreet's gloves that lay upon her arm, and the haughty face was smiling and the low voice was inviting her again to take the vacant seat beside her.

Miss Nobody slid into the seat with a husky "Thanks" and pulled her serge skirt back humbly, lest it touch her sister's silken one.

It was not the first time Miss Nobody had been to a Symphony concert, Oh, no! For she could remember the time when her head had not been confused nor her heart restless, and she dreaded to hear the first strain that should come when Emil Paur finished his easy bow and poised his magic baton in mid-air.

It had come.

First like an avalanche that made a wave of memories sweep through her brain and sent a thrill of new fire through her tired nerves.

Miss Beaconstreet turned the leaves of her programme and watched the movements of Director Paur as he leaned toward the orchestra, and with every move the musicians responded as though automatic, and he but touched the invisible chords with his wand aloft.

Miss Nobody was looking nowhere; her mind was everywhere; the avalanche had passed, and so had her stormy thoughts. There was a silence. She could think no more, and then came the sudden, low trill of strings and she forgot it all. The trills grew into melody, and the melody [illegible] by horns and

Overture, "Le Carnaval Romain".....Berlioz
Recitative and air from "The Spectre's Bride".....Dvorak
Symphony No. 3, in F major.....Chadwick
(First time. Conducted by the composer.)
Songs with piano.....Wagner
(a) Dreams. (b) Cradle Song.
Ballet music, from "Der Damon".....Rubinstein

Berlioz's overture was very brief, and then Mme. Juch appeared and received an ovation, for she is a great favorite here. Her aria and recitative from Dvorak's "The Spectre's Bride" was beautifully rendered. The lady's voice seems fuller and rounder than ever, and she sang with all that rare expression which makes her vocal efforts so very pleasing. Later in the programme she sang three of the famous Wagner group of songs, with piano accompaniment, Mr. Paur playing for her. The "Cradle Song" was especially fine, and in it was noticed the remarkable control Mme. Juch has over her voice. The purity of her tones and the wide range were also prominent features of her singing.

The interesting event of the evening was the first performance at these concerts of George W. Chadwick's latest symphony, No. 3, in F major and in four movements. It was this work which received the prize of $300 offered by the National Conservatory of Music in New York this year and the only prize awarded by that institution. The symphony is one of the most ambitious efforts of the talented composer. The themes are melodious and the working out brilliant and masterful, yet there seems to be something lacking. The music suggests ideas that are never realized, and in some of the movements the development is obscure and incomplete.

EMMA JUCH.

The larghetto in B flat major is the most pleasing, the opening theme being replete with harmony, with half of the first and second violins and the first 'celli in unison. The second theme is more elaborate, and the quiet ending is pleasingly effective.

The vivacious dance melody with which the third movement opens is entertaining, but as the movement progresses the incompleteness in development already referred to is noticed. The last movement is brilliant, and for the close the two themes are elaborately worked out. The number was led by the composer.

Two ballet numbers from Rubinstein's "The Demon," beautifully rendered by the orchestra, finished the interesting programme.

At the rehearsal next Friday afternoon and the concert on Saturday evening the following will be given:

Unfinished symphony.....Schubert
Concerto for pianoforte, in E flat major.....Beethoven
Symphony in C major.....Schumann
The soloist will be Mr. Carl Baermann.

[31]

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCVI., NO. 113.

SUNDAY, OCTOBER 21, 1894.

CHADWICK'S NEW SYMPHONY.

The Centre of Interest at the Symphony Concert.

Produced for the First Time and Conducted by the Composer Himself—Berlioz Overture Given with Brilliancy—Rubenstein Ballet Music—Emma Juch the Soloist.

The second concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given in Music Hall last night. The programme was:

Overture, "Le Carnival Romain,".....Berlioz
Air, "Mine Did I Once a Lover Call";
"The Spectre Bride,".....Dvorak
Symphony No. 3, F. major (first time).....G. W. Chadwick
"Dreams"; "Cradle Song,".....Wagner
Ballet music from "The Demon"...Rubinstein

Mme. Emma Juch was the soloist. There was a large audience. The central point of interest was, of course, Mr. Chadwick's new symphony, which, by the way, was conducted by the composer himself with skill and authority. The work is a surprising advance on anything that Mr. Chadwick has hitherto produced in regard to seriousness of style and largeness of thought. It is difficult to do full justice to a composition of this aspiring order, on a first hearing, and that difficulty is intensified in this particular instance owing to the extreme and almost intricate elaboration of instrumentation and of harmonic treatment that characterizes the work. What may seen somewhat confused at first may, on better acquaintance, resolve itself into perfect clearness; what may appear lacking in spontaneity and freshness, may take on a contrary aspect after frequent hearings. It is certain, however, that this symphony maintains an impressive dignity from beginning to end. It is almost ascetic in its seriousness, and there are moments in it that for power in conception and skill in development would do credit to any living composer. The symphony, as a whole, seems to have been written in a spirit completely influenced by Brahms, as far as its themes and their treatment are concerned, though the orchestration is, on the whole, more massive and at times more stormy than is characteristic of that composer. There is enough and to spare of fire and of passion, but there is little of quiet and graceful melodiousness by way of relief and contrast to the prevailing somberness. If what appears to be the crucial fault of the work might be pointed out, on the basis of the impression created by a first hearing, it would probably be found in a certain monotony in the orchestral treatment, notably in the prominence that is accorded the horn throughout. Not that Mr. Chadwick has restricted himself in using with skill the various combinations of modern orchestration, but the effects themselves are varied in their general character. The instrumentation is always brilliant, and it constantly indicates a thorough knowledge of the different instruments and of their proper and most effective use, but the composer has seen fit to illustrate that knowledge more frequently in a complex than in a simple manner, the result often being to the disadvantage of lucidity. Thus, in the first movement there is so much of this complexity that the scoring becomes sometimes too thick for the melody to come to the surface. A notable exception is the beautiful episode near the end of the movement, which is thoroughly charming in its chaste sentiment, and the means by which it is produced. The larghetto is rhapsodic in style, and, though wanting in nothing that shall indicate the scholarly musicianship of the composer, seems to be without any point on which the attention can centre. One constantly waits for something that never comes, and the incessant modulating and the clever contrapuntal devices scarcely atone for the lack of clearness in regard to the composer's intention. Here again arise thoughts of the unfairness of judging such a work on a single hearing; but still, first impressions may be set down if a discreet reserve, on the ground of their possible unreliability, be granted; and all that is intended here is to give such first impressions under such conditions. Instead of the conventional scherzo the composer has given a spirited saltarello, of which the trio is in slower time and different rhythm swing. The themes are pleasing and are treated with much brilliancy, and the orchestration is very ingenious. The working out of the first subject begins clearly, but presently becomes foggy, from excessive elaboration, and every now and then the movement suffers from the same cause. The finale has immense vitality, and is at times remarkably vigorous in its rush. The brasses often loom out with majestic effect, and the movement sweeps along with great fire to the end; but here again there appears to be too much of over-instrumentation. It is all brilliant and stirring, but there is so much of intricate orchestration that the main thread of the music, that on which its meaning hangs, is obscured. Summing up, still under the influence of a first impression, we are inclined to the belief that the symphony is fragmentary in effect; that it has too many moments when there is nothing but mere modulating, that has little to do with thematic development or with the subject in hand; that none of the movements leaves a distinct impression on the mind as a well-rounded whole, with a central point; that all four movements have about the same color and the same effect, and that the work is more creditable to the composer's industry and scholarship than to his resources of invention, his feeling for judicious contrasts in effect and to his sense of clearness. It was finely played and was well received, with much friendliness, the third movement winning most plaudits. At the end of the work Mr. Chadwick was warmly applauded, and was twice recalled with great heartiness.

The Berlioz overture was given with splendid brilliancy, Mr. Paur's reading of the work showing a keen and fine appreciation of its every mood. The Rubinstein ballet music is as bright in melody and as marked in rhythm as any ballet music need be, and its melodiousness, as well as its richly colored and peculiarly original orchestration, make it very pleasing in the hearing. It was beautifully played. In fact, through the whole evening the orchestra sustained the fine impression it made at the opening concert by the splendid qualities of its work. Mme. Juch, who was welcomed with great cordiality, sang the Dvorak air in [illegible] long familiar musicianly style. The [illegible] lection is not well adapted for concert performance, and the composer has always been considerate of the singer in his instrumentation, but the aria left nothing to be desired, except perhaps something more of physical power in the more impassioned moments of the air. The Wagner songs were exquisitely sung in respect to finish of style, grace of phrasing and justness of sentiment. There were but two songs announced on the programme, but these were preceded by another, "Schmerz," if we are not mistaken, from the same group. Mme. Juch was recalled enthusiastically twice after each appearance. A passing word of acknowledgment must be spoken for the charming manner in which Mr. Paur played the

INCOMPLETE

THE BRUNONIAN.

PROVIDENCE, R. I., OCTOBER 20, 1894. VOL

Boston Symphony Orchestra,

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.
Fourteenth Season 1894-'95.

6 GRAND CONCERTS

IN INFANTRY HALL, WEDNESDAY EVENINGS,

Oct. 24, Nov. 14, Dec. 19, Jan. 16, Feb. 20 and March 20.

SOLO ARTISTS: MME. JULIE M. WYMAN; MISS. GERTRUDE FRANKLIN; MONS. POL PLANCON (the distinguished Baritone of Abbey, Schoeffel & Grau's Opera Co.); MR. CARL BAERMANN; MR CESAR THOMSON (the famous Belgian Violinist), and others.

Season tickets, with reserved seats, for the series of six concerts, $5. Programme books, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed, will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets.

Season tickets now on sale at the box office, Infantry Hall.

Single tickets for the first concert at $1.25 each on sale Monday, Oct. 22, at 9 a. m.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.

MONDAY MORNING, OCT 22, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY.

MR. CHADWICK'S AMBITIOUS WORK HEARD.

It is Learned and Complex and Contains Much to Praise—A Flavor of Brahms, Berlioz, Dvorak, Wagner and Rubinstein Also Represented on the Programme.

Although the programme of Saturday was entirely devoted to the modern school of composition, it was varied enough, for many phases of recent musical thought were represented; the tone-coloring of Berlioz was balanced by the melody of Dvorak, the songs of Wagner by the ballets of Rubinstein, and the European school represented by these, found a counterpoise in the American classics represented by Chadwick. The last named work is a pleasant forerunner of many native works to come. While one may be thoroughly averse to pampering the American muse, by giving concerts of native compositions, as such, yet it would be much worse to discriminate against the native school, and to confine the repertoire to European works, as was done at one stage in the history of these concerts. One may commend Mr. Paur's catholicity of taste and predict that the public will be the gainers by it.

The programme began very much as the preceding one had ended, with considerable racket, but the festivity of Berlioz's "Carnaval Romaine" overture is of a higher sort than the magniloquence of Wagner's "Kaiser Marsch," which stunned the audience a week before. Mr. Paur, although not giving the acme of caprice in such a work as the "Carnaval Romaine," is wonderfully successful in bringing order out of chaos, in making passages clear that become muddled under other conductors, and it is much to be grateful for to have a work of such complexity and bizarrerie made intelligible. In the matter of bold crescendo effects, too (and Berlioz delighted in these), our orchestra has been trained to the point of audacity. Yet the ensemble in this work, and in the Dvorak accompaniment, as well as in the Chadwick symphony, was not as perfect as in the opening concert of a week before.

It is a fact well known to musicians that errors, like misfortunes, never come singly; a few slight slips in the overture led to a weak ensemble in the aria, and the doubtful points of execution in the Scherzo and finale of the symphony may be shared between the composer and the players.

The overture was, however, generally praiseworthy, and Mr. Mueller's work on the English horn gave a good introduction to the exciting number. The chromatic irruption of the woodwind might have been bolder, but the final climax was superb. In the working up of a broad climax Mr. Paur is unexcelled.

Mme. Juch came next with the melodious soprano air from "The Spectre's Bride." This was but fairly successful. Mme. Juch is every inch a musician, which many better vocalists are not, but her voice is hard and dry in the upper register, particularly when intensity or breadth is necessary. In a group of songs written by Wagner during his early period (although "Dreams" belongs to the passionate second epoch), the singer rose to her greatest height. She is a tied singer of the very first rank, and outvalues a dozen Mme. Joachims in this field at present. She added a third Wagner song to the group for good measure, but in this connection one may protest against unannounced changes in concerts of this dignity; the habit should not be allowed to grow.

When Mr. Chadwick came upon the stage to direct his symphony there was a most spontaneous outburst of applause; but the applause was not quite so unhesitating after the first movement had come to an end. It is a symphony in which the composer has exerted all his ingenuity, and studied from the manuscript it must contain many points of profound interest to the musician, but it is quite another matter to the auditor, who lets many a bit of augmentation, of diminution and of contrary motion slip by unperceived. In the first movement the composer leads one into a development that is a jungle made up of fragments. The composer falls into the style of Brahms in giving many small thoughts rather than one continuous one, but Brahms' piece-work is the more intelligible. Nevertheless when the composer has worked his themes sufficiently to show that he is up to the symphonic standard, he becomes more natural and gives a really great climax. The end of the first movement is an instance of this. The second and third movements please the present writer best, for the Larghetto has a noble chief theme and there is good contrast in it, while the Scherzo is as dainty in its humor as if it were by that prince of Scherzo-writers, Mendelssohn. All in all, one finds much to praise in the work, but at the end must confess that the great American symphony is not yet written. Mr. Chadwick directed the orchestra with much steadiness and discretion.

The concert ended with two numbers from Rubinstein's ballet music from "The Demon." Not so attractive as the "Feramors" ballet music, the numbers are yet interesting and delightful. The themes flow spontaneously, and there are many effects of orchestration that are striking and effective. The oriental flavor is well sustained, and the numerous augmented seconds which form such an important factor in the Eastern scales (and the Hungarian too) are prominently present. There is a degree of reiteration in the numbers which leads to an intentional, and not unpleasant monotony. The numbers won hearty applause.

The excellent accompaniments to the Wagnerian songs given by Mr. Paur must not be passed unnoticed. It is a fortunate singer who can have so good a musician at the piano to second her.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

BOSTON POST.
The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, OCT. 21, 1894.

SYMPHONY GIRLS

Miss Beaconstreet and Miss Nobody Together.

HOW THEY ENJOYED IT.

One Stepped From Her Carriage, the Other From an Electric—They Tell the Rest About Paur, Chadwick, Juch et al.

Miss Beaconstreet got out of her carriage at the big door, Miss Nobody walked from the electric car and got there at the same time.

Miss Beaconstreet swept into the hall a few minutes later, with her fur wrap over her arm, and it just brushed Miss Nobody's arm as she passed, and the rustle of her silken skirts went "rich-rich," and Miss Nobody sighed as the vision passed on, leaving a waft of dainty odor from sachets and the big bunch of violets that were rustling in the frills of Miss B.'s bodice.

"Where is your seat?" inquired the suave-faced, blonde usher.

Miss Nobody turned pale.

"I—I—er—"

"Oh, way over back there, anywhere underneath the balcony."

Miss Nobody was red clear up to where her curly black hair peaked out from under her seedy little velvet hat, for as she passed on she could look over the bright crowned heads and balloon-sleeved satin waists.

She saw Mrs. Sampson from her seat in the centre raise her pearl-handled lorgnette and focus it on her, and she bobbed her little velvet toqued head and crowded on.

There was a nice, empty seat, but the next was filled by Miss Beaconstreet; and she hurried by, intent on getting one over in the shadowy corner, where nobody could see her.

"Here is a seat." She felt the touch of a light hand, and the voice was low and modulated. Miss Nobody turned and, to her astonishment, found it was the white tips of Miss Beaconstreet's gloves that lay upon her arm, and the haughty face was smiling and the low voice was inviting her again to take the vacant seat beside her.

Miss Nobody slid into the seat with a husky "Thanks" and pulled her serge skirt back humbly, lest it touch her sister's silken one.

It was not the first time Miss Nobody had been to a Symphony concert. Oh, no! For she could remember the time when her head had not been confused nor her heart restless, and she dreaded to hear the first strain that should come when Emil Paur finished his easy bow and poised his magic baton in mid-air.

It had come.

First like an avalanche that made a wave of memories sweep through her brain and sent a thrill of new fire through her tired nerves.

Miss Beaconstreet turned the leaves of her programme and watched the movements of Director Paur as he leaned toward the orchestra, and with every move the musicians responded as though automatic, and he but touched the invisible chords with his wand aloft.

Miss Nobody was looking nowhere, her mind was everywhere; the avalanche had passed, and so had her stormy thoughts. There was a silence. She could think no more, and then came the sudden, low trill of strings and she forgot it all. The trills grew into melody, and the melody was echoed by horn and clarinet, and the

Overture, "Le Carnaval Romain"..Berlioz
Recitative and air from "The Spectre's Bride"..... Dvorak
Symphony No. 3, in F major.....Chadwick
(First time. Conducted by the composer.)
Songs with piano.....Wagner
(a) Dreams. (b) Cradle Song.
Ballet music, from "Der Damon"..... Rubinstein

Berlioz's overture was very brief, and then Mme. Juch appeared and received an ovation, for she is a great favorite here. Her aria and recitative from Dvorak's "The Spectre's Bride" was beautifully rendered. The lady's voice seems fuller and rounder than ever, and she sang with all that rare expression which makes her vocal efforts so very pleasing. Later in the programme she sang three of the famous Wagner group of songs, with piano accompaniment, Mr. Paur playing for her. The "Cradle Song" was especially fine, and in it was noticed the remarkable control Mme. Juch has over her voice. The purity of her tones and the wide range were also prominent features of her singing.

The interesting event of the evening was the first performance at these concerts of George W. Chadwick's latest symphony, No. 3, in F major and in four movements. It was this work which received the prize of $300 offered by the National Conservatory of Music in New York this year and the only prize awarded by that institution. The symphony is one of the most ambitious efforts of the talented composer. The themes are melodious and the working out brilliant and masterful, yet there seems to be something lacking. The music suggests ideas that are never realized, and in some of the movements the development is obscure and incomplete.

The larghetto in B flat major is the most pleasing, the opening theme being replete with harmony, with half of the first and second violins and the first 'celli in unison. The second theme is more elaborate, and the quiet ending is pleasingly effective.

The vivacious dance melody with which the third movement opens is entertaining, but as the movement progresses the incompleteness in development already referred to is noticed. The last movement is brilliant, and for the close the two themes are elaborately worked out. The number was led by the composer.

Two ballet numbers from Rubinstein's "The Demon," beautifully rendered by the orchestra, finished the interesting programme.

At the rehearsal next Friday afternoon and the concert on Saturday evening the following will be given:

Unfinished symphony.....Schubert
Concerto for pianoforte, in E flat major Beethoven
Symphony in C major.....Schumann

The soloist will be Mr. Carl Baermann.

EMMA JUCH.

[31]

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCVI., NO. 113.

SUNDAY, OCTOBER 21, 1894.

CHADWICK'S NEW SYMPHONY.

The Centre of Interest at the Symphony Concert.

Produced for the First Time and Conducted by the Composer Himself—Berlioz Overture Given with Brilliancy—Rubenstein Ballet Music—Emma Juch the Soloist.

The second concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given in Music Hall last night. The programme was:

Overture, "Le Carnival Romain,".....Berlioz
Air, "Mine Did I Once a Lover Call";
"The Spectre Bride,".....Dvorak
Symphony No. 3, F. major (first tim)....
.....G. W. Chadwick
"Dreams"; "Cradle Song,".....Wagner
Ballet music from "The Demon"...Rubinstein

Mme. Emma Juch was the soloist. There was a large audience. The central point of interest was, of course, Mr. Chadwick's new symphony, which, by the way, was conducted by the composer himself with skill and authority. The work is a surprising advance on anything that Mr. Chadwick has hitherto produced in regard to seriousness of style and largeness of thought. It is difficult to do full justice to a composition of this aspiring order, on a first hearing, and that difficulty is intensified in this particular instance owing to the extreme and almost intricate elaboration of instrumentation and of harmonic treatment that characterizes the work. What may seen somewhat confused at first may, on better acquaintance, resolve itself into perfect clearness; what may appear lacking in spontaneity and freshness, may take on a contrary aspect after frequent hearings. It is certain, however, that this symphony maintains an impressive dignity from beginning to end. It is almost ascetic in its seriousness, and there are moments in it that for power in conception and skill in development would do credit to any living composer. The symphony, as a whole, seems to have been written in a spirit completely influenced by Brahms, as far as its themes and their treatment are concerned, though the orchestration is, on the whole, more massive and at times more stormy than is characteristic of that composer. There is enough and to spare of fire and of passion, but there is little of quiet and graceful melodiousness by way of relief and contrast to the prevailing somberness. If what appears to be the crucial fault of the work might be pointed out, on the basis of the impression created by a first hearing, it would probably be found in a certain monotony in the orchestral treatment, notably in the prominence that is accorded the horn throughout. Not that Mr. Chadwick has restricted himself in using with skill the various combinations of modern orchestration, but the effects themselves are varied in their general character. The instrumentation is always brilliant, and it constantly indicates a thorough knowledge of the different instruments and of their proper and most effective use, but the composer has seen fit to illustrate that knowledge more frequently in a complex than in a simple manner, the result often being to the disadvantage of lucidity. Thus, in the first movement there is so much of this complexity that the scoring becomes sometimes too thick for the melody to come to the surface. A notable exception is the beautiful episode near the end of the movement, which is thoroughly charming in its chaste sentiment, and the means by which it is produced. The larghetto is rhapsodic in style, and, though wanting in nothing that shall indicate the scholarly musicianship of the composer, seems to be without any point on which the attention can centre. One constantly waits for something that never comes, and the incessant modulating and the clever contrapuntal devices scarcely atone for the lack of clearness in regard to the composer's intention. Here again arise thoughts of the unfairness of judging such a work on a single hearing; but still, first impressions may be set down if a discreet reserve, on the ground of their possible unreliability, be granted; and all that is intended here is to give such first impressions under such conditions. Instead of the conventional scherzo the composer has given a spirited saltarello, of which the trio is in slower time and different rhythm swing. The themes are pleasing and are treated with much brilliancy, and the orchestration is very ingenious. The working out of the first subject begins clearly, but presently becomes foggy, from excessive elaboration, and every now and then the movement suffers from the same cause. The finale has immense vitality, and is at times remarkably vigorous in its rush. The brasses often loom out with majestic effect, and the movement sweeps along with great fire to the end; but here again there appears to be too much of over-instrumentation. It is all brilliant and stirring, but there is so much of intricate orchestration that the main thread of the music, that on which its meaning hangs, is obscured. Summing up, still under the influence of a first impression, we are inclined to the belief that the symphony is fragmentary in effect; that it has too many moments when there is nothing but mere modulating, that has little to do with thematic development or with the subject in hand; that none of the movements leaves a distinct impression on the mind as a well-rounded whole, with a central point; that all four movements have about the same color and the same effect, and that the work is more creditable to the composer's industry and scholarship than to his resources of invention, his feeling for judicious contrasts in effect and to his sense of clearness. It was finely played and was well received, with much friendliness, the third movement winning most plaudits. At the end of the work Mr. Chadwick was warmly applauded, and was twice recalled with great heartiness.

The Berlioz overture was given with splendid brilliancy, Mr. Paur's reading of the work showing a keen and fine appreciation of its every mood. The Rubinstein ballet music is as bright in melody and as marked in rhythm as any ballet music need be, and its melodiousness, as well as its richly colored and peculiarly original orchestration, make it very pleasing in the hearing. It was beautifully played. In fact, through the whole evening the orchestra sustained the fine impression it made at the opening concert by the splendid qualities of its work. Mme. Juch, who was welcomed with great cordiality, sang the Dvorak air in a long familiar musicianly style. The selection is not well adapted for concert performance, and the composer has always been considerate of the singer in his instrumentation, but the air left nothing to be desired, except perhaps something more of physical power in the more impassioned moments of the air. The Wagner songs were exquisitely sung in respect to finish of style, grace of phrasing and justness of sentiment. There were but two songs announced on the programme, but these were preceded by another, "Schmerz," if we are not mistaken, from the same group. Mme. Juch was recalled enthusiastically twice after each appearance. A passing word of acknowledgment must be given for the charming manner in which Mr. Paur played the piano accompaniment to the songs.

The programme for the next concert is: Unfinished symphony, Schubert; Concerto for pianoforte, in E-flat, Beethoven; and symphony in C, Schumann. Mr. Carl Baermann is to be the soloist.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, OCTOBER 22, 1894.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The programme of the second symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Berlioz: Overture, "Le Carnaval Romain," opus 9.
Dvorák: Recitative, "Where art thou, father," and Air, "Mine did I once a lover call," from "The Spectre's Bride," opus 69.
Chadwick: Symphony No. 3, in F major. (First time.) Conducted by the Composer.
Wagner: Songs with Pianoforte—
Schmerzen—Träume—Wiegenlied.
Rubinstein: Ballet Music from "Der Dämon"
Miss Emma Juch was the singer.

With all our admiration for Berlioz's "Carnaval Romain" overture, we cannot think it a good piece to begin a programme: those violent, strident opening measures should not come suddenly upon the unprepared listener; they are like a musical scratch in the face, and seem almost insulting. Note that Berlioz wrote the piece as a "second overture to 'Benvenuto Cellini,' to be played before the second act of that opera;" when given as he meant it to be, the work does not take the listener so disagreeably by surprise; the Saltarello theme has been heard already in the opera, and when the orchestra dashes upon it at the beginning of the overture, it comes as a sort of jolly "Here we are again!" and one is glad to hear it once more. But coming suddenly upon the unprepared ear, at the very beginning of a concert, it puts one into no very kindly humor; one feels rather like hitting back! But, apart from its ill-chosen place on the programme, it made the most superb effect on Saturday evening: never before have we heard this overture so well given. We have perhaps heard it played with equal precision and fire, but never with such well-chosen vigor of accent nor so fine a totality of conception; the performance "held the music together" as with a grasp of iron: one could feel that the whole composition was coherent and stoutly built, instead of being the succession of merely haphazard modulations and whimsical effects that it too often sounds like. When "interpretation" brings with it such admirable results as this, long live interpretation, say we! Mr. Paur has done great things with Berlioz before, but never finer than on this occasion.

Mr. Chadwick's new symphony has won a success with both musicians and the public that augurs well for its future life. Indeed, as prize symphonies go, one wonders a little how so fine a work should have won a prize. It seems in very truth, a composition well fitted to give the lie to the old Viennese player's neologistic remark: "Seh't, Kinder! das hab' ich mir immer gemerkt: je preiser ein Werk gekrönt, desto durcher fällt es nachher!" (Look you, boys! I have always noticed that, the prizer a work is, the througher it falls afterwards!) It would take something more than a prize to kill this symphony! Mr. Chadwick has shown himself tolerably content with the traditional symphonic form; he has allowed himself but one irregularity in his symphony. This is in the first movement, where the principal theme returns at the beginning of the third part. Instead of bringing it back in its original shape and in the tonic key, F-major, he brings it back "in augmentation," and in the key of the subdominant, B-flat major; moreover, the augmentation, from ¾ time in triplets to ¾ time without triplets, entirely alters the rhythm, so that it seems almost like a new melody. But this little innovation not only brings with it a most charming effect, but has a certain amount of musical logic behind it, at least in so far as regards the irregularity of key. The first part of the movement begins in the tonic and ends in the dominant; now, one can see by the proportion: "Tonic : Dominant = Subdominant : Tonic" that the third part, which in the symphonic form is the symmetrical pendant of the first, has but to take a similar course, to end in the tonic, as it should. This return of the first theme in its altered shape forms a delightful, quasi-pastoral episode, while none the less playing its proper part in the form of the movement. Another charming fancy of the composer's, albeit not really an irregularity, is his cheating the listener into taking the brisk, saltarello-like theme with which the third movement begins for the principal theme of the movement; as the movement begins with it, one naturally takes it to be the principal theme. But no! the real principal theme is the melody in 2-4 time that creeps in somewhat later on the horn, for all the world as if it were nothing more than a chance counter-theme. Tricks of this sort have no little charm, when well done; and Mr. Chadwick has done this one capitally. It is a sort of thing for which he seems to have a peculiar predilection, a "musical joke" of the best sort.

But, apart from these two items, the form of the symphony is strictly regular and orthodox; and one finds this regularity of form all the more admirable, and in no wise open to the charge of mere scholasticism, in that it plainly springs from the way in which Mr. Chadwick has here confined himself to the coherent and musically logical development and working-out of his thematic subject matter, without allowing himself any of that sort of capricious musical skylarking for which he has on some other occasions shown considerable inclination. In this symphony the composer has kept his seriousness throughout, as he did in his "Melpomene" overture; and he has lost not a whit of his native charm and fascination by so doing. Each one of the four movements is but the natural working-out of its subject matter, with but few episodes — certainly with no irrelevant ones. The whole symphony is distinctly what one calls "professional work." The composer has, now and then, faced some pretty taxing tasks; but he keeps his head and heels to perfection, and never loses his way in the mazes of his own counterpoint, and, quite apart from the solidity of his work, it is full of geniality, life and charm; the themes show invention, naturalness, force and grace; and, in their development, every phrase fits well into its allotted place. In a word, it is a symphony for both composer and public to be proud of. The work does not perhaps reach a higher plane than the "Melpomene" overture; but remember, an overture is one thing, and a symphony in four movements quite another! That Mr. Chadwick has succeeded in carrying the larger form as high as he did the smaller is quite enough to his credit, and shows no inconsiderable advance beyond his former, already high, position. The performance, under the composer's own direction, was excellent; indeed the whole orchestra took hold of the work con amore from the first. Mr. Chadwick was twice recalled at the end.

If Berlioz's "Carnaval Romain" is no very good thing to begin a concert, the ballet movements from Rubinstein's "Dämon" are at least equally ill-adapted to end with. As an accompaniment to a real ballet this music may be not devoid of charm; the themes have a rather attractive quaintness, and, while looking at the movements of graceful and captivating dancers, one would not be too much inclined to care about their development. An ounce of musical invention goes a longish way in ballet music when put to its proper use! But at a concert the graceful and captivating dancer falls out of the game; one has to listen to the music simply as music. And these two "Dämon" pieces strike one aghast at the composer's wonderful poverty of resource, quite sufficient for his original ballet purpose though it may be. To hear two or three little themes, of such vague outline that they hardly deserve to be called melodies, repeated over and over again through two long movements, with but little variation or embroidery, and wholly without climax, comes as near as anything need come to being a musical bore. And to end a concert with such a dead level of musical inanity is very like finishing a savory dinner with plain boiled hominy, which, after all, has the advantage of being nutritious, which the "Dämon" ballet music has not.

Miss Juch sang the recitative and air from "The Spectre's Bride" very beautifully, indeed, like the true artist that she is. The selection, however, seemed somewhat out of place. The music was out of its proper atmosphere. There is a homely flavor of very intime sentiment in this music that somehow seems to shrink from the downright publicity of the concert stage. When the whole cantata is given, it soon creates its own atmosphere; but at a symphony concert, especially immediately after so garish a work as the "Carnaval Romain," it is very different; we, for one, could not help feeling uncomfortably de trop, as if we were unwarrantably intruding upon the sacred privacy of The Maiden's soliloquy—there seemed to be something almost immodest about it. We remember having much the same feeling when Mme. Materna and Mr. Winkelmann sang the love-scene from "Tristan" in Mechanics Hall some years ago. These modest, homely, intime blossoms of sentiment, like Dvorák's "Mine did I once a lover call," do not well stand the uncompromising glare of the concert stage, except when given in their proper frame. To be sure, Miss Juch's soulfulness and exquisite refinement of expression, the way in which her singing reflected the maidenly purity of the music, did much to cure the incongruity of the situation. But we had rather have heard her sing something else.

We were not a little disappointed to find Mr. Paur breaking his whilom resolve to have no songs with pianoforte at the symphony concerts. This disappointment was somewhat mitigated, it is true, by hearing Miss Juch sing the "Schmerzen"—which was not down on the programme, by the way, and seemed to bother the readers of the programme-books a good deal. We have always thought this song decidedly the best of the, by no means very fine, set of five "Poems" Wagner wrote. The "Träume" has much to recommend it in itself; but unfortunately it is only a first sketch of some of the greatest music in "Tristan," and the sketch is too much overshadowed by the finished work to be really enjoyable; having the love-scene in "Tristan" in one's mind, it is a little irritating to hear this song keep turning to the left, as it were, just as one expects it to turn to the right. The "Wiegenlied" is charming enough, but rather unreposeful and breathless for a cradle-song. Upon the whole, song-writing was not Wagner's forte; he did such truly great work in other, larger fields that it seems useless to try to perpetuate his songs on the concert platform. They are works wholly devoid of importance, and a song by Schubert, Schumann or Franz—or even by Rubinstein or Jensen—can throw them sadly into the shade. Miss Juch sang the songs delightfully — albeit the "Schmerzen" struck us as somewhat beyond her ken—but even her singing of them was not a sufficient excuse for having them on the programme.

The next programme is: Schubert, unfinished symphony in B minor; Beethoven, pianoforte concerto No. 5, in E-flat major; Schumann, symphony No. 2, in C major. Mr. Carl Baermann will be the pianist.

Boston Daily Globe.

TUESDAY, OCT. 23, 1894.

Kneisel Quartet.

Union hall was filled last night with a fashionable and representative audience, who came to listen to the first of the Kneisel quartet concerts of this season. The quartet, consisting of Franz Kneisel first violin, Otto Roth second violin, L. Svecenski viola and Alwin Schroeder violoncello, received a very cordial reception, and were listened to with close attention throughout their fine performance.

The program, if not strikingly varied in character, was excellent in selection and calculated to elucidate the best qualities of the quartet, qualities that have made them so popular with the lovers of good music. The quartet from Haydn in G major was admirably played, and Mr Kneisel was in particular good form—displaying wonderful skill as first violin.

The quartet from Sgambati in D flat major was given for the first time at these concerts, and proved a delightful composition. The fourth movement of it was played with a delicacy and charm only capable of being elicited by such masters in technique as the members of the Kneisel quartet are. They were warmly applauded, and the audience exhibited keen appreciation.

The quintet from Mozart in G minor was assisted by Mr Max Zach, who played second viola, and the reading of it was strikingly pretty. The audience was enthusiastic over the effective work of the orchestra, and the musicians were the recipients of cordial applause. Throughout the performance the audience displayed a marked attention and a lively appreciation of the best work of the quartet, and they were repeatedly encored.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCVI., NO. 116

TUESDAY, OCTOBER 23, 1894.

Kneisel Quartet Gives Its First Concert of the Season.

Last evening there was a large and brilliant audience in Union Hall, the occasion being the first concert of the current season by the Kneisel quartet. The programme was:

Quartet, G major, op. 77, No. 1.....Haydn
Quartet, D flat major, op. 17.....Sgambati
Quintet, G minor.....Mozart

The quartet, which remains unchanged in its personnel, was assisted by Mr. Max Zach. The programme, as will be seen, was one of peculiar interest, presenting, as it did Sgambati, one of the most modern of the moderns, between the two great founders of the older school. The piece by the Italian composer had not been heard at these concerts before. It is a work of great originality, but is scarcely a string quartet in the received acceptation of the term, its general aspect being that of a fantasie. It is well written—that is, almost every variety of effect that can be obtained from combining the instruments employed is produced—and though it fairly bristles with difficulties of technique, they are all justly within the capacity of the different instruments, and the music is string music throughout.

The contrast with the simple, genial and spontaneous quartet of Haydn, that preceded it was almost grotesque. On the one hand everything was broad and manifest, on the other there was a constant striving for novelty, and the labor it had cost its composer was obtrusively evident. Of any familiar aspect of what is understood as the Italian style there is not a trace, but though the composer's affinities are German, neither is there anything in the quartet that can be pronounced German. Something of the influence of Liszt, under whom he studied long in Rome, is clearly shown in the work, especially in its struggle for bizarre effects of rhythm and harmony and in its general rhapsodic color. No difficulty is in the way of an understanding of the work on a first hearing, despite its complexity. All is clear enough, and it appeals steadily to the interest even if it does not always gratify it. The scherzo is, perhaps, the most attractive and the most brilliant movement. It is full of life and freshness and has a piquancy and a lively originality that are fascinating in their way. There are some beautiful movements in the andante, which moves on its way with a certain suave nobility that is very impressive, and the finale, though it is somewhat spun out too long after the composer has said all he had to say in it, is inspiriting in its fiery impulsiveness. The quartet was listened to with great attention and was vigorously applauded.

That it has any permanent musical value it would not be easy to demonstrate, but it was well worth the hearing as an example of what the serious representative composers of Italy are doing. It was wonderfully played, its tremulous exactions in the performers being met with perfect success. As an exhibition of technique in ensemble nothing finer could be reasonably demanded. The Mozart quintet, one of the most charming of its composer's works, emphasized the musical hollowness of what preceded it. Here there is learning in abundance, but it is made a means and not an end, and the noble melancholy of the opening movement, and the grace, tenderness and large dignity of the adagio, together with the instinctive tribute paid to the beautiful in art, belittled the more ostentatious work, with its restless, striving and its ostentatious pedantry, and caused it to be almost forgotten before its echoes had died away. Nothing could have been more true to the spirit of this quintet than the interpretation it received at the hands of the performers. It was exquisitely played throughout, though toward the close with something of false intonation.

This, however, may possibly be attributed to the atmosphere of the hall, which became distressingly heated, owing to lack of proper ventilation, and may have caused the strings to fall out of tune. The Haydn quartet was also delightfully read and played. The applause through the evening was equally cordial and appreciative, and the concert, as a whole, was abundant in pleasure and satisfaction to all who heard it. The next concert in the series will be given Monday evening, Nov. 12. In the meanwhile, it is impossible not to regret that Boston has no concert hall better fitted for the performance of chamber music and more judiciously adapted to the comfort of an audience than that in which these performances are given.

Philadelphia Abend-Post.

Published every evening, except Sunday, by

The Post Printing and Publishing Co.

Limited,

R. Friedlander.....President

406 NORTH FOURTH STREET

Served to Subscribers at 10 cents per week, $5 per annum.

Samstag, 20. Oktober 1894.

Boston Symphonie Orchester. Dieses berühmte Orchester wird während dieser Saison, wie aus einer Anzeige in einer andern Spalte d. Bl. hervorgeht, fünf Symphonie-Konzerte unter Mitwirkung von prominenten Solisten veranstalten. Herr Emil Paur ist auch jetzt der Dirigent des Orchesters. Unter den Solisten sind Mrs. Julie M. Wyman, (Sopran.) Miß Adele aus der Ohe (Piano), Mr. E. Ysaye (Violine) und andere mehr. Dem Letzteren, der erst kürzlich herüber gekommen ist und dem ein sehr vortheilhafter Ruf vorausgeht, ist hier noch nicht gehört worden. Der Verkauf der Subscriptions-Tickets wird am nächsten Montag bei Fisher, No. 1221 Chestnut Str. eröffnet.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.

TUESDAY MORNING, OCT 23, 1894.

The Kneisel Quartette Concert.

It is scarcely necessary to state that Union Hall was filled last night, for the Kneisel concerts have become as much a part of Boston's musical life as the symphony concerts themselves. It is, however, a cause for congratulation that the pure flame continues to burn so steadily, and that the appreciation never seems to flag. It has been frequently stated in these columns that the appreciation and comprehension of the string quartette is the highest form that the musical taste of a community can take: it is a less often found even than the appreciation of symphony.

Like the symphonic orchestra, the quartette found it advisable to begin the season without a soloist, to give, for the first concert, a taste of their concerted work pure and simple, and not only was a judicious conservatism displayed in this, but also in the works selected, for the concert began with Haydn and ended with Mozart.

Between these two was sandwiched a modern of moderns, an Italian who has deserted the vocal traditions of his land and achieved a success in the instrumental field, —Sgambati. The concert therefore seemed like a vast first-rondo form, with Sgambati as its countertheme. Haydn's Quartette in G major (op. 77) was charming in a simplicity that is most difficult of attainment.

A simplicity that is difficult in the performance too, for each error would stand revealed in such limpidity as a flaw in a crystal. There were, however, no errors to condone, and the auditor could revel in the pure unforced music with no more fear of meeting slips than of meeting unresolved seventh chords. Such music is best described in the words with which Spenser described Chaucer (with slight alteration) as a "well of music, undefyled."

There was a wealth of merriment and freedom in the movements, the minuet being especially bold, as much so as the two Scherzi with which Haydn replaced minuets in later quartettes. The finale was as bright as if it had been copied from the Gigue with which the older masters used to end their suites,—as it may have been. These were, as has been intimated, no slips, but the playing could not sound quite as well as it might have done in Chickering Hall,—were that still devoted to music.

Sgambati's quartette in D flat is a great work, full of ideas and of masterly combinations. It is thoroughly dramatic from the very introduction, even if it becomes spasmodic sometimes, in the first and last movements.

The Prestissimo (which fills the place of Scherzo, and is the second movement) is full of technical difficulty, and presents much martelato work, as well as flying staccato and pizzicato. It is as uncanny as if it were a witch's dance. The gem of the work, however, is the slow movement—andante sastenuto. It is not only full of melody—as, for example, the theme of the first and second violins—but has a richness of harmony recalling Schumann. The finale was not so clear, but was powerful, nevertheless. The work was heartily applauded.

With Mozart's quintette in G minor, in which Mr. Zach took the extra viola part, the concert ended. The two violas give this work a fullness and solidity that is especially attractive. This was noticeable in the first movement and in the adagio. Altogether the concert was a very delightful beginning of the chamber music season, and although something is lost because of the size of the hall, the concerts bid fair to be as successful as ever of yore.

LOUIS C. ELSON

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL.

SUNDAY, OCTOBER 21, 1894.

NEXT Wednesday occurs the first of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts at Infantry Hall, the striking features of which are the production of Sgambati's First Symphony and the appearance of Pol Plancon, basso, of the Abbey, Schoeffel & Grau Grand Opera Co. The Sgambati Symphony, played for the first time in this country, easily takes rank as the most important selection in the programme. Sgambati was born in Rome, Italy, May 28, 1843. His father was a lawyer,

POL PLANCON,
Baritone, with Boston Symphony Orchestra.

his mother a daughter of Joseph Gott, the London sculptor. His progress as a musician was very rapid, and, at the age of 27, he had mastered all that the local instructor could teach him, and was easily the leading Italian pianist. As he was about to go to Germany to pursue his studies, by a rare bit of luck, Liszt, the great pianist, came to Rome to settle, and Sgambati at once placed himself under Liszt's tuition. His progress was indeed remarkable, and in 1877 Wagner himself, on hearing some of Sgambati's works, commended him most highly. The symphony to be performed at the first Providence concert was given its first hearing before the "Court of the Quirinal" in Rome, on March 28, 1881, in the presence of the King and Queen of Italy. Its success was immense, and Sgambati was rewarded by the Order of the Crown of Italy.

[32]

Boston Journal.

TEN PAGES.

TUESDAY, OCTOBER 23, 1894.

The First Concert of the Tenth Series Given by the Kneisel Quartet.

The Kneisel Quartet gave the first concert of the 10th season in Union Hall last evening. Mr. Zach played second viola in the quintet. The program was as follows:

Quartet, G major, op. 77.....Haydn
Quartet, D flat, op. 17.....Sgambati
Quintet, G minor.....Mozart

The quartet by Sgambati was first played in this city by the Listemann Quartet during the fall of 1889, and the attendant circumstances of that performance did not favor a calm valuation of the work. Sgambati in his younger days turned his back on musical Italy, and looked across the Alps. He was influenced mightily in the sensitive period of creation by Liszt. They say that of late years he has shown more genuine Italian feeling. However this may be, the quartet played last night reveals in large measure the power exerted by the hyper-modern German school.

"We always return to our first hates." Even when played by the Kneisel Quartet the first movement and the finale do not make a more favorable impression than when they were heard five years ago. They seem extravagant, strained, wildly ambitious without definite purpose except to startle. This music is not quartet music in the true meaning of the word, but this fact alone should not bias the hearer against enjoyment, for traditions are but liquid things, nor is there in this day a Procrustean bed for composers with their pieces. Even want of strict form may be excused if the effect of beauty or strength is present. But these movements, taken in bulk, seem vague and unnecessarily ugly. The introductory adagio has the mock mysticism, the bathos of Liszt. The most interesting feature of the first movement is the treatment of the choral, which although at times eccentric, is yet often masterly. As for the finale, it is disagreeable music. The scherzo is full of fancy and is by all odds the strongest and most musical of the movements. It is a thoroughly delightful and most creditable piece of work. So, too, the andante contains passages of genuine beauty, passages that are spontaneous and sincere.

***

If the end of all art is the fabrication of unity, then are the best quartets of Haydn and such compositions as the immortal quintet by Mozart supreme in chamber music. This music has the classical serenity, the simple perfection of expression even in humor or in passion. There is no straining after effect any more than in a phenomenon of Nature.

It is a good thing, yea, it is a blessed privilege to hear such a work as the G minor quintet played by such artists. The performance of the other pieces was wholly admirable, but the performance of the quintet was one long and devoutly to be remembered. When the ensemble was so excellent, it may seem invidious to particularize, and yet one cannot refrain from praising without stint the exquisite playing of Mr. Kneisel in the adagio by Mozart. For when he played, it was as though Mozart sang.

PHILIP HALE.

BOSTON POST.
The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

TUESDAY MORNING, OCT. 23, 1894.

FIRST KNEISEL CONCERT.

The first concert of the tenth season of the Kneisel Quartet was given in Union Hall, Boylston street, last evening. Mr. Carl Zerrahn was among the many distinguished auditors in the large assemblage of musicians and music lovers. The opening selection was a quartet in G major by Haydn, op. 77, No. 1. The only criticism of the rendering of this delicate composition that could possibly be offered would be that Mr. Schroeder's cello groundwork was a trifle too heavy. The second number, quartet in D flat major, op. 17, by Sgambati, given for the first time at these concerts, made a big hit, and Mr. Kneisel will probably be asked to repeat it before the season is over. The third movement, prestissimo, in its delicate, tripping style, reminds one a little of the menuet movement in Bizet's well-known "Suite L'Arlesienna." The third and last number was a quartet, Mr. Max Zach playing the second viola. The audience was a large one, and the occasion, on the whole, an auspicious opening of the season.

Boston Transcript

TUESDAY, OCTOBER 23, 1894.

Union Hall: The Kneisel Quartet.

The Kneisel Quartet, assisted by Mr. Max Zach, gave its first concert of the season in Union Hall last evening, the programme being as follows—

Haydn: Quartet in G major, opus 77, No. 1.
Sgambati: Quartet in D-flat major, opus 17.
Mozart: Quintet in G minor.

Among the many delightful impressions this concert left on the listener's mind was one by no means so pleasant. This was that Boston needs, and more sorely than ever, a new chamber-concert hall. Cheerful sightliness of aspect has gone out with the old Chickering Hall,—which was, however, never a very favorable place for strings. The new Chickering Hall is too small for such an audience as is drawn by the Kneisels, pretty and cosy as it is: and of the cheerfulness and sightlineis of the other chamber-concert halls in town, the less said, the better. Bumstead Hall is accouiticaly about as near perfection as the soul of man can desire; but even the perfection of musical effect is hardly enough to lure most people on to endure temporary incarceration in that pumpkin ampitheatre. And the other halls are neither pleasant to be in nor good for music. It took some time and no little effort to get over the first impression of the dim, distant tone of the strings in the Haydn quartet last evening; at first it seemed as if the quartet were playing half a mile off; then the evident nearness of the players cured this impression of distance, and the music sounded as if all the fovr bows had been rosined with soap. The faint little "whiz-whiz" one heard was about as much like a full string tone as the feeble "spit-spit" in Mark Twain's "Great French Duel" was like the crack of normal pistols. With the broader treatment and more sonorous scoring of the Sgambati quartet, the tone began better to conquer the poor acoustics of the hall; and, by the time the Mozart quintet came on, one had got tolerably accustomed to the effect—enough so, at least, to be able to enjoy the music.

Still, in spite of this drawback, one could see that the ever delightful Haydn quartet was admirably played. The Sgambati quartet is, we believe, now in Boston. The impression it made—and here we can speak only of first impressions—was distinctly fine. The work is full of beauty, dignity of feeling and expression, and poetic charm. It all sounded coherent and as if the composer both had something to say and knew how to say it. It is, however, music to which one must get acclimated, as it were, before thoroughly and unreservedly enjoying it. Sgambati is an Italian, if in some respects a rather Teutonizing one; and no one can rationally ask him to cast the skin of his nationality. The more frankly Italian he keeps himself, the better. Only we have not been used to finding this Italian flavor in instrumental chamber music, and it strikes us at first as somewhat disconcertingly exotic. Mozart, to be sure, had no little of the Italian in him; but his Italianism was complemented by his German nature and training, and his music in general shows the Italian warmth and grace far more than it does the Italian musical idiom or point of view. But Sgambati, in spite of his thorough studies in German music, remains Italian through and through, Italian in feeling as in expression, and, what is more, a distinctly modern Italian, one who has got far beyond the Mozart standpoint. Remember, too, that Italy has been from the beginning a civilized musical country; its musical evolution was slow, gradual, and wholly normal, and its musical idiom has none of that mere quaintness and quasi-barbaric zest one finds in that of the Slavs, Magyars or Scandinavians. Like the Germans, French, and English, the Italians are anything but musical barbarians; what of the primary folk-song element there is in their melody is civilized, to start with. Thus what may seem exotic in their instrumental chamber music lies more in its expression and suggestiveness than in its purely musical aspect; it keeps reminding us of things and scenes which do not ordinarily come before our mental vision at a chamber concert, and we find our imagination constantly impelled to stray from purely musical matter in a quite unwonted way. Of course this may strike the listener favorably, or unfavorably, according to his point of view. We are free to own that, with all our appreciation of the æsthetic value of the suggestive and picturesque side of music, we can not but feel in our heart of hearts that these elements have so triumphantly invaded almost all other domains of the art that it would be a comfort if instrumental chamber music could be kept as a sanctuary of refuge for the pure music-lover who gets quite enough of poetic suggestiveness and picturesqueness from other quarters. Sgambati last evening kept evoking such visions of twilight church ceremonies. with solemn choral song and curling incense-clouds, of prayers sung before shrines of the Madonna, and sinuous processions of mumbling monks, that our truant imagination left us little power to listen to his music simply as such. All this may have been very lovely and poetic, but it was not what we had come for. The fault is plainly in ourselves; but we were none the less musically incapacitated.

No doubt all this feeling may wear off with time and further acquaintance. Musical suggestiveness is surely a fine and beautiful thing in itself; it is only the unaccustomed, and hence not easily explained, suggestion that makes an inartistic impression. To take an example that has not been referred to perhaps quite as often as it deserves, it may be surmised with considerable reason that the orchestral writers of Haydn's and Mozart's day kept the trombones out of their scores, not so much because of any distaste for trombone effects in themselves, as because the trombone was at that time an instrument peculiarly associated with the Church, and they felt that any use of it in symphonic writing would impel the hearer to look for some ecclesiastical allusion in their music, such as was wholly foreign to their purpose; that the appearance of trombone harmonies in a symphony would inevitably throw the listener off the track and lead him to look for something in the music that was not there. Nowadays, when the trombone has long been a regular item in symphonic orchestration, it brings with it no sort of ecclesiastical suggestion, and our purely musical apprehension is no longer disturbed by it. In the same way, we have not been accustomed to have instrumental chamber-music call up poetic or picturesque visions before our mind's eye; and when it does we find it just to that extent perplexing. We have heard little chamber-music in the Italian idiom; and this idiom is so strongly associated in our minds with extra-musical things (through the opera), that we cannot at first help finding it extra-musically suggestive.

Still, as we have said, time and continued appropinquity should cure all this; we may soon be able to hear a thoroughly Italian quartet without thinking of anything elte. The performance last evening of Sgambati's work calls for nothing but the warmest admiration: it was more than perfect at every point.

The divine Mozart G minor quintet was admirably played; especially that thrice-wonderful dialogue of the first violin and viola in the slow movement was shown in all its superearthly beauty. Now and then Mr. Kneisel would make us feel the want of perfect Mozartean grace and buoyancy of phrasing; but not often. And, to be frank, who else could show us this? The perfect Mozart player is rara avis in terris.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 24, 1894.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

HERE are the dates and programs of the Boston Symphony Orchestral concerts in this city:

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 1.

Symphony in D (first time).....Sgambati
Aria.....
Mons. Plançon.
Tamburin, Gavotte and Chaconne.....Gluck
Symphonic Poem, "Phaeton".....Saint-Saëns
Aria.....
Mons. Plancon.
Overture, "Sappho" (first time).....Goldmark

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 6.

Symphony No. 7.....Beethoven
Concerto for violin.....
Mr. Thomson.
Overture, "Wem die Krone" (first time).....Ritter
"Carnival in Paris".....Svendsen
Symphonic Poem, "Les Préludes".....Liszt

THURSDAY, JANUARY 10.

Grand Wagner Program.
Solo numbers by Mme. Nordica.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 7.

Symphony No. 3, "Eroica".....Beethoven
Concerto for violoncello (MS., first time).....Loeffler
Mr. Schroeder.
Suite, "L'Arlesienne".....Bizet
Overture, "Genoveva".....Schumann

THURSDAY, MARCH 14.

Solo artist to be announced.
Symphonie Fantastique.....Berlioz
Ballet music, "Die Rebe".....Rubinstein
Overture.....Schumann
"Lenore No. 2".....Beethoven

These concerts will be given in the Metropolitan Opera House.

The program of the second Symphony concert was as follows:

Overture, "Carnaval Romain".....Berlioz
Recitative, "Where art thou, father?" } .....Dvorák
Air, "Mine did I once a lover call" }
(From "The Spectre's Bride.")
Miss Juch.
Symphony No. 3, in F major.....Chadwick
Songs, with piano.....Wagner
Miss Juch.
Ballet music, from "The Demon".....Rubinstein

The orchestra gave a brilliant performance of the music by Berlioz and Rubinstein. The pieces are familiar and require no comment.

The feature of the concert was the singing by Miss Juch of Wagner's "Dreams." In the aria, with its overladen accompaniment, there was occasionally a lack of freshness and strength; but in "Dreams" there was a display of exquisite art that embellished natural feeling.

You may say, "What! A song the feature of a concert, when a new symphony was produced for the first time and conducted by the composer?" And yet the answer is, "Yes."

It is not necessary to tell the story of Mr. Chadwick's career. He is not a man of promise, he is a man of actual performance. Whether you look at the "Melpomene" overture, the piano quintet, or the "Phœnix Expirans," you acknowledge gladly a talent that at times almost suggests genius.

But to me at least this symphony was a disappointment. Everywhere is there evidence of labor, thoughtfulness, sincerity and nobility of aim. I do not find, however, the spontaneity, the warm and sensuous coloring, the homogeneity that characterize his best work even when it is of small proportions.

As you know, this symphony was awarded the prize offered by the National Conservatory of Music. The fact alone that a symphony won a prize does not inspire confidence. There's that long winded geographical, anthropological and historical thing by Raff, to take an example Even a jury of professors may go astray, be frightened by the boldness or arrogance of deserving youth, be flattered by humble imitation of their own works, or complimented by evident respect paid their choicest theories. The prize piece may be either hopelessly academic or of flagrant originality. The road to the Temple of Fame is paved with prize compositions trodden under foot, forgotten by the cutthroat band that rush toward the closed door.

But this symphony by Mr. Chadwick does not openly suffer from its association with a prize. It is not academic in the sense that much of the music of Villiers-Stanford, Foote, Mackenzie is academic. Nor on the other hand is there a wild desire to bombard the firmament with rockets.

Mr. Chadwick has been sitting at the feet of Mr. Johannes Brahms. He has also listened—no doubt unconsciously—to the pleasing performance of Mr. Anton Dvorák on the celebrated instrument known as the Negro-Indian American pipe, which I believe is the invention of Messrs. Krehbiel & Company. Not that he has in any degree whatever copied either of these men. The feeling, the mood, however, of the first movement and the finale is Brahmsian. The scherzo contains a theme, first given out by a horn, which resembles the true Negro-American tune; it is not a Bohemian melody, strengthened or diluted, as you please, with Glenlivet for domestic use in Spilville, Ia. As I wrote in another newspaper, "The theme has a popular character that in the absence of a more precise phrase may be described as a folk song or wandering melody that is repeated by a negro, and undergoes modifications without the specific intent of the dusky singer. * * * It has the true mixture of reckless indifference and superficial melancholy." So again the scherzo is in the "American" mood of Dvorák. But Mr. Chadwick has avoided the mistake of trying deliberately to turn a serious work of art into a wandering booth where alleged folk songs are labeled and pointed out by the stick of the showman.

The first movement, an allegro sostenuto, suffers from the desire of the composer to give out a great amount of musical information. I admire his patience, and I admit the strength of certain passages, although the impression of the moment was one of technical proficiency rather than of invention or color. The movement is prolix, and the speaker at times hems and haws. More popular undoubtedly will be the second movement, a larghetto in B flat major, in which there is tunefulness; in which there is also more genuine passion than in the allegro that preceded. After one hearing the scherzo seemed to me the most characteristic and musical movement of the symphony. It is not so "intellectual," and perhaps for that reason may be only tolerated by those to whom the mission of music is to produce a knitting together of the eyebrows. But I recognize in it the man I know, the sane, humorous, brusque, imaginative, highly endowed Yankee. The finale shares with this scherzo the glory of the work. I like the broad and flowing second theme, the dramatic effects of syncopation. Yet other passages in this finale seemed dull and unnecessarily noisy.

In this symphony the modulations are often like the invitation given in dreams to climb a little higher to see the offered prospect; but these modulations prepare too often for disappointment; the view is one of commonplace, or a mist enshrouds it. Mr. Chadwick, on the other hand, has been most fortunate in suggesting, and by apparently simple means, the thought of mystery, as in the first movement by a use of horns and clarinets. The symphony is strong in the matter of rhythm, occasionally too strong, as when rhythm is tortured till it shrieks.

Much of the instrumentation seemed over studied, thick, without contrast. Mr. Chadwick in this work has displayed a passion for horns that is almost frenetic, and one is tempted to try a homœopathic remedy and ward off the evil by the finger horn of Italy.

The composer was received warmly and loudly applauded.

* * *

The program of the Symphony concert of the 27th will be Schubert's "Unfinished," Beethoven's E flat concerto for piano, and Schumann's C major symphony. Mr. Baermann will be the pianist.

The Kneisel Quartet will give a concert in Union Hall to-morrow evening. The program will be: Quartet, Haydn, G major, op. 77, No. 2; quartet, Sgambati, op. 17; Mozart, quintet, G minor. In the last piece Mr. Zach will play the second viola.

The Telegram.

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 25, 1894.

A BRIGHT OPENING.

The Symphony Orchestra Course Begins Most Delightfully.

Another season in Providence was begun in Infantry hall last night by the Poston Symphony orchestra, and, it can be said, very delightfully for patrons and agreeably, at least, for entertainers. The audience was good in size, and, as usual, it represented the cream of the city's population. Suburban people were numerous also. The success of the occasion was a strong proof that Mr. Higginson's orchestra is very thoroughly intrenched here, and that its concerts are recognized as events of the first order by the culture of the town.

The performance was most interesting, and enjoyable, to the last notes. The introduction of Sgambati's No. 1 symphony was a rich thing, and the gathering to an individual attested the great appreciation the musicians aroused. This work was a new one. The other numbers, "Egmont" overture, by Beethoven, and ballet music, "Daemon," by Rubinstein, were brilliantly given. The advent of Mr. Paul Plancon, the baritone who has just come to America, metaphorically decorated with the tokens of vocal achievements in European halls and theaters, was a matter of considerable moment. He rendered two arias, and in each demonstrated the remarkable clearness, strength and flexibility of his voice, the excellence of his style and his power to regale in large measure.

Manager Ellis is to be congratulated that the inauguration in toto was so satisfactory. The second concert will occur Nov. 14.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

First Performance of the Season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The first concert of the season was given at Infantry Hall last night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. There was a brilliant programme and the usual superb playing. Some few changes have been made in the personnel of the organization since last year, presumably for the better, though it is difficult to detect improvement in what seemed already well-nigh perfect. At any rate, the ensemble has lost nothing of its magnificent vigor and unanimity of action, beautiful tone quality, or power of accurate and graceful shading. At the conductor's desk Mr. Emil Paur presented the same intelligent and musicianly readings that marked the work of his first season, and indicated his wishes to the orchestra in his peculiarly energetic and not over-graceful manner. The programme was as follows:

Beethoven.....Overture, "Egmont"
Verdi.....Aria, "Don Carlos"
Sgambati.....Symphony No. 1
I. Allegro vivace, non troppo (D major).
II. Andante mesto (G minor).
III. Scherzo: Presto (B-flat major).
Trio: Un poco meno (G-flat major).
IV. Serenata: Andante (D minor).
V. Finale: Allegro con fuoco (D major).
Schumann.....Song, "The Two Grenadiers"
Rubinstein.....Ballet Music, "Daemon"

Beethoven's overture to Goethe's tragedy of "Egmont," which opened the concert, was played with superb elan and vigor. Mr. William F. Apthorp, in his programme notes, calls attention to the fact that although the work is on a tragic subject and its thematic material is of the grandest and most nobly heroic, its form is practically cast in the model of the light Italian opera overture. It might be further said that no composer of Italian operas who has ever lived could construct so solid a piece of music in that or any other form; it is Beethoven all the way through—and Beethoven at his best.

The principal number, and also the novelty of the programme, was Sgambati's Symphony No. 1, in D major. The impression left after the first hearing of this work, is that of having seen some new and unknown tropical bird of gorgeous and dazzling plumage. There is in it enought of brilliant-hued and kaleidoscopic orchestration to furnish forth a full half-dozen symphonies of the everyday sort. This is the first and most lasting impression, although one catches glimpses while being hurried along of cunning construction, and feels the presence of a master hand. There are bits of melody that suggest Wagner, tricks of instrumentation worthy of Berlioz, and a gorgeous prodigality like unto that of Verdi, but all without sense of plagiarism. It was pleasant to listen to—one of those things one would gladly hear again.

The ballet music from Rubinstein's opera "The Demon," reflects all that original composer's somewhat peculiar genius, and, delightfully played by the orchestra, made a pleasing finish to the programme.

The vocalist of the evening was Mons. Pol Plancon, the famous basso of Abbey, Schoeffel & Grau's opera company, who made his debut in this country with them last season, and fairly divided the honors with the great Edouard de Reszke. The French basso is a large man of fine stage presence, with a very powerful voice of agreeable quality. The position which he holds is a sufficient guarantee of his artistic worth. The power of his vocal organ was well tested in his aria from Verdi's "Don Carlos," the accompaniment to which would have overcome any ordinary voice, but which he seemed to have no difficulty in dominating at will. His second number, Schumann's famous "Two Grenadiers," with its inspiring "Marsellaise" for a final climax, was given with great fire and energy, and provoked a most determined attempt at an encore. This was, however, declined, although the singer returned to bow his acknowledgments of the enthusiastic applause some five or six times.

The audience was of about the usual size seen at the Symphony concerts, and all seemed pleased to greet again the country's finest orchestra. Both programme and performance were worthy of the liberal applause which was bestowed upon every number.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 24, 1894.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

HERE are the dates and programs of the Boston Symphony Orchestral concerts in this city:

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 1.

Symphony in D (first time).....Sgambati
Aria.....
Mons. Plançon.
Tamburin, Gavotte and Chaconne.....Gluck
Symphonic Poem, "Phaeton".....Saint-Saëns
Aria.....
Mons. Plancon.
Overture, "Sappho" (first time).....Goldmark

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 6.

Symphony No. 7.....Beethoven
Concerto for violin.....
Mr. Thomson.
Overture, "Wem die Krone" (first time).....Ritter
"Carnival in Paris".....Svendsen
Symphonic Poem, "Les Préludes".....Liszt

THURSDAY, JANUARY 10.

Grand Wagner Program.
Solo numbers by Mme. Nordica.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 7.

Symphony No. 8, "Eroica".....Beethoven
Concerto for violoncello (MS., first time).....Loeffler
Mr. Schroeder.
Suite, "L'Arlesienne".....Bizet
Overture, "Genoveva".....Schumann

THURSDAY, MARCH 14.

Solo artist to be announced.
Symphonie Fantastique.....Berlioz
Ballet music, "Die Rebe".....Rubinstein
Overture.....Schumann
"Lenore No. 2".....Beethoven

These concerts will be given in the Metropolitan Opera House.

The program of the second Symphony concert was as follows:

Overture, "Carnaval Romain".....Berlioz
Recitative, "Where art thou, father?"
Air, "Mine did I once a lover call".....Dvorák
(From "The Spectre's Bride.")
Miss Juch.
Symphony No. 3, in F major.....Chadwick
Songs, with piano.....Wagner
Miss Juch.
Ballet music, from "The Demon".....Rubinstein

The orchestra gave a brilliant performance of the music by Berlioz and Rubinstein. The pieces are familiar and require no comment.

The feature of the concert was the singing by Miss Juch of Wagner's "Dreams." In the aria, with its overladen accompaniment, there was occasionally a lack of freshness and strength; but in "Dreams" there was a display of exquisite art that embellished natural feeling.

You may say, "What! A song the feature of a concert, when a new symphony was produced for the first time and conducted by the composer?" And yet the answer is, "Yes."

It is not necessary to tell the story of Mr. Chadwick's career. He is not a man of promise, he is a man of actual performance. Whether you look at the "Melpomene" overture, the piano quintet, or the "Phœnix Expirans," you acknowledge gladly a talent that at times almost suggests genius.

But to me at least this symphony was a disappointment. Everywhere is there evidence of labor, thoughtfulness, sincerity and nobility of aim. I do not find, however, the spontaneity, the warm and sensuous coloring, the homogeneity that characterize his best work even when it is of small proportions.

As you know, this symphony was awarded the prize offered by the National Conservatory of Music. The fact alone that a symphony won a prize does not inspire confidence. There's that long winded geographical, anthropological and historical thing by Raff, to take an example Even a jury of professors may go astray, be frightened by the boldness or arrogance of deserving youth, be flattered by humble imitation of their own works, or complimented by evident respect paid their choicest theories. The prize piece may be either hopelessly academic or of flagrant originality. The road to the Temple of Fame is paved with prize compositions trodden under foot, forgotten by the cutthroat band that rush toward the closed door.

But this symphony by Mr. Chadwick does not openly suffer from its association with a prize. It is not academic in the sense that much of the music of Villiers-Stanford, Foote, Mackenzie is academic. Nor on the other hand is there a wild desire to bombard the firmament with rockets.

Mr. Chadwick has been sitting at the feet of Mr. Johannes Brahms. He has also listened—no doubt unconsciously—to the pleasing performance of Mr. Anton Dvorák on the celebrated instrument known as the Negro-Indian American pipe, which I believe is the invention of Messrs. Krehbiel & Company. Not that he has in any degree whatever copied either of these men. The feeling, the mood, however, of the first movement and the finale is Brahmsian. The scherzo contains a theme, first given out by a horn, which resembles the true Negro-American tune; it is not a Bohemian melody, strengthened or diluted, as you please, with Glenlivet for domestic use in Spilville, Ia. As I wrote in another newspaper, "The theme has a popular character that in the absence of a more precise phrase may be described as a folk song or wandering melody that is repeated by a negro, and undergoes modifications without the specific intent of the dusky singer. * * * It has the true mixture of reckless indifference and superficial melancholy." So again the scherzo is in the "American" mood of Dvorák. But Mr. Chadwick has avoided the mistake of trying deliberately to turn a serious work of art into a wandering booth where alleged folk songs are labeled and pointed out by the stick of the showman.

The first movement, an allegro sostenuto, suffers from the desire of the composer to give out a great amount of musical information. I admire his patience, and I admit the strength of certain passages, although the impression of the moment was one of technical proficiency rather than of invention or color. The movement is prolix, and the speaker at times hems and haws. More popular undoubtedly will be the second movement, a larghetto in B flat major, in which there is tunefulness; in which there is also more genuine passion than in the allegro that preceded. After one hearing the scherzo seemed to me the most characteristic and musical movement of the symphony. It is not so "intellectual," and perhaps for that reason may be only tolerated by those to whom the mission of music is to produce a knitting together of the eyebrows. But I recognize in it the man I know, the sane, humorous, brusque, imaginative, highly endowed Yankee. The finale shares with this scherzo the glory of the work. I like the broad and flowing second theme, the dramatic effects of syncopation. Yet other passages in this finale seemed dull and unnecessarily noisy.

In this symphony the modulations are often like the invitation given in dreams to climb a little higher to see the offered prospect; but these modulations prepare too often for disappointment; the view is one of commonplace, or a mist enshrouds it. Mr. Chadwick, on the other hand, has been most fortunate in suggesting, and by apparently simple means, the thought of mystery, as in the first movement by a use of horns and clarinets. The symphony is strong in the matter of rhythm, occasionally too strong, as when rhythm is tortured till it shrieks.

Much of the instrumentation seemed over studied, thick, without contrast. Mr. Chadwick in this work has displayed a passion for horns that is almost frenetic, and one is tempted to try a homœopathic remedy and ward off the evil by the finger horn of Italy.

The composer was received warmly and loudly applauded.

* * *

The program of the Symphony concert of the 27th will be Schubert's "Unfinished," Beethoven's E flat concerto for piano, and Schumann's C major symphony. Mr. Baermann will be the pianist.

The Kneisel Quartet will give a concert in Union Hall to-morrow evening. The program will be: Quartet, Haydn, G major, op. 77, No. 2; quartet, Sgambati, op. 17; Mozart, quintet, G minor. In the last piece Mr. Zach will play the second viola.

The Telegram.

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 25, 1894.

A BRIGHT OPENING.

The Symphony Orchestra Course Begins Most Delightfully.

Another season in Providence was begun in Infantry hall last night by the Boston Symphony orchestra, and, it can be said, very delightfully for patrons and agreeably, at least, for entertainers. The audience was good in size, and, as usual, it represented the cream of the city's population. Suburban people were numerous also. The success of the occasion was a strong proof that Mr. Higginson's orchestra is very thoroughly intrenched here, and that its concerts are recognized as events of the first order by the culture of the town.

The performance was most interesting, and enjoyable, to the last notes. The introduction of Sgambati's No. 1 symphony was a rich thing, and the gathering to an individual attested the great appreciation the musicians aroused. This work was a new one. The other numbers, "Egmont" overture, by Beethoven, and ballet music, "Daemon," by Rubinstein, were brilliantly given. The advent of Mr. Paul Plancon, the baritone who has just come to America, metaphorically decorated with the tokens of vocal achievements in European halls and theaters, was a matter of considerable moment. He rendered two arias, and in each demonstrated the remarkable clearness, strength and flexibility of his voice, the excellence of his style and his power to regale in large measure.

Manager Ellis is to be congratulated that the inauguration in toto was so satisfactory. The second concert will occur Nov. 14.

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 25, 1894.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

First Performance of the Season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The first concert of the season was given at Infantry Hall last night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. There was a brilliant programme and the usual superb playing. Some few changes have been made in the personnel of the organization since last year, presumably for the better, though it is difficult to detect improvement in what seemed already well-nigh perfect. At any rate, the ensemble has lost nothing of its magnificent vigor and unanimity of action, beautiful tone quality, or power of accurate and graceful shading. At the conductor's desk Mr. Emil Paur presented the same intelligent and musicianly readings that marked the work of his first season, and indicated his wishes to the orchestra in his peculiarly energetic and not over-graceful manner. The programme was as follows:

Beethoven.....Overture, "Egmont"
Verdi.....Aria, "Don Carlos"
Sgambati.....Symphony No. 1
I. Allegro vivace, non troppo (D major).
II. Andante mesto (G minor).
III. Scherzo: Presto (B-flat major).
Trio: Un poco meno (G-flat major).
IV. Serenata: Andante (D minor).
V. Finale: Allegro con fuoco (D major).
Schumann.....Song, "The Two Grenadiers"
Rubinstein.....Ballet Music, "Daemon"

Beethoven's overture to Goethe's tragedy of "Egmont," which opened the concert, was played with superb elan and vigor. Mr. William F. Apthorp, in his programme notes, calls attention to the fact that although the work is on a tragic subject and its thematic material is of the grandest and most nobly heroic, its form is practically cast in the model of the light Italian opera overture. It might be further said that no composer of Italian operas who has ever lived could construct so solid a piece of music in that or any other form; it is Beethoven all the way through—and Beethoven at his best.

The principal number, and also the novelty of the programme, was Sgambati's Symphony No. 1, in D major. The impression left after the first hearing of this work, is that of having seen some new and unknown tropical bird of gorgeous and dazzling plumage. There is in it enought of brilliant-hued and kaleidoscopic orchestration to furnish forth a full half-dozen symphonies of the everyday sort. This is the first and most lasting impression, although one catches glimpses while being hurried along of cunning construction, and feels the presence of a master hand. There are bits of melody that suggest Wagner, tricks of instrumentation worthy of Berlioz, and a gorgeous prodigality like unto that of Verdi, but all without sense of plagiarism. It was pleasant to listen to—one of those things one would gladly hear again.

The ballet music from Rubinstein's opera "The Demon," reflects all that original composer's somewhat peculiar genius, and, delightfully played by the orchestra, made a pleasing finish to the programme.

The vocalist of the evening was Mons. Pol Plancon, the famous basso of Abbey, Schoeffel & Grau's opera company, who made his debut in this country with them last season, and fairly divided the honors with the great Edouard de Reszke. The French basso is a large man of fine stage presence, with a very powerful voice of agreeable quality. The position which he holds is a sufficient guarantee of his artistic worth. The power of his vocal organ was well tested in his aria from Verdi's "Don Carlos," the accompaniment to which would have overcome any ordinary voice, but which he seemed to have no difficulty in dominating at will. His second number, Schumann's famous "Two Grenadiers," with its inspiring "Marsellaise" for a final climax, was given with great fire and energy, and provoked a most determined attempt at an encore. This was, however, declined, although the singer returned to bow his acknowledgments of the enthusiastic applause some five or six times.

The audience was of about the usual size seen at the Symphony concerts, and all seemed pleased to greet again the country's finest orchestra. Both programme and performance were worthy of the liberal applause which was bestowed upon every number.

...NG BULLETIN.

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 25, 1894.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

First Performance of the Season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The first concert of the season was given at Infantry Hall last night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. There was a brilliant programme and the usual superb playing. Some few changes have been made in the personnel of the organization since last year, presumably for the better, though it is difficult to detect improvement in what seemed already well-nigh perfect. At any rate, the ensemble has lost nothing of its magnificent vigor and unanimity of action, beautiful tone quality, or power of accurate and graceful shading. At the conductor's desk Mr. Emil Paur presented the same intelligent and musicianly readings that marked the work of his first season, and indicated his wishes to the orchestra in his peculiarly energetic and not over-graceful manner. The programme was as follows:

Beethoven.....Overture, "Egmont"
Verdi.....Aria, "Don Carlos"
Sgambati.....Symphony No. 1
I. Allegro vivace, non troppo (D major).
II. Andante mesto (G minor).
III. Scherzo: Presto (B-flat major).
Trio: Un poco meno (G-flat major).
IV. Serenata: Andante (D minor).
V. Finale: Allegro con fuoco (D major).
Schumann.....Song, "The Two Grenadiers"
Rubinstein.....Ballet Music, "Daemon"

Beethoven's overture to Goethe's tragedy of "Egmont," which opened the concert, was played with superb elan and vigor. Mr. William F. Apthorp, in his programme notes, calls attention to the fact that although the work is on a tragic subject and its thematic material is of the grandest and most nobly heroic, its form is practically cast in the model of the light Italian opera overture. It might be further said that no composer of Italian operas who has ever lived could construct so solid a piece of music in that or any other form; it is Beethoven all the way through—and Beethoven at his best.

The principal number, and also the novelty of the programme, was Sgambati's Symphony No. 1, in D major. The impression left after the first hearing of this work, is that of having seen some new and unknown tropical bird of gorgeous and dazzling plumage. There is in it enought of brilliant-hued and kaleidoscopic orchestration to furnish forth a full half-dozen symphonies of the everyday sort. This is the first and most lasting impression, although one catches glimpses while being hurried along of cunning construction, and feels the presence of a master hand. There are bits of melody that suggest Wagner, tricks of instrumentation worthy of Berlioz, and a gorgeous prodigality like unto that of Verdi, but all without sense of plagiarism. It was pleasant to listen to—one of those things one would gladly hear again.

The ballet music from Rubinstein's opera "The Demon," reflects all that original composer's somewhat peculiar genius, and, delightfully played by the orchestra, made a pleasing finish to the programme.

The vocalist of the evening was Mons. Pol Plancon, the famous basso of Abbey, Schoeffel & Grau's opera company, who made his debut in this country with them last season, and fairly divided the honors with the great Edouard de Reszke. The French basso is a large man of fine stage presence, with a very powerful voice of agreeable quality. The position which he holds is a sufficient guarantee of his artistic worth. The power of his vocal organ was well tested in his aria from Verdi's "Don Carlos," the accompaniment to which would have overcome any ordinary voice, but which he seemed to have no difficulty in dominating at will. His second number, Schumann's famous "Two Grenadiers," with its inspiring "Marseillaise" for a final climax, was given with great fire and energy, and provoked a most determined attempt at an encore. This was, however, declined, although the singer returned to bow his acknowledgments of the enthusiastic applause some five or six times.

The audience was of about the usual size seen at the Symphony concerts, and all seemed pleased to greet again the country's finest orchestra. Both programme and performance were worthy of the liberal applause which was bestowed upon every number.

Philadelphia Abend-Post.

Freitag, 26. Oktober 1894.

Boston Symphonie Orchester.

Dieses berühmte Orchester wird während dieser Saison, wie aus einer Anzeige in einer anderen Spalte d. Bl. hervorgeht, fünf Symphonie-Konzerte unter Mitwirkung von prominenten Solisten veranstalten. Herr Emil Paur ist auch jetzt der Dirigent des Orchesters. Unter den Solisten sind Mrs. Julie M. Wyman, (Sopran,) Miß Adele aus der Ohe (Piano), Mr. E. Ysaye (Violine) und andere mehr. Dem Vernehmen, der erst kürzlich herüber gekommen ist und dem ein vortheilhafter Ruf vorausgeht, ist hier noch nicht gehört worden. Das erste Konzert findet nächsten Montag statt.

Boston Transcript

SATURDAY, OCTOBER, 27, 1894.

THE ART ATMOSPHERE IN NEW YORK AND BOSTON.

Mr. Chadwick's latest symphony, just offered to our hearing, meets with distinguished consideration from Mr. H. E. Krehbiel, who discusses the work at length in the New York Tribune, illustrating his comments with quotations from the work. The illustrations, to be sure, are not always legible, but the intention is kindly. Of interest apart from the critical analysis of the symphony are Mr. Krehbiel's remarks concerning the difference of the musical atmosphere of New York and Boston. There are more concerts and better performances to be heard in the larger city, but in New York the air surrounding musical affairs is self-contained and strictly professional. It is possible in New York to give three or four concerts of magnitude on the same evening without causing a commotion among musicians or public, and a manifestation of concern in the artistic outcome of a concert in which he has taken part is never seen in an orchestral player. An explanation of this indifference is found in the large number of skilled players in the city. Mr. Krehbiel has authority for the statement that New York can furnish orchestral players who can read at sight in numbers far beyond the available supply—outside of the organized orchestras which are in constant service—in any of the European capitals, not even excepting Vienna.

So much for New York. In Boston, according ty Mr. Krehbiel, there is much less of the commercial element, the young native musicians are more numerous, and the feeling of pride in their work is far more marked among the players of high-class orchestral music. The guild spirit here being more vital than in New York, it follows that resident composers have more encouragement with us, so far at least as performances of their works are incentives to labor. Later, Mr. Krehbiel expresses his views of the critical faculty among us, or rather his inability to determine what is our standard of judgment. He writes—

I confess that I do not know what constitutes musical orthodoxy in Boston. Sometimes it seems to be simply the other kind of "doxy," that is, the kind not exemplified in the work under the critical scalpel. And such a conclusion is confusing when the programmes are as varied as are those of Mr. Paur, who loves Liszt and dallies with dances.

A compliment may be drawn from between the lines of this confession. If we have reached the point where admiration, properly tempered, may be felt and expressed alike for a Strauss waltz and a Wagner music drama, we stand on the highest plane of esthetic culture. If we could only be sure that that distinction is ours—but it is not yet certain that taste is so sound among our connoisseurs that music can be heard and judged on its own merits without regard to its source, except, perhaps, by a few enlightened amateurs who are not indebted to teachers or conservatories at home or abroad for their critical or appreciative faculties. As for the professional critics among us, who, like professional critics all the world over, are as often guided by popular opinion as they guide it, if they have not the guild spirit of the musicians, all the more to their credit—setting aside the question of their capacity, individually or collectively considered. It seems, however, that they cannot be collectively considered, according to Mr. Krehbiel, who is, therefore, confused in his attempts to formulate a musical creed from the comments in our newspapers on works, singers or players. How much better is the New York way! There they have the guild spirit among the recognized, though not organized, academicians. When you take up the Morning Trumpet and read the judgment of this opera or that pianist, just appealing for metropolitan favors, you need rarely go further to learn the opinions of the guild. The Noonday Clarion and the Afternoon Annunciator will read the same in spirit, and so too will the serials especially devoted to music, the Weekly Diapason and the Monthly Harmonica. It is very soothing, this freedom from contention among the chosen few, but it may chance to stand in the way of progress, as for instance should a composer who is not a friend of some one of the guild attempt to gain a hearing for a new work in New York; for they do say that there have been productions in New York of works, favorably received elsewhere, which have been deliberately neglected by the entire gang—beg pardon, College of Critics—because Mr. X or Mr. Z of the coterie has passed the word for faint praise or concealed censure or absolute indifference. But the charge that the methods of the trade unions have thus been imitated is really too shocking!

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, OCT. 28, 1894.

THE WEEK'S CONCERTS—CHAMBER, OPERATIC AND SYMPHONY.

The first concert of the week came on Monday evening and began the tenth season of the Kneisel Quartette. With the assistance of Mr. Zach for the second viola, they presented this programme:—

Quartette, G major, op. 77.....Haydn
Quartette, D flat, op. 17.....Sgambati
Quartette, G minor.....Mozart

Of these works the Sgambati was awaited with curiosity and expectancy, because its author is known as one of that group of younger Italians who has shown themselves as particularly sensitive to trans-Alpine influences and who have sought to build up an "Italia redenta" in music as well as in political, intellectual and religious life. Those who have known the man will have difficulty in discovering him in this strange music, and can only accept it as expressive of him if they believe that he is in a transition period, his entire and successful emergence from which it depends upon time to determine. Quiet, reserved almost to diffidence, sensitive, fastidious, inclined to elegance, gracefulness and even gentleness of style in his careful and conscientious work as a pianist, it is not easy to account for the outbursts of emotion, the dark fulness of color, the sudden shifts of mood, the audacity, the harshness and the positive ugliness which appear here side by side, with passages of sustained delicacy, tenderness, gravity and almost of pathos. It seems as if his nature, restrained and suppressed in the formalism of clerical Rome and the narrow-minded conventionalism of melodic composition, had been set free all at once without an adequate knowledge of itself or of the many influences and temptations to which it was to be instantly exposed. The friendship and teaching of Liszt may have added extravagance to expansion, and acquaintance with modern Germany provoked the desire to use his liberty of progress by running almost at random through the fields laid open before him. Hence it is while there are evidences of high and noble talent expressing itself in forms of beanty instinct with appealing spirit, there are rough, irregular and incomprehensible portions which spring out without apparent reason and disappear as causelessly. The equable spirit of the ideal quartette, which may rise almost to exuberance and sink almost to despair, is wanting, and one concludes that invariable and almost irresponsible moods he had seized upon the string quartette in this attempt to express what was not absolutely formulated, mainly because its vocal fulness and flexibility offered a better chance toward success. The ardor, impetuosity and almost desperate energy of the work, as well as its fervor of acceptable feeling and its rich beauty. were particularly apparent in the contrast which it made with the other two compositions, each so characteristic of the master who wrote it and each a model of succinctness and proportion.

The audience was large and fine, and the players did admirable justice to their tasks, even though the close and over-heated air perplexed the strings at times out of their truth of intonation.

The third Symphony programme needs no comment as such. It was made up of three works which have been long known and beloved of all who are familiar with classic orchestral music of earlier and later date. These works were: the "Unfinished" symphony of Schubert; the fifth, or "Emperor," pianoforte concerto of Beethoven; and Schumann's first symphony. Although each of these might well be the theme of extended laudation and particularized admiration, yet their mere nomination will reveal the tender beauty of the first, so softly melodious and graciously harmonized that one is almost glad that it ends as it does, in imaginative expectancy of a corresponding close; of the nobility and candor alike in the strength, the gentleness and the gayety, of the second; and the resonant volume and frequent splendor of the third. It is only incumbent upon us, then, to say something of the performance, which might be promptly and justly summed up in some simple phrase of large and general admiration. But we cannot pass by Mr. Baermann's rendering of the concerto without a special tribute to him and to his art. He is ever the same devoted, earnest, self-forgetful player, who bends over his keyboard as the rapt 'cellist over his instrument or as the violinist takes his close to his bowed face, and he ever plays as if he and his music were alone together, with never a thought of hearers to be affected, still less astonished or dazzled by strange infusions of personality or displays of virtuosity. As his art ripens, it seems to grow richer also, so that especially in the deeper authors, and above all in Beethoven, it represents the very heart of the music, while giving all the "limbs and outward flourishes" their full grace, power and scope. A catholic and generous musician, familiar and sympathetic with all good schools, we still like to associate him first of all with Beethoven and—without even dreaming of any comparison between him and other eminent exemplars of the best piano playing—we are glad that he is a Bostonian by choice of residence and affiliation, and that Boston delights to honor him.

The orchestra did fine and concordant work in all the programme and the first movement of the concerto was an exceptional illustration of complete unity of feeling between soloist, band and conductor. There were more opportunities than in the previous concerts for the new clarinet to be heard, and it spoke with beautiful, equal tone and phrasing.

No concert this week; but a week later the programme will be Smetana's "Purchased Bride" overture; Sgambati's first symphony, new to Boston; and the first "Arlesienne" suite of Bizet.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, OCTOBER 28, 1894.

The Third Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall, Under Mr. Paur.

The program of the third Symphony concert was as follows:

Symphony, "Unfinished".....Schubert
Concerto in E flat for piano.....Beethoven
Mr. Baermann, pianist.
Symphony, C major.....Schumann

One charm of the immortal fragment by Schubert is that the symphony is unfinished. The slow movement does not stand on the same level with the supernatural allegro, and they that know and love Schubert the best are thankful that he never composed a scherzo and finale. The long works of the great melodist are generally a long decrescendo of musical interest. As it is, there is the curiosity as to what he might have done with this projected symphony if his life had been spared and he had learned to prune and condense; and there is also the thought of the colossal impudence of the German who, a few years ago, patched together two movements and finished it for him.

The fragment remains, and the allegro will be a delight for all times, not so much because of the charming, eminently Schubertian second theme first sung by the cellos, as because of the romantic atmosphere that enwraps the music, from the simple opening measures to the end. Or who can even forget that apparently inevitable modulation that introduces the theme above mentioned, or who is not moved mightily by the opening of the free fantasia, the yearning of passion that sees, as from a tower, the end of all?

About the proper tempo of the famous second theme there has been much dispute. Some take it too fast, and it is then as though ground out by an orchestrion. Others drag it; they deliberately check the organic rhythm which should be a pulse to the musical body, and play it with puling sentiment, creating an adagio. If Mr. Paur erred at all, it was slightly, and on the side of slowness. As for the second movement, it is pretty and popular, and there are delightful harmonic surprises; but, as I have said, it has not the overwhelming individuality of the movement that precedes.

***

Mr. Baermann gave a very fine performance of the great concerto. Not that it was equally admirable throughout, for in the finale there were occasional traces of restlessness that was not under absolute control, and the "loud-pedal," so called, was used at times too freely. But, on the whole, the performance was one to be remembered; it was so thoughtful, so well considered, so free from "virtuosity" in its objectionable form. There was no feeling of deadly rivalry between the piano and its old enemy the orchestra. Mr. Paur conducted the concerto like a master, and the few slips in intonation in the first movement could be pardoned easily, as the temperature of the hall was not favorable to either wind or string instruments.

***

The crowning glory of the Schumann Symphony is the wondrous adagio, probably the greatest slow movement composed since Beethoven's time. It is the fashion for writers on Schumann to pat him on the head, and in speaking of this symphony to say, "The fruits of his contrapuntal studies are here in graceful abundance." But one of these fruits is indeed a dry and withered thing. I refer to the staccato counterpoint that follows the first succession of violin trills. What in the world did Schumann mean by following such a superb climax by measures which suggest the class room and blackboard? Fortunately they are few in number.

So, too, I fail to see beauty or strength in the two trios of the scherzo, which by the way was played with infinite accuracy as well as dash. Of these trios, the second is the more offensive, for offensive is not too strong a word to use in this connection. Stiff are they both, and also are they dry.

***

The hall was crowded. After the Schubert symphony and the concerto, there was most hearty applause.

PHILIP HALE.

The program of the Symphony concert, Nov. 10 will be, overture, "Die Verkaufte Braut," Smetana; Sgambati's 1st symphony (first time at these concerts); Bizet's suite "L'Arlesienne" No. 1.

THE EVENING BULLETIN.

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 25, 1894.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

First Performance of the Season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The first concert of the season was given at Infantry Hall last night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. There was a brilliant programme and the usual superb playing. Some few changes have been made in the personnel of the organization since last year, presumably for the better, though it is difficult to detect improvement in what seemed already well-nigh perfect. At any rate, the ensemble has lost nothing of its magnificent vigor and unanimity of action, beautiful tone quality, or power of accurate and graceful shading. At the conductor's desk Mr. Emil Paur presented the same intelligent and musicianly readings that marked the work of his first season, and indicated his wishes to the orchestra in his peculiarly energetic and not over-graceful manner. The programme was as follows:

Beethoven.....Overture, "Egmont"
Verdi.....Aria, "Don Carlos"
Sgambati.....Symphony No. 1
I. Allegro vivace, non troppo (D major).
II. Andante mesto (G minor).
III. Scherzo: Presto (B-flat major).
Trio: Un poco meno (G-flat major).
IV. Serenata: Andante (D major).
V. Finale: Allegro con fuoco (D major).
Schumann.....Song, "The Two Grenadiers"
Rubinstein.....Ballet Music, "Daemon"

Beethoven's overture to Goethe's tragedy of "Egmont," which opened the concert, was played with superb elan and vigor. Mr. William F. Apthorp, in his programme notes, calls attention to the fact that although the work is on a tragic subject and its thematic material is of the grandest and most nobly heroic, its form is practically cast in the model of the light Italian opera overture. It might be further said that no composer of Italian operas who has ever lived could construct so solid a piece of music in that or any other form; it is Beethoven all the way through—and Beethoven at his best.

The principal number, and also the novelty of the programme, was Sgambati's Symphony No. 1, in D major. The impression left after the first hearing of this work, is that of having seen some new and unknown tropical bird of gorgeous and dazzling plumage. There is in it enought of brilliant-hued and kaleidoscopic orchestration to furnish forth a full half-dozen symphonies of the everyday sort. This is the first and most lasting impression, although one catches glimpses while being hurried along of cunning construction, and feels the presence of a master hand. There are bits of melody that suggest Wagner, tricks of instrumentation worthy of Berlioz, and a gorgeous prodigality like unto that of Verdi, but all without sense of plagiarism. It was pleasant to listen to—one of those things one would gladly hear again.

The ballet music from Rubinstein's opera "The Demon," reflects all that original composer's somewhat peculiar genius, and, delightfully played by the orchestra, made a pleasing finish to the programme.

The vocalist of the evening was Mons. Pol Plancon, the famous basso of Abbey, Schoeffel & Grau's opera company, who made his debut in this country with them last season, and fairly divided the honors with the great Edouard de Reszke. The French basso is a large man of fine stage presence, with a very powerful voice of agreeable quality. The position which he holds is a sufficient guarantee of his artistic worth. The power of his vocal organ was well tested in his aria from Verdi's "Don Carlos," the accompaniment to which would have overcome any ordinary voice, but which he seemed to have no difficulty in dominating at will. His second number, Schumann's famous "Two Grenadiers," with its inspiring "Marsellaise" for a final climax, was given with great fire and energy, and provoked a most determined attempt at an encore. This was, however, declined, although the singer returned to bow his acknowledgments of the enthusiastic applause some five or six times.

The audience was of about the usual size seen at the Symphony concerts, and all seemed pleased to greet again the country's finest orchestra. Both programme and performance were worthy of the liberal applause which was bestowed upon every number.

Philadelphia Abend-Post.

Freitag, 26. Oktober 1894.

Boston Symphonie Orchester. Dieses berühmte Orchester wird während dieser Saison, wie aus einer Anzeige in einer anderen Spalte d. Bl. hervorgeht, fünf Symphonie-Konzerte unter Mitwirkung von prominenten Solisten veranstalten. Herr Emil Paur ist auch jetzt der Dirigent des Orchesters. Unter den Solisten sind Mrs. Julie M. Wyman, (Sopran,) Miß Adele aus der Ohe (Piano), Mr. E. Ysaye (Violine) und andere mehr. Dem Letzteren, der erst kürzlich herüber gekommen ist und dem ein vortheilhafter Ruf vorausgeht, ist hier noch nicht gehört worden. Das erste Konzert findet nächsten Montag statt.

Boston Transcript

SATURDAY, OCTOBER, 27, 1894.

THE ART ATMOSPHERE IN NEW YORK AND BOSTON.

Mr. Chadwick's latest symphony, just offered to our hearing, meets with distinguished consideration from Mr. H. E. Krehbiel, who discusses the work at length in the New York Tribune, illustrating his comments with quotations from the work. The illustrations, to be sure, are not always legible, but the intention is kindly. Of interest apart from the critical analysis of the symphony are Mr. Krehbiel's remarks concerning the difference of the musical atmosphere of New York and Boston. There are more concerts and better performances to be heard in the larger city, but in New York the air surrounding musical affairs is self-contained and strictly professional. It is possible in New York to give three or four concerts of magnitude on the same evening without causing a commotion among musicians or public, and a manifestation of concern in the artistic outcome of a concert in which he has taken part is never seen in an orchestral player. An explanation of this indifference is found in the large number of skilled players in the city. Mr. Krehbiel has authority for the statement that New York can furnish orchestral players who can read at sight in numbers far beyond the available supply—outside of the organized orchestras which are in constant service—in any of the European capitals, not even excepting Vienna.

So much for New York. In Boston, according ty Mr. Krehbiel, there is much less of the commercial element, the young native musicians are more numerous, and the feeling of pride in their work is far more marked among the players of high-class orchestral music. The guild spirit here being more vital than in New York, it follows that resident composers have more encouragement with us, so far at least as performances of their works are incentives to labor. Later, Mr. Krehbiel expresses his views of the critical faculty among us, or rather his inability to determine what is our standard of judgment. He writes—

> I confess that I do not know what constitutes musical orthodoxy in Boston. Sometimes it seems to be simply the other kind of "doxy;" that is, the kind not exemplified in the work under the critical scalpel. And such a conclusion is confusing when the programmes are as varied as are those of Mr. Paur, who loves Liszt and dallies with dances.

A compliment may be drawn from between the lines of this confession. If we have reached the point where admiration, properly tempered, may be felt and expressed alike for a Strauss waltz and a Wagner music drama, we stand on the highest plane of æsthetic culture. If we could only be sure that that distinction is ours—but it is not yet certain that taste is so sound among our connoisseurs that music can be heard and judged on its own merits without regard to its source, except, perhaps, by a few enlightened amateurs who are not indebted to teachers or conservatories at home or abroad for their critical or appreciative faculties. As for the professional critics among us, who, like professional critics all the world over, are as often guided by popular opinion as they guide it, if they have not the guild spirit of the musicians, all the more to their credit—setting aside the question of their capacity, individually or collectively considered. It seems, however, that they cannot be collectively considered, according to Mr. Krehbiel, who is, therefore, confused in his attempts to formulate a musical creed from the comments in our newspapers on works, singers or players. How much better is the New York way! There they have the guild spirit among the recognized, though not organized, academicians. When you take up the Morning Trumpet and read the judgment of this opera or that pianist, just appealing for metropolitan favors, you need rarely go further to learn the opinions of the guild. The Noonday Clarion and the Afternoon Annunciator will read the same in spirit, and so too will the serials especially devoted to music, the Weekly Diapason and the Monthly Harmonica. It is very soothing, this freedom from contention among the chosen few, but it may chance to stand in the way of progress, as for instance should a composer who is not a friend of some one of the guild attempt to gain a hearing for a new work in New York; for they do say that there have been productions in New York of works, favorably received elsewhere, which have been deliberately neglected by the entire gang—beg pardon, College of Critics—because Mr. X or Mr. Z of the coterie has passed the word for faint praise or concealed censure or absolute indifference. But the charge that the methods of the trade unions have thus been imitated is really too shocking!

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, OCT. 28, 1894.

THE WEEK'S CONCERTS—CHAMBER, OPERATIC AND SYMPHONY.

The first concert of the week came on Monday evening and began the tenth season of the Kneisel Quartette. With the assistance of Mr. Zach for the second viola, they presented this programme:—

Quartette, G major, op. 77.....Haydn
Quartette, D flat, op. 17.....Sgambati
Quartette, G minor.....Mozart

Of these works the Sgambati was awaited with curiosity and expectancy, because its author is known as one of that group of younger Italians who has shown themselves as particularly sensitive to trans-Alpine influences and who have sought to build up an "Italia redenta" in music as well as in political, intellectual and religious life. Those who have known the man will have difficulty in discovering him in this strange music, and can only accept it as expressive of him if they believe that he is in a transition period, his entire and successful emergence from which it depends upon time to determine. Quiet, reserved almost to diffidence, sensitive, fastidious, inclined to elegance, gracefulness and even gentleness of style in his careful and conscientious work as a pianist, it is not easy to account for the outbursts of emotion, the dark fulness of color, the sudden shifts of mood, the audacity, the harshness and the positive ugliness which appear here side by side, with passages of sustained delicacy, tenderness, gravity and almost of pathos. It seems as if his nature, restrained and suppressed in the formalism of clerical Rome and the narrow-minded conventionalism of melodic composition, had been set free all at once without an adequate knowledge of itself or of the many influences and temptations to which it was to be instantly exposed. The friendship and teaching of Liszt may have added extravagance to expansion, and acquaintance with modern Germany provoked the desire to use his liberty of progress by running almost at random through the fields laid open before him. Hence it is while there are evidences of high and noble talent expressing itself in forms of beanty instinct with appealing spirit, there are rough, irregular and incomprehensible portions which spring out without apparent reason and disappear as causelessly. The equable spirit of the ideal quartette, which may rise almost to exuberance and sink almost to despair, is wanting, and one concludes that invariable and almost irresponsible moods he had seized upon the string quartette in this attempt to express what was not absolutely formulated, mainly because its vocal fulness and flexibility offered a better chance toward success. The ardor, impetuosity and almost desperate energy of the work, as well as its fervor of acceptable feeling and its rich beauty. were particularly apparent in the contrast which it made with the other two compositions, each so characteristic of the master who wrote it and each a model of succinctness and proportion.

The audience was large and fine, and the players did admirable justice to their tasks, even though the close and over-heated air perplexed the strings at times out of their truth of intonation.

The third Symphony programme needs no comment as such. It was made up of three works which have been long known and beloved of all who are familiar with classic orchestral music of earlier and later date. These works were: the "Unfinished" symphony of Schubert; the fifth, or "Emperor," pianoforte concerto of Beethoven; and Schumann's first symphony. Although each of these might well be the theme of extended laudation and particularized admiration, yet their mere nomination will reveal the tender beauty of the first, so softly melodious and graciously harmonized that one is almost glad that it ends as it does, in imaginative expectancy of a corresponding close; of the nobility and candor alike in the strength, the gentleness and the gayety, of the second; and the resonant volume and frequent splendor of the third. It is only incumbent upon us, then, to say something of the performance, which might be promptly and justly summed up in some simple phrase of large and general admiration. But we cannot pass by Mr. Baermann's rendering of the concerto without a special tribute to him and to his art. He is ever the same devoted, earnest, self-forgetful player, who bends over his keyboard as the rapt 'cellist over his instrument or as the violinist takes his close to his bowed face, and he ever plays as if he and his music were alone together, with never a thought of hearers to be affected, still less astonished or dazzled by strange infusions of personality or displays of virtuosity. As his art ripens, it seems to grow richer also, so that especially in the deeper authors, and above all in Beethoven, it represents the very heart of the music, while giving all the "limbs and outward flourishes" their full grace, power and scope. A catholic and generous musician, familiar and sympathetic with all good schools, we still like to associate him first of all with Beethoven and—without even dreaming of any comparison between him and other eminent exemplars of the best piano playing—we are glad that he is a Bostonian by choice of residence and affiliation, and that Boston delights to honor him.

The orchestra did fine and concordant work in all the programme and the first movement of the concerto was an exceptional illustration of complete unity of feeling between soloist, band and conductor. There were more opportunities than in the previous concerts for the new clarinet to be heard, and it spoke with beautiful, equal tone and phrasing.

No concert this week; but a week later the programme will be Smetana's "Purchased Bride" overture; Sgambati's first symphony, new to Boston; and the first "Arlesienne" suite of Bizet.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, OCTOBER 28, 1894.

The Third Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall, Under Mr. Paur.

The program of the third Symphony concert was as follows:

Symphony "Unfinished".....Schubert
Concerto in E flat for piano.....Beethoven
Mr. Baermann, pianist.
Symphony, C major.....Schumann

One charm of the immortal fragment by Schubert is that the symphony is unfinished. The slow movement does not stand on the same level with the supernatural allegro, and they that know and love Schubert the best are thankful that he never composed a scherzo and finale. The long works of the great melodist are generally a long decrescendo of musical interest. As it is, there is the curiosity as to what he might have done with this projected symphony if his life had been spared and he had learned to prune and condense; and there is also the thought of the colossal impudence of the German who, a few years ago patched together two movements and finished it for him.

The fragment remains, and the allegro will be a delight for all times, not so much because of the charming, eminently Schubertian second theme first sung by the cellos, as because of the romantic atmosphere that enwraps the music, from the simple opening measures to the end. Or who can even forget that apparently inevitable modulation that introduces the theme above mentioned, or who is not moved mightily by the opening of the free fantasia, the yearning of passion that sees, as from a tower, the end of all?

About the proper tempo of the famous second theme there has been much dispute. Some take it too fast, and it is then as though ground out by an orchestrion. Others drag it; they deliberately check the organic rhythm which should be a pulse to the musical body, and play it with puling sentiment, creating an adagio. If Mr. Paur erred at all, it was slightly, and on the side of slowness. As for the second movement, it is pretty and popular, and there are delightful harmonic surprises; but, as I have said, it has not the overwhelming individuality of the movement that precedes.

***

Mr. Baermann gave a very fine performance of the great concerto. Not that it was equally admirable throughout, for in the finale there were occasional traces of restlessness that was not under absolute control, and the "loud-pedal," so called, was used at times too freely. But, on the whole, the performance was one to be remembered; it was so thoughtful, so well considered, so free from "virtuosity" in its objectionable form. There was no feeling of deadly rivalry between the piano and its old enemy the orchestra. Mr. Paur conducted the concerto like a master, and the few slips in intonation in the first movement could be pardoned easily, as the temperature of the hall was not favorable to either wind or string instruments.

***

The crowning glory of the Schumann Symphony is the wondrous adagio, probably the greatest slow movement composed since Beethoven's time. It is the fashion for writers on Schumann to pat him on the head, and in speaking of this symphony to say, "The fruits of his contrapuntal studies are here in graceful abundance." But one of these fruits is indeed a dry and withered thing. I refer to the staccato counterpoint that follows the first succession of violin trills. What in the world did Schumann mean by following such a superb climax by measures which suggest the class room and blackboard? Fortunately they are few in number.

So, too, I fail to see beauty or strength in the two trios of the scherzo, which by the way was played with infinite accuracy as well as dash. Of these trios, the second is the more offensive, for offensive is not too strong a word to use in this connection. Stiff are they both, and also are they dry.

***

The hall was crowded. After the Schubert symphony and the concerto, there was most hearty applause.

PHILIP HALE.

The program of the Symphony concert Nov. 10 will be, overture, "Die Verkaufte Braut," Smetana; Sgambati's 1st symphony (first time at these concerts); Bizet's suite "L'Arlesienne" No. 1.

SUNDAY HERALD

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCVI., NO. 120.

SUNDAY, OCTOBER 28 1894.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Largest Attendance Thus Far This Season.

Mr. Carl Baermann the Soloist—The Schumann Symphony Splendidly Read and with a Brilliant Force and Effectiveness—No Performance This Week.

An audience that filled Music Hall, even to every available bit of standing room, was present last evening at the concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra. It was the largest attendance of the season thus far, and the most enthusiastic. The programme was:

Unfinished symphony .....Schubert
Concerto for pianoforte, No. 5, E flat..Beethoven
Symphony No. 2, C.....Schumann

The soloist was Mr. Carl Baermann. The wonderfully beautiful fragment by Schubert, of which the accepted title is curiously at odds with the character of a work that is, on the whole, and in another sense, the most [illegible] of its composer's orchestral productions, was accorded an exceptionally fine performance. This symphony is pure music from beginning to end, and in it Schubert plunged at once into a style of symphony writing which was peculiarly his own as far as form, treatment and thought are concerned, and in which there is nothing of the influence of Beethoven, nor of any of the preceding masters in this species of composition. The work stood apart from other symphonies, when it was written, and has continued to stand apart from them until now. It is singularly in conflict with the established forms that were so unvaryingly and so closely followed, but it would not have been a whit more admirable or more fascinating if it had been a model in that respect. Its exquisite musical sentiment, its long-sustained melodiousness always chaste and never sinking into mere sentimentality, and its refined sensuousness suffice to place it foremost among the most delightful examples of pure music that have ever come from the brain of a composer.

In its day, its orchestration was no less novel in its color and its combinations than were its other distinctive characteristics, and now, some 70 and odd years since it was written, it is as fresh and as free from anything that can be considered old-fashioned, as it was when it was committed to paper. As much cannot be said for many a masterpiece that was contemporary with it, and that has come down to our time still in the full promise of immortality. Why the symphony was not completed is not known. Nine bars of a scherzo were written, and that is all. It is probable that, after having proceeded thus far, Schubert felt the embarrassment attendant on following two movements in triple time, with a third movement in similar rhythm, and abandoned the work. It was nothing to him. He made music at will. The fount of his inspiration was always full to overflowing, though perhaps it might have caused him a pang to throw the symphony aside if he was aware of the vast stride he had made in it between that in C of 1818 and the unfinished symphony of 1822, his next effort in that species of composition.

As has been already said, the work was beautifully played. Mr. Paur read it with unfailing truth to its every shade of expression, and in the keenest sympathy with its varying sentiments. The first movement in particular was given with a tenderness that was as searching as it was poetical. It was fairly and movingly sung in the lovely theme that is its chief distinction, a theme which for grace, pathos and simple naturalness has never been surpassed. The improvement in the body and the quality of tone emitted by the wood-wind this season was strikingly exemplified in this work. The orchestra has never acquitted itself more brilliantly and more perfectly than it has in the concerts already given, and it is scarcely open to question if it has ever reached a high stage of efficiency in every direction as it now so strongly and so satisfyingly emphasizes.

The Schumann symphony was splendidly read, and with a brilliant force and effectiveness. The climax at the close of the opening allegro was given with a fire that was exciting in its vigorous impetuosity and its beautifully graduated crescendo. The wood wind again distinguished itself, especially in the piquant first trio of the scherzo and also in the warmer theme of the second trio. In this movement the violins gave one of the finest exhibitions of orchestral virtuosity it has ever afforded, notably in the tremendous coda. It was taken at a fearful pace, but every note came out distinctly. The adagio was exquisitely read, and in the true spirit of Schumann in his most poetic mood; and it was played with delightful purity and refinement of style. In short, the orchestra was at its very best, not only here, but through the whole concert.

Mr. Baermann was received with a friendliness that was enthusiastic, but the applause that greeted him on his first appearance, cordial and prolonged as it was, was as nothing to the storm of plaudits that rewarded him at the close of the concerto. This work has never had a more noble interpretation than he gave it last evening. From beginning to end it was Beethoven playing of the highest order, and was particularly impressive in its manliness, its freedom from affectation, its conscientious abstention from any attempt to make the concerto say something new, or more than the composer has placed clearly in evidence. Both intellectually and emotionally it was surpassingly beautiful, and in the large musicianly spirit that marked its rendering throughout, not only in regard to fidelity to every phase of mood and expression, but in respect to delicacy as well as virility and beauty of technique.

To listen to such playing as Mr. Baerman played last night was worth no end of vague and unmeaning discussions anent piano touch. Nothing could possibly be more even, more pearly and more charming than was the playing of the scale runs in which the concerto abounds. Volume of tone was obtained without abusing the power of the instrument, and the pedals were used with felicitous judgment, while in the more cantabile moments of the work the legato was perfect. It was a genuine delight to hear such healthy playing again. As in the past, Mr. Baermann, with the instinct and the innate modesty of the innate artist, obliterated himself as much as possible by avoiding all that tended to personal display, [illegible] only on devotion

It was, perhaps, a cruelty to place the fiery Sgambati between the sweet serenity of Haydn and the faultless classic beauty of Mozart. In the playing of the Mozart quintet, the high point of perfection was reached. Objection might be urged against the Haydn interpretation, in that subsidiary portions of the work were pushed into too great prominence, in opposition to the intentions of the composer; but the most exacting criticism could not but be charmed with the perfect manner in which the noble quartet was read. A curious consideration is, that if the modern spirit is right in its methods of seeking for and seeing beauty, what shall be said of the method of Mozart? Here is depth of thought, intensity of feeling, unimpeachable knowledge, and a smiling beauty that defies the shafts of time. There is nothing antiquated in the quintet, or, rather, in it is the antiquity of Greek sculpture, the antiquity of a time when the earth was younger, and genius more often spoke in the language of the gods, more closely saw the beauty which is the soul of the highest art. Of course it is no argument to say that a Sgambati is not a Mozart; but yet, in judging works of art, one is irresistibly tempted to use the highest standard of measurement. If we would know wherein Tupper is wanting, we must know wherein Shakspeare excels; in studying an asteroid, we shall reach a false conclusion if we forget the sun.

In conclusion, it remains to be repeated that the work of all the members of the Kneisel Quartet was of the highest quality; it was exquisitely finished work, and met with deserved recognition from a most critical audience.

The first Kneisel concert of the season, on Monday evening last, brought together the real lovers of chamber music, and the playing, it is needless to say, was of a very high order of excellence. A large and enthusiastic audience was present, among them being the Parkman Blakes, Dr. and Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, Mr. and Mrs. George L. Osgood, Mr. Elliott W. Pratt.

Miss Fanny French, Mr. John K. Paine, Mr. B. J. Lang and Miss Lang, Dr. and Mrs. Wadsworth, Mr. William P. Blake, Miss Isa Coolidge and her fiance, Mr. Eliot Hubbard, Mr. Carl Baerman, Dr. John Mason, just home from his summer abroad, Dr. Hooper, Mrs. William F. Apthorp, Mr. Heinrich Meyn, Mrs. Kennard and Miss Kennard, and nearly all the members of the symphony orchestra.

The first concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra's New York series will be given on Thursday evening, Nov. 1, in the Metropolitan Opera House. The programme for this concert will include Sgambati's symphony in D, the tambourin, gavotte and chaconne, by Gluck; Saint-Saens' symphonic poem, "Phaeton," and Goldmark's "Sappho" overture. M. Pol Plancon is to be the soloist.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, OCT. 28, 1894.

Symphony Concert Echoes, Baermann the Soloist.

Two symphonies and a concerto for pianoforte were the substantial offerings provided by director Paur for the third of this season's Symphony concerts. A program of greater variety would have been welcome to a majority of last night's audience, but the performance was of such general excellence that much enjoyment was derived from the concert.

The selections were: Schubert's unfinished symphony in B minor, Beethoven's concerto for pianoforte, No. 5, in E flat major, and Schumann's symphony, No. 2, in C major.

Mr Carl Baermann was the soloist, and he was naturally greeted with cordial expressions of delight. Mr Baermann is generally acknowledged to hold the highest rank among resident pianists, and his annual appearance as a soloist with the Symphony orchestra has, for a number of years, been looked forward to as an especially enjoyable occasion.

His rare talent as an interpreter of piano music is too well known to require comment at this time. He has a splendid command of the mechanics of the piano, but remarkable as is his technique, it is as a sympathetic interpreter that Mr Baermann wins greatest admiration. There is nothing "showy" in his style of playing. Many pianists have appeared here who have fairly dazzled the audience by the brilliancy and force of their execution, but rarely has one been heard who gives more genuine satisfaction than does Mr Baermann. He has the rare faculty of conveying plainly to the audience the meaning of the composer whose work he so sympathetically portrays.

His performance of Beethoven's magnificent fifth concerto was at once scholarly and comprehensible. It was an intelligent and faithful reading of the score. There was no attempt to embellish the master's writing, or effort to gain applause by display of finger dexterity. At the conclusion of the performance Mr Baermann was recalled four times with great enthusiasm.

Schubert's exquisite symphony fragments were played in a manner deserving of praise, generally speaking, but several passages, notably in the first movement, were rather carelessly treated. The playing of the brass instruments was rather rough, and there was an occasional absence of customary precision in the work of the first violins. The performance of the second movement was much more successful.

The Schumann symphony was admirably played, a more satisfactory interpretation of the great work has not before been given here. There were none of the shortcomings noticeable in the performance of the Schubert number, and the enthusiastic plaudits which rewarded Mr Paur were well merited.

There will be no Symphony concert this week, the orchestra being in other cities. For Nov 9 and 10 the program will be:

Overture, "Die verkaufte Braut".....Smetana
Symphony No. 1.....Sgambati
(First time at these concerts.)
Suite, L'Arlesienne No. 1.....Bizet

There will be no concert this week, the next one being set down for Nov. 10, when the programme will be: Overture, "Die verkaufte Braut," Smetana; Symphony No. 1, Sgambati (first time), and "L'Arlesienne," No. 1, Bizet.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, OCT. 28.

The Symphony Concert.

There were no novelties given at the third Symphony concert, but the programme was none the less interesting. It was:

Symphony in B minor (Unfinished).....Schubert
Concerto in E-flat major.....Beethoven
Symphony in C-major.....Schumann

The two symphonies thus placed so closely together emphasize some of the difficulties with which a conductor has to contend in his interpretation of the works of the classic masters. Much has been written concerning these two particular symphonies, and there is great latitude of choice for those who are eager to understand their inner meaning. Some critics dwelling on the word "minor," find the B minor symphony unfinished, because of the flowing of the composer's tears, that sprung from his agony at the indifference of the world; on the other hand, the C "major" symphony suggests that in writing it the composer was taking a cheerful survey of the world; Schubert was warbling in the cold dampness of a pine forest; Schumann exulting from the breezy height of a sunlit mountain. Then there are interpreters who find that the Schubert symphony remained unfinished from excess of joy in the composer, the joy that paralyzes while it stimulates, and they find in the Schumann symphony a passionate protest against the world; a tone picture of restless, endless conflict, and the final triumph of passion over reason. Then there are countless intermediate interpretations, each interesting in itself, and each fatal to all the others. Mr. Paur's reading of the works was noticeable for its sympathy. In listening to Schubert's music, the attention is not distracted by a multiplicity of details, nor does it demand in the hearer that he shall be both an anatomist and a lover of beauty at the same time. We are not concerned in asking what was the composer's method, for the result is all sufficient; we are transported into a musical Utopia, where beauty is the beginning and end of all things. Hence the need of sympathy, a quality that cannot be assumed for the occasion nor its place assumed by anything else. Mr. Paur read beyond the written language down to the soul emotion, which in music is grandly vague, allowing each listener to absorb as much of it as is in harmony with his own soul development and present mood. In any piece of music each person reads his own heart emotions, and the same piece of music may have—and rightly have—twenty different meanings to twenty different persons. It was not Pheidias, but his admirers, who labelled his statues. Mr. Paur is the most sympathetic of conductors, and under his guidance we saw the fine, rich beauty of the unfinished symphony;—the beauty that is the vitalizing force of all that Schubert wrote. The opening of the allegro was given with fine impressiveness, while the various shades of coloring in the movement were rendered with a delicacy, a decision and a beauty that closely approached the finest art. The second movement was given with the rarest beauty, perfection in expression and won the heartiest applause for Mr. Paur. The firmer, not finer, and more decisive Schumann symphony was also rarely treated. The first movement was given with spirit and fire; the nervous gayety, the vigor and the dash of the scherzo were finely reproduced, and again won the heartiest applause for Mr. Paur; while the beautiful adagio received the most poetical treatment, and nothing could be broader, finer or more brilliant than the reading of the wonderful finale.

The concerto introduced the artist, Mr. Carl Baermann. It is needless to say that the noble work of Beethoven was nobly played. Mr. Baermann is always a reliable player; he has no moods and vain fancies; but is always at his best. He reaches the highest point of his high art in his playing of Beethoven, a master he has studied with the most loving and critical care. His reading of the concerto was broad and massive; it was in exquisite taste, and the finest shades of meaning were brought out with a [clearness] that [approached perfection. The fine cultured taste was as apparent as the faultless technique; the meaning was never obscured. Largeness of style, dignity, grace, exquisite finish, purity of tone, are the characteristics of Mr. Baermann's playing, and they were all evident in his treatment of the concerto. We know of few artists who approach Mr. Baermann in his Beethoven interpretations, fewer still who are guidrd by the irreproachable taste, the subtlety of insight, the broadness of vision and the perfect adaptation of means to end that distinguish Mr. Baermann as the artist. He was finely supported by the orchestra, and was enthusiastically recalled four times to bow his thanks.

The programme for the fourth concert is the Overture "Die verkaufte Brant," Smetana; Symphony No. 1, Sgambati, suite "L'Arlesienne No. 1." Bizet.

The Kneisel Quartet.

The first concert of the Kneisel Quartet was given on Monday evening, October 22. The programme was:

Quartet, G-major, op. 77.....Hadyn.
Quartet, D-flat, op. 17.....Sgambati.
Quintet, G-minor.....Mozart.

The Sgambati quartet is a larger or smaller work, according to the viewpoint from which it is studied, placed, as it was, between two approved masterpieces, it seemed a restless, nervous, fiery and, at times, an over-garrulous work. It is intensely modern in striving after effect for effect's sake, in its striving for novelties in out-of the-way corners, in its fierce contempt of serenity, in the defiance of the beauty that is its own reward. There is the modern mania for saying things in a vague way, of suggesting by extrinsic ornamentation that which should come from the soul; there was the modern struggle for effect at any cost, a passion that has lost the art of respecting itself, the animal lack of reserve in restraining overwrought feeling. There was no doubt as to intention, the ideas were clear and could easily be followed in their development, there was no monotony, and there were fine contrasts of color. The introduction is weird and effective, though artificial, a working from without inward. The first movement is treated with the hand of a master—a master of all the resources of the orchestra; the scherzo is delightful, both in subject and treatment, it is imaginative, brilliant and of exquisite workmanship; the andante is dignified in conception and carried out with admirable broadness of treatment, while the finale has a dash and impetuosity that carry all before it. The work is valuable in that it is a fine example of the modern spirit, the spirit that dares all, and says all, in defiance of tradition and sometimes of self-respect. It is not a work of beauty, as beauty was understood by the old masters, it is the beauty or, perhaps, unloveliness of passion that scientifically holds its finger on its own pulse, and yields to its moods while conscientiously studying its symptoms. It is the self-conscious, tolerant beauty that is saved from remorse by the strength of its morbid theory of the world. This art, fine as it is, always forgets one important physiological fact that is the basis of æsthetics; that is, that pleasure and not pain is the end of all art. The emotion that is aroused is too limited and too constantly kept in activity, with the result that tissue vitality is overworked and pleasure is swallowed up in exhaustion. However brilliant the color or the tone, the eye or the ear will lose its appreciation if the color or the tone be dwelt on too persistently. In the Sgambati quartet the passion and fiery restlessness are too persistent, too closely approach the boundary line of pain to make the work a thing of beauty. The music was delightfully played, and its many difficulties conquered with an ease that was an evidence of the highest art.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, OCT. 28, 1894.

THE KNEISEL QUARTETTE.

It was in an unwonted place that many of Boston's lovers of chamber music gathered last Monday evening to hear the opening concert of the Kneisel quartette's tenth season. The partial disappearance of Chickering hall has left Union hall as the only available place for important chamber concerts. That is perhaps a trifle unfortunate; for the approaches, the fittings, and the associations of Union hall render it a by no means ideal place in which to listen to such music as Kneisel and his brother artists make. But it must indeed have been a captious hearer who refused to allow himself to enjoy the delightful concert of Monday evening. For, after all, the acoustics of any audience room of moderate size are only relatively good or bad. There is no sense which so readily accommodates itself to uncomfortable conditions as that of hearing. One can always hear in such a room as soon as one has found out how to listen.

We venture to say that no one in the audience failed to get on his "hearing cap"—if such a cap there be—at the earliest possible moment last Monday evening, for the concert began by the delightful and very well known quartette of Haydn in G, op. 77, No. 1, and there was not an uninteresting moment to the time when the last chord was played of the equally well known and even more beautiful quintette in G minor of Mozart, which ended the concert.

Of the rendering of these two classics it need only be said that the players fully sustained the high reputation which they already enjoy. The laurels they won in the playing of these works would easily be outnumbered and outshone by those which should be awarded them for the playing of the middle number of the programme, a quartette in D flat by Sgambati. The absolute mastery which the artists showed in their treatment of this extremely "modern" work merits nothing ishort of the highest praise. We have heard the work elsewhere and rendered by players of much reputation. But the Kneisel quartette's handling of it showed the qualities of coherency in what had hitherto seemed merely an interesting work. For, if there was one quality more prominent than another in the rendering, it was its lucidity.

And that means much in the case of a work like that of Sgambati. Fanciful to the last degree, the composer taxes the resources of the string quartette to an extent which might easily seem illegitimate to those who base their expectations of the future upon the accomplishments of the past. But such renderings as that of Monday show that Sgambati has demanded nothing which a competent body of players cannot furnish; and that he has composed a work which even if it does violate all precedent by ending in a minor key when it began in a major is full of tone beauty and art interest and is certainly not oppressively pessimistic.

November 12 is the date of the second concert. Several interesting novelties are promised for the season. We wish they might all be as delightful as the Sgambati number.

The audiences at the Symphonies last week were convincing that the society which makes Boston the fashionable musical centre it is, is really here at last and ready to participate in the pleasures as they come along, and they will be coming fast very soon. Among the familiar faces were Mrs. Apthorp, Mrs. Julie Wyman, Mr. and Mrs. B. J. Lang, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Foote, Mr. Whitney, Mr. and Mrs. Harry Fay, Miss French, the Misses Riddle, Mr. Percival Gassett, Mrs. Hugh Cotton, Miss Heloise Hersey with a flock of thirty girls, Mr. and Mrs. H. B. Rogers, Mr. and Mrs. R. H. Dana, Mrs. Alexander Wadsworth, Miss Goodwin, Mr. Clayton Johns, Mr. Gaugengigl, Miss Elsie Fay, Mr. and Mrs. Eliot Hubbard, Mrs. Winsor, the Misses Winsor, Mrs. Phœbe Jenks, Mr. Arthur Pickering, Mr. and Mrs. Edward Winslow, Mr. Henry W. Swift, Miss Isa Coolidge, Miss Gertrude Franklin, Miss Stackpole, Prof. Royce, Mr. Higginson, Mrs. Sprague, Mr. and Mrs. Howard Gay, Mr. and Mrs. Thorndike and Mrs. Julius Eichberg.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCVI., NO. 120.

SUNDAY, OCTOBER 28 1894.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Largest Attendance Thus Far This Season.

Mr. Carl Baermann the Soloist—The Schumann Symphony Splendidly Read and with a Brilliant Force and Effectiveness—No Performance This Week.

An audience that filled Music Hall, even to every available bit of standing room, was present last evening at the concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra. It was the largest attendance of the season thus far, and the most enthusiastic. The programme was:

Unfinished symphony .....Schubert
Concerto for pianoforte, No. 5, E flat..Beethoven
Symphony No. 2, C.....Schumann

The soloist was Mr. Carl Baermann. The wonderfully beautiful fragment by Schubert, of which the accepted title is curiously at odds with the character of a work that is, on the whole, and in another sense, the most [illegible] of its composer's orchestral productions, was accorded an exceptionally fine performance. This symphony is pure music from beginning to end, and in it Schubert plunged at once into a style of symphony writing which was peculiarly his own as far as form, treatment and thought are concerned, and in which there is nothing of the influence of Beethoven, nor of any of the preceding masters in this species of composition. The work stood apart from other symphonies, when it was written, and has continued to stand apart from them until now. It is singularly in conflict with the established forms that were so unvaryingly and so closely followed, but it would not have been a whit more admirable or more fascinating if it had been a model in that respect. Its exquisite musical sentiment, its long-sustained melodiousness always chaste and never sinking into mere sentimentality, and its refined sensuousness suffice to place it foremost among the most delightful examples of pure music that have ever come from the brain of a composer.

In its day, its orchestration was no less novel in its color and its combinations than were its other distinctive characteristics, and now, some 70 and odd years since it was written, it is as fresh and as free from anything that can be considered old-fashioned, as it was when it was committed to paper. As much cannot be said for many a masterpiece that was contemporary with it, and that has come down to our time still in the full promise of immortality. Why the symphony was not completed is not known. Nine bars of a scherzo were written, and that is all. It is probable that, after having proceeded thus far, Schubert felt the embarrassment attendant on following two movements in triple time, with a third movement in similar rhythm, and abandoned the work. It was nothing to him. He made music at will. The fount of his inspiration was always full to overflowing, though perhaps it might have caused him a pang to throw the symphony aside if he was aware of the vast stride he had made in it between that in C of 1818 and the unfinished symphony of 1822, his next effort in that species of composition.

As has been already said, the work was beautifully played. Mr. Paur read it with unfailing truth to its every shade of expression, and in the keenest sympathy with its varying sentiments. The first movement in particular was given with a tenderness that was as searching as it was poetical. It was fairly and movingly sung in the lovely theme that is its chief distinction, a theme which for grace, pathos and simple naturalness has never been surpassed. The improvement in the body and the quality of tone emitted by the woodwind this season was strikingly exemplified in this work. The orchestra has never acquitted itself more brilliantly and more perfectly than it has in the concerts already given, and it is scarcely open to question if it has ever reached a high stage of efficiency in every direction as it now so strongly and so satisfyingly emphasizes.

The Schumann symphony was splendidly read, and with a brilliant force and effectiveness. The climax at the close of the opening allegro was given with a fire that was exciting in its vigorous impetuosity and its beautifully graduated crescendo. The wood wind again distinguished itself, especially in the piquant first trio of the scherzo and also in the warmer theme of the second trio. In this movement the violins gave one of the finest exhibitions of orchestral virtuosity it has ever afforded, notably in the tremendous pace, but every note came out distinctly. The adagio was exquisitely read, and in the true spirit of Schumann in his most poetic mood; and it was played with delightful purity and refinement of style. In short, the orchestra was at its very best, not only here, but through the whole concert.

Mr. Baermann was received with a friendliness that was enthusiastic, but the applause that greeted him on his first appearance, cordial and prolonged as it was, was as nothing to the storm of plaudits that rewarded him at the close of the concerto. This work has never had a more noble interpretation than he gave it last evening. From beginning to end it was Beethoven playing of the highest order, and was particularly impressive in its manliness, its freedom from affectation, its conscientious abstention from any attempt to make the concerto say something new, or more than the composer has placed clearly in evidence. Both intellectually and emotionally it was surpassingly beautiful, and in the large musicianly spirit that marked its rendering throughout, not only in regard to fidelity to every phase of mood and expression, but in respect to delicacy as well as virility and beauty of technique.

To listen to such playing as Mr. Baerman played last night was worth no end of vague and unmeaning discussions anent piano touch. Nothing could possibly be more even, more pearly and more charming than was the playing of the scale runs in which the concerto abounds. Volume of tone was obtained without abusing the power of the instrument, and the pedals were used with felicitous judgment, while in the more cantabile moments of the work the legato was perfect. It was a genuine delight to hear such healthy playing again. As in the past, Mr. Baermann, with the instinct and the innate modesty of the innate artist, obliterated himself as much as possible by avoiding all that tended to personal display, and was clearly bent only on devotion [illegible] result that nothing came between the public and the music. It was a great performance of a great concerto, and was instantly recognized as such by the audience, which broke spontaneously into a fury of applause when all was over, and recalled the artist three times. The conducting of the work by Mr. Paur was masterly in the best and fullest sense of the word. The solo instrument was never overwhelmed, and the closest sympathy between the soloist and the conductor was maintained. The applause through the concert was frequent and spirited, Mr. Paur being recalled twice after the glorious performance of the Schubert symphony.

There will be no concert this week, the next one being set down for Nov. 10, when the programme will be: Overture, "Die verkaufte Braut," Smetana; Symphony No. 1, Sgambati (first time), and "L'Arlesienne," No. 1, Bizet.

The first Kneisel concert of the season, on Monday evening last, brought together the real lovers of chamber music, and the playing, it is needless to say, was of a very high order of excellence. A large and enthusiastic audience was present, among them being the Parkman Blakes, Dr. and Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, Mr. and Mrs. George L. Osgood, Mr. Elliott W. Pratt.

Miss Fanny French, Mr. John K. Paine, Mr. B. J. Lang and Miss Lang, Dr. and Mrs. Wadsworth, Mr. William P. Blake, Miss Isa Coolidge and her fiance, Mr. Eliot Hubbard, Mr. Carl Baerman, Dr. John Mason, just home from his summer abroad, Dr. Hooper, Mrs. William F. Apthorp, Mr. Heinrich Meyn, Mrs. Kennard and Miss Kennard, and nearly all the members of the symphony orchestra.

The first concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra's New York series will be given on Thursday evening, Nov. 1, in the Metropolitan Opera House. The programme for this concert will include Sgambati's symphony in D, the tambourin, gavotte and chaconne, by Gluck; Saint-Saens' symphonic poem, "Phaeton," and Goldmark's "Sappho" overture. M. Pol Plancon is to be the soloist.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, OCT. 28, 1894.

Symphony Concert Echoes, Baermann the Soloist.

Two symphonies and a concerto for pianoforte were the substantial offerings provided by director Paur for the third of this season's Symphony concerts. A program of greater variety would have been welcome to a majority of last night's audience, but the performance was of such general excellence that much enjoyment was derived from the concert.

The selections were: Schubert's unfinished symphony in B minor, Beethoven's concerto for pianoforte, No. 5, in E flat major, and Schumann's symphony, No. 2, in C major.

Mr Carl Baermann was the soloist, and he was naturally greeted with cordial expressions of delight. Mr Baermann is generally acknowledged to hold the highest rank among resident pianists, and his annual appearance as a soloist with the Symphony orchestra has, for a number of years, been looked forward to as an especially enjoyable occasion.

His rare talent as an interpreter of piano music is too well known to require comment at this time. He has a splendid command of the mechanics of the piano, but remarkable as is his technique, it is as a sympathetic interpreter that Mr Baermann wins greatest admiration. There is nothing "showy" in his style of playing. Many pianists have appeared here who have fairly dazzled the audience by the brilliancy and force of their execution, but rarely has one been heard who gives more genuine satisfaction than does Mr Baermann. He has the rare faculty of conveying plainly to the audience the meaning of the composer whose work he so sympathetically portrays.

His performance of Beethoven's magnificent fifth concerto was at once scholarly and comprehensible. It was an intelligent and faithful reading of the score. There was no attempt to embellish the master's writing, or effort to gain applause by display of finger dexterity. At the conclusion of the performance Mr Baermann was recalled four times with great enthusiasm.

Schubert's exquisite symphony fragments were played in a manner deserving of praise, generally speaking, but several passages, notably in the first movement, were rather carelessly treated. The playing of the brass instruments was rather rough, and there was an occasional absence of customary precision in the work of the first violins. The performance of the second movement was much more successful.

The Schumann symphony was admirably played, a more satisfactory interpretation of the great work has not before been given here. There were none of the shortcomings noticeable in the performance of the Schubert number, and the enthusiastic plaudits which rewarded Mr Paur were well merited.

There will be no Symphony concert this week, the orchestra being in other cities. For Nov 9 and 10 the program will be:

Overture, "Die verkaufte Braut".....Smetana
Symphony No. 1.....Sgambati
(First time at these concerts.)
Suite, L'Arlesienne No. 1.....Bizet

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, OCT. 28.

The Symphony Concert.

There were no novelties given at the third Symphony concert, but the programme was none the less interesting. It was:

Symphony in B minor (Unfinished).....Schubert
Concerto in E-flat major.....Beethoven
Symphony in C-major.....Schumann

The two symphonies thus placed so closely together emphasize some of the difficulties with which a conductor has to contend in his interpretation of the works of the classic masters. Much has been written concerning these two particular symphonies, and there is great latitude of choice for those who are eager to understand their inner meaning. Some critics dwelling on the word "minor," find the B minor symphony unfinished, because of the flowing of the composer's tears, that sprung from his agony at the indifference of the world; on the other hand, the C "major" symphony suggests that in writing it the composer was taking a cheerful survey of the world; Schubert was warbling in the cold dampness of a pine forest; Schumann exulting from the breezy height of a sunlit mountain. Then there are interpreters who find that the Schubert symphony remained unfinished from excess of joy in the composer, the joy that paralyzes while it stimulates, and they find in the Schumann symphony a passionate protest against the world; a tone picture of restless, endless conflict, and the final triumph of passion over reason. Then there are countless intermediate interpretations, each interesting in itself, and each fatal to all the others. Mr. Paur's reading of the works was noticeable for its sympathy. In listening to Schubert's music, the attention is not distracted by a multiplicity of details, nor does it demand in the hearer that he shall be both an anatomist and a lover of beauty at the same time. We are not concerned in asking what was the composer's method, for the result is all sufficient; we are transported into a musical Utopia, where beauty is the beginning and end of all things. Hence the need of sympathy, a quality that cannot be assumed for the occasion nor its place assumed by anything else. Mr. Paur read beyond the written language down to the soul emotion, which in music is grandly vague, allowing each listener to absorb as much of it as is in harmony with his own soul development and present mood. In any piece of music each person reads his own heart emotions, and the same piece of music may have—and rightly have—twenty different meanings to twenty different persons. It was not Pheidias, but his admirers, who labelled his statues. Mr. Paur is the most sympathetic of conductors, and under his guidance we saw the fine, rich beauty of the unfinished symphony;—the beauty that is the vitalizing force of all that Schubert wrote. The opening of the allegro was given with fine impressiveness, while the various shades of coloring in the movement were rendered with a delicacy, a decision and a beauty that closely approached the finest art. The second movement was given with the rarest beauty, perfection in expression and won the heartiest applause for Mr. Paur. The firmer, not finer, and more decisive Schumann symphony was also rarely treated. The first movement was given with spirit and fire; the nervous gayety, the vigor and the dash of the scherzo were finely reproduced, and again won the heartiest applause for Mr. Paur; while the beautiful adagio received the most poetical treatment, and nothing could be broader, finer or more brilliant than the reading of the wonderful finale.

The concerto introduced the artist, Mr. Carl Baermann. It is needless to say that the noble work of Beethoven was nobly played. Mr. Baermann is always a reliable player; he has no moods and vain fancies; but is always at his best. He reaches the highest point of his high art in his playing of Beethoven, a master he has studied with the most loving and critical care. His reading of the concerto was broad and massive; it was in exquisite taste, and the finest shades of meaning were brought out with a [clearness] that approached perfection. The fine cultured taste was as apparent as the faultless technique; the meaning was never obscured. Largeness of style, dignity, grace, exquisite finish, purity of tone, are the characteristics of Mr. Baermann's playing, and they were all evident in his treatment of the concerto. We know of few artists who approach Mr. Baermann in his Beethoven interpretations, fewer still who are guidrd by the irreproachable taste, the subtlety of insight, the broadness of vision and the perfect adaptation of means to end that distinguish Mr. Baermann as the artist. He was finely supported by the orchestra, and was enthusiastically recalled four times to bow his thanks.

The programme for the fourth concert is the Overture "Die verkaufte Brant," Smetana; Symphony No. 1, Sgambati, suite "L'Arlesienne No. 1," Bizet.

The Kneisel Quartet.

The first concert of the Kneisel Quartet was given on Monday evening, October 22. The programme was:

Quartet, G-major, op. 77.....Hadyn.
Quartet, D-flat, op. 17.....Sgambati.
Quintet, G-minor .....Mozart.

The Sgambati quartet is a larger or smaller work, according to the viewpoint from which it is studied, placed, as it was, between two approved masterpieces, it seemed a restless, nervous, fiery and, at times, an over-garrulous work. It is intensely modern in striving after effect for effect's sake, in its striving for novelties in out-of the-way corners, in its fierce contempt of serenity, in the defiance of the beauty that is its own reward. There is the modern mania for saying things in a vague way, of suggesting by extrinsic ornamentation that which should come from the soul; there was the modern struggle for effect at any cost, a passion that has lost the art of respecting itself, the animal lack of reserve in restraining overwrought feeling. There was no doubt as to intention, the ideas were clear and could easily be followed in their development, there was no monotony, and there were fine contrasts of color. The introduction is weird and effective, though artificial, a working from without inward. The first movement is treated with the hand of a master—a master of all the resources of the orchestra; the scherzo is delightful, both in subject and treatment, it is imaginative, brilliant and of exquisite workmanship; the andante is dignified in conception and carried out with admirable broadness of treatment, while the finale has a dash and impetuosity that carry all before it. The work is valuable in that it is a fine example of the modern spirit, the spirit that dares all, and says all, in defiance of tradition and sometimes of self-respect. It is not a work of beauty, as beauty was understood by the old masters, it is the beauty or, perhaps, unloveliness of passion that scientifically holds its finger on its own pulse, and yields to its moods while conscientiously studying its symptoms. It is the self-conscious, tolerant beauty that is saved from remorse by the strength of its morbid theory of the world. This art, fine as it is, always forgets one important physiological fact that is the basis of æsthetics; that is, that pleasure and not pain is the end of all art. The emotion that is aroused is too limited and too constantly kept in activity, with the result that tissue vitality is overworked and pleasure is swallowed up in exhaustion. However brilliant the color or the tone, the eye or the ear will lose its appreciation if the color or the tone be dwelt on too persistently. In the Sgambati quartet the passion and fiery restlessness are too persistent, too closely approach the boundary line of pain to make the work a thing of beauty. The music was delightfully played, and its many difficulties conquered with an ease that was an evidence of the highest art.

It was, perhaps, a cruelty to place the fiery Sgambati between the sweet serenity of Haydn and the faultless classic beauty of Mozart. In the playing of the Mozart quintet, the high point of perfection was reached. Objection might be urged against the Haydn interpretation, in that subsidiary portions of the work were pushed into too great prominence, in opposition to the intentions of the composer; but the most exacting criticism could not but be charmed with the perfect manner in which the noble quartet was read. A curious consideration is, that if the modern spirit is right in its methods of seeking for and seeing beauty, what shall be said of the method of Mozart? Here is depth of thought, intensity of feeling, unimpeachable knowledge, and a smiling beauty that defies the shafts of time. There is nothing antiquated in the quintet, or, rather, in it is the antiquity of Greek sculpture, the antiquity of a time when the earth was younger, and genius more often spoke in the language of the gods, more closely saw the beauty which is the soul of the highest art. Of course it is no argument to say that a Sgambati is not a Mozart; but yet, in judging works of art, one is irresistibly tempted to use the highest standard of measurement. If we would know wherein Tupper is wanting, we must know wherein Shakspeare excels; in studying an asteroid, we shall reach a false conclusion if we forget the sun.

In conclusion, it remains to be repeated that the work of all the members of the Kneisel Quartet was of the highest quality; it was exquisitely finished work, and met with deserved recognition from a most critical audience.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, OCT. 28, 1894.

THE KNEISEL QUARTETTE.

It was in an unwonted place that many of Boston's lovers of chamber music gathered last Monday evening to hear the opening concert of the Kneisel quartette's tenth season. The partial disappearance of Chickering hall has left Union hall as the only available place for important chamber concerts. That is perhaps a trifle unfortunate; for the approaches, the fittings, and the associations of Union hall render it a by no means ideal place in which to listen to such music as Kneisel and his brother artists make. But it must indeed have been a captious hearer who refused to allow himself to enjoy the delightful concert of Monday evening. For, after all, the acoustics of any audience room of moderate size are only relatively good or bad. There is no sense which so readily accommodates itself to uncomfortable conditions as that of hearing. One can always hear in such a room as soon as one has found out how to listen.

We venture to say that no one in the audience failed to get on his "hearing cap"—if such a cap there be—at the earliest possible moment last Monday evening, for the concert began by the delightful and very well known quartette of Haydn in G, op. 77, No. 1, and there was not an uninteresting moment to the time when the last chord was played of the equally well known and even more beautiful quintette in G minor of Mozart, which ended the concert.

Of the rendering of these two classics it need only be said that the players fully sustained the high reputation which they already enjoy. The laurels they won in the playing of these works would easily be outnumbered and outshone by those which should be awarded them for the playing of the middle number of the programme, a quartette in D flat by Sgambati. The absolute mastery which the artists showed in their treatment of this extremely "modern" work merits nothing ishort of the highest praise. We have heard the work elsewhere and rendered by players of much reputation. But the Kneisel quartette's handling of it showed the qualities of coherency in what had hitherto seemed merely an interesting work. For, if there was one quality more prominent than another in the rendering, it was its lucidity.

And that means much in the case of a work like that of Sgambati. Fanciful to the last degree, the composer taxes the resources of the string quartette to an extent which might easily seem illegitimate to those who base their expectations of the future upon the accomplishments of the past. But such renderings as that of Monday show that Sgambati has demanded nothing which a competent body of players cannot furnish; and that he has composed a work which even if it does violate all precedent by ending in a minor key when it began in a major is full of tone beauty and art interest and is certainly not oppressively pessimistic.

November 12 is the date of the second concert. Several interesting novelties are promised for the season. We wish they might all be as delightful as the Sgambati number.

The audiences at the Symphonies last week were convincing that the society which makes Boston the fashionable musical centre it is, is really here at last and ready to participate in the pleasures as they come along, and they will be coming fast very soon. Among the familiar faces were Mrs. Apthorp, Mrs. Julie Wyman, Mr. and Mrs. B. J. Lang, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Foote, Mr. Whitney, Mr. and Mrs. Harry Fay, Miss French, the Misses Riddle, Mr. Percival Gassett, Mrs. Hugh Cotton, Miss Heloise Hersey with a flock of thirty girls, Mr. and Mrs. H. B. Rogers, Mr. and Mrs. R. H. Dana, Mrs. Alexander Wadsworth, Miss Goodwin, Mr. Clayton Johns, Mr. Gaugengigl, Miss Elsie Fay, Mr. and Mrs. Eliot Hubbard, Mrs. Winsor, the Misses Winsor, Mrs. Phœbe Jenks, Mr. Arthur Pickering, Mr. and Mrs. Edward Winslow, Mr. Henry W. Swift, Miss Isa Coolidge, Miss Gertrude Franklin, Miss Stackpole, Prof. Royce, Mr. Higginson, Mrs. Sprague, Mr. and Mrs. Howard Gay, Mr. and Mrs. Thorndike and Mrs. Julius Eichberg.

The American Hebrew

Love ye the truth and the peace. ואמת והשלם אהבו

PHILIP COWEN, Publisher.

New York, Tishri 26, 5655, October 26, 1894.

That superb organization, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will give its five concerts this year at the Metropolitan Opera House on the evenings of November 1, December 6, January 10, February 7 and March 14. The programme for the first concert is as follows: Symphony in D (first time), Sgambati; Tambourin, Gavotte, and Chaconne, Gluck; Symphonic Poem, "Phaeton," Saint-Saens; Overture, "Sappho," Goldmark. Mons. Plancon will be the soloist. At the second concert, Mr. Cesar Thomson will be the soloist; the third concert will be devoted to Wagner with Mme. Nordica, soloist, and at the fourth concert, Mr. Alwin Schroeder will play a new concerto for violincello, by C. M. Loeffler. The full programmes for all the concerts can now be obtained at Schuberth's in Union Square, where subscriptions are also received. Much fault was found last year with the programmes at some of the concerts, but music lovers will this season have no reason for complaint. A perfect feast of the best music is offered with several novelties, and it is needless to say anything of the playing that may be expected. From all accounts of the concerts in Boston which have already commenced the orchestra was never in better form.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

The Official Paper of the State.

MONDAY MORNING, OCT 29, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY.

THE LAST CONCERT THE BEST IN YEARS.

The Programme Was Wholly Classical Without Lack of Contrast — Conductor Paur and Prof. Baermann Share the Leading Honors—The Work of the Orchestra.

The concert of Saturday was a rather unusual one, for it was entirely in the classical vein and consisted practically of three symphonies. Beginning with Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, the list continued with Beethoven's E flat piano concerto (the "Emperor" is really a symphony with an interwoven solo part) and ended with Schumann's C major symphony. The programme calls for commendation rather than for defence; wholly classical it is yet full of contrast; and emotion, romance, and intellectuality, are presented either separately or combined, in its nine movements. It was magnificently played, and the interest and enthusiasm of an exceedingly large audience continued unabated to the very end. It is not too much to say that this was the most successful concert that has been given by the orchestra in recent years, as it certainly was the most healthful and educational.

The Schubert "Unfinished Symphony" is as rich in melody as if it were a set of "Songs Without Words," and if the intellectuality, the subtle development, of the ultra-classical school is absent, it is none the less attractive by its emotional power and thematic contrasts. The clearness with which these contrasts were brought out made the work a splendid preamble to the more intricate numbers which were to follow. One might have demanded more elasticity in the first movement, a trifle more of poetic license, but the second movement was a revelation. The perfection of shading, the exquisite balance of parts, the absolute surety of the attacks and general ensemble, these made a memorable performance. A word of special tribute must be spoken of the violoncello theme of the first movement, and the horn shading and the woodwind work of the second. There were some excellent chances for the oboe, and these were made good use of. It was interesting to note the sweet and delicate tone (somewhat thin, after the French manner) which M. Sautet employed in the Schubert Symphony, and the fuller and broader style (the German mode) which he gave to the great theme in the adagio of the Schumann symphony, making the instrument sound almost as an English horn. There are not many artists who can vary their style to the composition in this manner.

Mr. Paur was applauded to the echo after this symphony, and the public seemed to fully appreciate the excellence of his interpretation.

The piano concerto was played by Professor Baermann in a manner that calls for no static adjectives. The present writer has never heard it so well performed. Without vehemence of any kind, without the slightest forcing of tone, every phrase was clear as crystal, and complex rhythmic combinations with which the work bristles were never blurred or indecisive. The work is the acme of combination of intellectual and emotional qualities; one player makes it clear but dry, another gives the powerful character but blurs the different rhythmic formations which so frequently occur simultaneously in the two hands, but it is very seldom that an artist is equally great in the romantic and lyrical directions as was the case on this occasion. The pianist not only has not exaggerated, he has advanced.

Success in either of Beethoven's two last concertos is more rarely attained than in the Emperor or Last concerto, for the last two composers make a piano comparatively concertos, while Beethoven's first two (Nos. 1 and 2 also) remain essentially orchestral works; the pianist is bound to abnegate self, to merge himself in the tonal forces, to relinquish all personal display and think chiefly of ensemble effects, and this was commendably done on this occasion. How closely Beethoven meant to bind his forces together is indicated by the direction that the time-concertos, just before the end of the first movement (coda) the solo instrument was given the opportunity to display all its technique in an unsupported passage (cadenza) generally derived the chief theme. This was purely a display of virtuosity and was to win applause for the technique of the artist. Examine the coda of this first movement of the "Emperor" and one will find a climax of brilliancy, but one in which the orchestra is made to share; it is in fact an orchestral cadenza of especial power. Hauptman called this work "a symphony with a pianoforte obbligato," and the intertwining of the chief and subordinate themes in this coda, through solo instrument and orchestra, is one of the touches that prove the fitness of the definition. Because of such close union of parts the pianist has twice the usual difficulty and does not make half the individual effect upon the audience, but he is the more honored by the truly musical auditor. The orchestra seemed inspired by the musicianly style of the artist at the piano, and the ensemble was scarcely ever anything but excellent the chief exception being the moment of transition from the adagio to the final rondo, where an instant of indecision was noticeable. The muted strings played the adagio with great expression, and the kettle-drummer displayed good discretion in the wonderful duet between piano and drum (only Beethoven, the liberator of the humbler instruments of the orchestra, could have thought of such a combination) in the passage just preceding the final coda. Of the piano playing in this Rondo one can only speak enthusiastically; Professor Baermann has done Boston an educational service by playing such a work in such a manner. It has become somewhat the fashion to speak of this concerto as over estimated, as belonging to a past school, and being about ready to be shelved; that is chiefly because so few artists are musicianly enough to play it. When one speaks of great statues the thoughts naturally revert to the Venus de Milo, and great tragedy leads the mind unconsciously to "Hamlet," the epics of past or present only form a road of suggestions toward "Paradise Lost," and all piano concertos can still but find their culmination and apotheosis in Beethoven's E flat concerto.

The excellences of this remarkable concert were not yet ended, if, as stated in the review of last week, one error often breeds successors in an orchestral programme, it is also true that excellence begets excellence. It was so on this occasion; everything was going so well that the orchestral forces seemed to feel able to conquer anything, and the Schumann symphony began with a loftiness that augured well for the finale of the concert. The bold shiftings of rhythm, the difficult syncopations so characteristic of Schumann, were given with perfect ensemble. That the repetition of themes in the first movement before the development was cut out was not a serious matter, although one could better condone "Cuts" in Schubert than in Schumann.

The double trio form used in the scherzo movement was the invention of Schumann, although he probably derived it from Beethoven's repetition of one trio in the minuet of his fourth, or the scherzo of his seventh symphony. The violins won their spurs in this scherzo; their performance could not have been surpassed by any orchestra in the world. Although the violins have also good work to do in the adagio, this is more essentially a woodwind movement. The oboe work has already been spoken of, it remains only to state that flutes and clarinets shared in the triumph. The contrapuntal treatment of the end was very clear and well balanced. The finale was as hearty and bracing as a bright October day. Nothing was forced, nothing exaggerated until the Coda which forms so grand an ending to the Symphony. Mr. Paur must beware of excess in climaxes; this Coda is a climax that may well lead a conductor to over-force the tone. Those great triplets on the kettle-drum (marked "solo" in the score to boot) may excuse somewhat of power, but they were given with the force of artillery. In the past season the kettle-drummer was criticized for his emphasis, and one must repeat the animadversion now. Perhaps the unfortunate man is between conductor and critic, between Scylla and Charybdis, and cannot reconcile the commands of the one and the diatribes of the other. Nevertheless one would again recommend a little less force in such a climax. One need not dwell however, on a single fault where all was so wonderfully well done, and it is more fitting to end with hearty congratulations to Mr. Paur and the orchestra and Professor Baermann for one of the most educational, dignified, and successful concerts of the symphonic series.

Louis C. Elson.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, OCT. 28, 1894.

PROMPT PAUR.

The Fiat Has Gone Forth at the Symphony.

GO EARLY OR BE SHUT OUT.

How Fond Anticipations Were Changed to Disappointment Last Evening—The People There and What They Wore.

Be prompt! Where? Why, at the symphonies, to be sure.

The fiat has gone forth. Sharply at 7:50 last evening the doors were hastily closed in the faces of the just and the unjust alike; smiles were changed to frowns, anticipations gave way to disappointment. The man who came in his carriage with his two pretty daughters from Beacon street, and the musician and his wife who came down from Huntington avenue in a West End car, the pompous individual, sometimes called a gentleman, who blustered and asked, "By what authority do you keep us out?" the dozen or more who complained of the "absurd rule," etc., the man who wore a dress suit and the humble clerk—all were there, and so was the Post woman!

CARL BAERMANN.

Moral: Go early.

About 100 persons missed hearing the "allegro moderato" of the first number, but there was nothing of a "moderato" movement when the rush to enter came fifteen minutes later.

What a scene! Who were there? Well, a very fair representative of Boston's "400," and many whose names figure prominently in the social register—the authority on blue blood.

Mr. and Mrs. J. Montgomery Sears arrived early, and took their seats—end ones—two-thirds down the hall, and directly across from Mr. and Mrs. Henry L. Higginson. Mrs. Sears looked unusually well, gowned in black silk, with white lace garniture. She wore a small bonnet, with a bit of the new red to brighten it. Several complimentary remarks were made in the lobby concerning the recent work of this most famous water color artist, and of her recent portraits to be exhibited in the "Fair Women" show in New York.

Way down front sat Dr. and Mrs. H. H. A. Beach (formerly Amy Marcy Cheney). Mrs. Beach has the distinction of being the only woman composer of a symphony in America, and she also came in for a share of pretty speeches over her forthcoming symphony which she has been quietly working on all summer in her Commonwealth avenue home.

Near the Beaches sat Mr. Arthur Howard Pickering in the very front row, enjoying the rare programme hugely.

Scattered among the front rows were Mr. and Mrs. Charles Inches, the latter in a handsome fall costume and dainty bonnet. Near them were Mr. Charles Head and Mr. and Mrs. Richard Dixey. In front of Colonel Higginson were Mr. and Mrs. John C. Bancroft and over to the left sat Mr. and Mrs. Charles Sprague. Mrs. Sprague, who is one of our wealthiest young matrons, looked exceedingly well in a pretty blue gown and Parisian bonnet.

Dr. and Mrs. Eliot the latter attired as usual in dark rich costume and close bonnet; Mr. and Mrs. S. P. Blake, Mr. and Mrs. Barthold Schlesinger and Mr. and Mrs. Perrin (a recent bride) furnished an interesting group.

Right in the centre of the hall is a group of young girls, a veritable treat to the eye in more ways than one, for every blessed girl was without hat or bonnet. These are pupils of Miss Heloise Hersey and they are not all Boston girls either; they come from various parts of the country, as far West as California. They furnish a good bit of color and life to the average symphony audience.

Many prefer the balcony seats. Mr. and Mrs. William F. Apthorp occupy end seats in the front row, near the stage on the Hamilton place side. Last evening Mr. Apthorp followed the score very closely. His gracious wife, who is one of the most popular of all our society women, looked very attractive in a grayish gown, with a collarette of the new petunia shade. She wore a medium-sized black hat with a dash of green.

Opposite the Apthorps sat Mr. Arthur Foote and his promising young daughter,

THE HERO OF THE EVENING.

The hero of the evening was Mr. Carl Baermann. The ladies all liked him, and applauded long and loud, especially the group of school girls.

Mr. and Mrs. S. Lothrop Thorndike, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Curtis, Dr. and Mrs. Boardman and Professor Paine are among those with a fancy for balcony seats.

The Hub's provincialism is splendidly illustrated, and it is a prime factor in making a symphony so enjoyable to an observer or a student of human nature. Near the centre of the hall was a man—a laborer—with no trace of a "biled shirt"; beside him sat two young men in dress suits, and on his right a Commonwealth avenue dame in silks and furs. He enjoyed the music; did his neighbors? He did not consult his programme, and probably understood nothing about rondos, adagios or C majors, but his expression was in decided contrast to the bored one of several of his neighbors. To the Post woman there is more of interest in the picturesqueness of a contemporary show than in the celebrities, who are rather apt to be monstrously dull and decorous or cut and dried.

For snap shots at human nature commend me to our regular Saturday symphonies.

MARION HOWARD.

THE MUSIC.

An Interesting Programme Finely Rendered.

There were three numbers in the programme which were as follows: Schubert, Unfinished Symphony in B minor; Beethoven, Concerto for pianoforte, No. 5, in E flat major, op. 73; Schumann, Symphony No. 2, in C major, op. 61. The soloist was Mr. Carl Baermann.

Schubert's symphony is well known and very popular at these concerts, and no season would be complete without at least one performance of it. Yet familiar as it was to the audience, it is doubtful if anyone has ever heard a more artistic and beautiful reading of the work. The melodious theme of the first movement was given with exquisite expression, and the interpretation of the leader was fully enjoyed by the musicians under him.

The second movement is more delicate, and for this reason, perhaps, Mr. Paur's control over the orchestra was more apparent. The piano passages were especially good, and the various notes which from time to time interrupted the theme were given their full significance. The whole work was rendered most satisfactorily, and found hearty appreciation.

Beethoven's familiar concerto found an able exponent in Mr. Baermann. Throughout the number his work was clear-cut and effective, and there was a noticeable delicacy of expression. The second movement, with its beautiful melody, was perhaps the most pleasing feature, but the general excellence of the rendition left little to be desired. The work of the orchestra was also thoroughly enjoyed.

Schumann's symphony was the closing number, and was carefully and artistically given. The brilliant scherzo was most effectively played, and caused quite a degree of enthusiasm. The three works lengthened the programme to beyond the usual limits of these concerts, but, owing to the interesting nature of the numbers, this could scarcely be cause for complaint.

Next Friday and Saturday there will be no rehearsal or concert, as the orchestra will be touring. The programme for Nov. 9 and 10 will be as follows:

Smetana—Overture, "Die verkaufte Braut."

Sgambati—Symphony No. 1. (First time at these concerts.)

Bizet—Suite, "L'Arlesienne No. 1."

[37]

The American Hebrew

Love ye the truth and the peace. והאמת והשלם אהבו

PHILIP COWEN, Publisher.

New York, Tishri 26, 5655, October 26, 1894.

That superb organization, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will give its five concerts this year at the Metropolitan Opera House on the evenings of November 1, December 6, January 10, February 7 and March 14. The programme for the first concert is as follows: Symphony in D (first time), Sgambati; Tambourin, Gavotte, and Chaconne, Gluck; Symphonic Poem, "Phaeton," Saint-Saens; Overture, "Sappho," Goldmark. Mons. Plancon will be the soloist. At the second concert, Mr. Cesar Thomson will be the soloist; the third concert will be devoted to Wagner with Mme. Nordica, soloist, and at the fourth concert, Mr. Alwin Schroeder will play a new concerto for violincello, by C. M. Loeffler. The full programmes for all the concerts can now be obtained at Schuberth's in Union Square, where subscriptions are also received. Much fault was found last year with the programmes at some of the concerts, but music lovers will this season have no reason for complaint. A perfect feast of the best music is offered with several novelties, and it is needless to say anything of the playing that may be expected. From all accounts of the concerts in Boston which have already commenced the orchestra was never in better form.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

The Official Paper of the State.

MONDAY MORNING, OCT 29, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY.

THE LAST CONCERT THE BEST IN YEARS.

The Programme Was Wholly Classical Without Lack of Contrast — Conductor Paur and Prof. Baermann Share the Leading Honors—The Work of the Orchestra.

The concert of Saturday was a rather unusual one, for it was entirely in the classical vein and consisted practically of three symphonies. Beginning with Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, the list continued with Beethoven's E flat piano concerto (the "Emperor" is really a symphony with an interwoven solo part) and ended with Schumann's C major symphony. The programme calls for commendation rather than for defence; wholly classical it is yet full of contrast; and emotion, romance, and intellectuality, are presented either separately or combined, in its nine movements. It was magnificently played, and the interest and enthusiasm of an exceedingly large audience continued unabated to the very end. It is not too much to say that this was the most successful concert that has been given by the orchestra in recent years, as it certainly was the most healthful and educational.

The Schubert "Unfinished Symphony" is as rich in melody as if it were a set of "Songs Without Words," and if the intellectuality, the subtle development, of the ultra-classical school is absent, it is none the less attractive by its emotional power and thematic contrasts. The clearness with which these contrasts were brought out made the work a splendid preamble to the more intricate numbers which were to follow. One might have demanded more elasticity in the first movement, a trifle more of poetic license, but the second movement was a revelation. The perfection of shading, the exquisite balance of parts, the absolute surety of the attacks and general ensemble, these made a memorable performance. A word of special tribute must be spoken of the violoncello theme of the first movement, and the horn shading and the woodwind work of the second. There were some excellent chances for the oboe, and these were made good use of. It was interesting to note the sweet and delicate tone (somewhat thin, after the French manner) which M. Sautet employed in the Schubert Symphony, and the fuller and broader style (the German mode) which he gave to the great theme in the adagio of the Schumann symphony, making the instrument sound almost as an English horn. There are not many artists who can vary their style to the composition in this manner.

Mr. Paur was applauded to the echo after this symphony, and the public seemed to fully appreciate the excellence of his interpretation.

The piano concerto was played by Professor Baermann in a manner that calls for ecstatic adjectives. The present writer has never heard it so well performed. Without vehemence of any kind, without the slightest forcing of tone, every phrase was clear as crystal, and complex rhythmic combinations with which the work bristles were never blurred or indecisive. The work is the acme of combination of intellectual and emotional qualities; one player makes it clear but dry, another gives the powerful character but blurs the different rhythmic formations which so frequently occur simultaneously in the two hands, but it is very seldom that an artist is equally great in the romantic and technical directions as was the case on this occasion. The pianist not only has not deteriorated, he has advanced.

A success in either of Beethoven's two last concertos is more rarely attained than in a Chopin or a Liszt concerto, for the last named composers make a piano composition of their concertos, while Beethoven's (and Brahms' two piano concertos also) remain essentially orchestral works; the artist is bound to abnegate self, to merge himself in the tonal forces, to relinquish all personal display and think chiefly of ensemble effects, and this was commendably done on this occasion. How closely Beethoven desired to bind his forces together may be seen by his discarding the time-honored cadenza, in all the old concertos, just before the end of the first movement (coda) the solo instrument was given the opportunity to display all its technique in an unsupported passage (cadenza) generally derived the chief theme. This was purely a display of virtuosity and was to win applause for the technique of the artist. Examine the coda of this first movement of the "Emperor" and one will find a climax of brilliancy, but one in which the orchestra is made to share; it is in fact an orchestral cadenza of especial power. Hauptman called this work "a symphony with a pianoforte obbligato," and the intertwining of the chief and subordinate themes in this coda through solo instrument and orchestra, is one of the touches that prove the fitness of the definition. Because of such close union of parts the pianist has twice the usual difficulty and does not make half the individual effect upon the audience, but he is the more honored by the truly musical auditor. The orchestra seemed inspired by the musicianly style of the artist at the piano, and the ensemble was scarcely ever anything but excellent the chief exception being the moment of transition from the adagio to the final rondo, where an instant of indecision was noticeable. The muted strings played the adagio with great expression, and the kettle-drummer displayed good discretion in the wonderful duet between piano and drum (only Beethoven, the liberator of the humbler instruments of the orchestra, could have thought of such a combination) in the passage just preceding the final coda. Of the piano playing in this Rondo one can only speak enthusiastically; Professor Baermann has done Boston an educational service by playing such a work in such a manner. It has become somewhat the fashion to speak of this concerto as over estimated, as belonging to a past school, and being about ready to be shelved; that is chiefly because so few artists are musicianly enough to play it. When one speaks of great statues the thoughts naturally revert to the Venus de Milo, and great tragedy leads the mind unconsciously to "Hamlet," the epics of past or present only form a road of suggestions toward "Paradise Lost," and all piano concertos can still but find their culmination and apotheosis in Beethoven's E flat concerto.

The excellences of this remarkable concert were not yet ended, if, as stated in the review of last week, one error often breeds successors in an orchestral programme, it is also true that excellence begets excellence. It was so on this occasion; everything was going so well that the orchestral forces seemed to feel able to conquer anything, and the Schumann symphony began with a loftiness that augured well for the finale of the concert. The bold shiftings of rhythm, the difficult syncopations so characteristic of Schumann, were given with perfect ensemble. That the repetition of themes in the first movement before the development was cut out was not a serious matter, although one could better condone "Cuts" in Schubert than in Schumann.

The double trio form used in the scherzo movement was the invention of Schumann, although he probably derived it from Beethoven's repetition of one trio in the minuet of his fourth, or the scherzo of his seventh symphony. The violins won their spurs in this scherzo; their performance could not have been surpassed by any orchestra in the world. Although the violins have also good work to do in the adagio, this is more essentially a woodwind movement. The oboe work has already been spoken of, it remains only to state that flutes and clarinets shared in the triumph. The contrapuntal treatment of the end was very clear and well balanced. The finale was as hearty and bracing as a bright October day. Nothing was forced, nothing exaggerated until the Coda which forms so grand an ending to the Symphony. Mr. Paur must beware of excess in climaxes; this Coda is a climax that may well lead a conductor to over-force the tone. Those great triplets on the kettle-drum (marked "solo" in the score to boot) may excuse somewhat of power, but they were given with the force of artillery. In the past season the kettle-drummer was criticized for his emphasis, and one must repeat the animadversion now. Perhaps the unfortunate man is between conductor and critic, between Scylla and Charybdis, and cannot reconcile the commands of the one and the diatribes of the other. Nevertheless one would again recommend a little less force in such a climax. One need not dwell however, on a single fault where all was so wonderfully well done, and it is more fitting to end with hearty congratulations to Mr. Paur and the orchestra and Professor Baermann for one of the most educational, dignified, and successful concerts of the symphonic series.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, OCT. 29, 1894.

PROMPT PAUR.

The Fiat Has Gone Forth at the Symphony.

GO EARLY OR BE SHUT OUT.

How Fond Anticipations Were Changed to Disappointment Last Evening—The People There and What They Wore.

Be prompt! Where? Why, at the symphonies, to be sure.

The fiat has gone forth. Sharply at 7:59 last evening the doors were hastily closed in the faces of the just and the unjust alike; smiles were changed to frowns, anticipations gave way to disappointment. The man who came in his carriage with his two pretty daughters from Beacon street, and the musician and his wife who came down from Huntington avenue in a West End car, the pompous individual, sometimes called a gentleman, who blustered and asked, "By what authority do you keep us out?" the dozen or more who complained of the "absurd rule," etc., the man who wore a dress suit and the humble clerk—all were there, and so was the Post woman!

CARL BAERMANN.

Moral: Go early.

About 100 persons missed hearing the "allegro moderato" of the first number, but there was nothing of a "moderato" movement when the rush to enter came fifteen minutes later.

What a scene! Who were there? Well, a very fair representative of Boston's "400," and many whose names figure prominently in the social register—the authority on blue blood.

Mr. and Mrs. J. Montgomery Sears arrived early, and took their seats—end ones—two-thirds down the hall, and directly across from Mr. and Mrs. Henry L. Higginson. Mrs. Sears looked unusually well, gowned in black silk, with white lace garniture. She wore a small bonnet, with a bit of the new red to brighten it. Several complimentary remarks were made in the lobby concerning the recent work of this most famous water color artist, and of her recent portraits to be exhibited in the "Fair Women" show in New York.

Way down front sat Dr. and Mrs. H. H. A. Beach (formerly Amy Marcy Chency). Mrs. Beach has the distinction of being the only woman composer of a symphony in America, and she also came in for a share of pretty speeches over her forthcoming symphony which she has been quietly working on all summer in her Commonwealth avenue home.

Near the Beaches sat Mr. Arthur Howard Pickering in the very front row, enjoying the rare programme hugely.

Scattered among the front rows were Mr. and Mrs. Charles Inches, the latter in a handsome fall costume and dainty bonnet. Near them were Mr. Charles Head and Mr. and Mrs. Richard Dixey. In front of Colonel Higginson were Mr. and Mrs. John C. Bancroft and over to the left sat Mr. and Mrs. Charles Sprague. Mrs. Sprague, who is one of our wealthiest young matrons, looked exceedingly well in a pretty blue gown and Parisian bonnet.

Dr. and Mrs. Eliot the latter attired as usual in dark rich costume and close bonnet; Mr. and Mrs. S. P. Blake, Mr. and Mrs. Barthold Schlesinger and Mr. and Mrs. Perrin (a recent bride) furnished an interesting group.

Right in the centre of the hall is a group of young girls, a veritable treat to the eye in more ways than one, for every blessed girl was without hat or bonnet. These are pupils of Miss Heloise Hersey and they are not all Boston girls either; they come from various parts of the country, as far West as California. They furnish a good bit of color and life to the average symphony audience.

Many prefer the balcony seats. Mr. and Mrs. William F. Apthorp occupy end seats in the front row, near the stage on the Hamilton place side. Last evening Mr. Apthorp followed the score very closely. His gracious wife, who is one of the most popular of all our society women, looked very attractive in a grayish gown, with a collarette of the new petunia shade. She wore a medium-sized black hat with a dash of green.

Opposite the Apthorps sat Mr. Arthur Foote and his promising young daughter, Katharine.

Charles P. Curtis [illegible] who joined in pronouncing the third Symphony concert one of unusual merit.

THE HERO OF THE EVENING.

The hero of the evening was Mr. Carl Baermann. The ladies all liked him, and applauded long and loud, especially the group of school girls.

Mr. and Mrs. S. Lothrop Thorndike, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Curtis, Dr. and Mrs. Boardman and Professor Paine are among those with a fancy for balcony seats.

The Hub's provincialism is splendidly illustrated, and it is a prime factor in making a symphony so enjoyable to an observer or a student of human nature. Near the centre of the hall was a man—a laborer—with no trace of a "biled shirt"; beside him sat two young men in dress suits, and on his right a Commonwealth avenue dame in silks and furs. He enjoyed the music; did his neighbors? He did not consult his programme, and probably understood nothing about rondos, adagios or C majors, but his expression was in decided contrast to the bored one of several of his neighbors. To the Post woman there is more of interest in the picturesqueness of a contemporary show than in the celebrities, who are rather apt to be monstrously dull and decorous or cut and dried.

For snap shots at human nature commend me to our regular Saturday symphonies.

MARION HOWARD.

THE MUSIC.

An Interesting Programme Finely Rendered.

There were three numbers in the programme which were as follows: Schubert, Unfinished Symphony in B minor; Beethoven, Concerto for pianoforte, No. 5, in E flat major, op. 73; Schumann, Symphony No. 2, in C major, op. 61. The soloist was Mr. Carl Baermann.

Schubert's symphony is well known and very popular at these concerts, and no season would be complete without at least one performance of it. Yet familiar as it was to the audience, it is doubtful if anyone has ever heard a more artistic and beautiful reading of the work. The melodious theme of the first movement was given with exquisite expression, and the interpretation of the leader was fully enjoyed by the musicians under him.

The second movement is more delicate, and for this reason, perhaps, Mr. Paur's control over the orchestra was more apparent. The piano passages were especially good, and the various notes which from time to time interrupted the theme were given their full significance. The whole work was rendered most satisfactorily, and found hearty appreciation.

Beethoven's familiar concerto found an able exponent in Mr. Baermann. Throughout the number his work was clear-cut and effective, and there was a noticeable delicacy of expression. The second movement, with its beautiful melody, was perhaps the most pleasing feature, but the general excellence of the rendition left little to be desired. The work of the orchestra was also thoroughly enjoyed.

Schumann's symphony was the closing number, and was carefully and artistically given. The brilliant scherzo was most effectively played, and caused quite a degree of enthusiasm. The three works lengthened the programme to beyond the usual limits of these concerts, but, owing to the interesting nature of the numbers, this could scarcely be cause for complaint.

Next Friday and Saturday there will be no rehearsal or concert, as the orchestra will be touring. The programme for Nov. 9 and 10 will be as follows:

Smetana—Overture, "Die verkaufte Braut."

Sgambati—Symphony No. 1.
(First time at these concerts.)

Bizet—Suite, "L'Arlesienne No. 1."

[37]

MONDAY, OCTOBER 29, 1894.

Music Hall, Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the third symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Schubert: Unfinished Symphony in B minor.
Beethoven: Concerto for pianoforte, No. 5, in E-flat major, opus 73.
Schumann: Symphony No. 2, in C major, opus 61.
Mr. Carl Baermann was the pianist.

A noble programme, although both the orchestra and a large part of the audience seemed to think it somewhat over-long. What would our audiences, who begin to grow restless after the third half-hour, think of the Sunday afternoon programmes at the Conservatoire in Paris, which seldom last less than three hours? That anxious restlessness between half after nine and ten on Saturday evenings makes no very favorable moral atmosphere for the enjoyment of great music! Mr. Paur himself seemed to feel the rebound of it, for the way he hurried on the separate movements of the Schumann symphony, giving hardly breathing time between them, showed plainly how anxious he was to get through on time. Worst of all was the omission of the traditional repeats in the first movements of the two symphonies. No doubt the old classic composers, especially Schubert, now and then abused the two-dotted double-bar, and there is no artistic sense in taking all their "repeats" au pied de la lettre; but the first repeat in the first movement of a symphony oftener has a real artistic significance than not, the modulating transition from the first part of the movement to the working-out often produces its full effect only after one has heard the different transition from the same point back to the beginning of the movement; to omit the repeat in such cases is to do the work a real injury. And, when the first part is so exceedingly short as in Schumann's second symphony, the omission of the repeat is doubly deplorable.

The more one hears the two movements of Schubert's unfinished symphony, the more strongly is he impressed with the wondrous charm of the composer's genius, and also with his characteristic shortcomings. There can be no question about it; a man must be a contrapuntist, born and bred, to achieve mastery in symphonic writing; the greatest charm of style, the most prurient fertility of invention in the world, will not atone for a lack of skill in handling thematic material. A composer's lack of this often revenges itself upon him in quite unexpected ways. Here is Schubert, for instance, as spontaneous and facile a writer as any in the whole list; when he gets into the contrapuntal vein, you do not feel that he, like Weber, is at a loss what to do, but you often do feel that his genius loses much of its freshness and charm, and that he becomes singularly dry and scholastic. Take those two-part imitations between the violins and basses in the first part of the first movement of this B minor symphony; how devoid of life they seem; how like mere exercises they sound! In the Andante con moto, too, Schubert's unfortunate prolixity is sorely felt; the movement hardly escapes being tedious, in spite of moments of the most exquisite beauty and fascination, such an amount of mere repetition is there in it. Undoubtedly the beauty of the work outweighs its shortcomings, and one cannot afford to lay it on the shelf; but the imperfections are still there, and become all the more glaring with time and familiarity. The performance was exceedingly fine.

Schumann's great C major symphony was superbly given. How far away the old times now seem, when our old Harvard orchestra used to struggle with this symphony, and the first movement—especially the working-out—used to sound so ragged and uncouth! One might be pardoned then for thinking that Schumann knew but little about scoring. But how strong and energetic, without seeming in the least frantic, that wild chromatic second theme in the first part of the first movement sounds now! What a beautiful glow of color encompasses the sighing figure of the wood-wind in the working-out, that figure which, in the old days, used to sound like the faded rags and tatters of a melody! How the skilful handling of a fine orchestra fills out all the "looped and windowed raggedness" that used to half-clothe that wondrous melody of the Adagio, not to speak of what our present violin virtuosity does for the Scherzo! Perhaps nowhere in the whole symphony is the indispensableness of our orchestra's present fine playing more keenly to be felt than in that "overgrown" Coda to the Finale; Mr. Paur and his men now hold the music together as with a grip of steel, and we recognize this stupendous Coda as the stoutly coherent and overwhelmingly energetic development of one fine idea, as the true crown of a great symphony; long, if you will, but never prolix. To hear such a work so given is a rare delight; not even the ill-boding shadow of the last electric car could dim its glory.

Mr. Baermann has seldom done finer work than his playing of the great E-flat concerto on Saturday evening. There was a jarring element in the first movement, but it was not his fault; whenever the first theme was to be given as an orchestral tutti, Mr. Paur took it at a quicker tempo than Mr. Baermann's; this not only destroyed the unity of tempo in the movement, but had, by association, a certain smack of something closely akin to vulgarity; it reminded one of that once-fashionable hurrying of the ritornello between the verses of English ballads which used to be one of the favorite tricks of accompanists. At one point of the concerto Mr. Baermann takes a leaf out of von Bülow's book: like von Bülow, he omits the cross-accent in the high arpeggio accompaniment to the theme of the Adagio, playing the arpeggi as if the thousand little syncopating slurs, plainly printed in the score, did not exist. We could never understand why von Bülow did this; neither can we understand why Mr. Baermann imitates him in it; for this persistent syncopated accent in the pianoforte has been as much, and as admiringly, talked about by commentators as any point in the whole concerto; it is famous all the world over! But, apart from this, Mr. Baermann played the wonderful work with admirable feeling, force and effect, and with far more self-control than he often shows. Perhaps, indeed, one could have wished him to let himself go a little more in one or two passages; a little more soulful abandon and warmth of coloring would have been not unwelcome where the pianoforte plays the principal theme of the Adagio; here Beethoven [illegible] change the whole character of the theme which first appears as a choral psalm-tune in the muted strings, but now assumes all the individually expressive character of a passionate solo—passionate is perhaps not quite the right word, but the warmth of emotion expressed in the music comes very near to passion. Something more of unbridled brilliancy, too, might have been imparted to that last bewitching working-up of the theme, between the pianoforte and wood-wind, in the Coda of the Finale; here is one of the places where Beethoven tosses up his hat and shouts! But, upon the whole, if Mr. Baermann's self-command seemed just a thought rigid in these two passages, its general fine influence upon his performance was none the less unmistakable: each one of the three movements was firmly held together, the detail-work never obliterated the main outline, and the development of the music was shown to be finely coherent. Mr. Baerman showed his usual warmth and energy, but free from all disturbing nervousness; he was master of his own fine qualities, and never merely at their mercy. He was rapturously applauded, and well earned it.

The next programme is: Smetana, overture to "Prodaná nevěsta;" Sgambati, symphony No. 1, in D major (first time at these concerts); Bizet, suite from "L'Arlésienne," No. 1. The rehearsal and concert come on Nov. 9 and 10, respectively; there will be no concert this week.

THE STANDARD UNION.

WILLIAM BERRI. MURAT HALSTEAD.

MONDAY EVENING, OCT. 29, 1894.

FOR GOOD MUSIC.

The Organization of the Boston Symphony Orchestra

ITS FOURTEENTH SEASON.

MESSRS. PAUR AND HIGGINSON, THE MANAGER AND ASSISTANT—LEADER PAUR'S ENTHUSIASM FOR HIS WORK—PERSONNEL OF THE ORCHESTRA—THERE ARE NO AMERICANS IN THE ORCHESTRA.

(Special Correspondence of The Standard Union.)

Boston, Oct. 27.—It has been an unexpected pleasure to-day to have a chat with Emil Paur, the leader of the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, and also to see some others who are familiar with the organization, especially the assistant manager, Frederick R. Comee. Mr. Paur is an uncommonly genial gentleman to converse with, being quick in comprehension, intelligent and clear in expression, and, above all, apparently full of kindly good nature and of enthusiasm for his work. He speaks warmly of his orchestra; his associates speak warmly of him; they have the highest appreciation of Henry L. Higginson (not Col. T. W. Higginson, the author), the liberal founder of the Symphony Orchestra, and they give no small credit for success to Charles A. Ellis, the manager of Boston Music Hall, and of the Symphony Orchestra, who is highly praised for a business capacity equal to his modesty. Such mutual good feeling and appreciation are not expected among so many artists and their associates, and it is this fraternity of sentiment, lifted above the professional aspect of what they are doing, which makes it all the pleasanter to tell of their prospects for the season, and of the personnel of the orchestra.

EMIL PAUR,
Conductor Boston Symphony Orchestra.

This is the fourteenth season of the great [illegible] orchestra. In 1881 Henry L. Higginson established it out of his strong love of music and determined to maintain it at a high standard. He paid from the outset sufficiently high salaries to the musicians to enable him to control their time, and thus to do all possible to bring the orchestra up to his standard of efficiency. It has been a labor of love with him from the beginning, and to him belongs whatever credit attaches to the maintaining of this famous organization. Having been founded in face of warning that it would be an expensive indulgence to him, the public will be pleased to know that Mr. Higginson, thanks to the generous appreciation of his endeavors, has not been obliged to incur the loss to which he exposed himself when he instituted this enterprise.

Mr. Paur has spent the summer for the most part at his home in Jamaica Plain, one of the suburbs within the limits of Boston, preparing for the season which is now auspiciously begun. His programmes are carefully prepared, for they are not the same for the different cities in which the orchestra will play this season. He finds that it is better for the musicians to require something new of them frequently. If they were permitted to play the same programme over and over, he says, it would render them mechanical and unappreciative in their interpretation. If new selections are given, it keeps up their interest in their work. It gives them something fresh to be mastered and enjoyed. So there is constant progress, and it is seen to be as true of an orchestra as it is of a tree, a newspaper or a great successful business, that where there is life there will be growth. Mr. Paur is enthusiastic over the quality of the orchestra this year, for it is better than it ever was before. This being his second season with them, he finds that they understand him and he them better than before. They have become accustomed to each other, and they know better than at first how to respond to his leadership. The truth of this is seen in the appreciation by the public, for it is a matter of comment that the orchestra has never been better than under the hands of Mr. Paur. Yet with this improvement over last year, there are only two new men out of the eighty-seven who compose the entire orchestra—the first clarinet and the first bassoon.

For the information of the curious the composition of the orchestra is given, as follows: Sixteen first violins, fourteen second violins, ten violas, eight violoncellos, eight double basses, two flutes, one piccolo, two oboes, two clarinets, one bass clarinet, one English horn, two bassoons, one contra bassoon, four horns, two trumpets, three trombones, a harp, a tuba, and tympani, drums, cymbals, triangle, tambour, and castenets—the cymbals and triangle being handled by one man, and the tambour and castenets by one.

It is perhaps not flattering to our native American musical talent to learn that while on the orchestra are Germans, Russians, Poles, Italians, Englishmen Frenchmen and Hungarians, there are none of our native stock represented. The names are sufficient proof that our appreciation of orchestral music is rather in listening than in performing. Some of these men of foreign names were born in this country, and to that extent they are Americans, but it would be unjust to deprive their old fatherland of the credit of their musical genius. Most of the orchestra, at any rate, are natives of the Old World. Our protection of home talent under the strong arm of the Government does not yet extend to musicians, for which we may be thankful.

The winter will be fully occupied by the engagements which have already been made for the orchestra. There will be twenty-four rehearsals and as many concerts in Boston. A series of ten will be given in Cambridge, and one of six in Providence. Seasons will also be filled in Brooklyn, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington. No engagements have been made further West. There will be one appearance in New Haven and four or five other single appearances in as many different cities. It is possible that the orchestra will travel some in the spring after the close of the present season, but that has not been settled.

Mr. Paur regards Boston, Cambridge and Brooklyn as the places most appreciative of his orchestra. But, contrary to what many might suppose, he says that the American public, as he sees it in his audiences, appreciate good music as the people do in Germany. It may be said, however, that he doubtless sees the most musical portion of the American people present at his entertainments. He finds much popular interest in the symphony concerts and a general understanding of music on the part of the American people. Doubtless one of the reasons why the orchestra is so well appreciated in Boston is because it is a local institution of which the people are very proud, and, furthermore, there are in Boston during the musical season a people of high musical sensibility from all over the country. Boston is the musical metropolis of the nation, and not only do the talented learners come from all over the United States, but accomplished teachers from many different States as well come here in order to find pupils. This being so, it is not strange that there should be a constant demand for seats at the performances of the orchestra. As far as can be seen, these rehearsals and concerts, both being equally finished performances, are as fully appreciated as at any time during the last thirteen years. Every seat is habitually sold, and there is always a great rush for the balcony seats when the doors are open.

Brooklyn people will learn with interest that Mrs. Paur is a musician, as well as her distinguished husband, having received a fine education in Vienna. She will appear in Brooklyn next month in a piano recital. There are two or three children in the family, and they are comfortably settled in a permanent home of their own here, enjoying it as much as the native born apparently.

The concerts in Boston are given in Music Hall, and nothing has been heard lately of the project of a new hall on the Back Bay. That enterprise was undertaken when it seemed certain that the present hall would be taken for the route of an elevated road, but that danger no longer threatens. There is still, however, a feeling of insecurity regarding the future of the hall, and it is possible that the proposed plan for a new one will be eventually carried out. If the hall were larger than this Mr. Paur and the Symphony Orchestra would easily fill it.

Philadelphia Abend-Post.

Montag, 29. Oktober 1894.

Das Boston Symphonie-Orchester wird heute Abend unter Leitung des Herrn Emil Paur sein erstes Konzert in dieser Saison in der Academy of Music geben. Die Sängerin Mrs. Julia M. Wyman wird als Solistin mitwirken. Das Orchester wird die Tannhäuser-Ouverture, die C-dur-Symphonie von Schumann, eine Gavotte von Gluck und zum ersten Male die Ouverture zu „Sappho" von Goldmark zum Vortrag bringen. Daß das Konzert ein ausgezeichnetes werden wird, unterliegt keinem Zweifel.

[38]

Transcript

MONDAY, OCTOBER 29, 1894.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the third symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Schubert: Unfinished Symphony in B minor.
Beethoven: Concerto for pianoforte, No. 5, in E-flat major, opus 73.
Schumann: Symphony No. 2, in C major, opus 61.
Mr. Carl Baermann was the pianist.

A noble programme, although both the orchestra and a large part of the audience seemed to think it somewhat over-long. What would our audiences, who begin to grow restless after the third half-hour, think of the Sunday afternoon programmes at the Conservatoire in Paris, which seldom last less than three hours? That anxious restlessness between half after nine and ten on Saturday evenings makes no very favorable moral atmosphere for the enjoyment of great music! Mr. Paur himself seemed to feel the rebound of it, for the way he hurried on the separate movements of the Schumann symphony, giving hardly breathing time between them, showed plainly how anxious he was to get through on time. Worst of all was the omission of the traditional repeats in the first movements of the two symphonies. No doubt the old classic composers, especially Schubert, now and then abused the two-dotted double-bar, and there is no artistic sense in taking all their "repeats" au pied de la lettre; but the first repeat in the first movement of a symphony oftener has a real artistic significance than not, the modulating transition from the first part of the movement to the working-out often produces its full effect only after one has heard the different transition from the same point back to the beginning of the movement; to omit the repeat in such cases is to do the work a real injury. And, when the first part is so exceedingly short as in Schumann's second symphony, the omission of the repeat is doubly deplorable.

The more one hears the two movements of Schubert's unfinished symphony, the more strongly is he impressed with the wondrous charm of the composer's genius, and also with his characteristic shortcomings. There can be no question about it; a man must be a contrapuntist, born and bred, to achieve mastery in symphonic writing; the greatest charm of style, the most prurient fertility of invention in the world, will not atone for a lack of skill in handling thematic material. A composer's lack of this often revenges itself upon him in quite unexpected ways. Here is Schubert, for instance, as spontaneous and facile a writer as any in the whole list; when he gets into the contrapuntal vein, you do not feel that he, like Weber, is at a loss what to do, but you often do feel that his genius loses much of its freshness and charm, and that he becomes singularly dry and scholastic. Take those two-part imitations between the violins and basses in the first part of the first movement of this B minor symphony; how devoid of life they seem; how like mere exercises they sound! In the Andante con moto, too, Schubert's unfortunate prolixity is sorely felt; the movement hardly escapes being tedious, in spite of moments of the most exquisite beauty and fascination, such an amount of mere repetition is there in it. Undoubtedly the beauty of the work outweighs its shortcomings, and one cannot afford to lay it on the shelf; but the imperfections are still there, and become all the more glaring with time and familiarity. The performance was exceedingly fine.

Schumann's great C major symphony was superbly given. How far away the old times now seem, when our old Harvard orchestra used to struggle with this symphony, and the first movement—especially the working-out—used to sound so ragged and uncouth! One might be pardoned then for thinking that Schumann knew but little about scoring. But how strong and energetic, without seeming in the least frantic, that wild chromatic second theme in the first part of the first movement sounds now! What a beautiful glow of color encompasses the sighing figure of the wood-wind in the working-out, that figure which, in the old days, used to sound like the faded rags and tatters of a melody! How the skilful handling of a fine orchestra fills out all the "looped and windowed raggedness" that used to half-clothe that wondrous melody of the Adagio, not to speak of what our present violin virtuosity does for the Scherzo! Perhaps nowhere in the whole symphony is the indispensableness of our orchestra's present fine playing more keenly to be felt than in that "overgrown" Coda to the Finale; Mr. Paur and his men now hold the music together as with a grip of steel, and we recognize this stupendous Coda as the stoutly coherent and overwhelmingly energetic development of one fine idea, as the true crown of a great symphony; long, if you will, but never prolix. To hear such a work so given is a rare delight; not even the ill-boding shadow of the last electric car could dim its glory.

Mr. Baermann has seldom done finer work than his playing of the great E-flat concerto on Saturday evening. There was a jarring element in the first movement, but it was not his fault; whenever the first theme was to be given as an orchestral tutti, Mr. Paur took it at a quicker tempo than Mr. Baermann's; this not only destroyed the unity of tempo in the movement, but had, by association, a certain smack of something closely akin to vulgarity; it reminded one of that once-fashionable hurrying of the ritornello between the verses of English ballads which used to be one of the favorite tricks of accompanists. At one point of the concerto Mr. Baermann takes a leaf out of von Bülow's book: like von Bülow, he omits the cross-accent in the high arpeggio accompaniment to the theme of the Adagio, playing the arpeggi as if the thousand little syncopating slurs, plainly printed in the score, did not exist. We could never understand why von Bülow did this; neither can we understand why Mr. Baermann imitates him in it; for this persistent syncopated accent in the pianoforte has been as much, and as admiringly, talked about by commentators as any point in the whole concerto; it is famous all the world over! But, apart from this, Mr. Baermann played the wonderful work with admirable feeling, force and effect, and with far more self-control than he often shows. Perhaps, indeed, one could have wished him to let himself go a little more in one or two passages; a little more soulful abandon and warmth of coloring would have been not unwelcome where the pianoforte plays the principal theme of the Adagio; here Beethoven has added some ineffably beautiful ornaments which change the whole character of the theme which first appears as a choral psalm-tune in the muted strings, but now assumes all the individually expressive character of a passionate solo—passionate is perhaps not quite the right word, but the warmth of emotion expressed in the music comes very near to passion. Something more of unbridled brilliancy, too, might have been imparted to that last bewitching working-up of the theme, between the pianoforte and wood-wind, in the Coda of the Finale; here is one of the places where Beethoven tosses up his hat and shouts! But, upon the whole, if Mr. Baermann's self-command seemed just a thought rigid in these two passages, its general fine influence upon his performance was none the less unmistakable: each one of the three movements was firmly held together, the detail-work never obliterated the main outline, and the development of the music was shown to be finely coherent. Mr. Baerman showed his usual warmth and energy, but free from all disturbing nervousness; he was master of his own fine qualities, and never merely at their mercy. He was rapturously applauded, and well earned it.

The next programme is: Smetana, overture to "Prodaná nevěsta;" Sgambati, symphony No. 1, in D major (first time at these concerts); Bizet, suite from "L'Arlésienne," No. 1. The rehearsal and concert come on Nov. 9 and 10, respectively; there will be no concert this week.

THE STANDARD UNION.

WILLIAM BERRI. MURAT HALSTEAD.

MONDAY EVENING, OCT. 29, 1894.

FOR GOOD MUSIC.

The Organization of the Boston Symphony Orchestra

ITS FOURTEENTH SEASON.

MESSRS. PAUR AND HIGGINSON, THE MANAGER AND ASSISTANT—LEADER PAUR'S ENTHUSIASM FOR HIS WORK—PERSONNEL OF THE ORCHESTRA—THERE ARE NO AMERICANS IN THE ORCHESTRA.

(Special Correspondence of The Standard Union.)

Boston, Oct. 27.—It has been an unexpected pleasure to-day to have a chat with Emil Paur, the leader of the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, and also to see some others who are familiar with the organization, especially the assistant manager, Frederick R. Comee. Mr. Paur is an uncommonly genial gentleman to converse with, being quick in comprehension, intelligent and clear in expression, and, above all, apparently full of kindly good nature and of enthusiasm for his work. He speaks warmly of his orchestra; his associates speak warmly of him; they have the highest appreciation of Henry L. Higginson (not Col. T. W. Higginson, the author), the liberal founder of the Symphony Orchestra, and they give no small credit for success to Charles A. Ellis, the manager of Boston Music Hall, and of the Symphony Orchestra, who is highly praised for a business capacity equal to his modesty. Such mutual good feeling and appreciation are not expected among so many artists and their associates, and it is this fraternity of sentiment, lifted above the professional aspect of what they are doing, which makes it all the pleasanter to tell of their prospects for the season, and of the personnel of the orchestra.

EMIL PAUR,
Conductor Boston Symphony Orchestra.

This is the fourteenth season of the orchestra. In 1881 Henry L. Higginson established it out of his strong love of music and determined to meaintain it at a high standard. He paid from the outset sufficiently high salaries to the musicians to enable him to control their time, and thus to do all possible to bring the orchestra up to his standard of efficiency. It has been a labor of love with him from the beginning, and to him belongs whatever credit attaches to the maintaining of this famous organization. Having been founded in face of warning that it would be an expensive indulgence to him, the public will be pleased to know that Mr. Higginson, thanks to the generous appreciation of his endeavors, has not been obliged to incur the loss to which he exposed himself when he instituted this enterprise.

Mr. Paur has spent the summer for the most part at his home in Jamaica Plain, one of the suburbs within the limits of Boston, preparing for the season which is now auspiciously begun. His programmes are carefully prepared, for they are not the same for the different cities in which the orchestra will play this season. He finds that it is better for the musicians to require something new of them frequently. If they were permitted to play the same programme over and over, he says, it would render them mechanical and unappreciative in their interpretation. If new selections are given, it keeps up their interest in their work. It gives them something fresh to be mastered and enjoyed. So there is constant progress, and it is seen to be as true of an orchestra as it is of a tree, a newspaper or a great successful business, that where there is life there will be growth. Mr. Paur is enthusiastic over the quality of the orchestra this year, for it is better than it ever was before. This being his second season with them, he finds that they understand him and he them better than before. They have become accustomed to each other, and they know better than at first how to respond to his leadership. The truth of this is seen in the appreciation by the public, for it is a matter of comment that the orchestra has never been better than under the hands of Mr. Paur. Yet with this improvement over last year, there are only two new men out of the eighty-seven who compose the entire orchestra—the first clarinet and the first bassoon.

For the information of the curious the composition of the orchestra is given, as follows: Sixteen first violins, fourteen second violins, ten violas, eight violoncellos, eight double basses, two flutes, one piccolo, two oboes, two clarinets, one bass clarinet, one English horn, two bassoons, one contra bassoon, four horns, two trumpets, three trombones, a harp, a tuba, and tympani, drums, cymbals, triangle, tambour, and castenets—the cymbals and triangle being handled by one man, and the tambour and castenets by one.

It is perhaps not flattering to our native American musical talent to learn that while on the orchestra are Germans, Russians, Poles, Italians, Englishmen Frenchmen and Hungarians, there are none of our native stock represented. The names are sufficient proof that our appreciation of orchestral music is rather in listening than in performing. Some of these men of foreign names were born in this country, and to that extent they are Americans, but it would be unjust to deprive their old fatherland of the credit of their musical genius. Most of the orchestra, at any rate, are natives of the Old World. Our protection of home talent under the strong arm of the Government does not yet extend to musicians, for which we may be thankful.

The winter will be fully occupied by the engagements which have already been made for the orchestra. There will be twenty-four rehearsals and as many concerts in Boston. A series of ten will be given in Cambridge, and one of six in Providence. Seasons will also be filled in Brooklyn, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington. No engagements have been made further West. There will be one appearance in New Haven and four or five other single appearances in as many different cities. It is possible that the orchestra will travel some in the spring after the close of the present season, but that has not been settled.

Mr. Paur regards Boston, Cambridge and Brooklyn as the places most appreciative of his orchestra. But, contrary to what many might suppose, he says that the American public, as he sees it in his audiences, appreciate good music as the people do in Germany. It may be said, however, that he doubtless sees the most musical portion of the American people present at his entertainments. He finds much popular interest in the symphony concerts and a general understanding of music on the part of the American people. Doubtless one of the reasons why the orchestra is so well appreciated in Boston is because it is a local institution of which the people are very proud, and, furthermore, there are in Boston during the musical season a great many highly trained musicians and people of high musical sensibility from all over the country. Boston is the musical metropolis of the nation, and not only do the talented learners come from all over the United States, but accomplished teachers from many different States as well come here in order to find pupils. This being so, it is not strange that there should be a constant demand for seats at the performances of the orchestra. As far as can be seen, these rehearsals and concerts, both being equally finished performances, are as fully appreciated as at any time during the last thirteen years. Every seat is habitually sold, and there is always a great rush for the balcony seats when the doors are open.

Brooklyn people will learn with interest that Mrs. Paur is a musician, as well as her distinguished husband, having received a fine education in Vienna. She will appear in Brooklyn next month in a piano recital. There are two or three children in the family, and they are comfortably settled in a permanent home of their own here, enjoying it as much as the native born apparently.

The concerts in Boston are given in Music Hall, and nothing has been heard lately of the project of a new hall on the Back Bay. That enterprise was undertaken when it seemed certain that the present hall would be taken for the route of an elevated road, but that danger no longer threatens. There is still, however, a feeling of insecurity regarding the future of the hall, and it is possible that the proposed plan for a new one will be eventually carried out. If the hall were larger than this Mr. Paur and the Symphony Orchestra would easily fill it.

Philadelphia Abend-Post.

Montag, 29. Oktober 1894.

Das Boston Symphonie-Orchester wird heute Abend unter Leitung des Herrn Emil Paur sein erstes Konzert in dieser Saison in der Academy of Music geben. Die Sängerin Mrs. Julia M. Wyman wird als Solistin mitwirken. Das Orchester wird die Tannhäuser-Ouverture, die C-dur-Symphonie von Schumann, eine Gavotte von Gluck und zum ersten Male die Ouverture zu „Sappho" von Goldmark zum Vortrag bringen. Daß das Konzert ein ausgezeichnetes werden wird, unterliegt keinem Zweifel.

[38]

arteries of the brain and spinal marrow. The cause of the severe headaches, which to overcome often required the greatest energy, has also been found. It was occasioned by two nerves whose origin laid in a cicatrice of the brain covering, and which terminated in the scalp, the cicatrice being the result of an inflammation of the brain covering in his childhood. In other respects Bülow's brain offers the greatest interest by its formation and especially its comparative size."

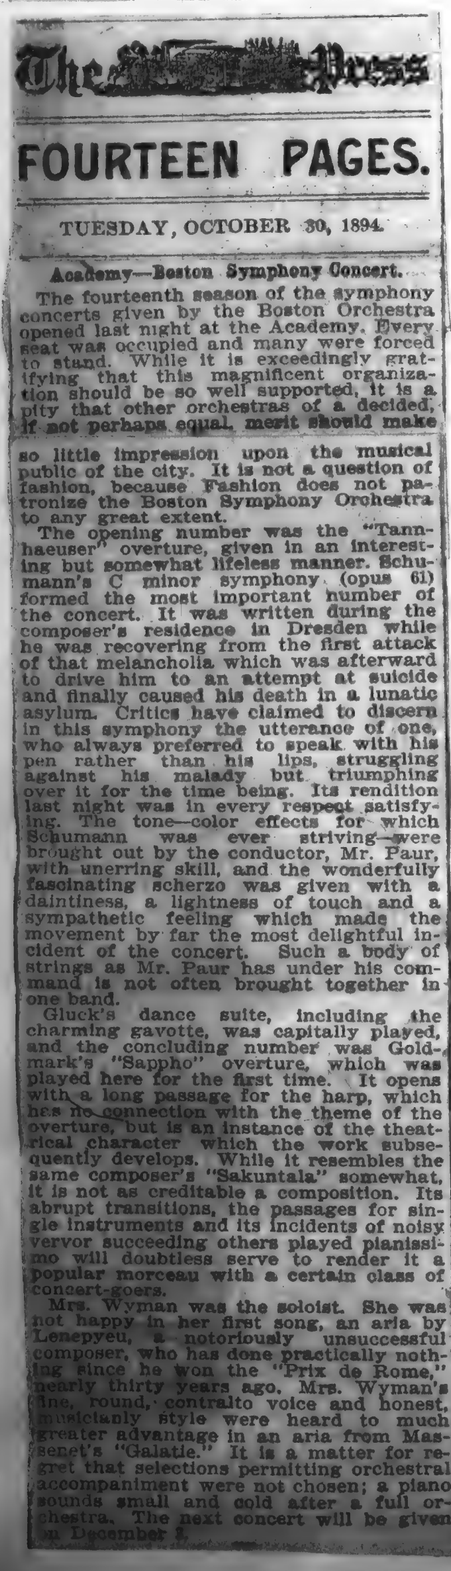
CHANGES AT CARNEGIE HALL.

THE atmosphere has been charged during the last several weeks with rather ominous rumors regarding pending changes in the administrative department of Carnegie Music Hall. Heated sessions of the board of directors are said to have recently been held, at which considerable criticism on the conduct of the affairs of the hall were indulged in, and the board is now supposed to be divided into two antagonistic sections, one favoring the continuation of the management under Mr. Morris Reno, and the other, as a matter of course, demanding a change simply because the first party does not demand it. We suppose such is always the case when two antagonistic elements come into conflict.

It is even said that there is considerable friction at present between Mr. Reno and Mr. Walter Damrosch, the latter insisting upon a change and asking the prerogative of naming Mr. Reno's successor. At the hall there is no evidence of the perturbed state of affairs and everyone pursues his duties in a sphynx-like manner, usually indicative of grave and responsible duties, but also, at times, taken as evidence of a pending cataclysm.

Whether or not Mr. Reno's administration has proved to be a failure, there is no question in the minds of all who have had contact with him that he seems to have devoted all of his energies to the work in hand, risking even his health in the arduous duties connected with what we suppose to be a rather ungrateful position. Naturally the inside operations of the institution are unknown to the public, and it is difficult to secure information on the subject or on such matters as affect the value of the stock of the company—if it has any value just now.

The erection of the new and ungainly addition which has destroyed the symmetry of the structure and changed its appearance to that of an East Side tenement may have had some influence upon the



The [illegible] Press.

FOURTEEN PAGES.

TUESDAY, OCTOBER 30, 1894.

Academy—Boston Symphony Concert.

The fourteenth season of the symphony concerts given by the Boston Orchestra opened last night at the Academy. Every seat was occupied and many were forced to stand. While it is exceedingly gratifying that this magnificent organization should be so well supported, it is a pity that other orchestras of a decided, if not perhaps equal, merit should make so little impression upon the musical public of the city. It is not a question of fashion, because Fashion does not patronize the Boston Symphony Orchestra to any great extent.

The opening number was the "Tannhaeuser" overture, given in an interesting but somewhat lifeless manner. Schumann's C minor symphony (opus 61) formed the most important number of the concert. It was written during the composer's residence in Dresden while he was recovering from the first attack of that melancholia which was afterward to drive him to an attempt at suicide and finally caused his death in a lunatic asylum. Critics have claimed to discern in this symphony the utterance of one, who always preferred to speak with his pen rather than his lips, struggling against his malady but triumphing over it for the time being. Its rendition last night was in every respect satisfying. The tone-color effects for which Schumann was ever striving—were brought out by the conductor, Mr. Paur, with unerring skill, and the wonderfully fascinating scherzo was given with a daintiness, a lightness of touch and a sympathetic feeling which made the movement by far the most delightful incident of the concert. Such a body of strings as Mr. Paur has under his command is not often brought together in one band.

Gluck's dance suite, including the charming gavotte, was capitally played, and the concluding number was Goldmark's "Sappho" overture, which was played here for the first time. It opens with a long passage for the harp, which has no connection with the theme of the overture, but is an instance of the theatrical character which the work subsequently develops. While it resembles the same composer's "Sakuntala" somewhat, it is not as creditable a composition. Its abrupt transitions, the passages for single instruments and its incidents of noisy vervor succeeding others played pianissimo will doubtless serve to render it a popular morceau with a certain class of concert-goers.

Mrs. Wyman was the soloist. She was not happy in her first song, an aria by Lenepveu, a notoriously unsuccessful composer, who has done practically nothing since he won the "Prix de Rome," nearly thirty years ago. Mrs. Wyman's fine, round, contralto voice and honest, musicianly style were heard to much greater advantage in an aria from Massenet's "Galatie." It is a matter for regret that selections permitting orchestral accompaniment were not chosen; a piano sounds small and cold after a full orchestra. The next concert will be given on December 4.

the touch alone, without any assistance from the pedal, effect a sustained, singing, lyric tone, a brilliant, pearly, sparkling tone, full of life and animation, a thundering, rich, glowing tone; and, again, tones so delicate, soft and ethereal as to be scarcely audible? And then, an artist who knows the means by which these various tones and moods are expressed, who is imaginative and has before him some beautiful ideal which he endeavors to reach, will he not draw from a piano sounds which are noble in their sonority and richness, and charm one by the passion and beauty of his playing? His nature may be ever so musical and warm; his emotion ever so deep and sincere, and all admirably controlled and guided by his intelligence, but if he has not an elastic, sensitive, certain and perfectly developed touch, with a true, independent, flexible mechanism, his tone will positively be harsh and unpleasant, notwithstanding the piano may be a good one, simply because his pianistic equipment is bad and not properly cultivated. The whole matter rests right here: if a pianist has not a good, artistic touch, his tone will likewise suffer, and will be correspondingly bad.

KREHBIEL IN BOSTON.

MR. KREHBIEL was invited to Boston to attend the Symphony concert of the 20th, on which occasion Mr. Chadwick's new symphony was played. He published his impressions, views and opinions in the New York "Tribune" of the 22d, and here are the articles in Boston newspapers written in reply.

The Boston "Herald," October 28, published the following:

Mr. Krehbiel gave an elaborate review of Mr. Chadwick's new symphony in last Monday's New York "Tribune." In the preliminary comments on the work the critic takes occasion to say: "As I write I am not able to say what is the voice of the newspaper reviewers, but if it is not kindly the circumstance will only add a little to the bewilderment which long range readers of the Boston newspapers have frequently felt in the past respecting the Bostonian standard of judgment. I confess that I do not know what constitutes musical orthodoxy in Boston. Sometimes it seems to be simply the other kind of 'doxy'; that is, the kind not exemplified in the work under the critical scalpel. And such a conclusion is confusing when the programs are as varied as those of Mr. Paur, who loves Liszt and dallies with dances." This little tilt at Boston criticism in advance of what it would say of the work in question is droll, as is also the sneer at Mr. Paur, which would seem to indicate that he is to be again subjected to the "critical scalpel" of New York "newspaper reviewers." Mr. Krehbiel's general estimate of the work is that "as a whole the symphony is capitally written, although there are a few spots of over-elaboration and turgid instrumentation." As this is, in essence, the verdict that Boston "newspaper reviewers" passed on the symphony, Mr. Krehbiel must have felt much gratified on finding that their judgment was so much in harmony with his own, and that musical orthodoxy in Boston does not differ greatly from musical orthodoxy in New York, as represented and protected by him. But what page in the last court calendar pronounced New York musical criticism an infallible authority?

The "Transcript," October 27, spoke editorially as follows:

THE ART ATMOSPHERE IN NEW YORK AND BOSTON.

Mr. Chadwick's latest symphony, just offered to our hearing, meets with distinguished consideration from Mr. H. E. Krehbiel, who discusses the work at length in the New York "Tribune," illustrating his comments with quotations from the work. The illustrations, to be sure, are not always legible, but the intention is kindly. Of interest apart from the critical analysis of the symphony are Mr. Krehbiel's remarks concerning the difference of the musical atmosphere of New York and Boston. There are more concerts and better performances to be heard in the larger city, but in New York the air surrounding musical affairs is self contained and strictly professional. It is possible in New York to give three or four concerts of magnitude on the same evening without causing a commotion among musicians or public, and a manifestation of concern in the artistic outcome of a concert in which he has taken part is never seen in an orchestral player. An explanation of this indifference is found in the large number of skilled players in the city. Mr. Krehbiel has authority for the statement that New York can furnish orchestral players who can read at sight in numbers far beyond the available supply—outside of the organized orchestras which are in constant service—in any of the European capitals, not even excepting Vienna.

So much for New York. In Boston, according to Mr. Krehbiel, there is much less of the commercial element, the young native musicians are more numerous, and the feeling of pride in their work is far more marked among the players of high-class orchestral music. The guild spirit here being more vital than in New York, it follows that resident composers have more encouragement with us, so far at least as performances of their works are incentives to labor. Later, Mr. Krehbiel expresses his views of the

[illegible]

Philadelphia, Tuesday, October 30, 1894.

Academy of Music—Boston Symphony Orchestra.

All the pleasurable attributes attendant upon a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra were in evidence last evening, when that fine organization, thoughtfully led by Emil Paur, began its Philadelphia season at the Academy of Music. A large and characteristic audience, containing many sincere music-lovers, and of the real symphony concert appearance and mood, gave the necessary éclat to the occasion; the programme was well chosen (to say that it seemed a trifle less attractive, in its entirety, than some past ones might be considered a kind of Philistinism), and the band was in just that form, and under just the proper discipline, to promise an effective presentation of the allotted numbers. The latter comprised one of the best-liked examples of Wagner, his overture to Tannhæuser," the C Major symphony of Schumann, three movements (tambourine, gavotte and chaconne) from a suite of dance pieces selected by Gevaert from Glück's operas, and Goldmark's new overture to "Sappho," in G flat major (op. 44).

The symphony of Schumann, one of, if not the greatest, of that, of en incomprehensible composer, is a work that scored a veritable triumph when played by this same band in former years under Mr. Nikisch's interpretation—a word that has unusual significance in this instance, for in the symphony under consideration everything depends upon the way in which it is, so to speak, elucidated. The first movement, even under the best readings, is far from clear, as was once more apparent last night, and it is a matter of record that when the composition was first produced in London none of the great critics could discover any merit in it. As with other of Schumann's music, it is a sealed book, except to the specially competent reader. But it is no exaggeration to say that Mr. Paur's reading, as shown last evening, and the wholly admirable execution of his men, especially in the scherzo and adagio, exploited the production under the very best auspices, so that the cognoscenti must at least have been satisfied, whatever may have been the feelings (doubtless unexpressed) of the un-elect among the audience. The work fairly bristles with technical difficulties, and the fact that the orchestra not only surmounted these, but went further, and gave justifiable excuse for the revival of the symphony, is something that calls for unqualified praise.

The important novelty on the programme (which should not have come last) was "Sappho" Overture, and it proved in some ways a pleasant disappointment. That is to say, it possessed a melodic charm and grace hardly to be expected, and while it had here and there a certain artificial quality noticeable in some of Goldmark's music—a striving, as it were, after grand effects without sufficient results—the general treatment of the piece was both interesting and attractive, while it was given a remarkably good performance under Mr. Paur. The overture would doubtless be even more welcome on a second hearing, which is more than can be said for certain efforts of the composers of the Goldmark school.

Of the rest of the concert it may be remarked that one of its most charming incidents was the exquisite performance of the Glück excerpts, and that Mrs. Wyman, the soloist, was much applauded for her singing of arias by Massenet and Lavepreu.

arteries of the brain and spinal marrow. The cause of the severe headaches, which to overcome often required the greatest energy, has also been found. It was occasioned by two nerves whose origin laid in a cicatrice of the brain covering, and which terminated in the scalp, the cicatrice being the result of an inflammation of the brain covering in his childhood. In other respects Bülow's brain offers the greatest interest by its formation and especially its comparative size."

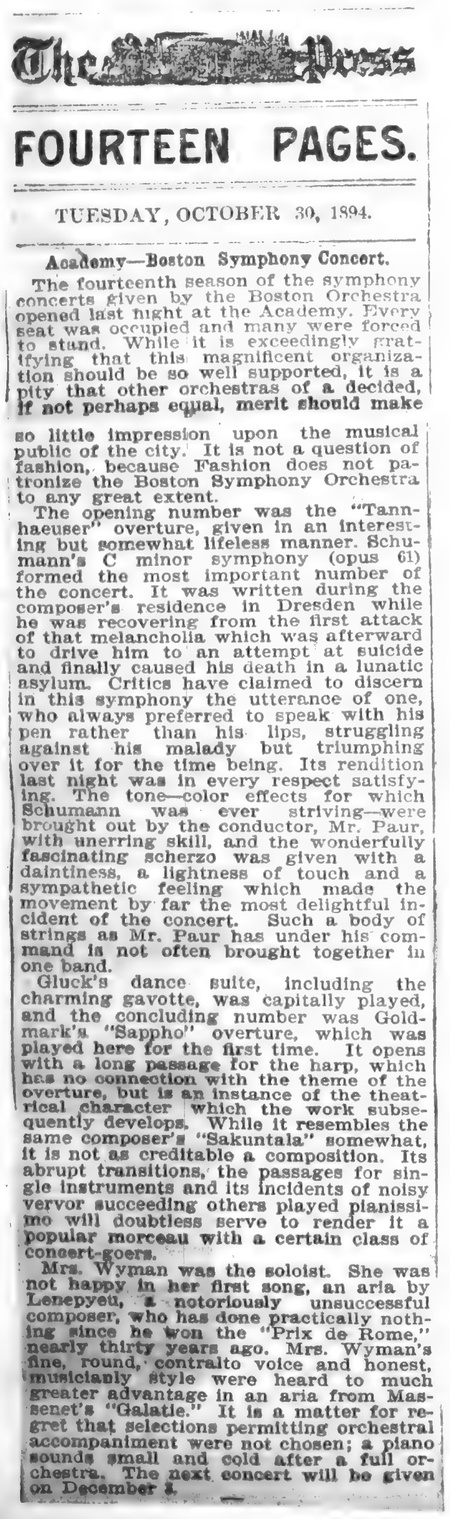
CHANGES AT CARNEGIE HALL.

THE atmosphere has been charged during the last several weeks with rather ominous rumors regarding pending changes in the administrative department of Carnegie Music Hall. Heated sessions of the board of directors are said to have recently been held, at which considerable criticism on the conduct of the affairs of the hall were indulged in, and the board is now supposed to be divided into two antagonistic sections, one favoring the continuation of the management under Mr. Morris Reno, and the other, as a matter of course, demanding a change simply because the first party does not demand it. We suppose such is always the case when two antagonistic elements come into conflict.

It is even said that there is considerable friction at present between Mr. Reno and Mr. Walter Damrosch, the latter insisting upon a change and asking the prerogative of naming Mr. Reno's successor. At the hall there is no evidence of the perturbed state of affairs and everyone pursues his duties in a sphynx-like manner, usually indicative of grave and responsible duties, but also, at times, taken as evidence of a pending cataclysm.

Whether or not Mr. Reno's administration has proved to be a failure, there is no question in the minds of all who have had contact with him that he seems to have devoted all of his energies to the work in hand, risking even his health in the arduous duties connected with what we suppose to be a rather ungrateful position. Naturally the inside operations of the institution are unknown to the public, and it is difficult to secure information on the subject or on such matters as affect the value of the stock of the company—if it has any value just now.

The erection of the new and ungainly addition which has destroyed the symmetry of the structure and changed its appearance to that of an East Side tenement may have had some influence upon the



The Press

FOURTEEN PAGES.

TUESDAY, OCTOBER 30, 1894.

Academy—Boston Symphony Concert.

The fourteenth season of the symphony concerts given by the Boston Orchestra opened last night at the Academy. Every seat was occupied and many were forced to stand. While it is exceedingly gratifying that this magnificent organization should be so well supported, it is a pity that other orchestras of a decided, if not perhaps equal, merit should make so little impression upon the musical public of the city. It is not a question of fashion, because Fashion does not patronize the Boston Symphony Orchestra to any great extent.

The opening number was the "Tannhaeuser" overture, given in an interesting but somewhat lifeless manner. Schumann's C minor symphony (opus 61) formed the most important number of the concert. It was written during the composer's residence in Dresden while he was recovering from the first attack of that melancholia which was afterward to drive him to an attempt at suicide and finally caused his death in a lunatic asylum. Critics have claimed to discern in this symphony the utterance of one, who always preferred to speak with his pen rather than his lips, struggling against his malady but triumphing over it for the time being. Its rendition last night was in every respect satisfying. The tone-color effects for which Schumann was ever striving—were brought out by the conductor, Mr. Paur, with unerring skill, and the wonderfully fascinating scherzo was given with a daintiness, a lightness of touch and a sympathetic feeling which made the movement by far the most delightful incident of the concert. Such a body of strings as Mr. Paur has under his command is not often brought together in one band.

Gluck's dance suite, including the charming gavotte, was capitally played, and the concluding number was Goldmark's "Sappho" overture, which was played here for the first time. It opens with a long passage for the harp, which has no connection with the theme of the overture, but is an instance of the theatrical character which the work subsequently develops. While it resembles the same composer's "Sakuntala" somewhat, it is not as creditable a composition. Its abrupt transitions, the passages for single instruments and its incidents of noisy vervor succeeding others played pianissimo will doubtless serve to render it a popular morceau with a certain class of concert-goers.

Mrs. Wyman was the soloist. She was not happy in her first song, an aria by Lenepveu, a notoriously unsuccessful composer, who has done practically nothing since he won the "Prix de Rome," nearly thirty years ago. Mrs. Wyman's fine, round, contralto voice and honest, musicianly style were heard to much greater advantage in an aria from Massenet's "Galatie." It is a matter for regret that selections permitting orchestral accompaniment were not chosen; a piano sounds small and cold after a full orchestra. The next concert will be given on December 3.

the touch alone, without any assistance from the pedal, effect a sustained, singing, lyric tone, a brilliant, pearly, sparkling tone, full of life and animation, a thundering, rich, glowing tone; and, again, tones so delicate, soft and ethereal as to be scarcely audible? And then, an artist who knows the means by which these various tones and moods are expressed, who is imaginative and has before him some beautiful ideal which he endeavors to reach, will he not draw from a piano sounds which are noble in their sonority and richness, and charm one by the passion and beauty of his playing? His nature may be ever so musical and warm; his emotion ever so deep and sincere, and all admirably controlled and guided by his intelligence, but if he has not an elastic, sensitive, certain and perfectly developed touch, with a true, independent, flexible mechanism, his tone will positively be harsh and unpleasant, notwithstanding the piano may be a good one, simply because his pianistic equipment is bad and not properly cultivated. The whole matter rests right here: if a pianist has not a good, artistic touch, his tone will likewise suffer, and will be correspondingly bad.

KREHBIEL IN BOSTON.

MR. KREHBIEL was invited to Boston to attend the Symphony concert of the 20th, on which occasion Mr. Chadwick's new symphony was played. He published his impressions, views and opinions in the New York "Tribune" of the 22d, and here are the articles in Boston newspapers written in reply.

The Boston "Herald," October 28, published the following:

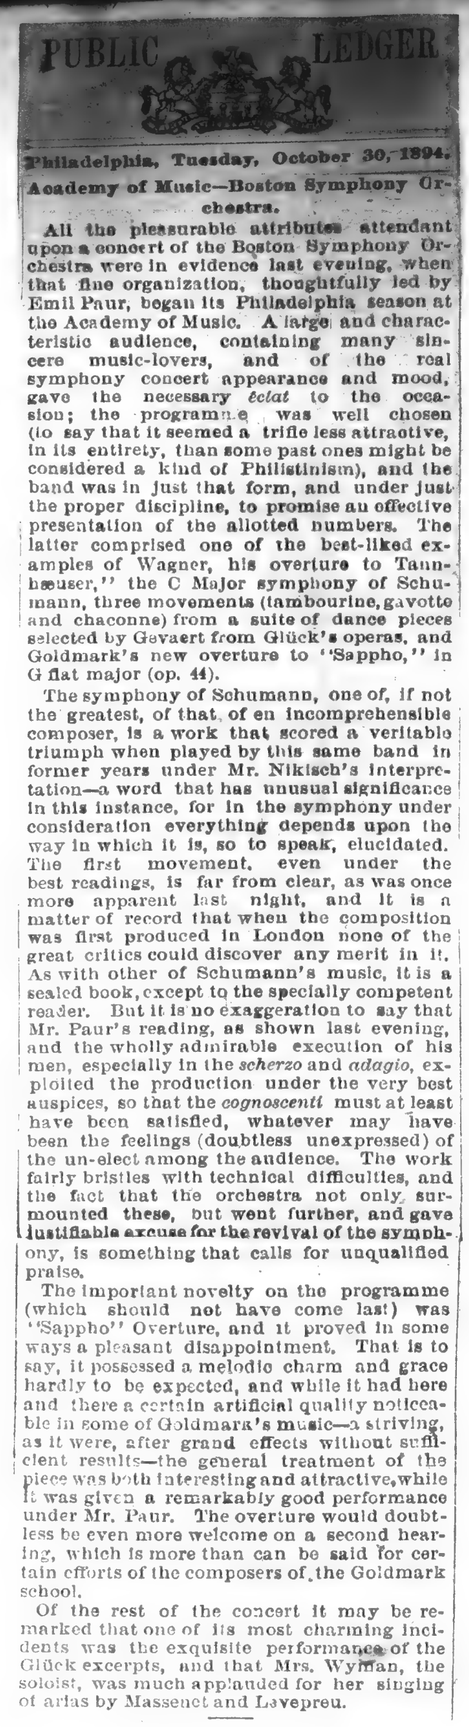
Mr. Krehbiel gave an elaborate review of Mr. Chadwick's new symphony in last Monday's New York "Tribune." In the preliminary comments on the work the critic takes occasion to say: "As I write I am not able to say what is the voice of the newspaper reviewers, but if it is not kindly the circumstance will only add a little to the bewilderment which long range readers of the Boston newspapers have frequently felt in the past respecting the Bostonian standard of judgment. I confess that I do not know what constitutes musical orthodoxy in Boston. Sometimes it seems to be simply the other kind of 'doxy'; that is, the kind not exemplified in the work under the critical scalpel. And such a conclusion is confusing when the programs are as varied as those of Mr. Paur, who loves Liszt and dallies with dances." This little tilt at Boston criticism in advance of what it would say of the work in question is droll, as is also the sneer at Mr. Paur, which would seem to indicate that he is to be again subjected to the "critical scalpel" of New York "newspaper reviewers." Mr. Krehbiel's general estimate of the work is that "as a whole the symphony is capitally written, although there are a few spots of over-elaboration and turgid instrumentation." As this is, in essence, the verdict that Boston "newspaper reviewers" passed on the symphony, Mr. Krehbiel must have felt much gratified on finding that their judgment was so much in harmony with his own, and that musical orthodoxy in Boston does not differ greatly from musical orthodoxy in New York, as represented and protected by him. But what page in the last court calendar pronounced New York musical criticism an infallible authority?

The "Transcript," October 27, spoke editorially as follows:

THE ART ATMOSPHERE IN NEW YORK AND BOSTON.

Mr. Chadwick's latest symphony, just offered to our hearing, meets with distinguished consideration from Mr. H. E. Krehbiel, who discusses the work at length in the New York "Tribune," illustrating his comments with quotations from the work. The illustrations, to be sure, are not always legible, but the intention is kindly. Of interest apart from the critical analysis of the symphony are Mr. Krehbiel's remarks concerning the difference of the musical atmosphere of New York and Boston. There are more concerts and better performances to be heard in the larger city, but in New York the air surrounding musical affairs is self contained and strictly professional. It is possible in New York to give three or four concerts of magnitude on the same evening without causing a commotion among musicians or public, and a manifestation of concern in the artistic outcome of a concert in which he has taken part is never seen in an orchestral player. An explanation of this indifference is found in the large number of skilled players in the city. Mr. Krehbiel has authority for the statement that New York can furnish orchestral players who can read at sight in numbers far beyond the available supply—outside of the organized orchestras which are in constant service—in any of the European capitals, not even excepting Vienna.

So much for New York. In Boston, according to Mr. Krehbiel, there is much less of the commercial element, the young native musicians are more numerous, and the feeling of pride in their work is far more marked among the players of high-class orchestral music. The guild spirit here being more vital than in New York, it follows that resident composers have more encouragement with us, so far at least as performances of their works are incentives to labor. Later, Mr. Krehbiel expresses his views of the



PUBLIC LEDGER

Philadelphia, Tuesday, October 30, 1894.

Academy of Music—Boston Symphony Orchestra.

All the pleasurable attributes attendant upon a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra were in evidence last evening, when that fine organization, thoughtfully led by Emil Paur, began its Philadelphia season at the Academy of Music. A large and characteristic audience, containing many sincere music-lovers, and of the real symphony concert appearance and mood, gave the necessary éclat to the occasion; the programme was well chosen (to say that it seemed a trifle less attractive, in its entirety, than some past ones might be considered a kind of Philistinism), and the band was in just that form, and under just the proper discipline, to promise an effective presentation of the allotted numbers. The latter comprised one of the best-liked examples of Wagner, his overture to Tannhæuser," the C Major symphony of Schumann, three movements (tambourine, gavotte and chaconne) from a suite of dance pieces selected by Gevaert from Glück's operas, and Goldmark's new overture to "Sappho," in G flat major (op. 44).

The symphony of Schumann, one of, if not the greatest, of that of en incomprehensible composer, is a work that scored a veritable triumph when played by this same band in former years under Mr. Nikisch's interpretation—a word that has unusual significance in this instance, for in the symphony under consideration everything depends upon the way in which it is, so to speak, elucidated. The first movement, even under the best readings, is far from clear, as was once more apparent last night, and it is a matter of record that when the composition was first produced in London none of the great critics could discover any merit in it. As with other of Schumann's music, it is a sealed book, except to the specially competent reader. But it is no exaggeration to say that Mr. Paur's reading, as shown last evening, and the wholly admirable execution of his men, especially in the scherzo and adagio, exploited the production under the very best auspices, so that the cognoscenti must at least have been satisfied, whatever may have been the feelings (doubtless unexpressed) of the un-elect among the audience. The work fairly bristles with technical difficulties, and the fact that the orchestra not only surmounted these, but went further, and gave justifiable excuse for the revival of the symphony, is something that calls for unqualified praise.

The important novelty on the programme (which should not have come last) was "Sappho" Overture, and it proved in some ways a pleasant disappointment. That is to say, it possessed a melodic charm and grace hardly to be expected, and while it had here and there a certain artificial quality noticeable in some of Goldmark's music—a striving, as it were, after grand effects without sufficient results—the general treatment of the piece was both interesting and attractive, while it was given a remarkably good performance under Mr. Paur. The overture would doubtless be even more welcome on a second hearing, which is more than can be said for certain efforts of the composers of the Goldmark school.

Of the rest of the concert it may be remarked that one of its most charming incidents was the exquisite performance of the Glück excerpts, and that Mrs. Wyman, the soloist, was much applauded for her singing of arias by Massenet and Lavepreu.

critical faculty among us, or rather his inability to determine what is our standard of judgment. He writes:

> I confess that I do not know what constitutes musical orthodoxy in Boston. Sometimes it seems to be simply the other kind of "doxy;" that is, the kind not exemplified in the work under the critical scalpel. And such a conclusion is confusing when the programs are as varied as are those of Mr. Paur, who loves Liszt and dallies with dances.

A compliment may be drawn from between the lines of this confession. If we have reached the point where admiration, properly tempered, may be felt and expressed alike for a Strauss waltz and a Wagner music drama, we stand on the highest plane of æsthetic culture. If we could only be sure that that distinction is ours—but it is not yet certain that taste so sound among our connoisseurs that music can be heard and judged on its own merits without regard to its source, except, perhaps, by a few enlightened amateurs who are not indebted to teachers or conservatories at home or abroad for their critical or appreciative faculties. As for the professional critics among us, who, like professional critics all the world over, are as often guided by popular opinion as they guide it, if they have not the guild spirit of the musicians, all the more to their credit—setting aside the question of their capacity, individually or collectively considered. It seems, however, that they cannot be collectively considered, according to Mr. Krehbiel, who is therefore confused in his attempts to formulate a musical creed from the comments in our newspapers on works, singers and players.

How much better is the New York way! There they have the guild spirit among the recognized, though not organized, academicians. When you take up the "Morning Trumpet" and read the judgment of this opera or that pianist, just appealing for metropolitan favors, you need rarely go further to learn the opinions of the guild. The "Noonday Clarion" and the "Afternoon Annunciator" will read the same in spirit, and so, too, will the serials especially devoted to music, the "Weekly Diapason" and the "Monthly Harmonica." It is very soothing, this freedom from contention among the chosen few, but it may chance to stand in the way of progress, as for instance should a composer who is not a friend of someone of the guild attempt to gain a hearing for a new work in New York; for they do say that there have been productions in New York of works, favorably received elsewhere, which have been deliberately neglected by the entire gang—beg pardon, College of Critics—because Mr. X or Mr. Z of the coterie has passed the word for faint praise or concealed censure or absolute indifference. But the charge that the methods of the trade unions have thus been imitated is really shocking!

The Boston "Journal," October 28, had this to say:

Mr. Krehbiel, of New York, was in town a week ago Saturday to hear Mr. Chadwick's symphony, and his views and opinions were published in the New York "Tribune" of last Monday. He surveyed city, music and musicians as through a telescope set up on another and a happier planet.

"The musical activities of Boston," says Mr. Krehbiel. "are always an interesting study to the observer from New York."

Now this statement may be reversed easily, and as follows: The musical activity of a lecturer from New York is always an interesting study to the observer in Boston.

Mr. Krehbiel adds: "Not wholly because of their extent or their variety, for in sooth, despite the Symphony Orchestra, with its weekly public rehearsal and concert, New York hears much more music every season of all kinds than Boston; nor even because of their superior merit, for one can assert that the average of performance is higher in New York than it is in Boston, notwithstanding the efforts of the superb organization which Mr. Higginson maintains."

Does Mr. Krehbiel really believe the latter half of this statement? Is there any orchestra in New York that plays as well twenty-four times in the season as the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Paur? Is it not the Kneisel Quartet, of Boston, that delights the music lovers of New York by the exquisite finish of its performance? Are there so many choral societies in New York that are superior to the Händel and Haydn, the Cecilia and the Apollo? Do wandering stars, singers, or violinists shine with more than ordinary brilliancy over Manhattan? Or how does Mr. Krehbiel know the superiority of musical performances in this city, unless he listens to the bourgeois musical attempts in Boston through a long distance telephone? Even with the aid of space annihilating science it would be difficult to judge of the respective merits of two concerts when they were synchronous and it would indeed require a practiced ear.

But we should not complain, for Mr. Krehbiel finds "among the musicians, composers, teachers and performers a more vital guild spirit in Boston than in New York." This settles it. We still are the people. But we never should have known it, had not Mr. Krehbiel discovered and named this element of superiority. Messrs. Paur, Zerrahn, Lang, Kneisel, Adamowski, Faelten, Chelius, et al. have been working away industriously, doing the best they could, and yet not until Monday, October 22, 1894, on the arrival of the New York "Tribune" from the metropolis, was it discovered by their fellow townsmen that these musicians were imbued, filled, possessed with "a vital guild spirit." Perhaps the musicians themselves were ignorant of their great good fortune.

"As I write," says Mr. Krehbiel, "I am not able to say what is the voice of the newspaper reviewers; but if it is not kindly the circumstances will only add a little to the bewilderment which long range readers of the Boston newspapers have frequently felt in the past respecting the Bostonian standard of judgment. I confess that I do not know what constitutes musical orthodoxy in Boston. Sometimes it seems to be simply the other kind of 'doxy;' that is, the kind not exemplified in the work under the critical scalpel. And such a conclusion is confusing when the programs are as varied as those of Mr. Paur, who loves Liszt and dallies with dances."

Let no reader form an unjust idea of Mr. Krehbiel's character. He is a large, fine looking man, of genial disposition. He is welcomed here heartily by friends and admirers whenever he leaves New York to visit the provinces. The supposition that his mind has been impaired by unremitting attention to the subtle meaning of the Wagnerian opera is as absurd as insulting. He is a veritable sleuth hound on the track of a folksong, and he can scent his prey when others abandon the chase. He is also a graceful writer. When Mr. Paur "dallies with dances" Mr. Krehbiel is seriously distressed, and as Mr. Paur is a kindly man he will no doubt suspend henceforth his offensive dalliance. It is even possible that Mr. Paur will cease to love Liszt.

So, too, the newspaper reviewers of Boston were deeply pained to learn that they have on former occasions provoked "bewilderment" in the manly breast of Mr. Krehbiel. It is his own fault, however, for he has of late neglected his duty; he has not lectured here for a year or so. There was a time when Mr. Krehbiel unrolled the Wagner panorama, and we all profited thereby. There was a time when, with the assistance of Mr. Seidl, he took the trouble to explain to us the mysteries of coral in all its branches, antipathes, heliospora, meandrina, the family cyathophyllidæ, fungia, tubipora, astroides and even the millepores, which are only distantly related to the other coralligenous animals, though their calcareous skeletons also form extensive reefs.

Alas, those pleasant and instructive afternoons are over. Now, if we all, like sheep, have gone astray, it's Mr. Krehbiel's fault. When Mr. Dvorák's great "North American" symphony was brought over here, although Mr. Krehbiel was present for the purpose of disliking the performance under Mr. Paur, there was no preparatory lecture to give points to the conductor and to put the hearers in the proper mood for enjoyment. He should, therefore, be the last to reproach us with confused notions concerning "musical orthodoxy."

---

[39]

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 31, 1894.

THE first Kneisel Quartet concert of the tenth season was given October 22, in Union Hall. The Quartet was assisted by Mr. Max Zach, who played the second viola in the quintet by Mozart. The program was as follows:

Quartet, G major, op. 77, No. 1.....Haydn
Quartet, D flat major, op. 17.....Sgambati
First time at these concerts.
Quintet, G minor.....Mozart

This quartet by Sgambati was first played in public in Boston by the Listemann Quartet, November 11, 1889. The performance then was unfortunate, in that it precluded a calm and judicious valuation of the composition.

They say that of late years Sgambati, the musician, is more Italian in feeling and disposition. However this may be, it is true that during the extremely sensitive period of creation he was under the spell and the dominion of Liszt. In certain ways close companionship with the Hungarian visitor was undoubtedly valuable, as in awakening enthusiasm, broadening the horizon, inspiring generous, catholic appreciation; but it is doubtful whether such intimacy was of benefit to Sgambati as a composer. The reproach has been made that when a young Italian finds his melodic invention does not warrant his following in the steps of the leading Italian opera makers, he turns about and copies or tries to surpass the shining lights of the hyper-modern Germans. I do not know enough about the later works of Sgambati to say whether his melodic vein is thin, but in this quartet the themes are as a rule of little interest, nor is there evidence of spontaneous or finely nurtured melody.

The first movement opens with an adagio, which in its mock mysticism and pseudo solemnity recalls Liszt in feeblest mood. The pathos is here spelled with a B. Nor does the vivace leave a fixed impression of definite conviction and mastery of expression. The restlessness is that of weakness rather than strength. The second movement is a masterpiece. Striking, piquant, with a touch of diablerie, alluring in rhythm, firmly knit together, concise, it is one of the most fascinating movements in modern chamber music. The third movement, an andante, abounds in passages of genuine beauty, in delightful harmonic surprises, although it does not rise to the high level of the scherzo. The finale is, to me at least, disagreeable music, music that may be called unnecessarily ugly.

The unpleasant feature of this composition is the general tendency to strain after an effect. Here is no determined quartet-writing in the old and approved sense of the term. The composer seems to say, "Come now and see what I can do with these four well-known instruments." In the first movement, for instance, he takes a choral and treats it extravagantly; not without brilliancy, not without an exhibition of technical skill, but the hearer feels that the music should have been composed for an orchestra. The suggestion of what the composer intended drives out the realization of his attempt. There is a singular absence of the flowing, sensuous or even trivial song of his fatherland. He hints at the solemn ritual of the church, he endeavors to impress by monotonous iteration of a pointless remark, he churns himself into a passion and shrieks once or twice, until the hearer is ready to cry out, "The voice of the Abbé Liszt!"

Now should one protest because in a string quartet there is a desire to create a mood and a consequent abandonment in small or large measure of traditional form? Traditions are but fleeting clouds, and fetich worship in music dies hard, but it is dying. If by taking liberties the composer gains an effect of beauty or strength, or thereby puts the hearer in sympathy with its own mood, why should one quarrel with the means employed? But Sgambati did not succeed when he was most ambitious. The second movement is free from this besetting sin of vain extravagance, and so, too, the slow movement is most beautiful when there is the least apparent attempt to excite wonder.

Now on the other hand, if the end of all art is the fabrication of unity, as some believe, then is such a work as the quintet of Mozart "the finish beyond which philosophy cannot go and does not wish to go." There is more of Italy in one movement of this composition than in the whole quartet by Sgambati. Take the second theme, for instance, of the first movement: how frank, how direct, how intense, and not so unlike Verdi, the Verdi of the middle period when he was terribly in earnest; but the suggestion of similarity ceases after the first few measures. As for the adagio, there is the true classical serenity, the absolute control of expression. There is no straining after an effect any more than there is apparent effort in a phenomenon of nature. Such music is as the "flight of the gray gull over the bay, or the tall leaning of sunflowers on their stalk, or the appearance of the sun journeying through heaven, or the appearance of the moon afterward.

The performance of the Sgambati Quartet, which bristles with difficulties, as well as of the music of Haydn and Mozart, compelled praise and admiration, and Mr. Kneisel's playing in the adagio of the quintet will live long in the memory.

* * *

The program of the third Symphony concert was as follows:

Symphony, "Unfinished".....Schubert
Concerto, E flat, for piano and orchestra.....Beethoven
Mr. Baermann, pianist.
Symphony, C major.....Schumann

Familiar program numbers, and yet there are many questions that arise when this music is played. Why did Schumann, for instance, introduce the passage of staccato counterpoint immediately after that noble burst of passion which dies away in the series of violin trills? Was it because he had been studying counterpoint with great vigor, and thought he must use his knowledge pedantically? For writers about this symphony delight to speak of the "fruits of his contrapuntal studies."

Dry, indeed, is this particular fruit, which smells of chalk and the blackboard. And how incongruous it seems! What has it to do with the wild romance of the adagio, to me at least one of the greatest, if not the greatest, symphonic slow movements since Beethoven. Then, too, how could the sensitive Schumann have endured the stiffness of the two trios to the scherzo, particularly the last. The scherzo itself, with its demoniacal fury, showed the superb quality and the technical proficiency of the strings. But outside of this scherzo and the adagio, the symphony is not of abiding strength or even interest.

Another question that still excites dispute is the proper pace of the second theme of the first movement of the "Unfinished" symphony, the theme sung first by the 'cellos. There is the tendency to drag it beyond endurance, to introduce an arbitrary adagio, to make it too beautiful. In Berlin ten years or so ago there was a reaction in view of free and breezy criticism, and the recoil was too far. If Mr. Paur erred at all last evening it was slightly, and on the side of slowness.

Is not one of the greatest charms of the "Unfinished" symphony the fact that it was unfinished. Or would Schubert, if he had added a scherzo and a finale, have violated his general principle in works of long breath, which called for a decrescendo of musical interest? Already was the slow movement below the level of the preceding allegro. And is there in absolute music of the romantic school anything more beautiful than this allegro? The few opening measures of the free fantasia are enough to immortalize the work.

Mr. Baermann gave a thoughtful, accurate and finely balanced performance of the concerto. Perhaps in the last movement there were traces of restlessness, and he used occasionally the "loud pedal," so-called, too freely, but all in all, it was an unusually fine performance. It was eminently musical also in this, that there was no attempt to overthrow and subdue the orchestra. Mr. Baermann was content with the indications suggested by Beethoven, and he realized how cunningly the composer had arranged it so that the orchestra would not drown out the piano, and it would be necessary for the latter instrument to vie in vain, hopeless rivalry.

In spite of the heat and the foul air many stood throughout the concert.

There will be no Symphony concert this week. The next rehearsal and concert will be given November 9 and 10, when the program will be as follows: Overture, "Die Verkaufte Braut," Smetana; Sgambati's first symphony (first time at these concerts); Bizet's suite, "L'Arlesienne" No. 1.

Baltimore American

SUNDAY, OCTOBER 28, 1894.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS.

MATTERS OF INTEREST TO LOVERS OF THE ESTHETIC.

Baptism of the New Hall of the Auditorium Company Will Be Engraven on the Memory of Baltimoreans as a Conspicuously Important Event—To Be Opened With a Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra—Assistance of Renowned Artists Promised.

The concert to be given at Music Hall next Wednesday evening will be a "red-letter" event of the musical season. The doors of this new and magnificent "Temple of Music" will then be opened to the public for the first time, and the concert will introduce a remarkable aggregation of famous artists in every way worthy of the important occasion. The concert is the first of the annual series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

This fine organization will appear in full ranks, numbering eighty-seven musicians, and will be accompanied by a quartet of singers composed of the great prima donna soprano, Mme. Melba, and her associates, Mme. Scalchi, Messrs. Maugiere and Plancon, from the Metropolitan Opera House, New York. The advent of a singer of the calibre of Mme. Melba (who has never been heard in this city) is in itself a musical event of leading importance. This brilliant cantatrice within the last seven years has won by her superb vocalization the highest possible distinction in Paris, Brussels, Milan, London and New York, and is perhaps entitled to the very first place among the singers of the present day.

She is of Scotch descent and was born in Australia. At a very early age she began the study of the pianoforte with her mother, who was an amateur of ability. When about twelve years old it was discovered that nature had endowed her with a voice of musical beauty, and after some years of study in Australia, acting upon the advice of friends, she went to Paris to seek the advantage of tutition from the celebrated Mme. Marchesi.

Notwithstanding the many objections raised by Mr. Mitchell, her father, a landed proprietor at Melbourne, and one of the commissioners of the Melbourne Exhibition, a lyric career became irresistible, and after studying with Mme. Marchesi for about a year, Mme. Melba made her debut on the 15th of October, 1887, as Gilda in "Rigoletto" at the Theatre de la Monnaie, Brussels. Her success was so immediate and brilliant that the intendant, M. Lapissada, who had only arranged for a single appearance, engaged her for a term, and she subsequently appeared as Lakme, Violetta, Ophelie and Lucia. Subsequently, Sir Augustus Harris engaged her for Covent Garden, and in the season of 1888 she made her first appearance in England as Lucia with a success that will be remembered with pleasure by all opera-goers.

From October to the following May, Madame Melba was again engaged at Brussels, after which she returned to Paris, and having studied the part of the heroine of Ambroise Thomas' opera of "Hamlet" with the composer, she made her appearance at the Grand Opera in the character of Ophelia, which was successfully repeated eight times, and described by the French press in the most enthusiastic terms.

Madame next studied the role of Juliette, with the assistance of the composer, Charles Gounod, and appeared in London in that character in June, 1889, with Jean de Reske in his favorite part of Romeo.

In the winter of that year she was the favorite prima donna of the Grand Opera at Paris, where she sang in several representations of Marguerite, Juliette, Ophelie, Lucia and Gilda.

Later assumptions of Mme. Melba were Esmeralda at Covent Garden, in Goring Thomas' opera of that name; Elsa de Brabant, in Wagner's "Lohengrin," and Elaine, which M. Bemberg had written expressly for her, to whom, by the way, and to Jean de Reske, the work is dedicated.

Mention of her appearance in the part of Micaela in the picturesque opera of "Carmen" at the Opera Comique, given to provide the funds for a statue for M. Bizet, its gifted composer, should not be forgotten. This was subsequently repeated at Covent Garden to the Carmen of Zelie de Lussan, and it may be safely asserted that the beautiful phrases allotted to Micaela have never been so delightfully sung as by the "Australian Nightingale."

Last season Madame Melba made her debut in America at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, singing throughout the season with the same success that attended her appearances in the European capitals and giving such satisfaction to her managers, Abbey, Schoeffel and Grau, that she has been re-engaged for the current season at a princely honorarium.

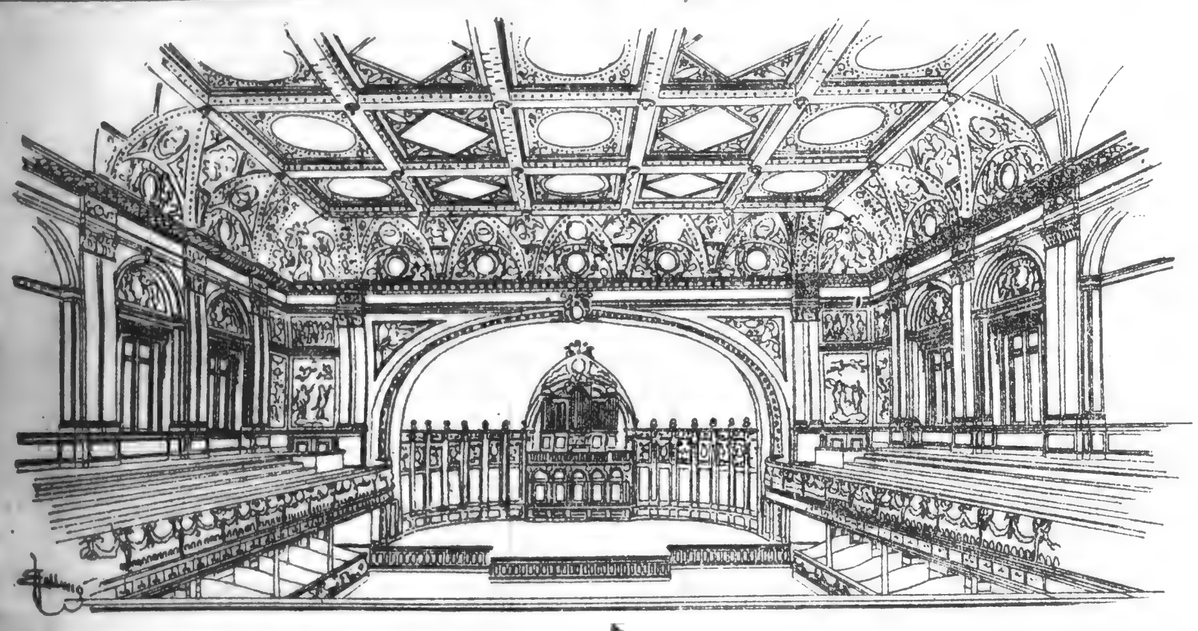
Madame Melba's voice is of a remarkably pure, beautiful and sympathetic quality, with an extensive range, reaching to E in alt., the tone being crystalline in its sweetness and clearness.

It is perfectly even throughout the register, and her vocalization, in the purest Italian style, is almost unrivalled in fluency and absolutely faultless, while the development recently exhibited by Melba, in a dramatic sense, promises a position for her as a lyric equal to her extraordinary powers as a vocalist.

Madame Scalchi, the famous operatic contralto, is too well known in this city to require extended notice. Mons. Maugiere is a tenor of considerable ability, and Mons. Plancon, who is a great favorite at the Grand Opera, Paris, is one of the best baritones that ever visited America, and fairly divided the honors with Edward de Reszke during the last opera season in New York.

An Incorporated Band.

A new band has been organized in this



GENERAL VIEW OF AUDITORIUM AND STAGE OF MUSIC HALL.

Showing Scheme of Decoration for Wall and Ceiling.

Philadelphia Inquirer

TUESDAY, OCTOBER 30, 1894.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

A Delightful Concert Attended by a Very Large Audience.

The Boston Symphony season opened last night at the Academy of Music, which was crowded in every part. The orchestra has been somewhat reinforced since last season. Mr. Paur was hardly at his best last night. The Tannhaeuser overture, which opened the concert, was played with great repression and the lack of brasses was notable. It was a refined production, though lacking in the breadth and dignity given it by other directors. The Symphony was Schumann's C major, a work of varied characteristics, which the orchestra played admirably. The Gluck "Tambourine, Gavotte and Chacoune" was played with all the delicacy for which the organization is so famous. The new number of Goldmark's "Sappho Overture," which is characteristic of that master.

Miss Julie M. Wyman, who has a small but pleasing voice, sang to piano accompaniment an aria by Lenepreu and one from Massanet's "Galathee."

The audience was enthusiastic and entirely undiscriminating. While it has been said that Mr. Paur was hardly at his best last night, it might be more properly said that the program was chiefly at fault. While it was an interesting concert it was less noteworthy than that excellent organization is accustomed to give us.

THE RECORD.

Philadelphia, October 30, 1894.

Boston Symphony Orchestra — Academy of Music

Carl Goldmark's latest orchestral work, the "Overture to Sappho in G flat major," was given its first Philadelphia performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its first concert of the season at the Academy of Music last evening. The score recalls in many respects the Hungarian composer's earlier "Overture to Sakuntala," but, it must be admitted, is much less impressive. The contrasts between the instruments are happily developed, but the fitful flitting from gentle oboe and violin solos to stormy outbursts of almost the full orchestra leaves an unpleasant, unsymmetrical impression upon the memory of the listener. The turbulent first theme is oddly introduced by broad phrases on the harp, the full lyrical beauty of which was rather lost last night. The single harp was often almost too much drowned by the heavy bowing of the violinists. The half sweet and half melancholy pastoral melody which threads the piece haunts the imagination forcibly, however, and gains an enriched splendor when heard in the octaves of oboe and horn. The grand pæan is worthy, too, of the brilliant Goldmark.

The feature, however, of the concert—and the masterpiece—proved to be the opening number, Wagner's wonderful "Overture to Tannhaeuser." It is safe to declare that never before had that familiar overture so magnificent an interpretation before a Philadelphia audience. The violins did heroic work, and throughout the entire orchestral struggle of the Pilgrims and the sprites of Venusberg the shadings were majestically depicted by all the instruments. The perfect control of Conductor Emil Paur was emphatically revealed in the instant responses. The final return of the Pilgrims' chorus on the trombones and trumpets against the melodic figure on the violins evoked an ovation of applause from the immense audience. Schumann's "Symphony No. 2, in C major," provoked small enthusiasm. To most music-lovers Schumann is still the Browning of music, cloudy in form and purpose. The final coda was a blind groping for expression, despite its tremendousness. The scherzo second movement, with its picturesque trios and its remarkable finale on the violins, will, on the contrary, long linger in the remembrance of all who heard it. The predominant merit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is that it is superb in the strings.

The North American

PHILADELPHIA, PA.

TUESDAY, OCTOBER 30, 1894.

MUSIC AT THE ACADEMY.

First Concert for the Season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The auditorium of the Academy of Music was crowded in every part last evening when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Emil Paur, gave the first of the five concerts in which it is to be heard here during the present season. Upon this occasion the symphony was that by Schumann in C major No. 4. This is great music, but it is anything but easy music, either to execute or to appreciate. It exhibits in a superlative degree alike the merits and the defects which constitute the characteristics of Schumann's work. It is wonderfully vital, salient and energetic. It is full of original ideas, many of them of the utmost beauty, and it exhibits in its ultimate development and most convincing aspect the composer's unequalled faculty for the combination of tone-color. The skill with which the various instruments are in their turn employed in order to produce the precise effect desired is extraordinary, and an impression is thus produced on the mind as of something singularly vivid and gorgeous, fantastically varied and differently brilliant, like the patterns of a kaleidoscope. The trouble is that Schumann overlays his pattern with such a wealth of ornamental arabesques, that to any but the expert eye the original design is overshadowed by the multitude of detail of which it is the basis. This to a large extent is true of last night's symphony. The scherzo and the adagio are clear enough, but the opening movement demands the closest attention, while much of the finale is only intelligible to the trained musician. For this reason there was some suggestion of relief in the applause which the close of the symphony elicited, and yet it was all beautifully played, not only with an absolute and never-failing technical sufficiency, but with broad intelligence, a fine sense of proportion and delicately sympathetic insight. The rushing scherzo, with its dazzling exhibition of the brilliancy of the strings, was naturally most effective, but the delivery of the slow movement was not less masterly, and afforded even a surer test of quality, and the entire performance in every respect was most admirable. Of the other instrumental numbers the dance music by Gluck pleased the audience most, especially an extremely melodious and characteristic gavotte, which would gladly have been heard over again. The playing of the "Tannhaeuser" overture, though beautifully refined and lucid, lacked something of breadth and power, and was not sufficiently worked up to a convincing climax, while the Goldmark overture seemed on a first hearing labored and incoherent. Mrs. Julie M. Wyman was the soloist. She has an agreeable voice and a good method, but her genre is the chanson, and last night both of her selections were unfortunate. They were too low for her range, and they were not interesting. It may indeed be questioned whether at a symphony concert songs with piano are not out of place. At least there ought always to be one aria with orchestral accompaniment. The date of the next concert is December 3.

The Times

PHILADELPHIA, OCTOBER 30, 1894.

Academy of Music.

Mr. Paur's pride must have been highly gratified by the splendid audience which welcomed the opening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The Academy was more than crowded, and presented almost the brilliance of an opera night. There was only one orchestral novelty on the programme, Goldmark's "Sappho" overture. Towards this, as toward so much else of the work of the hour, the audience found itself in an attitude of interested expectancy, hopeful of agreeable but not great things. And agreeable things they received. Goldmark, though always literary, is always original, a man who orchestrates cleverly, boldly and deftly, and in his new overture he repeats the distinguishing attractions as well as the style of the "Sakuntala." It is not very deep music, perhaps, this "Sappho" overture; for one thing it is not particularly suggestive of Sappho; but in the strength of its themes and its well-defined treatment, now clear and contrasting, now dashing and forcible in the true "plein orchestre" school, it is a good addition to the modern menu-programme. For the other numbers Mr. Paur played the "Tannhaeuser" overture, in which the violins were heard to unusual advantage; the Schumann C major symphony, with its ever-lovely opening numbers, and some dance music from Gluck, among which a gavotte proved exquisitely charming and aroused long-continued applause. The soloist, Mrs. Julie M. Wyman, sang an aria from Lenepreu, "Lajeune Captive," and the rather tame aria from Massenet's "Galathee."

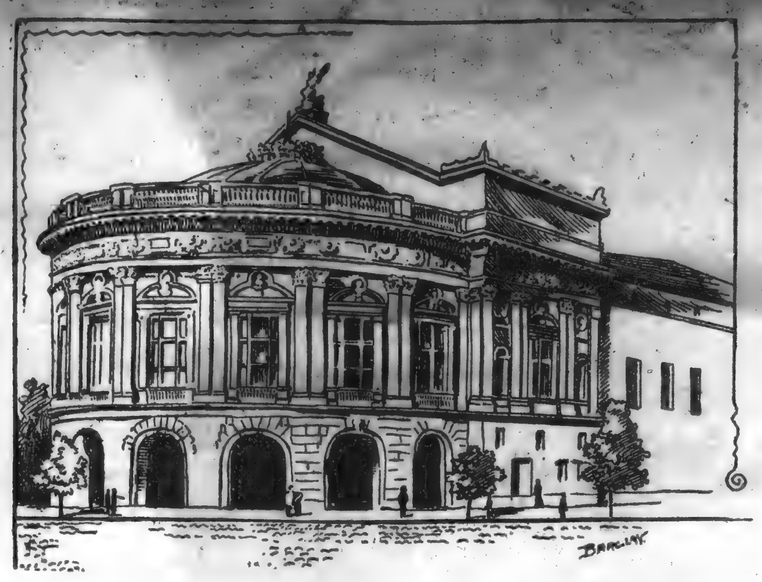
Philadelphia Abend-Post.

Dienstag, 30. Oktober 1894.

Boston Symphonie Orchester. Dieses ausgezeichnete Orchester gab gestern Abend in der Academy of Music das erste von fünf großen Konzerten unter Leitung des Herrn Emil Paur. Es wurde die Tannhäuser Ouverture in musterhafter Weise zum Vortrag gebracht, außerdem die berühmte Schumann'sche C dur Symphonie, Tänze aus Gluck's Opern und die hier noch unbekannte Ouverture zu Goldmark's „Sappho". In der Symphonie waren das „Scherzo" und das „Adagio" die erfolgreichsten. Die ungeheuren technischen Schwierigkeiten, welche die Komposition bietet, wurden spielend überwunden. Als Solistin fungirte Frau Julie M. Wyman, eine tüchtige Lieder-Sängerin, deren schöne, wohlgeschulte Stimme selbst in den ihr weniger günstig gelegenen Arien zur Geltung kam. Das nächste Konzert findet am 3. Dezember statt.

[41]

SUPERB TEMPLE OF MUSIC.



Baltimore's Great Auditorium to Open Its Doors This Week.

Baltimore has the finest auditorium in the South and one that cannot be easily rivalled anywhere in the country in the new Music Hall, which will be opened this week.

Its unusual size, its beautiful decorations, the charming tone of classic elegance everywhere apparent in its furnishing combine to make it one of the most attractive and magnificent places of amusement in America.

The opening of a hall so splendidly adapted to its purpose will have an enthusing effect on the musical interests of Baltimore. It will be an inspiration and will make this city more than ever a centre of musical culture and will bring the largest companies and most celebrated artists. With the Peabody Conservatory to create a craving for classical music and the high class performances of the Music Hall to satisfy it, the people of Baltimore will, indeed, be fortunate.

Diagram of the Main Floor.

Music Hall, as it stands completed, is a monument to the public spirit and persevering energy of the gentlemen who built it. They have worked in the face of great obstacles and have overcome all difficulties in their determination to furnish the city of Baltimore a music hall which should be worthy of the city and adequate to its needs. Baltimore's commercial, social and educational supremacy are unquestioned among all the cities of the South, and the Music Hall will be the crowning point that will give the city wide musical fame also.

The Opening an Epoch.

The opening of Music Hall marks the beginning of an epoch for Baltimore. The city has never had a music hall adequate for the attractions which would have come and which passed Baltimore by because of the lack of a suitable hall. The new auditorium is essentially a music hall, but it has three rooms besides the main hall suitable for concerts, dances and festivals.

The opening attraction—the Boston Symphony Orchestra—is very strong. Mr. Emil Paur will be the conductor and the soloists will be: Mme. Melba, soprano; Mme. Scalchi, contralto; M. Maugiere, tenor; M. Plancon, baritone. The orchestra contains 87 musicians, which, with the soloists obtained from the Grand Italian and French Opera Company of the Metropolitan Opera House, New York (by special arrangement with Messrs. Abbey, Schoeffel and Grau), form the greatest combination of artists that has ever appeared in a single concert in this city.

Conductor Emil Paur.

On the evening of the opening all the parlors, reception rooms and banquet halls of the building will be illuminated and opened for inspection by the public.

A series of five concerts will be given by the same organization that opens the hall on Wednesday evening, October 31, December 5, January 9, February 6 and March 13. The following soloists will take part in the concerts: Mme. Melba, prima donna soprano; Mme. Nordica, prima donna soprano; Mme. Scalchi, contralto; Mme. Maugiere, tenor; Mr. Plancon, baritone; Mr. Caesar Thomson, violin; Mr. Alwin Schroeder, violencello.

Programme of Opening Concert.

Vorspiel, "Dei Meistersinger"....Wagner
Romanza from "Mignon".....A. Thomas
Mons. Maugiere.
Aria from "Don Carlos".....Verdi
Mons. Plancon.
Aria, "Sweet Bird" (l'allegro il penseoso), Handel
(Flute obligato, Mons. Mole), Mme. Melba
Entr' acte, "Gwendoline," first time Chabrier
Aria, "Che Faro," from "Orpheus,"..Gluck
Mme. Scalchi.
Song, "The Two Grenadiers"...Schumann
Mons. Plancon.
Waltz, "Se Seran Rose".....Arditi
Mme. Melba.
Overture, scherzo, notturno and wedding march from "The Midsummer Night's Dream"..... .... Mendelssohn
Quartet from "Rigoletto".....Verdi
Mesdames Melba and Scalchi, Messrs. Maugiere and Plancon.
Overture, "Egmout".. ... .Beethoven

Mme. Nellie Melba.

Mme. Nellie Melba, the star soloist, who, within the last five years, has gained the highest possible distinction in Paris, Brussels, London, Milan and New York, was born in Australia. She is of Scotch descent, and at the early age of 3 years her mother, who was an amateur of ability, began to teach her the piano; and at 6 years of age she was heard at a public concert given in aid of the funds of the Presbyterian Church at Richmond.

Madame Melba made her debut on the 15th of October, 1887, as Gilda in "Rigoletto," at the Theatre de la Monnaie, Brussels. Her success was so immediate and brilliant that M. Lapissada, who had only arranged for a single appearance, engaged her for a term, and she subsequently appeared as Lakma, Violetta, Ophelia and Lucia. Subsequently Sir Augustus Harris engaged her for Covent Garden, and in the season of 1888 she made her first appearance in London as Lucia.

She returned to Paris, and made her appearance at the Grand Opera in the character of Ophelia, which was successfully repeated eight times. She next studied the role of Juliette, with the assistance of Charles Gounod, and appeared in London in that character in June, 1869, with Jean de Reszke in his favorite part of Romeo. In the winter of that year she was the favorite prima donna of the Grand Opera at Paris, where she sang in several representations of Marguerite, Juliette, Ophelie, Lucia and Gilda.

The latest assumptions of Madame Melba have been as Esmeralda at Covent Garden, in Goring Thomas' opera of that name; Elsa de Brabant in Wagner's "Lohengrin"; and Elaine, which M. Bemberg had written expressly for her, to whom, and to Jean de Reszke, the work is dedicated.

Mme. Nellie Melba.

During her short artistic career Madame Melba has received a number of valuable presents from admirers, among whom may be included several crowned heads of Europe. A magnificent brooch of rubies and diamonds is the gift of Her Majesty, and from the Prince and Princess of Wales she has received a brooch of diamonds and pearls, and bracelet of rubies and diamonds. The Czar gave her a splendid bracelet of pearls and diamonds; while the Grand Duke Alexis handed her a brooch, with bracelet to match, of sapphires and diamonds.

Messrs. Abbey, Schoeffel & Grau induced her to visit America last year, and her brilliant triumphs at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York City, in that remarkable season of Italian and French grand opera are familiar to the music-lovers throughout this country. Madame Melba's voice is of a remarkably pure, beautiful and sympathetic quality, with an extensive range, reaching to E in alt, the tone being crystalline in its sweetness and clearness. It is perfectly even throughout the register, and her vocalization, in the purest Italian style, is almost unrivaled in fluency and absolutely faultless, while the development recently exhibited by Madame Melba in a dramatic sense promises a position for her as a lyric artist equal to her extraordinary powers as a vocalist.

Coming Attractions.

The new Music Hall not only starts out well, but it has a good list of attractions to keep it going. It is not expected that a new house should have the strong attractions which a well-established auditorium can secure and the list of the Music Hall's attractions is on that account all the more surprising. Included in the list are the following:

Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Seidl Orchestra.
Damrosch Orchestra.
Sousa's Band.
Princeton College Glee and Banjo Club.
Ysaye, Belgian violin soloist.
Thomson, Belgian violin soloist.

These are among the traveling attractions. It has besides a number of the leading local entertainments in which are the following:

Haydn Society concerts.
Home for Consumptives' bazaar.
Baptist Orphanage bazaar.
Fidelia Assembly ball and banquet.
Letter Carriers' Association ball.

The strong list of attractions is due to the energy of Mr. John J. Nolan, the manager, who has had 12 years' experience in managing such companies and houses as Theodore Thomas' Orchestra, National Opera Company, Juch Opera Company, Hinrich's Opera Company, Damrosch Symphony Orchestra, Urania and Carnegie Music Hall.

Music Hall is owned by the Auditorium Company, an organization of which the officers and directors are:

Mr. Frank Frick, president; Mr. W. Graham Bowdoin, vice-president; Mr. Robert C. Davidson, treasurer; Mr. R. S. Albert, secretary; Mr. Charles Keidel, Mr. Alexander Frank, Mr. Bernard N. Baker, Mr. David L. Bartlett and Mr. J. Le Roy White.

Will Rival the Finest.

The building bids fair to rival the finest places of amusement in the country, not only on account of the size and conveniences of the auditorium itself, but through the number and arrangement of the other halls, passages, dressing-rooms, etc., which are especially planned to be used in connection with it or for separate and distinct performances.

It may be said, in a general way, to meet the requirements of every variety of entertainment, both musical, social, political and educational, for which there is a demand. The building stands between Mt. Royal and Maryland avenues, near their junction, and has entrances from both.

The site is wisely selected, being almost in the centre of the best quarter of city residences, surrounded by the principal lines of street railways, and near both the Baltimore and Ohio and the Pennsylvania Stations. Therefore, as a convenient centre for the kind of attractions for which it has been built the Music Hall hardly has a rival in Baltimore; and with its other advantages it promises for itself a great success in the future, and to become of inestimable value to the city in which it is built and for whose advancement it is dedicated.

Diagram of the Gallery Floor.

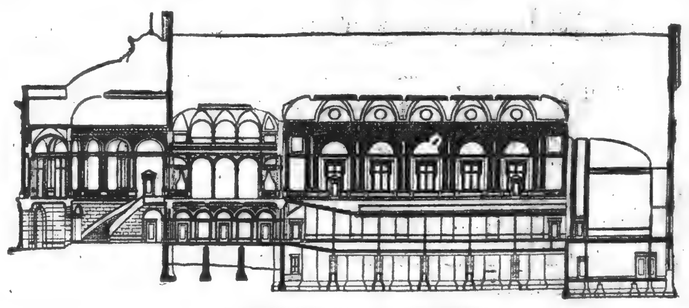
AUDITORIUM AND STAGE.

The building still lacks its semi-circular front, the absence of which not only mars the entire effect of the building as seen from Mt. Royal avenue, but deprives the general plan of the interior of its most striking and unusual feature. A temporary vestibule of frame has, however, been erected where the semi-circular hall will stand, leading to the lobby and to the dressing-rooms, and making an ample and convenient entrance to the building from that direction. The lobby (30 by 40 feet) gives access to the main floor of the auditorium and to the staircases to the gallery and assembly-rooms above. It is flanked by dressing-rooms, coatrooms and lavatories, which are so arranged that they can be used in connection with the assembly-room above them, as well as with the auditorium itself, according to the character of the entertainments in progress.



LONGITUDIN AL SECTION.

Will Seat 3000.

The auditorium itself is one of the largest music halls in this country, being 110 feet in length, exclusive of the stage, and 100 feet in width. It has a full seating capacity of 3000 persons, although at present only 2634 seats have been provided as sufficient for its present needs. The central portion of the main floor, 70 by 85 feet, is flat, and provided with 1100 movable seats upon a canvas covering. These will be removed when balls are given, or any other entertainment that requires a clear floor space.

The 240 seats under the galleries and overlooking this space are so arranged that they can at any time be divided into sections by light partitions and converted into "stalls" thereby. The galleries on the three sides of the auditorium have a full seating capacity of 1044 persons.

The stage is elliptical in plan. Its width is 70 feet, its depth 40 feet and its seating capacity about 500 persons. The organ gallery is in the centre of the east wall and forms the principal feature of the stage.

On either side are large dressing-rooms with lavatories adjoining for the performers' use, and above them again other rooms suitable either as dressing-rooms or storerooms. Easy access is provided to the auditorium on each floor, both from the Maryland avenue and Mt. Royal avenue entrances. The staircases to the former will be used as a general rule for exits only.

The general effect of the auditorium and of the stage is simple but good. The decoration has been used sparingly and with great care, and the color scheme, while in keeping with the general simplicity of the interior, is light and attractive.

All experiments that have been made to try the acoustic qualities of the auditorium have brought the most satisfactory results and prove beyond doubt that it possesses unusual advantages for hearing not only orchestral and choral music, but a single voice, either in speaking or in singing.

The Assembly Room.

The assembly-room is connected with the lobby and dressing rooms below by a staircase from either end, and it also connects directly with the gallery of the auditorium, thus answering the requirements of a foyer. It possesses from its size and general arrangements excellent advantages as a ball-room, lecture-room or concert hall. The windows on the east side of the room open directly into the auditorium, enabling it to be used in connection with the larger hall whenever occasion requires. The open floor space in this room is 60 by 40 feet and the ceiling 40 feet above. At either end are passages or lobbies containing together more than half that amount of space and above them galleries, reached by staircases, for musicians, etc.

The decoration of the assembly-room is more elaborate in detail and its coloring more striking than that of any other portion of the building. While it now possesses advantages over any other hall of its character in Baltimore, it is natural to suppose that together with the semi-circular colonnade of the enrtance hall, which it is hoped will soon be added to the building, there will be no more effective arrangements for balls and social and musical entertainments generally found in the country than these will together afford.

ASSEMBLY ROOM.

At the other end of the building and below the stage is another hall of the same length and width, but with lower ceiling, 15 feet, and much simpler finish generally. Its entrances are at either end, and open directly from Maryland avenue. Adjoining it is the banquet hall of the same dimensions, finished in dark wood and possessing the necessary pantries in connection with it for suppers, etc.

There are also anterooms, dressing-rooms and lavatories adjoining these two halls to make their purposes complete, and special facilities for a great variety of entertainments have thereby been assured. Furthermore, being connected with the auditorium by staircases at either end, these halls can be used in connection with the larger hall when balls fairs and public meetings are being given.

Safety in a Panic.

On account of the number of staircases and entrances connected with all of the halls in the building opening upon the streets at both ends, not only the convenience, but the safety of the public has been thoroughly well provided for. Openings for four fire-escapes from each floor of the auditorium have been arranged to add, if necessary, further security against danger of fire or panic.

The building is provided with electric light in abundance, a special plant in the building, being supplemented with gas for special occasions. The heating and ventilating apparatus is most complete, and the fan system with which the building has been provided has already proved most thorough and satisfactory in its effects in both conditions of heat and cold.

It has been three years since the first meeting was held to provide for the erection of the Music Hall. On November 28, 1891, the initiatory meeting of those interested was held at the Mount Vernon Hotel. A general committee of 30 was appointed at that meeting to take the whole matter in charge. The following were appointed members of the committee:

Men Who Built It.

Messrs. B. N. Baker, Frank Frick, Blanchard Randall, Edward F. Leyh, R. C. Davidson, Ernest Knabe, Richard S. Albert, J. Le Roy White, Alex. Frank, George H. Sargeant, Charles A. Martin, I. Guggenheimer, Alfred Dohme, F. M. Colston, A. H. Hecht, Henry Lauts, Henry Smith, A. K. Shriver, G. M. Shriver, F. H. Gotlieb, Nelson Hiss, W. A. Hanway, Louis Schneider, George Savage, J. F. Supplee, Ross Jungnickel, George Blumer, W. H. Love, D. L. Bartlett and W. Graham Bowdoin.

The committee went to work at once and by April 11, 1892, had secured subscriptions for $150,000. The organization was incorporated under the title of The Auditorium Company of Baltimore, with a capital stock of $200,000, and the following were named as directors for the first year:

Messrs. Frank Frick, W. Graham Bowdoin, R. C. Davidson, Richard S. Albert, Ernest Knabe, D. L. Bartlett, B. N. Baker, Alexander, Frank and J. Le Roy White.

The lot on which the building now stands was purchased for $43,000. It fronts 223 feet on Mount Royal avenue and 117 feet on Maryland avenue. Competitive designs for a building were asked for and from a number presented the present design was selected.

[42]

REDUCTION

RATIO

15x

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

3.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

Another Stradivarius.

MR. FRANZ KNEISEL'S recent purchase of a Stradivarius violin adds one more to the number in this city of "supposed to be genuine" instruments of the greatest of all violin makers. Mr. Kneisel purchased his "Strad" of his former teacher, Prof. Gruen of Vienna, and it is stated that he paid $5000 for it. This instrument was made in 1717, which is admitted to have been during the best period of its maker's wonderful productiveness. Patrons of the symphony and of the Kneisel Quartette concerts will have the pleasure of listening to this rare instrument. A fine Guarnarius violin, a Gaspar de Salo viola, and an Amati 'cello are also owned by other members of the Kneisel Quartette. The aggregate value of these instruments in the commercial estimation of their owners is $14,000. The celebrated String Quartette of London possess instruments that have a market value of $25,000. But, after all, it can hardly be assumed that audiences, even in this musically enlightened 19th century, are capable of appreciating the difference in tone-quality between the instruments of one of these Quartettes and those of any other. Nor is it necessary that they should possess so subtle an appreciation to enjoy the interpretations of the artists who, through the mediumship of such perfect instruments, are all the better able to reach the highest excellence in their art.

MELBA, QUEEN OF SONG,

Heard at the Opening of the New Music Hall.

A BRILLIANT EVENT.

Three Thousand People Throng the Auditorium.

MUSIC, JEWELS AND BEAUTY.

The Initial Concert of the Most Brilliant Musical Season Baltimore Has Ever Experienced—Paur's Matchless Orchestra Fully Supports the Celebrated Vocalists—A Critical Analysis of the Performance.

BALTIMORE'S new Music Hall, on Mount Royal avenue, west of Charles, was gloriously dedicated and opened last night.

The doors of the magnificent structure were thrown wide open to the public for the first time, and the people of this city saw fulfilled an ambition and desire of years. The most ardent well-wishers of this enterprise could hardly have anticipated a more auspicious beginning. Wealth, beauty and culture, all were present to assist in launching this commendable venture upon its splendid mission. There have been occasions frequently when throngs of representative people were gathered under one roof, but rarely has there been one more brilliant than the audience which greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night.

The event had been looked forward to with great interest. The people were as eager for an opportunity to inspect the new building as they were to listen to the performance.

As early as 7 o'clock the hosts began to gather. Those first on the grounds were desirous of purchasing their tickets at the window, and shortly after the doors were opened a line was formed reaching far out into the street. The anxious ones were accommodated as quickly as possible, but two seemed to arrive for every one that passed into the hall.

It was 8 o'clock when the great majority began to put in an appearance. Carriage after carriage passed around the grass-plot in front of the building and deposited their burdens of fashion and culture before the doors of the hall. It was not long before there was a crush in the temporary foyer, but the crowd was handled with acute skill by Doorkeeper A. K. Tabman and his assistants. The stream that continuously passed in was almost dazzling. The ladies, in their handsome toilets and sparkling jewels, contrasted prettily with the conventional black of their escorts. Manager John J. Nolan was ubiquitous. He was here, there and everywhere, looking after the comfort of all who came.

Seats for All.

The first-comers whiled away the time in making tours of inspection, and loud and sincere were their expressions of admiration. The throbbing of the great electric machine found an echo in the tramp of hosts of feet. People had been coming for almost two hours, and yet there was room for almost every person within those four walls.

Myriads of electric bulbs shed a radiant glow over the scene, which was beautiful. Upon the platform were grouped the members of the orchestra in picturesque detail. Banked in the rear, and interlaced on the sides, were decorations of green and white in mid colors.

A storm of applause greeted Conductor Paur when he advanced to his place in front of the orchestra and turned to receive acknowledgment before that sea of faces. The applause had hardly subsided before one of the ushers rushed up the aisle and presented Mr. Paur with a handsome floral music-stand, the gift of the members of the Auditorium Company.

A hush of expectancy fell upon the audience. The people had been satisfied with the inspection of the building, and were waiting impatiently for the concert to begin. They were on the qui vive to hear Madame Melba. The Boston Symphony Orchestra had been heard here before, but Melba never. She came preceded by a reputation that few of the day can boast of. When she was over, she had conquered, as many more than demanded that her enviable reputation was attained by true merit alone.

Madame Melba.

With one or two exceptions, however, the selections given were hardly up to the Boston Symphony Orchestra standard. Not that they were indifferently played, but the critical ones in the audience, no doubt, looked for numbers of more depth and classical construction than those given in the main. At night, however, the light compositions were thought to be in keeping with the joyousness of the occasion.

Madame Melba was the bright particular star of the evening. Fairly sparkling in a costume of turquoise-blue satin, besprinkled with sprays of cut steel, she came on for her triumph. The applause of recognition was not long, the people were too anxious to hear her voice.

Her first solo was the "Sweet Bird" of Haendel, with flute obligato. And she sung it like a bird. Such a succession of pure and perfect trills and hard to imagine and much more difficult to describe. Few singers can take turns in the middle register without a guttural break, but with Melba the tones flowed with a crystalline brilliancy that blunted the sheen of the jewels at her throat. In the duo in thirds with the flute the voice and instrument blended with a purity was superb, while the "echo opprogiotura" in canton effect was almost a revolution. The the roulades were as near perfect as well-schooled vocalism can produce, and, although no opportunity was lost for an opportunity at coleratuer display, there was no attempt at vocal acrobatics.

Great credit is also due the work of Mr. Chales Mole, the flautist. He played a silver instrument of the Boehm pattern, and gave a splendid exhibition of technique and breadth of tone. Mme. Melba was recalled again and again, and responded by repeating a part of the same solo.

Equally as successful was she in the rendition of Orditi's waltz song, "Se Saran Rose," and as an encore to this beautiful yet hackneyed work sang a German love song.

The Other Soloists.

Mons. Plancon has a sonorous and musical baritone, which he uses with good judgment, although at times he became too emphatic, causing a perceptible harshness. He did exceedingly well with the aria from Verdi's "Don Carlos," and was thrice recalled. He was far more successful in the singing of Schuman's "The Two Grenadiers," with its patriotic "Marsailes," and an encore was demanded and given.

Madame Scalchi scored her usual triumph. She is not a stranger to the lyric lovers of this city, and was accorded a warm greeting. She sang the "Chefaro," from Gluck's "Orpheus," and as an encore gave a Russian composition.

The audience was not a little disappointed in M. Mangiere, the tenor. He has a musical, sympathetic voice, but it lacks body and range, and in taking the higher tones he is forced to resort to falsetto tones. In place of the selection from "Mignon" scheduled, he sang the "Salut, Demure, Chaste et Pure," from Gounod's "Faust."

A decided feature of the programme was the famous quartette from "Rigoletto," sung by Mesdames Melba and Scalchi and Mons. Mangiere and Plancon.

The orchestral numbers were rendered as only the Boston Symphony Orchestra can play. On the opening number, the prelude to "Die Meistersinger Von Nuemberg," was at once made plain the splendid acoustic qualities of the hall. The unique staccato of the wood wind working down to a single theme for the oboe, was heard distinctly in every part of the hall.

The prelude to act second of "Gwendoline," by Chambrier, is a newcomer in this vicinity. It is of the new French school, devoted to orchestral colonys and contrapuntal peculiarities and in the end is extremely uninteresting.

The gem of the orchestra work was the "Scherzo Nocturne" and wedding march from "Midsummer Night's Dream," by Wagner. The work of the wood, wind and strings in the first named was exceptionally fine.

The concert closed with Brahm's "Academic Overture."

Much to their sorrow, the artists were forced to leave their magnificent floral tokens in Baltimore. Not that the beautiful emblems were not appreciated, but, as the company left last night for New York, it was found impossible to take the flowers without spoiling them, and it was decided that they be sent to-day to the Home for Incurables of this city.

Notwithstanding the rush of carriages before and after the performance, there was not the slightest confusion, owing to the splendid police arrangements under the personal direction of Captain Frank Toner and Round Sergeant Ned Schleigh.

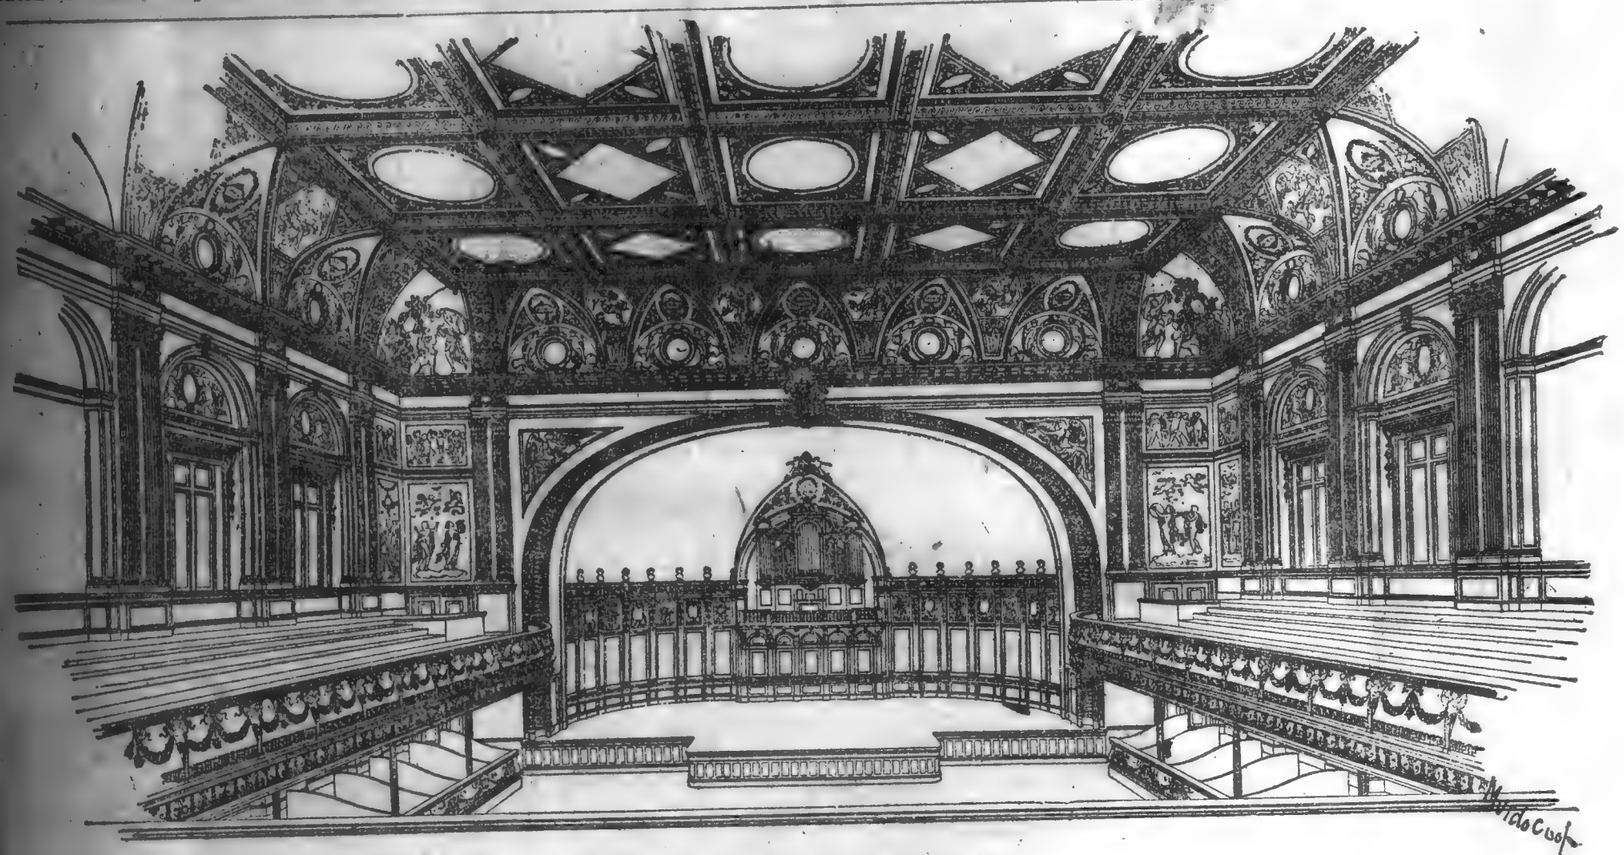
Society Well Represented.

The big audience at the Music Hall last night had a generous sprinkling of society's belles and beaux, and particularly those who are noted for their love of the highest-class music could be seen. Long before the hour of 8 carriages were driven hurriedly along Mount Royal avenue to the entrance in a steady stream, and for the distance of 100 feet people were packed together, trying to get to their seats first. But there was no need of their hurrying.

It must not be imagined from this, however, that there were no further applicants for admission after the house was full, for many hundred, as soon as it became known that seats were unobtainable, left rather than stood up. The love of fine music implanted in young women was particularly brought out by the presence of a number of well-known society girls scarcely through with the year of their debut. They seemed to enjoy the different numbers thoroughly, and clapped their daintily gloved hands in applause frequently. On the whole, it was not a representative society gathering, being made up mostly of musical extremists in Baltimore, but yet there were enough of the 400 present to stamp it as a real big event. There were few evening costumes, and the general color of the dresses was sombre in the extreme, though lighter at intervals, with a gown or two of blue, pink, &c.

Some of those present in the audience were: Miss Nellie Stirling, Miss Helen Harvey, the Misses Lurman, Miss Mary Boone, Miss Mary Keyser, Miss Josephine Poe, Miss Mary Shearer, Miss Fannie Gray, Miss Florence Ranstead, Miss Eleanor Smith, Miss Margaret Atkinson, Miss Henrietta Tilghman, Mrs. Lovell, Miss Beulah Smith, Miss Mabel Ford, Mrs. Arthur Shreve, Mrs. Joshua Harvey, Miss Laura Jenkins, Miss Mary H. Jenkins, Mrs. Charles P. Montague, General and Mrs. Felix Agnus, the Misses Agnus, Miss Coulter, Mrs. N. G. Penniman, Mr. and Mrs. Stanley Gary, Mr. and Mrs. Charles E. Ways, Miss Bessie Ways, the Misses Penniman, Mr. and Mrs. J. P. Wright, Mr. and Mrs. Randolph Hendleton, Miss Alice Key Blunt, Florence Bassen, Dr. William P. Lockwood, Dr. McFier Warfield, Robert Lehr, Mr. and Mrs. Winslow Williams, L. Edwin Aler, Harold Randolph, Miss Virginia Cooper, Mr. and Mrs. Jesse Tyson, Mr. and Mrs. C. Morton Stewart, Mrs. G. Johnson Poe, Mr. and Mrs. William Reed, Mr. and Mrs. W. Martin, J. Crossman Cooper, Miss May Boone, B. N. Baher, Charles Keidel, Mr. and Mrs. Wesley M. Oler, Mr. and Mrs. W. P. Hayey, Beulah Smith, Mr. and Mrs. Mrs. George W. Dobbin, George W. Dobbin, Jr., Otto Sutro, Mr. and Mrs. James P. Bradt, Thomas C. Basshor, Mr. and Mrs. Bartlett S. Johnston, Mr. and Mrs. William Whitelock, Lucien O'Dend'bal, Mr. and Mrs. Winslow Williams, F. F. Peard, Edgar H. Miller, Jr., Willard G. Day, B. Howard Tyson, William J. Bowdoin, Arthur Rolson, J. Hooper Edmondson, James B. Clarke, Dr. B. Merrill Hopkinson, J. Seth Hopkins, Percy B. McLaran, Mr. and Mrs. Charles H. Smith, Mr. and Mrs. William B. Ogden, Patrick Henry Macgill, Harry Farber, David Bendann, George R. Andrews, Mr. and Mrs. George A. Von Lingen, Miss Henrietta Seligman, Miss Mabel Ford, Edwin Howland, M. D., Mrs. Robert Johnson, Mr. and Mrs. D. Buchanan Merryman, Dr. and Mrs. Robert Johnson, S. Johnson Poe, George May, B. N. Baker, Charles Keidel, Edward Gray, John McKim, the Misses Farber, I. Crossman Cooper, the Misses Riggs, Signor Minetti, Dr. Eugene Van Ness, Frank Taylor, Mr. and Mrs. Jesse Tyson, Miss Willie Stirling, Miss Helen Harvey, the Misses Lurman, Miss May Borne, Miss Nellie Dobbin, N. G. Penniman, Rebecca Penniman, Lizzie Mitchell, Bessie O'Donovan, Mrs. R. Dorsey Coale, Mrs. James Young, Fanuie Theobald and many others.

MELBA.



INTERIOR OF THE NEW MUSIC HALL.

THE MUSIC HALL.

[43]

Another Stradivarius.

MR. FRANZ KNEISEL'S recent purchase of a Stradivarius violin adds one more to the number in this city of "supposed to be genuine" instruments of the greatest of all violin makers. Mr. Kneisel purchased his "Strad" of his former teacher, Prof. Gruen of Vienna, and it is stated that he paid $5000 for it. This instrument was made in 1717, which is admitted to have been during the best period of its maker's wonderful productiveness. Patrons of the symphony and of the Kneisel Quartette concerts will have the pleasure of listening to this rare instrument. A fine Guarnarius violin, a Gaspar de Salo viola, and an Amati 'cello are also owned by other members of the Kneisel Quartette. The aggregate value of these instruments in the commercial estimation of their owners is $14,000. The celebrated String Quartette of London possess instruments that have a market value of $25,000. But, after all, it can hardly be assumed that audiences, even in this musically enlightened 19th century, are capable of appreciating the difference in tone-quality between the instruments of one of these Quartettes and those of any other. Nor is it necessary that they should possess so subtle an appreciation to enjoy the interpretations of the artists who, through the mediumship of such perfect instruments, are all the better able to reach the highest excellence in their art.

MADAME MELBA, QUEEN OF SONG,

Heard at the Opening of the New Music Hall.

A BRILLIANT EVENT.

Three Thousand People Throng the Auditorium.

MUSIC, JEWELS AND BEAUTY.

The Initial Concert of the Most Brilliant Musical Season Baltimore Has Ever Experienced—Paur's Matchless Orchestra Fully Supports the Celebrated Vocalists—A Critical Analysis of the Performance.

BALTIMORE'S new Music Hall, on Mount Royal avenue, west of Charles, was gloriously dedicated and opened last night.

The doors of the magnificent structure were thrown wide open to the public for the first time, and the people of this city saw fulfilled an ambition and desire of years. The most ardent well-wishers of this enterprise could hardly have anticipated a more auspicious beginning. Wealth, beauty and culture, all were present to assist in launching this commendable venture upon its splendid mission. There have been occasions frequently when throngs of representative people were gathered under one roof, but rarely has there been one more brilliant than the audience which greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night.

The event had been looked forward to with great interest. The people were as eager for an opportunity to inspect the new building as they were to listen to the performance.

As early as 7 o'clock the hosts began to gather. Those first on the grounds were desirous of purchasing their tickets at the window, and shortly after the doors were opened a line was formed reaching far out into the street. The anxious ones were accommodated as quickly as possible, but two seemed to arrive for every one that passed into the hall.

It was 8 o'clock when the great majority began to put in an appearance. Carriage after carriage passed around the grass-plot in front of the building and deposited their burdens of fashion and culture before the doors of the hall. It was not long before there was a crush in the temporary foyer, but the crowd was handled with acute skill by Doorkeeper A. K. Tabman and his assistants. The stream that continuously passed in was almost dazzling. The ladies, in their handsome toilets and sparkling jewels, contrasted prettily with the conventional black of their escorts. Manager John J. Nolan was ubiquitous. He was here, there and everywhere, looking after the comfort of all who came.

Seats for All.

The first-comers whiled away the time in making tours of inspection, and loud and sincere were their expressions of admiration. The throbbing of the great electric machine found an echo in the tramp of hosts of feet. People had been coming for almost two hours, and yet there was room for almost every person within those four walls.

Myriads of electric bulbs shed a radiant glow over the scene, which was beautiful. Upon the platform were grouped the members of the orchestra in picturesque detail. Banked in the rear, and interlaced on both sides, were decorations of green and autumn colors.

A storm of applause greeted Conductor Emil Paur when he advanced to his place in front of the orchestra and turned to bow his acknowledgment before that sea of faces. The applause had hardly subsided before one of the ushers rushed up the aisle and presented Mr. Paur with a handsome floral music-stand, the gift of the directors of the Auditorium Company.

Then a hush of expectancy fell upon the audience. The people had been satisfied with their inspection of the building, and now waited anxiously for the concert to begin. All were on the qui vive to hear Madame Melba. The Boston Symphony Orchestra had been heard here before, but Melba, never. She came preceded by a [illegible] that few singers of the day can boast [illegible] before the evening was over, she more than demonstrated that her enviable reputation was attained by true merit alone.

Madame Melba.

With one or two exceptions, however, the selections given were hardly up to the Boston Symphony Orchestra standard. Not that they were indifferently played, but the critical ones in the audience, no doubt, looked for numbers of more depth and classical construction than those given in the main. At night, however, the light compositions were thought to be in keeping with the joyousness of the occasion.

Madame Melba was the bright particular star of the evening. Fairly sparkling in a costume of turquoise-blue satin, besprinkled with sprays of cut steel, she came on for her triumph. The applause of recognition was not long, the people were too anxious to hear her voice.

Her first solo was the "Sweet Bird" of Haendel, with flute obligato. And she sung it like a bird. Such a succession of pure and perfect trills and hard to imagine and much more difficult to describe. Few singers can take turns in the middle register without a gutteral break, but with Melba the tones flowed with a crystalline brilliancy that blunted the sheen of the jewels at her throat. In the duo in thirds with the flute the voice and instrument blended with a purity was superb, while the "echo opprogiotura" in canton effect was almost a revolution. The the roulades were as near perfect as well-schooled vocalism can produce, and, although no opportunity was lost for an opportunity at coleratuer display, there was no attempt at vocal acrobatics.

Great credit is also due the work of Mr. Chales Mole, the flantist. He played a silver instrument of the Boehm pattern, and gave a splendid exhibition of technique and breadth of tone. Mme. Melba was recalled again and again, and responded by repeating a part of the same solo.

Equally as successful was she in the rendition of Orditi's waltz song, "Se Saran Rose," and as an encore to this beautiful yet hackneyed work sang a German love song.

The Other Soloists.

Mons. Plancon has a sonorous and musical baritone, which he uses with good judgment, although at times he became too emphatic, causing a perceptible harshness. He did exceedingly well with the aria from Verdi's "Don Carlos," and was thrice recalled. He was far more successful in the singing of Schuman's "The Two Grenadiers," with its patriotic "Marsailles," and an encore was demanded and given.

Madame Scalchi scored her usual triumph. She is not a stranger to the lyric lovers of this city, and was accorded a warm greeting. She sang the "Chefaro," from Gluck's "Orpheus," and as an encore gave a Russian composition.

The audience was not a little disappointed in M. Mangiere, the tenor. He has a musical, sympathetic voice, but it lacks body and range, and in taking the higher tones he is forced to resort to falsetto tones. In place of the selection from "Mignon" scheduled, he sang the "Salut, Demure, Chaste et Pure," from Gounod's "Faust."

A decided feature of the programme was the famous quartette from "Rigoletto," sung by Mesdames Melba and Scalchi and Mons. Mangiere and Plancon.

The orchestral numbers were rendered as only the Boston Symphony Orchestra can play. On the opening number, the prelude to "Die Meistersinger Von Nuemberg," was at once made plain the splendid acoustic qualities of the hall. The unique staccato of the wood wind working down to a single theme for the oboe, was heard distinctly in every part of the hall.

The prelude to act second of "Gwendoline," by Chambrier, is a newcomer in this vicinity. It is of the new French school, devoted to orchestral colonys and contrapuntal peculiarities and in the end is extremely uninteresting.

The gem of the orchestra work was the "Scherzo Nocturne" and wedding march from "Midsummer Night's Dream," by Wagner. The work of the wood, wind and strings in the first named was exceptionally fine.

The concert closed with Brahm's "Academic Overture."

Much to their sorrow, the artists were forced to leave their magnificent floral tokens in Baltimore. Not that the beautiful emblems were not appreciated, but, as the company left last night for New York, it was found impossible to take the flowers without spoiling them, and it was decided that they be sent to-day to the Home for Incurables of this city.

Notwithstanding the rush of carriages before and after the performance, there was not the slightest confusion, owing to the splendid police arrangements under the personal direction of Captain Frank Toner and Round Sergeant Ned Schleigh.

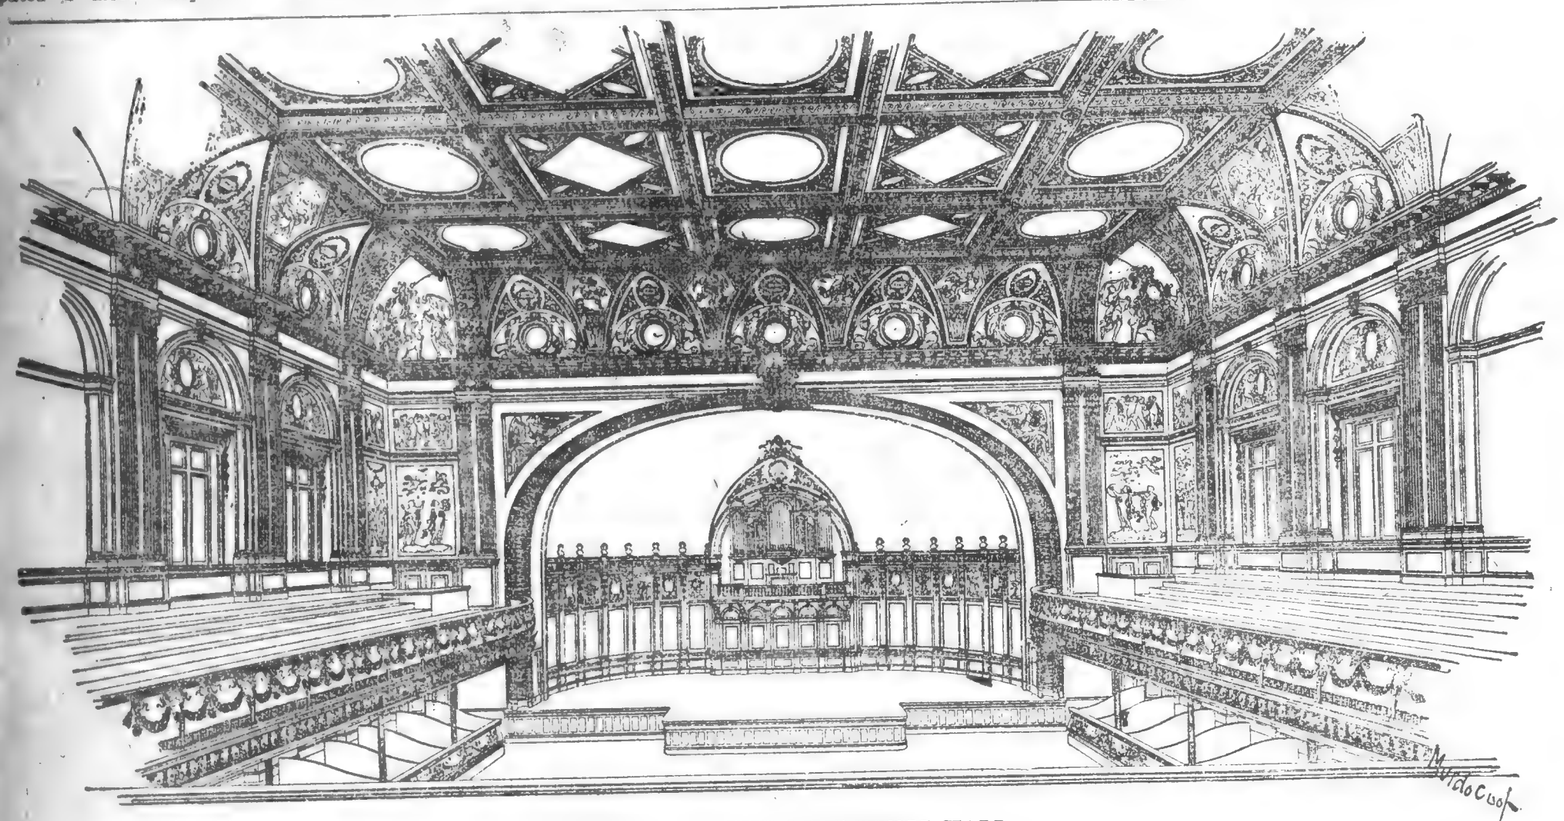
Society Well Represented.

The big audience at the Music Hall last night had a generous sprinkling of society's belles and beaux, and particularly those who are noted for their love of the highest-class music could be seen. Long before the hour of 8 carriages were driven hurriedly along Mount Royal avenue to the entrance in a steady stream, and for the distance of 100 feet people were packed together, trying to get to their seats first. But there was no need of their hurrying.

It must not be imagined from this, however, that there were no further applicants for admission after the house was full, for many hundred, as soon as informed that seats were unobtainable, left rather than stand up. The love of fine music implanted in young women was particularly brought out by the presence of a number of well-known society girls scarcely through with the year of their debut. They seemed to enjoy the different numbers thoroughly, and clapped their daintily gloved hands in applause frequently. On the whole, it was not a representative society gathering, being made up mostly of musical extremists in Baltimore, but yet there were enough of the 400 present to stamp it as a real big event. There were few evening costumes, and the general color of the dresses was sombre in the extreme, though lighter at intervals, with a gown or two of blue, pink, &c.

Some of those present in the audience were: Miss Nellie Stirling, Miss Helen Harvey, the Misses Lurman, Miss Mary Boone, Miss Mary Keyser, Miss Josephine Poe, Miss Mary Shearer, Miss Fannie Gray, Miss Florence Ranstead, Miss Eleanor Smith, Miss Margaret Atkinson, Miss Henrietta Tilghman, Mrs. Lovell, Miss Beulah Smith, Miss Mabel Ford, Mrs. Arthur Shreve, Mrs. Joshua Harvey, Miss Laura Jenkins, Miss Mary H. Jenkins, Mrs. Charles P. Montague, General and Mrs. Felix Agnus, the Misses Agnus, Miss Coulter, Mrs. N. G. Penniman, Mr. and Mrs. Stanley Gary, Mr. and Mrs. Charles E. Ways, Miss Bessie Ways, the Misses Pennman, Mr. and Mrs. J. P. Wright, Mr. and Mrs. Randolph Hendleton, Miss Alice Key Blunt, Florence Bassen, Dr. William P. Lockwood, Dr. McFier Warfield, Robert Lehr, Mr. and Mrs. Winslow Williams, L. Edwin Aler, Harold Randolph, Miss Virginia Cooper, Mr. and Mrs. Jesse Tyson, Mr. and Mrs. C. Morton Stewart, Mrs. G. Johnson Poe, Mr. and Mrs. William Reed, Mr. and Mrs. W. Martin, J. Crossman Cooper, Miss May Boone, B. N. Baher, Charles Keidel, Mr. and Mrs. Wesley M. Oler, Mr. and Mrs. W. P. Hayey, Beulah Smith, Mr. and Mrs. Mrs. George W. Dobbin, George W. Dobbin, Jr., Otto Sutro, Mr. and Mrs. James P. Bradt, Thomas C. Basshor, Mr. and Mrs. Bartlett S. Johnston, Mr. and Mrs. William Whitelock, Lucien O'Dend'bal, Mr. and Mrs. Winslow Williams, F. F. Peard, Edgar H. Miller, Jr., Willard G. Day, B. Howard Tyson, William J. Bowdoin, Arthur Rolson, J. Hooper Edmondson, James B. Clarke, Dr. B. Merriil Hopkinson, J. Seth Hopkins, Percy B. McLaran, Mr. and Mrs. Charles H. Smith, Mr. and Mrs. William B. Ogden, Patrick Henry Macgill, Harry Farber, David Beudann, George R. Andrews, Mr. and Mrs. George A. Von Lingen, Miss Henrietta Seligman, Miss Mabel Ford, Edwin Howland, M. D., Mrs. Robert Johnson, Mr. and Mrs. D. Buchanan Merryman, Dr. and Mrs. Robert Johnson, S. Johnson Poe, George May, B. N. Baker, Charles Keidel, Edward Gray, John McKim, the Misses Farber, I. Crossman Cooper, the Misses Riggs, Signor Minetti, Dr. Eugene Van Ness, Frank Taylor, Mr. and Mrs. Jesse Tyson, Miss Willie Stirling, Miss Helen Harvey, the Misses Lurman, Miss May Borne, Miss Nellie Dobbin, N. G. Penniman, Rebecca Penniman, Lizzie Mitchell, Bessie O'Donovan, Mrs. R. Dorsey Coale, Mrs. James Young, Fannie Theobald and many others.

MELBA.



INTERIOR OF THE NEW MUSIC HALL.

THE MUSIC HALL.

[43]

REDUCTION

RATIO

12x

2.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

150 mm

100 mm

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

PRECISION[SM] RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

Another Stradivarius.

MR. FRANZ KNEISEL'S recent purchase of a Stradivarius violin adds one more to the number in this city of "supposed to be genuine" instruments of the greatest of all violin makers. Mr. Kneisel purchased his "Strad" of his former teacher, Prof. Gruen of Vienna, and it is stated that he paid $5000 for it. This instrument was made in 1717, which is admitted to have been during the best period of its maker's wonderful productiveness. Patrons of the symphony and of the Kneisel Quartette concerts will have the pleasure of listening to this rare instrument. A fine Guarnarius violin, a Gaspar de Salo viola, and an Amati 'cello are also owned by other members of the Kneisel Quartette. The aggregate value of these instruments in the commercial estimation of their owners is $14,000. The celebrated String Quartette of London possess instruments that have a market value of $25,000. But, after all, it can hardly be assumed that audiences, even in this musically enlightened 19th century, are capable of appreciating the difference in tone-quality between the instruments of one of these Quartettes and those of any other. Nor is it necessary that they should possess so subtle an appreciation to enjoy the interpretations of the artists who, through the mediumship of such perfect instruments, are all the better able to reach the highest excellence in their art.

MADAME MELBA, QUEEN OF SONG,

Heard at the Opening of the New Music Hall.

A BRILLIANT EVENT.

Three Thousand People Throng the Auditorium.

MUSIC, JEWELS AND BEAUTY.

The Initial Concert of the Most Brilliant Musical Season Baltimore Has Ever Experienced—Paur's Matchless Orchestra Fully Supports the Celebrated Vocalists—A Critical Analysis of the Performance.

BALTIMORE'S new Music Hall, on Mount Royal avenue, west of Charles, was gloriously dedicated and opened last night.

The doors of the magnificent structure were thrown wide open to the public for the first time, and the people of this city saw fulfilled an ambition and desire of years. The most ardent well-wishers of this enterprise could hardly have anticipated a more auspicious beginning. Wealth, beauty and culture, all were present to assist in launching this commendable venture upon its splendid mission. There have been occasions frequently when throngs of representative people were gathered under one roof, but rarely has there been one more brilliant than the audience which greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night.

The event had been looked forward to with great interest. The people were as eager for an opportunity to inspect the new building as they were to listen to the performance.

As early as 7 o'clock the hosts began to gather. Those first on the grounds were desirous of purchasing their tickets at the window, and shortly after the doors were opened a line was formed reaching far out into the street. The anxious ones were accommodated as quickly as possible, but two seemed to arrive for every one that passed into the hall.

It was 8 o'clock when the great majority began to put in an appearance. Carriage after carriage passed around the grass-plot in front of the building and deposited their burdens of fashion and culture before the doors of the hall. It was not long before there was a crush in the temporary foyer, but the crowd was handled with acute skill by Doorkeeper A. K. Tabman and his assistants. The stream that continuously passed in was almost dazzling. The ladies, in their handsome toilets and sparkling jewels, contrasted prettily with the conventional black of their escorts. Manager John J. Nolan was ubiquitous. He was here, there and everywhere, looking after the comfort of all who came.

Seats for All.

The first-comers whiled away the time in making tours of inspection, and loud and sincere were their expressions of admiration. The throbbing of the great electric machine found an echo in the tramp of hosts of feet. People had been coming for almost two hours, and yet there was room for almost every person within those four walls.

Myriads of electric bulbs shed a radiant glow over the scene, which was beautiful. Upon the platform were grouped the members of the orchestra in picturesque detail. Banked in the rear, and interlaced on both sides, were decorations of green and autumn colors.

A storm of applause greeted Conductor Emil Paur when he advanced to his place in front of the orchestra and turned to bow his acknowledgment before that sea of faces. The applause had hardly subsided before one of the ushers rushed up the aisle and presented Mr. Paur with a handsome floral music-stand, the gift of the directors of the Auditorium Company. A hush of expectancy fell upon the audience. The people had been satisfied as to the capacity of the building, and

A decided feature of the programme was the famous quartette from "Rigoletto," sung by Mesdames Melba and Scalchi and Mons. Mangiere and Plancon.

The orchestral numbers were rendered as only the Boston Symphony Orchestra can play. On the opening number, the prelude to "Die Meistersinger Von Nuemberg," was at once made plain the splendid acoustic qualities of the hall. The unique staccato of the wood wind working down to a single theme for the oboe, was heard distinctly in every part of the hall.

The prelude to act second of "Gwendoline," by Chambrier, is a newcomer in this vicinity. It is of the new French school, devoted to orchestral colonys and contrapuntal peculiarities and in the end is extremely uninteresting.

The gem of the orchestra work was the "Scherzo Nocturne" and wedding march from "Midsummer Night's Dream," by Wagner. The work of the wood, wind and strings in the first named was exceptionally fine.

The concert closed with Brahm's "Academic Overture."

Much to their sorrow, the artists were forced to leave their magnificent floral tokens in Baltimore. Not that the beautiful emblems were not appreciated, but, as the company left last night for New York, it was found impossible to take the flowers without spoiling them, and it was decided that they be sent to-day to the Home for Incurables of this city.

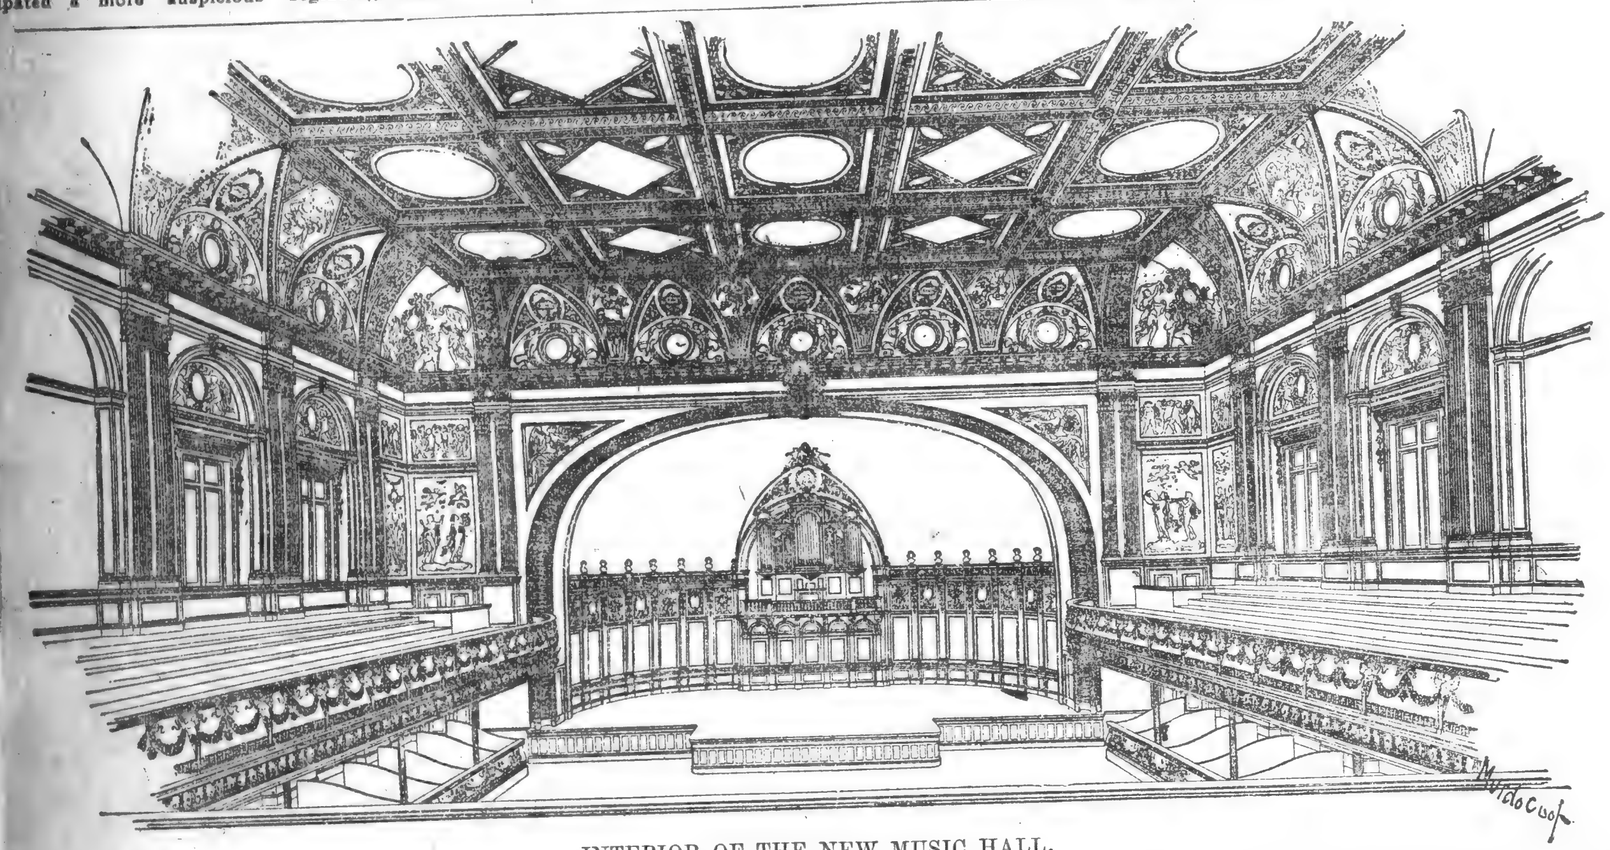
Notwithstanding the rush of carriages before and after the performance, there was not the slightest confusion, owing to the splendid police arrangements under the personal direction of Captain Frank Toner and Round Sergeant Ned Schleigh.

Society Well Represented.

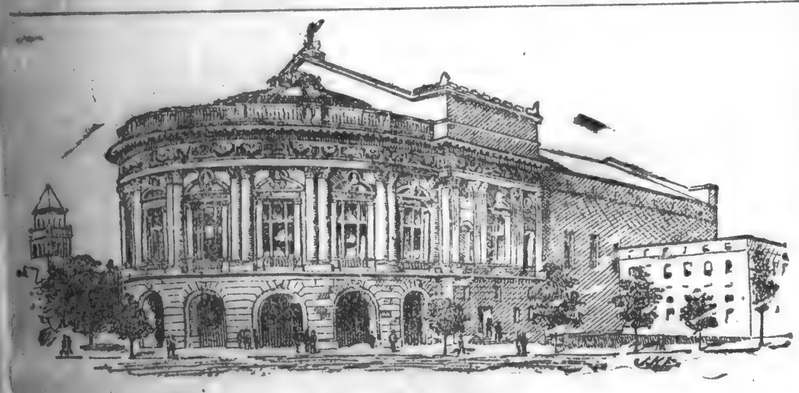
The big audience at the Music Hall last night had a generous sprinkling of society's belles and beaux, and particularly those who are noted for their love of the highest-class music could be seen. Long before the hour of 8 carriages were driven hurriedly along Mount Royal avenue to the entrance in a steady stream, made up mostly of musical extremists in Baltimore, but yet there were enough of the 400 present to stamp it as a real big event. There were few evening costumes, and the general color of the dresses was sombre in the extreme, though lighter at intervals, with a gown or two of blue, pink, &c.

Some of those present in the audience were: Miss Nellie Stirling, Miss Helen Harvey, the Misses Lurman, Miss Mary Boone, Miss Mary Keyser, Miss Josephine Poe, Miss Mary Shearer, Miss Fannie Gray, Miss Florence Ranstead, Miss Eleanor Smith, Miss Margaret Atkinson, Miss Henrietta Tilghman, Mrs. Lovell, Miss Beulah Smith, Miss Mabel Ford, Mrs. Arthur Shreve, Mrs. Joshua Harvey, Miss Laura Jenkins, Miss Mary H. Jenkins, Mrs. Charles P. Montague, General and Mrs. Felix Agnus, the Misses Agnus, Miss Coulter, Mrs. N. G. Penniman, Mr. and Mrs. Stanley Gary, Mr. and Mrs. Charles E. Ways, Miss Bessie Ways, the Misses Pennman, Mr. and Mrs. J. P. Wright, Mr. and Mrs. Randolph Hendleton, Miss Alice Key Blunt, Florence Bassen, Dr. William P. Lockwood, Dr. McFier Warfield, Robert Lehr, Mr. and Mrs. Winslow Williams, L. Edwin Aler, Harold Randolph, Miss Virginia Cooper, Mr. and Mrs. Jesse Tyson, Mr. and Mrs. C. Morton Stewart, Mrs. G. Johnson Poe, Mr. and Mrs. William Reed, Mr. and Mrs. W. Martin, J. Crossman Cooper, Miss May Boone, B. N. Baher, Charles Keidel, Mr. and Mrs. Wesley M. Oler, Mr. and Mrs. W. P. Hayey, Beulah Smith, Mr. and Mrs. Mrs. George W. Dobbin, George W. Dobbin, Jr., Otto Sutro, Mr. and Mrs. James P. Bradt, Thomas C. Basshor, Mr. and Mrs. Bartlett S. Johnston, Mr. and Mrs. William Whitelock, Lucien O'Dend'hal, Mr. and Mrs. Winslow Williams, F. F. Peard, Edgar H. Miller, Jr., Willard G. Day, B. Howard Tyson, William J. Bowdoin, Arthur Rolson, J. Hooper Edmondson, James B. Clarke, Dr. B. Merrill Hopkinson, J. Seth Hopkins, Percy B. McLaran, Mr. and Mrs. Charles H. Smith, Mr. and Mrs. William B. Ogden, Patrick Henry Macgill, Harry Farber, David Bendann, George R. Andrews, Mr. and Mrs. George A. Von Lingen, Miss Henrietta Seligman, Miss Mabel Ford, Edwin Howland, M. D., Mrs. Robert Johnson, Mr. and Mrs. D. Buchanan Merryman, Dr. and Mrs. Robert Johnson, S. Johnson Poe, George May, B. N. Baker, Charles Keidel, Edward Gray, John McKim, the Misses Farber, I. Crossman Cooper, the Misses Riggs, Signor Minetti, Dr. Eugene Van Ness, Frank Taylor, Mr. and Mrs. Jesse Tyson, Miss Willie Stirling, Miss Helen Harvey, the Misses Lurman, Miss May Borne, Miss Nellie Dobbin, N. G. Penniman, Rebecca Penniman, Lizzie Mitchell, Bessie O'Donovan, Mrs. R. Dorsey Coale, Mrs. James Young, Fanuie Theobald and many others.

MELBA.



INTERIOR OF THE NEW MUSIC HALL.



THE MUSIC HALL.

[43]

MADAME MELBA, QUEEN OF SONG,

Heard at the Opening of the New Music Hall.

A BRILLIANT EVENT.

Three Thousand People Throng the Auditorium.

MUSIC, JEWELS AND BEAUTY.

The Initial Concert of the Most Brilliant Musical Season Baltimore Has Ever Experienced—Paur's Matchless Orchestra Fully Supports the Celebrated Vocalists—A Critical Analysis of the Performance.

BALTIMORE'S new Music Hall, on Mount Royal avenue, west of Charles, was gloriously dedicated and opened last night.

The doors of the magnificent structure were thrown wide open to the public for the first time, and the people of this city saw fulfilled an ambition and desire of years. The most ardent well-wishers of this enterprise could hardly have anticipated a more auspicious beginning. Wealth, beauty and culture, all were present to assist in launching this commendable venture upon its splendid mission. There have been occasions frequently when throngs of representative people were gathered under one roof, but rarely has there been one more brilliant than the audience which greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night.

The event had been looked forward to with great interest. The people were as eager for an opportunity to inspect the new building as they were to listen to the performance.

As early as 7 o'clock the hosts began to gather. Those first on the grounds were desirous of purchasing their tickets at the window, and shortly after the doors were opened a line was formed reaching far out into the street. The anxious ones were accommodated as quickly as possible, but two seemed to arrive for every one that passed into the hall.

It was 8 o'clock when the great majority began to put in an appearance. Carriage after carriage passed around the grass-plot in front of the building and deposited their burdens of fashion and culture before the doors of the hall. It was not long before there was a crush in the temporary foyer, but the crowd was handled with acute skill by Doorkeeper A. K. Tabman and his assistants. The stream that continuously passed in was almost dazzling. The ladies, in their handsome toilets and sparkling jewels, contrasted prettily with the conventional black of their escorts. Manager John J. Nolan was ubiquitous. He was here, there and everywhere, looking after the comfort of all who came.

Seats for All.

The first-comers whiled away the time in making tours of inspection, and loud and sincere were their expressions of admiration. The throbbing of the great electric machine found an echo in the tramp of hosts of feet. People had been coming for almost two hours, and yet there was room for almost every person within those four walls.

Myriads of electric bulbs shed a radiant glow over the scene, which was beautiful. Upon the platform were grouped the members of the orchestra in picturesque detail. Banked in the rear, and interlaced on both sides, were decorations of green and autumn colors.

A storm of applause greeted Conductor Emil Paur when he advanced to his place in front of the orchestra and turned to bow his acknowledgment before that sea of faces. The applause had hardly subsided before one of the ushers rushed up the aisle and presented Mr. Paur with a handsome floral music-stand, the gift of the directors of the Auditorium Company.

Then a hush of expectancy fell upon the audience. The people had been satisfied with their inspection of the building, and now waited anxiously for the concert to begin. All were on the qui vive to hear Madame Melba. The Boston Symphony Orchestra had been heard here before, but Melba, never. She came preceded by a fame that few singers of the day can boast of. Before the evening was over, she more than demonstrated that her enviable reputation was attained by true merit alone.

Madame Melba.

With one or two exceptions, however, the selections given were hardly up to the Boston Symphony Orchestra standard. Not that they were indifferently played, but the critical ones in the audience, no doubt, looked for numbers of more depth and classical construction than those given in the main. At night, however, the light compositions were thought to be in keeping with the joyousness of the occasion.

Madame Melba was the bright particular star of the evening. Fairly sparkling in a costume of turquoise-blue satin, besprinkled with sprays of cut steel, she came on for her triumph. The applause of recognition was not long, the people were too anxious to hear her voice.

Her first solo was the "Sweet Bird" of Haendel, with flute obligato. And she sung it like a bird. Such a succession of pure and perfect trills and hard to imagine and much more difficult to describe. Few singers can take turns in the middle register without a gutteral break, but with Melba the tones flowed with a crystalline brilliancy that blunted the sheen of the jewels at her throat. In the duo in thirds with the flute the voice and instrument blended with a purity was superb, while the "echo oppregiotura" in canton effect was almost a revolution. The the roulades were as near perfect as well-schooled vocalism can produce, and, although no opportunity was lost for an opportunity at coleratuer display, there was no attempt at vocal acrobatics.

Great credit is also due the work of Mr. Chales Mole, the flantist. He played a silver instrument of the Boehm pattern, and gave a splendid exhibition of technique and breadth of tone. Mme. Melba was recalled again and again, and responded by repeating a part of the same solo.

Equally as successful was she in the rendition of Orditi's waltz song, "Se Saran Rose," and as an encore to this beautiful yet hackneyed work sang a German love song.

The Other Soloists.

Mons. Plancon has a sonorous and musical baritone, which he uses with good judgment, although at times he became too emphatic, causing a perceptible harshness. He did exceedingly well with the aria from Verdi's "Don Carlos," and was thrice recalled. He was far more successful in the singing of Schuman's "The Two Grenadiers," with its patriotic "Marsalles," and an encore was demanded and given.

Madame Scalchi scored her usual triumph. She is not a stranger to the lyric lovers of this city, and was accorded a warm greeting. She sang the "Chefaro," from Gluck's "Orpheus," and as an encore gave a Russian composition.

The audience was not a little disappointed in M. Mangiere, the tenor. He has a musical, sympathetic voice, but it lacks body and range, and in taking the higher tones he is forced to resort to falsetto tones. In place of the selection from "Mignon" scheduled, he sang the "Salut, Demure, Chaste et Pure," from Gounod's "Faust."

A decided feature of the programme was the famous quartette from "Rigoletto," sung by Mesdames Melba and Scalchi and Mons. Mangiere and Plancon.

The orchestral numbers were rendered as only the Boston Symphony Orchestra can play. On the opening number, the prelude to "Die Meistersinger Von Nuemberg," was at once made plain the splendid acoustic qualities of the hall. The unique staccato of the wood wind working down to a single theme for the oboe, was heard distinctly in every part of the hall.

The prelude to act second of "Gwendoline," by Chambrier, is a newcomer in this vicinity. It is of the new French school, devoted to orchestral colonys and contrapuntal peculiarities and in the end is extremely uninteresting.

The gem of the orchestra work was the "Scherzo Nocturne" and wedding march from "Midsummer Night's Dream," by Wagner. The work of the wood, wind and strings in the first named was exceptionally fine.

The concert closed with Brahm's "Academic Overture."

Much to their sorrow, the artists were forced to leave their magnificent floral tokens in Baltimore. Not that the beautiful emblems were not appreciated, but, as the company left last night for New York, it was found impossible to take the flowers without spoiling them, and it was decided that they be sent to-day to the Home for Incurables of this city.

Notwithstanding the rush of carriages before and after the performance, there was not the slightest confusion, owing to the splendid police arrangements under the personal direction of Captain Frank Toner and Round Sergeant Ned Schleigh.

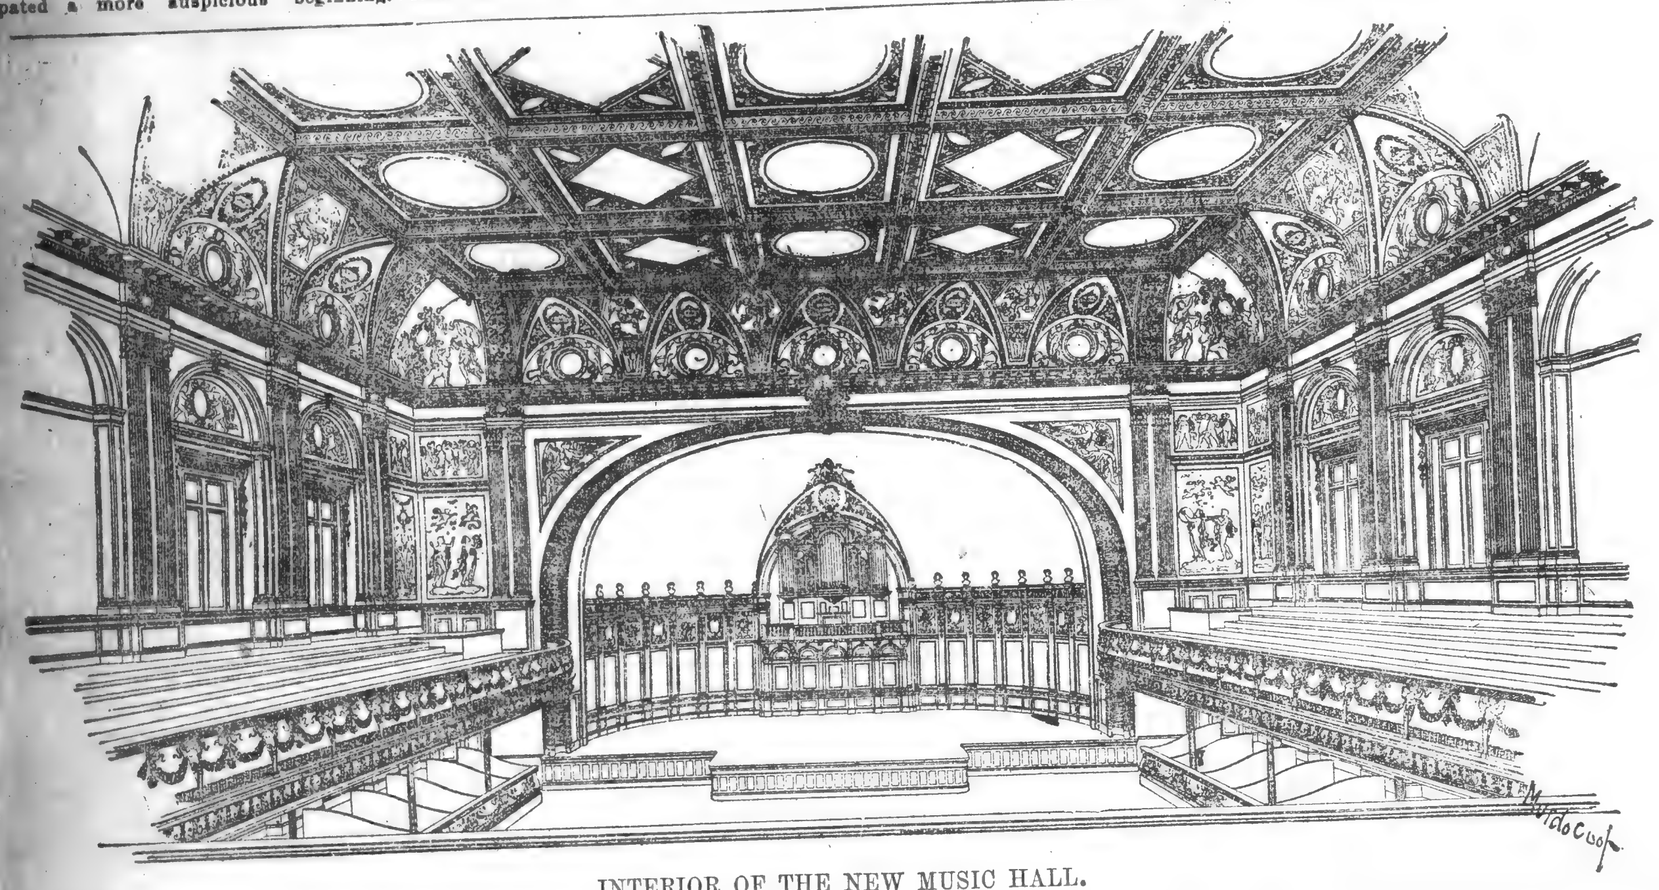
Society Well Represented.

The big audience at the Music Hall last night had a generous sprinkling of society's belles and beaux, and particularly those who are noted for their love of the highest-class music could be seen. Long before the hour of 8 carriages were driven hurriedly along Mount Royal avenue to the entrance in a steady stream, and for the distance of 100 feet people were packed together, trying to get to their seats first. But there was no need of their hurrying.

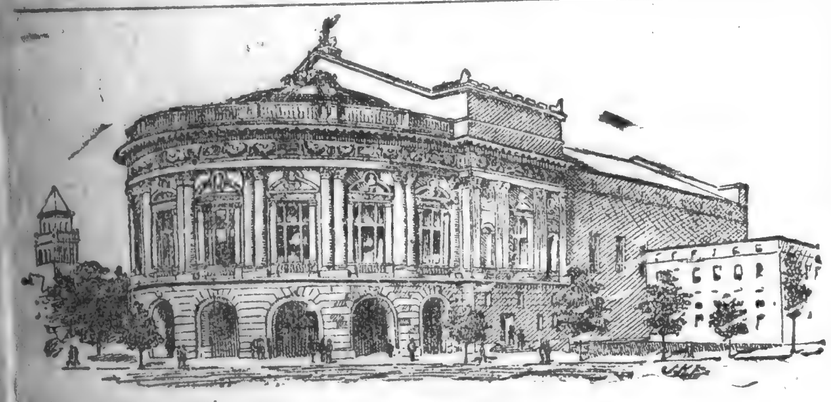
It must not be imagined from this, however, that there were no further applicants for admission after the house was full, for many hundred, as soon as informed that seats were unobtainable, left rather than stand up. The love of fine music implanted in young women was particularly brought out by the presence of a number of well-known society girls scarcely through with the year of their debut. They seemed to enjoy the different numbers thoroughly, and clapped their daintily gloved hands in applause frequently. On the whole, it was not a representative society gathering, being made up mostly of musical extremists in Baltimore, but yet there were enough of the 400 present to stamp it as a real big event. There were few evening costumes, and the general color of the dresses was sombre in the extreme, though lighter at intervals, with a gown or two of blue, pink, &c.

Some of those present in the audience were: Miss Nellie Stirling, Miss Helen Harvey, the Misses Lurman, Miss Mary Boone, Miss Mary Keyser, Miss Josephine Poe, Miss Mary Shearer, Miss Fannie Gray, Miss Florence Ranstead, Miss Eleanor Smith, Miss Margaret Atkinson, Miss Henrietta Tilghman, Mrs. Lovell, Miss Beulah Smith, Miss Mabel Ford, Mrs. Arthur Shreve, Mrs. Joshua Harvey, Miss Laura Jenkins, Miss Mary H. Jenkins, Mrs. Charles P. Montague, General and Mrs. Felix Agnus, the Misses Agnus, Miss Coulter, Mrs. N. G. Penniman, Mr. and Mrs. Stanley Gary, Mr. and Mrs. Charles E. Ways, Miss Bessie Ways, the Misses Pennman, Mr. and Mrs. J. P. Wright, Mr. and Mrs. Randolph Hendleton, Miss Alice Key Blunt, Florence Bassen, Dr. William P. Lockwood, Dr. McFier Warfield, Robert Lehr, Mr. and Mrs. Winslow Williams, L. Edwin Aler, Harold Randolph, Miss Virginia Cooper, Mr. and Mrs. Jesse Tyson, Mr. and Mrs. C. Morton Stewart, Mrs. G. Johnson Poe, Mr. and Mrs. William Reed, Mr. and Mrs. W. Martin, J. Crossman Cooper, Miss May Boone, B. N. Baher, Charles Keidel, Mr. and Mrs. Wesley M. Oler, Mr. and Mrs. W. P. Hayey, Beulah Smith, Mr. and Mrs. Mrs. George W. Dobbin, George W. Dobbin, Jr., Otto Sutro, Mr. and Mrs. James P. Bradt, Thomas C. Basshor, Mr. and Mrs. Bartlett S. Johnston, Mr. and Mrs. William Whitelock, Lucien O'Dend'hal, Mr. and Mrs. Winslow Williams, F. F. Peard, Edgar H. Miller, Jr., Willard G. Day, B. Howard Tyson, William J. Bowdoin, Arthur Rolson, J. Hooper Edmondson, James B. Clarke, Dr. B. Merrill Hopkinson, J. Seth Hopkins, Percy B. McLaran, Mr. and Mrs. Charles H. Smith, Mr. and Mrs. William B. Ogden, Patrick Henry Macgill, Harry Farber, David Bendann, George R. Andrews, Mr. and Mrs. George A. Von Lingen, Miss Henrietta Seligman, Miss Mabel Ford, Edwin Howland, M. D., Mrs. Robert Johnson, Mr. and Mrs. D. Buchanan Merryman, Dr. and Mrs. Robert Johnson, S. Johnson Poe, George May, B. N. Baker, Charles Keidel, Edward Gray, John McKim, the Misses Farber, I. Crossman Cooper, the Misses Riggs, Signor Minetti, Dr. Eugene Van Ness, Frank Taylor, Mr. and Mrs. Jesse Tyson, Miss Willie Stirling, Miss Helen Harvey, the Misses Lurman, Miss May Borne, Miss Nellie Dobbin, N. G. Penniman, Rebecca Penniman, Lizzie Mitchell, Bessie O'Donovan, Mrs. R. Dorsey Coale, Mrs. James Young, Fannie Theobald and many others.

MELBA.



INTERIOR OF THE NEW MUSIC HALL.



THE MUSIC HALL.

Another Stradivarius.

MR. FRANZ KNEISEL'S recent purchase of a Stradivarius violin adds one more to the number in this city of "supposed to be genuine" instruments of the greatest of all violin makers. Mr. Kneisel purchased his "Strad" of his former teacher, Prof. Gruen of Vienna, and it is stated that he paid $5000 for it. This instrument was made in 1717, which is admitted to have been during the best period of its maker's wonderful productiveness. Patrons of the symphony and of the Kneisel Quartette concerts will have the pleasure of listening to this rare instrument. A fine Guarnarius violin, a Gaspar de Salo viola, and an Amati 'cello are also owned by other members of the Kneisel Quartette. The aggregate value of these instruments in the commercial estimation of their owners is $14,000. The celebrated String Quartette of London possess instruments that have a market value of $25,000. But, after all, it can hardly be assumed that audiences, even in this musically enlightened 19th century, are capable of appreciating the difference in tone-quality between the instruments of one of these Quartettes and those of any other. Nor is it necessary that they should possess so subtle an appreciation to enjoy the interpretations of the artists who, through the mediumship of such perfect instruments, are all the better able to reach the highest excellence in their art.

[43]

REDUCTION

RATIO

15x

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0

1.1

1.25

1.4

1.6

1.8

2.0

2.2

2.5

2.8

3.2

3.6

4.0

4.5

5.0

5.6

6.3

7.1

8.0

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

4.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm

Baltimore American

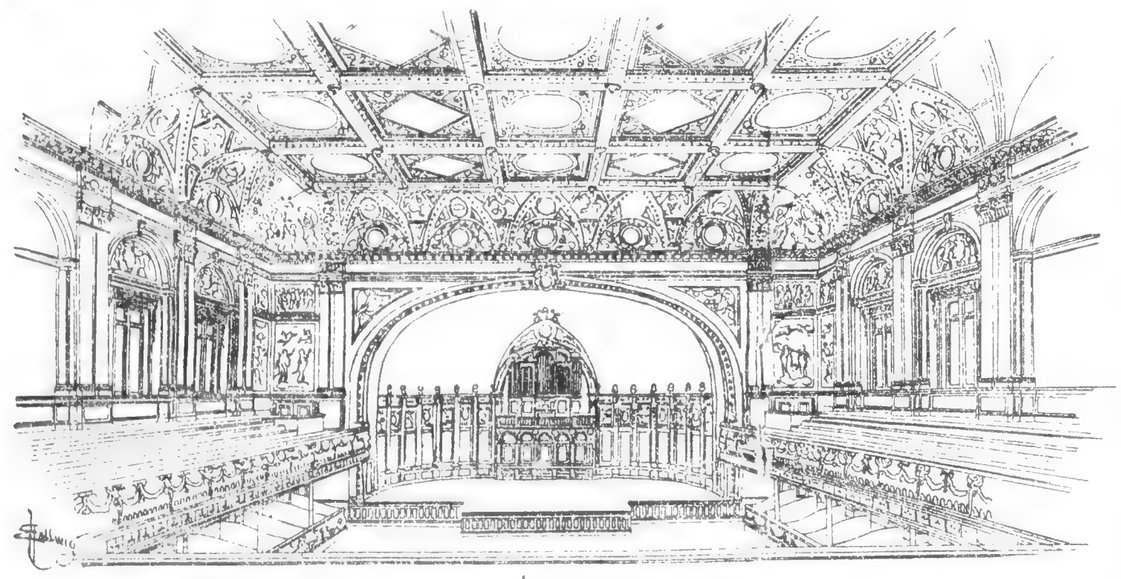
THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 1, 1894.

AN AUSPICIOUS BEGINNING

THOUSANDS OF SPONSORS AT THE AUDITORIUM'S CHRISTENING.

Formal Opening of the New Music Hall With a Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and a Brilliant Assemblage—A Profusion of Flowers, Both in the Audience and on the Stage—Foreign Artists Receive a Warm Welcome—Acoustic Properties.

Rarely has any event, either social or musical, created such widespread interest as the opening of the new Music Hall yesterday evening. It was a red-letter night for Baltimoreans, and about three thousand of her most representative citizens graced the occasion with their presence. The occasion was doubly interesting—first, the formal opening of the building itself, and second, the initial appearance this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The opening night of the latter is always an event of importance in the musical circles, and is welcome to Baltimore, but when it brings four such artists with it as



INTERIOR OF THE NEW MUSIC HALL.

Madame Melba, Madame Scalchi, Monsieur Maugiere and Monsieur Plancon, it is indeed a time of rejoicing. By half-past seven o'clock yesterday evening all roads seemed to lead to the Music Hall. The street cars were crowded, the streets were filled with pedestrians, while in front of the building there was a mass of carriages, each waiting in line for a place in front of the main entrance.

Within the large lobby all was animation. Those who already had tickets quietly waited to get in line and file into the spacious auditorium, while those who had none eagerly tried to get to the ticket window. Just before eight o'clock there was a solid phalanx of humanity entering the three gates and moving onto the main floor or up to the galleries. The scene was a very brilliant one, as beautifully gowned women, many of whom were in exquisite costume, and men in evening dress, were shown to their seats by a well-trained corps of ushers in charge of Mr. A. L. Watkins. A few women were without any head covering, but most of them wore either crownless bonnets or velvet or jeweled bandeaux. Flowers adorned many corsages, and chrysanthemum boutonnieres were in the coats of most of the men.

Floral Decorations.

The stage, where the orchestra was arranged, was decorated with a quantity of tall fresh palms that formed a background for the musicians, while in front, at the base, were arranged variegated palms and tropical plants. The hall was brilliantly lighted with electric bulbs, which unfortunately ceased to glow in the early part of the evening. The gas was then lighted and gave a dim, religious light for the remainder of the time. The flowers presented by the directors of the hall to Madame Melba, Madame Scalchi and to Mr. Emil Paur, the director, were simply superb. At the beginning of the concert Mr. Paur was given a director's stand with music rest and baton complete, made of chrysanthemums and American beauty roses. Madame Melba and Madame Scalchi received immense baskets of pink and white chrysanthemums that were so large they could scarcely carry them, and tremendous bouquets of roses that filled the air with fragrance as they were taken down the aisle. As each soloist appeared there was loud applause, and when Melba came out the air was rent in twain.

She wore a beautiful trained, low-necked gown of pale blue satin, spangled with silver discs, and a blue chiffon waist studded with diamond pins. Around her throat was a gorgeous diamond necklace.

Madame Scalchi's gown was a French creation of striped satin, brocaded with pink nosegays, and embellished with rare cream-colored lace. Her jewels were diamonds in the shape of odd brooches, and she wore a jeweled butterfly in her hair.

The acoustics of the new hall were very satisfactory, and the voices could be clearly and distinctly heard at any point in the auditorium. The orchestra also carried well, and all the musicians expressed themselves as pleased with the new building in this respect.

The dimensions of the hall make it unusually resonant, and an orchestra which sounds large in a theater seems to double in size when heard in this grand enclosure, without the interference of scenery and the large space back of the curtain in theaters. There was, therefore, much speculation as to the probable acoustic properties of the new hall, as its breadth and length are very nearly the same, thereby approaching the square form, which is generally very damaging to musical productions. The hall would undoubtedly be imperfect in this respect but for the balcony extending around the three sides, and which prevents extreme reverberation. The happy medium between a non-resonant and a too-resonant auditorium is thereby attained.

As Melba and Scalchi left last night for New York, and as they wished to show their appreciation of the flowers received from the directors of the Music Hall, they telephoned to The American for advice as to how they should dispose of the flowers, and at the suggestion of this paper the flowers were sent to the Home for Incurables with the compliments of Melba and Scalchi, in appreciation of their gracious reception in this city. After the concert there were more adjectives hurled through the doors of the new Music Hall than will soon be heard again, and most of them were qualified by an adverb, and they were all in the superlative degree. Success, with a big S, is the one word that conveys the result of yesterday evening.

Music of the Concert.

The Vorspiel, or prelude to the Wagner opera The Mastersinger, gave the orchestra an opportunity to display itself to great advantage. The full size of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with its thirty violins, ten violas, sixteen cellos and double basses, fifty-six strings in all, was realized for the first time in this city.

The vocal numbers on the program were singularly lacking in novelty. Monsieur Maugiere delivered the first, and at the same time made his first appearance in Baltimore, in the familiar "Salve Dimora" from Faust, changing the program by substituting this number for the Romance from Mignon. He was evidently not in good voice, as he used the falsetto for the celebrated high C, and was not always perfect in intonation.

Mons. Plancon, the French baritone, chose an aria from Verdi's "Don Carlos," composed about thirty years ago, and which does not compare very favorably with Verdi's more modern works, as Falstaff, or the Prologue in Pagliacci, which gainer for Campanari such an immense ovation at the Seidl concert last week. Plancon has a large voice, which comes out very fully in the resonant hall, but lacks somewhat in smoothness and evenness. He was heartily recalled.

Melba's debut in Baltimore was made in the old-fashioned aria "Sweet Bird," from Handel's "Il Penserosa." The music is of the classic bravura style, filled with the vocal exercises, roulades, trills and the like, that were considered the most important requisite of music a hundred and fifty years ago. Melba's method proved that she could triumph easily over all the obstacles and difficulties of the old school, and in which many modern prima donnas are sadly deficient. Handel's music gives the vocal organs the best exercise they can possibly have, and the singer who has mastered his works will have little difficulty in anything modern. At the same time, the old songs can not compare in expression or intensity with musical conceptions of modern masters. Melba was accorded a storm of applause on finishing, and recalled several times. The flute obligato of Mons. Mole added greatly to the effect of her triumph. She is a great artist on the concert stage, but will never be thoroughly heard in Baltimore until she appears, as she will, later in the season, in grand opera. She was well loaded with various designs in floral offerings, which obliged her to come to the footlights several times to receive the well continued applause. She finally responded to encores for both her numbers. Baltimore will await her coming and appearance in grand opera with great interest.

Madame Scalchi repeated the beautiful Gluck aria "Che Faro," from Orpheus and Eurydice, which she has sung so often in this city. This aria, although of the old French-German school, is one of music's immortal numbers. It is as fresh today as it was a hundred years ago. It was true to nature at first, and will be enjoyed as long as music is sung. In dramatic force and art, Scalchi is still herself, but her voice cannot be compared to that of her own former years. In fact, it is becoming harsh, and would hardly be tolerated if she were now making her debut. She was encored, and sang the concluding portion of the air from "Semiramide," "Ah, quel giorno!"

Another whiskered favorite was the Schumann "Two Grenadiers," presented by Mons. Plancon. Most of the artists who come to America seem to think the country has just been discovered, and that to Baltimoreans this well worn Schumann song would prove a novelty. But all such selections are mistakes here. Mme. Melba also discounted Baltimore lovers of music when she sang for them a waltz by Arditi. As for the everlasting quartet from Rigoletto, we need not ask when it has been heard here, but rather try to remember what concert organization has ever failed to sing it to us. If the "bella figlia del amore" were allowed to remain in the sack in which she is carried off at the end of the opera, a much abused public would undoubtedly be grateful.

The Boston Orchestra is the largest ever brought here. In fact, the full orchestra never came to this city before, because the halls were too small to accommodate the large aggregation. Hereafter there can be no complaint of the want of a proper place for music. There can be orchestral tournaments of the highest order. Not only the Boston, but the Seidl, Damrosch, and even our Baltimore Orchestra, which has heretofore never had a fair opportunity, can all be fairly judged by the public. The effects of the hall on fine orchestral music and artistic solo work were well shown last evening. It remains only to be tested for chorus, ensemble, duets, trios and the trials of masters on that king of modern instruments, the grand piano.

People Who Heard the Concert.

Some of the people noticed in the audience were Mr. and Mrs. C. Morton Stewart, Mr. and Mrs. Jesse Tyson, Mr. and Mrs. William Reed, Mr. and Mrs. G. H. Martin, Mr. and Mrs. W. P. Harvey, Mr. and Mrs. Charles H. Smith, Mr. and Mrs. Wm. B. Ogden, Mr. and Mrs. Hough Cottman, Mr. and Mrs. Edwin Howland, Dr. and Mrs. Robert Johnson, Mr. and Mrs. D. Buchanan Merryman, General and Mrs. Felix Agnus, Mrs. N. G. Penniman, Mr. and Mrs. Stanley Gary, Miss Nellie Stirling, Miss Helen Harvey, the Misses Lurman, Miss Mary Boone, Miss Mary Keyser, Miss Josephine Poe, Miss Mary Shearer, Miss Fannie Gray, Miss Florence Ranstead, Miss Eleanor Smith, the Misses Agnus, the Misses Gary, Miss Coulter, Mr. and Mrs. G. A. Von Lingen, Miss Bertie Von Lingen, Mrs. O. N. Butler, Miss Mary Butler, Mr. Thomas Baker, Mr. Barton Smith, Mr. Percy McLaran, the Messrs. Ahrens, Mr. Geo. Armistead, Miss Mary Goldsborough, Miss Ellen Goldsborough, Mrs. H. C. Evans, Mr. and Mrs. J. P. Wright, Mr. and Mrs. Randolph Pendleton, Dr. and Mrs. R. Merrill Hopkinson, Miss Alice Key Blunt, Mr. George W. Dobbin, Miss Florence Basshor, Mr. and Mrs. Bartlett S. Johnson, Mr. and Mrs. Wm. Whitelock, Dr. Wm. F. Lockwood, Mr. and Mrs. Winslow Williams, Miss Virginia Cooper, Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Whitridge, Mrs. Fitzgerald Smith, Miss Margaret Atkinson, Miss Henrietta Tilghman, Mrs. Lovell, Miss Beulah Smith, Miss Mabel Ford, Mrs. Arthur Shreve, Mrs. Joshua Harvey, Miss Larra Jenkins, Miss Lulu Jenkins, Miss Mary Jenness, Mrs. Charles P. Montague, Mr. and Mrs. Tunstall Smith, Messrs. S. Johnson Poe, George May, B. N. Baker, Charles Keidel, Edward Gray, Otto Sutro, John McKim, the Messrs. Parker, J. Crossan Cooper, the Messrs. Riggs, Signor Minetti, Dr. Eugene Van Ness, Frank Taylor, Messrs. Charles Boone, Gerard S. Hopkins, Samuel S. Keyser, George Andrews, Dr. Thomas L. Shearer, Mr. Redmond C. Stewart, Dr. Maclay Warfield, Dr. Robert Reuling, Dr. Geo. Reuling, Mr. Frank Harvey, Mr. Douglas Gordon, Mr. John S. Ford, the Messrs. Penniman, A. L. Gaubrill, George W. Dobbin, Jr., Thomas C. Basshor, Robert Lehr, Lucien Odend'hal, Edwin Aler, Harold Randolph, F. E. Peard, B. Howkins, H. P. C. Wilson, Dr. T. Beckler and Treson Arthur Robson, J. Seth Hoffman, Miss Mary Chatard, Dr. Ferdinand Chatard, Miss Bond, Mr. Reber Stryker, Mr. and Mrs. George Gibson, Mr. and Mrs. Carlos Sanchez, Mr. Leonce Rabillon, Mr. and Mrs. Wesley M. Oler, Miss Mary Murdock, Mr. John Middleton, Mr. and Mrs. Alan P. Smith, Dr. and Mrs. John N. Mackenzie, Mr. and Mrs. Lynn R. Meekins, Mrs. Fisher Sloan, Miss Ella Buzby, Mrs. Joel Gutman, Mr. and Mrs. Edward Key, Miss Alice Horwitz, Miss Nellie Porter, Miss Olivia Gill, General and Mrs. John Gill, Miss Belle Berry, Mr. and Mrs. Gustav Lurman, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Keidel, the Misses Hall, Dr. and Mrs. F. M. Chisolm, Mr. and Mrs. Charles D. Fisher, Miss Sally Fisher, Miss Dugan, the Misses Dorries, the Misses Dammann, Miss Buckler, Dr. P. C. Williams, Miss William-, Miss Maude Thompson.

DESCRIPTION OF BUILDING.

Inception of Movement Which Led to Its Erection.

The new Music Hall was begun about three years ago, when Mr. Frank Frick and the late Ernest Knabe conceived the idea of its need in this community.

The first meeting looking to its accomplishment was held at the Mount Vernon Hotel, and subscriptions were at once solicited, after which stock was apportioned. A board of directors was appointed, and the scheme rapidly assumed definite shape, the company taking the name of the Auditorium Company of Baltimore.

The new Music Hall stands between Mount Royal and Maryland avenues, near their junction, and has entrances from both. It may be said, in a general way, to meet the requirements of every variety of entertainment—musical, social, political and educational— for which there is a demand. Not only on account of the auditorium itself is it adapted to present needs, but, through the number and arrangement of the other halls, passages, dressing-rooms, &c., which are especially planned to be used in connection with it, or for separate and distinct performances. The site is wisely selected, being almost in the center of the best quarter of city residences, surrounded by the principal lines of street railways, and near both the Baltimore and Ohio and the Pennsylvania stations. The building still lacks, however, its semi-circular front, the absence of which not only mars the entire effect of the building as seen from Mount Royal avenue, but deprives the general plan of the interior of its most striking and unusual feature. A temporary vestibule of frame has, however, been erected where the semi-circular hall will stand, leading to the lobby and to the dressing-rooms, and making an ample and convenient entrance to the building from that direction. The lobby (30x40 feet) gives access to the main floor of the auditorium and to the staircases to the gallery and assembly rooms above. It is flanked by dressing-rooms, coat-rooms and lavatories, which are so arranged that they can be used in connection with the assembly room above them, as well as with the auditorium itself, according to the character of the entertainments in progress.

A Splendid Auditorium.

The auditorium itself is one of the largest music halls in this country, being 110 feet in length, exclusive of the stage, and 100 feet in width. It has a full seating capacity of 3,000 persons, although at present only 2,634 seats have been provided, as sufficient for its present needs. The central portion of the main floor (70x85 feet) is flat, and provided with 1,100 movable seats upon a canvas covering. These will be removed when balls are given, or any other entertainment that requires a clear floor space. The 240 seats under the galleries and overlooking this space are so arranged that they can at any time be divided into sections by light partitions and converted into stalls thereby. The galleries on the three sides of the auditorium have a full seating capacity of 1,044 persons. The stage is elliptical in plan. Its width is 70 feet, its depth 40 feet, and its seating capacity about 500 persons. The organ gallery is in the center of the east wall, and forms the principal feature of the stage.

On either side are large dressing-rooms, with lavatories adjoining, for the performers' use, and above them again other rooms, suitable either as dressing-rooms or store-rooms. Easy access is provided to the auditorium on each floor, both from the Maryland avenue and Mount Royal avenue entrances. The staircases to the former will be used, as a general rule, for exits only.

The general effect of the auditorium and of the stage is simple, but good. The decoration has been used sparingly and with great care, and the color scheme, while in keeping with the general simplicity of the interior, is light and attractive.

The Assembly Room.

The assembly room is connected with the lobby and dressing-rooms below by a staircase from either end, and it also connects directly with the gallery of the auditorium, thus answering the requirements of a foyer. It also possesses, from its size and general arrangements, advantages as a ball-room, lecture-room or concert hall. The windows on the east side of the room open directly into the auditorium, enabling it to be used in connection with the larger hall whenever occasion requires. The open floor space in this room is 60x40 feet, and the ceiling forty feet above. At either end are passages or lobbies, containing together more than half that amount of space, and above them galleries, reached by staircases, for musicians, &c. The decoration of the assembly room is more elaborate in detail and its coloring more striking than that of any other portion of the building.

At the other end of the building and below the stage is another hall of the same length and width, but with lower ceiling (fifteen feet), and much simpler finish generally. Its entrances are at either end, and open directly from Maryland avenue. Adjoining it is the banquet hall, of the same dimensions, finished in dark wood, and possessing the necessary pantries in connection with it for suppers, &c. There are, also, ante-rooms, dressing-rooms and lavatories adjoining these two halls, to make their purposes complete, and special facilities for a great variety of entertainments have thereby been assured. Furthermore, being connected with the auditorium by staircases at either end, these halls can be used in connection with the larger hall when balls, fairs and public meetings are being given.

On account of the number of staircases and entrances connected with all of the halls in the building opening upon the streets at both ends, not only the convenience, but the safety, of the public has been well provided for. Openings for four fire-escapes from each floor of the auditorium have been arranged, to add, if necessary, further security against danger of fire or panic. The building is provided with electric light in abundance, a special plant in the building, supplemented with gas for special occasions. The heating and ventilating apparatus is most complete, and the fan system with which the building has been provided has already proved most thorough and satisfactory in its effects in both conditions of heat and cold. The Music Hall was built by Henry Smith & Sons, of Baltimore, from drawings and under the supervision of Griffin & Randall, architects, New York.

Officers of the Company.

The officers and directors of the Auditorium Company of Baltimore are: Frank Frick, president; W. Graham Bowdoin, vice president; Robert C. Davidson, treasurer; R. S. Albert, secretary, and Charles Keidel, Alexander Frank, Bernard N. Baker, David L. Bartlett and Julian Le Roy White.

THE SUN, BALTIMORE,

THURSDAY MORNING, NOVEMBER 1, 1894.

MELBA AT MUSIC HALL.

She and Other Celebrated Singers at the Grand Opening

WITH BOSTON [illegible] ORCHESTRA

A Large and Brilliant Audience Delighted with the [illegible] Music Building which has Been Dedicated to Music

[illegible]

[illegible]

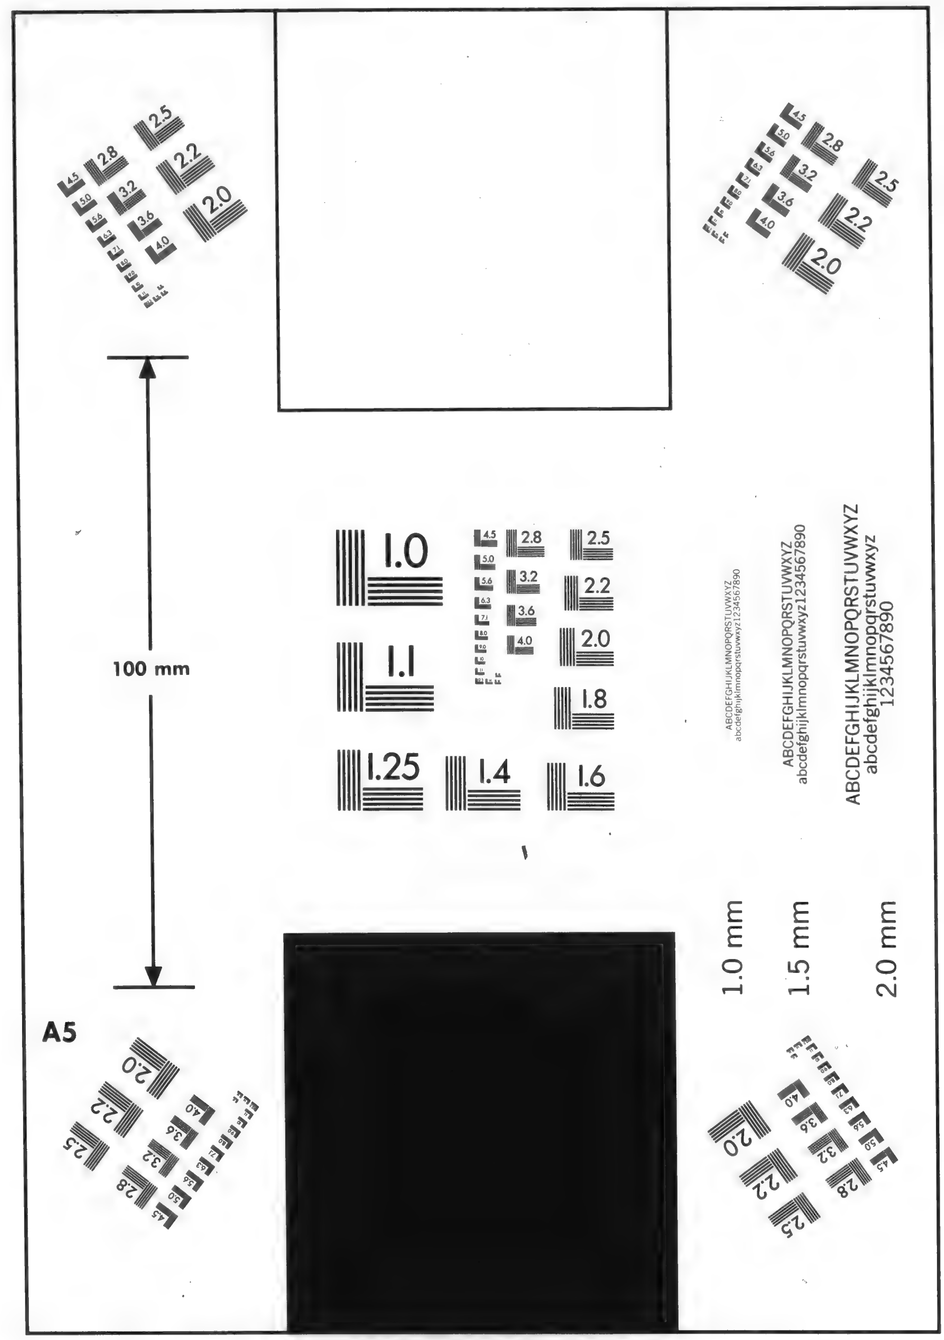
[illegible]

REDUCTION RATIO 12x

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
4.5 mm 1234567890

3.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

Baltimore American

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 1, 1894.

AN AUSPICIOUS BEGINNING

THOUSANDS OF SPONSORS AT THE AUDITORIUM'S CHRISTENING.

Formal Opening of the New Music Hall With a Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and a Brilliant Assemblage—A Profusion of Flowers, Both in the Audience and on the Stage—Foreign Artists Receive a Warm Welcome—Acoustic Properties.

Rarely has any event, either social or musical, created such widespread interest as the opening of the new Music Hall yesterday evening. It was a red-letter night for Baltimoreans, and about three thousand of her most representative citizens graced the occasion with their presence. The occasion was doubly interesting—first, the formal opening of the building itself, and second, the initial appearance this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The opening night of the latter is always an event of importance in the musical circles, and is welcome to Baltimore, but when it brings four such artists with it as Madame Melba, Madame Scalchi, Monsieur Maugiere and Monsieur Plancon, it is indeed a time of rejoicing. By half-past seven o'clock yesterday evening all roads seemed to lead to the Music Hall. The street cars were crowded, the streets were filled with pedestrians, while in front of the building there was a mass of carriages, each waiting in line for a place in front of the main entrance.

Within the large lobby all was animation. Those who already had tickets quietly waited to get in line and file into the spacious auditorium, while those who had none eagerly tried to get to the ticket window. Just before eight o'clock there was a solid phalanx of humanity entering the three gates and moving onto the main floor or up to the galleries. The scene was a very brilliant one, as beautifully gowned women, many of whom were in exquisite costume, and men in evening dress, were shown to their seats by a well-trained corps of ushers in charge of Mr. A. L. Watkins. A few women were without any head covering, but most of them wore either crownless bonnets or velvet or jeweled bandeaux. Flowers adorned many corsages, and chrysanthemum boutonnieres were in the coats of most of the men.

Floral Decorations.

The stage, where the orchestra was arranged, was decorated with a quantity of tall fresh palms that formed a background for the musicians, while in front, at the base, were arranged variegated palms and tropical plants. The hall was brilliantly lighted with electric bulbs, which unfortunately ceased to glow in the early part of the evening. The gas was then lighted and gave a dim, religious light for the remainder of the time. The flowers presented by the directors of the hall to Madame Melba, Madame Scalchi and to Mr. Emil Paur, the director, were simply superb. At the beginning of the concert Mr. Paur was given a director's stand with music rest and baton complete, made of chrysanthemums and American beauty roses. Madame Melba and Madame Scalchi received immense baskets of pink and white chrysanthemums that were so large they could scarcely carry them, and tremendous bouquets of roses that filled the air with fragrance as they were taken down the aisle. As each soloist appeared there was loud applause, and when Melba came out the air was rent in twain.

She wore a beautiful trained, low-necked gown of pale blue satin, spangled with silver discs, and a blue chiffon waist studded with diamond pins. Around her throat was a gorgeous diamond necklace.

Madame Scalchi's gown was a French creation of striped satin, brocaded with pink nosegays, and embellished with rare cream-colored lace. Her jewels were diamonds in the shape of odd brooches, and she wore a jeweled butterfly in her hair. The acoustics of the new hall were very satisfactory, and the voices could be clearly and distinctly heard at any point in the auditorium. The orchestra also carried well, and all the musicians expressed themselves as pleased with the new building in this respect.

The dimensions of the hall make it unusually resonant, and an orchestra which sounds large in a theater seems to double in size when heard in this grand enclosure, without the interference of scenery and the large space back of the curtain in theaters. There was, therefore, much speculation as to the probable acoustic properties of the new hall, as its breadth and length are very nearly the same, thereby approaching the square form, which is generally very damaging to musical productions. The hall would undoubtedly be imperfect in this respect but for the balcony extending around the three sides, and which prevents extreme reverberation. The happy medium between a non-resonant and a too-resonant auditorium is thereby attained.

As Melba and Scalchi left last night for New York, and as they wished to show their appreciation of the flowers received from the directors of the Music Hall, they telephoned to The American for advice as to how they should dispose of the flowers, and at the suggestion of this paper the flowers were sent to the Home for Incurables with the compliments of Melba and Scalchi, in appreciation of their gracious reception in this city. After the concert there were more adjectives hurled through the doors of the new Music Hall than will soon be heard again, and most of them were qualified by an adverb, and they were all in the superlative degree. Success, with a big S, is the one word that conveys the result of yesterday evening.

Music of the Concert.

The Vorspiel, or prelude to the Wagner opera The Mastersinger, gave the orchestra an opportunity to display itself to great advantage. The full size of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with its thirty violins, ten violas, sixteen cellos and double basses, fifty-six strings in all, was supplemented with gas for special occasions. The heating and ventilating apparatus is most complete, and the fan system with which the building has been provided has already proved most thorough and satisfactory in its effects in both conditions of heat and cold. The Music Hall was built by Henry Smith & Sons, of Baltimore, from drawings and under the supervision of Griffin & Randall, architects, New York.

Officers of the Company.

The officers and directors of the Auditorium Company of Baltimore are: Frank Frick, president; W. Graham Bowdoin, vice president; Robert C. Davidson, treasurer; R. S. Albert, secretary, and Charles Keidel, Alexander Frank, Bernard N. Baker, David L. Bartlett and Julian Le Roy White.

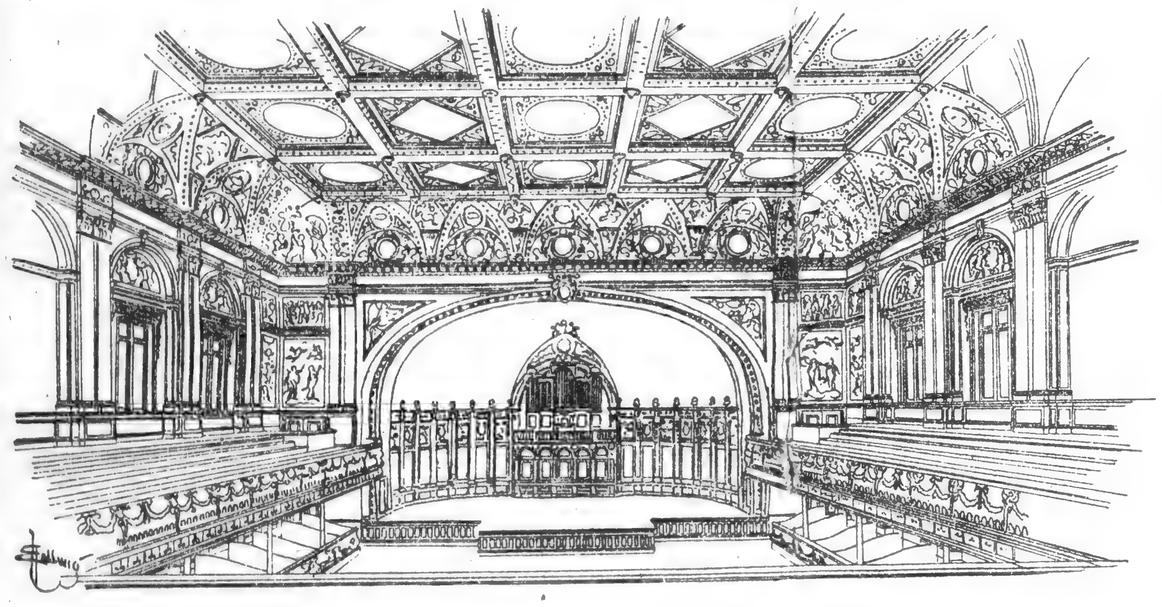
own former years. In fact, it is becoming harsh, and would hardly be tolerated if she were now making her debut. She was encored, and sang the concluding portion of the air from "Semiramide," "Ah, quel giorno!"

Another whiskered favorite was the Schumann "Two Grenadiers," presented by Mons. Plancon. Most of the artists who come to America seem to think the country has just been discovered, and that to Baltimoreans this well worn Schumann song would prove a novelty. But all such selections are mistakes here. Mme. Melba also discounted Baltimore lovers of musid when she sang for them a waltz by Arditi. As for the everlasting quartet from Rigoletto, we need not ask when it has been heard here, but rather try to remember what concert organization has ever failed to sing it to us. If the "bella figlia del amore" were allowed to remain in the sack in which she is carried off at the end of the opera, a much abused public would undoubtedly be grateful.

The Boston Orchestra is the largest ever brought here. In fact, the full orchestra never came to this city before, because the halls were too small to accommodate the large aggregation. Hereafter there can be no complaint of the want of a proper place for music. There can be orchestral tournaments of the highest order. Not only the Boston, but the Seidl, Damrosch, and even our Baltimore Orchestra, which has heretofore never had a fair opportunity, can all be fairly judged by the public. The effects of the hall on fine orchestral music and artistic solo work were well shown last evening. It remains only to be tested for chorus, ensemble, duets, trios and the trials of masters on that king of modern instruments, the grand piano.

People Who Heard the Concert.

Some of the people noticed in the audience were Mr. and Mrs. C. Morton Stewart, Mr. and Mrs. Jesse Tyson, Mr. and Mrs. William Reed, Mr. and Mrs. G. H. Martin, Mr. and Mrs. W. P. Harvey, Mr. and Mrs. Charles H. Smith, Mr. and Mrs. Wm. B. Ogden, Mr. and Mrs. Hough Cottman, Mr. and Mrs. Edwin Howland, Dr. and Mrs. Robert Johnson, Mr. and Mrs. D. Buchanan Merryman, General and Mrs. Felix Agnus, Mrs. N. G. Penniman, Mr. and Mrs. Stanley Gary, Miss Nellie Stirling, Miss Helen Harvey, the Misses Lurman, Miss Mary Boone, Miss Mary Keyser, Miss Josephine Poe, Miss Mary Shearer, Miss Fannie Gray, Miss Florence Ranstead, Miss Eleanor Smith, the Misses Agnus, the Misses Gary, Miss Coulter, Mr. and Mrs. G. A. Von Lingen, Miss Bertie Von Lingen, Mrs. O. N. Butler, Miss Mary Butler, Mr. Thomas Baker, Mr. Barton Smith, Mr. Percy McLaran, the Messrs. Ahrens, Mr. Geo. Armistead, Miss Mary Goldsborough, Miss Ellen Goldsborough, Mrs. H. C. Evans, Mr. and Mrs. J. P. Wright, Mr. and Mrs. Randolph Pendleton, Dr. and Mrs. B. Merrill Hopkinson, Miss Alice Key Blunt, Mrs George W. Dobbin, Miss Florence Basshor, Mr. and Mrs. Bartlett S. Johnson, Mr. and Mrs. Wm. Whitelock, Dr. Wm. F. Lockwood, Mr. and Mrs. Winslow Williams, Miss Virginia Cooper, Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Whitridge, Mrs. Fitzgerald Smith, Miss Margaret Atkinson, Miss Henrietta Tilghman, Mrs. Lovell, Miss Beulah Smith, Miss Mabel Ford, Mrs. Arthur Shreve, Mrs. Joshua Harvey; Miss Laura Jenkins, Miss Lulu Jenkins, Miss Mary H. Jenness, Mrs. Charles P. Montague, Mr. and Mrs. Tunstall Smith, Messrs. S. Johnson Poe, George May, B. N. Baker, Charles Keidel, Edward Gray, Otto Sutro, John McKim, the Messrs. Farber, J. Crossan Cooper, the Messrs. Riggs, Signor Minetti, Dr. Eugene Van Ness, Frank Taylor, Messrs. Charles Boone, Gerard S. Hopkins, Samuel S. Keyser, George Andrews, Dr. Thomas L. Shearer, Mr. Redmond C. Stewart, Dr. Mactier Warfield, Dr. Robert Reuling, Dr. Geo. Reuling, Mr. Frank Harvey, Mr. Douglas Gordon, Mr. John S. Ford, the Messrs. Penniman, A. L. Gambrill, George W. Dobbin, Jr., Thomas C. Basshor, Robert Lehr, Lucien Odend'hal, Edwin Aler, Harold Randolph, F. F. Peard, B. Howard Tyson, Arthur Robson, J. Seth Hopkins, H. P. C. Wilson, Dr. T. Buckler, Miss Mary Chatard, Dr. Ferdinand Chatard, Miss Bond, Mr. Heber Stryker, Mr. and Mrs. George Gibson, Mr. and Mrs. Carlos Sanchez, Mr. Leonce Rabillon, Mr. and Mrs. Wesley M. Oler, Miss Mary Murdoch, Mr. John Middleton, Mr. and Mrs. Alan P. Smith, Dr. and Mrs. John N. Mackenzie, Mr. and Mrs. Lynn R. Meekins, Mrs. Fisher Sloan, Miss Ella Buzby, Mrs. Joel Gutman, Mr. and Mrs. Edward Key, Miss Alice Horwitz, Miss Nellie Porter, Miss Olivia Gill, General and Mrs. John Gill, Miss Belle Berry, Mr. and Mrs. Gustav Lurman, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Keidel, the Misses Hall, Dr. and Mrs. F. M. Chisolm, Mr. and Mrs. Charles D. Fisher, Miss Sally Fisher, Miss Dugan, the Misses Devries, the Misses Dammann, Miss Buckler, Dr. P. C. Williams, Miss Williams, Miss Maude Thompson.



INTERIOR OF THE NEW MUSIC HALL.

DESCRIPTION OF BUILDING.

Inception of Movement Which Led to Its Erection.

The new Music Hall was begun about three years ago, when Mr. Frank Frick and the late Ernest Knabe conceived the idea of its need in this community.

The first meeting looking to its accomplishment was held at the Mount Vernon Hotel, and subscriptions were at once solicited, after which stock was apportioned. A board of directors was appointed, and the scheme rapidly assumed definite shape, the company taking the name of the Auditorium Company of Baltimore.

The new Music Hall stands between Mount Royal and Maryland avenues, near their junction, and has entrances from both. It may be said, in a general way, to meet the requirements of every variety of entertainment—musical, social, political and educational— for which there is a demand. Not only on account of the auditorium itself is it adapted to present needs, but, through the number and arrangement of the other halls, passages, dressing-rooms, &c., which are especially planned to be used in connection with it, or for separate and distinct performances. The site is wisely selected, being almost in the center of the best quarter of city residences, surrounded by the principal lines of street railways, and near both the Baltimore and Ohio and the Pennsylvania stations. The building still lacks, however, its semi-circular front, the absence of which not only mars the entire effect of the building as seen from Mount Royal avenue, but deprives the general plan of the interior of its most striking and unusual feature. A temporary vestibule of [illegible] has been erected where quirements of a foyer. It also possesses, from its size and general arrangements, advantages as a ball-room, lecture-room or concert hall. The windows on the east side of the room open directly into the auditorium, enabling it to be used in connection with the larger hall whenever occasion requires. The open floor space in the room is 60x40 feet, and the ceiling forty feet above. At either end are passages or lobbies, containing together more than half that amount of space, and above them galleries, reached by staircases, for musicians, &c. The decoration of the assembly room is more elaborate in detail and its coloring more striking than that of any other portion of the building.

At the other end of the building and below the stage is another hall of the same length and width, but with lower ceiling (fifteen feet), and much simpler finish generally. Its entrances are at either end, and open directly from Maryland avenue. Adjoining it is the banquet hall, of the same dimensions, finished in dark wood, and possessing the necessary pantries in connection with it for suppers, &c. There are, also, ante-rooms, dressing-rooms and lavatories adjoining these two halls, to make their purposes complete, and special facilities for a great variety of entertainments have thereby been assured. Furthermore, being connected with the auditorium by staircases at either end, these halls can be used in connection with the larger hall when balls, fairs and public meetings are being given.

On account of the number of staircases and entrances connected with all of the halls in the building opening upon the streets at both ends, not only the convenience, but the safety, of the public has been well provided for. Openings for four fire-escapes from each floor of the auditorium have been arranged, to add, if necessary, further security against danger of fire or panic. The building is provided with electric light in abundance, a special plant in the building,

THE SUN, BALTIMORE,

THURSDAY MORNING,

NOVEMBER 1, 1894.

MELBA AT MUSIC HALL.

She and Other Celebrated Singers at the Grand Opening

WITH BOSTON'S FAMOUS ORCHESTRA

A Large and Brilliant Audience Delighted with the Concert and also with the Splendid New Building which Has Been Dedicated to Music

Illumined by a flood of soft radiance falling on delicate tints of buff and cream and blue, the new Music Hall was thrown open last night to the gaze of 2,800 Baltimoreans at one of the most brilliant musical events of many years.

With the combined attractions of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a group of some of the greatest opera singers of the day and a new hall which ranks among the best in the country, the faces of the auditors, animated at first with sudden surprised delight, wore a continuously happy expression that deepened as the evening wore on and the majestic strains of opera music, old and new, filled the beautiful hall.

The audience was one of the most brilliant that has ever gathered in a Baltimore place of amusement. The musical world, the social world, the literary world—indeed, the cultured world in general of the city was represented by prominent men and women who assembled partly out of interest in the Boston Orchestra's programme, partly out of pride in the new home of art and partly because they had chimed in with the contagious impression that everybody else was going to be there.

A Magnificent Hall.

The hall was seen at its best when the audience was first seated, for later in the evening, when the musical programme had begun, the lights began to misbehave and glaring calciums had to be pressed into service for fear the hall would be plunged into darkness.

The first impression, with the incandescent lights glowing softly and steadily, was this: A vast auditorium formed of graceful arches and squares, colored in creamy shades and so tastefully arranged that the vision became enchanted with the harmonious whole before the fine details were thought of.

[illegible] end arose the [illegible] a great arch of exquisite symmetry and surmounted by musical emblems, near which hovered two heroic winged figures, typical also of the art divine. Within the stage a smaller arch inclosed the most romantic of Romeo-and-Juliet balconies, hung with gobelin blue velours, and over the arch were poised, in bold relief, two dimpled cherubs clinging airily to massive lyres.

On the ceiling of the auditorium the prevailing creamy tints was broken by sky-blue squares, and back of the gallery at the rear another suggestion of delicate color was made by glimpses of the rose tints in the foyer caught through the white arches of the main hall.

The huge stage was fringed with gigantic palms that added just the one needed touch of "growing things" in the picture, and taken all in all the scene was one that was a fitting artistic setting to the musical feast to be first set forth in its walls.

Test of Acoustics.

Naturally a great deal of interest was felt in the concert as a test of the acoustics of the new hall, and the test seemed a successful one. The music resounded clearly and brilliantly, perhaps a little too brilliantly, suggesting an interesting question in acoustics. If a new violin or a new bell needs the seasoning power of time to mellow it and tone it down, why should not the same be true of the plaster and bricks of a music hall? At all events it seems natural to suppose that the new hall, already so well equipped acoustically, should become better and better with every concert given in it and with every strain of music that resounds against its heavy walls.

Compliment to Paur.

The opening concert was an especially appropriate one. The programme was almost wholly operatic, and although operatic concerts in the abstract are far from being the most artistic and satisfactory kind, there was so much that was admirable in the exponents and so much reason why the programme should not be too serious or heavy for the occasion that the affair was a success from beginning to end.

Emil Paur, the leader, had just stepped on his stand and picked up his baton when a sensation was created by the sight of a great floral music stand and baton going up the aisle with ushers staggering under it. The appropriate emblems were handed to the smiling director, who thereafter directed from the floral stand.

The director was warmly welcomed. There is something earnest and rugged and hearty about the thick-set little Viennese that makes him wear well. He conducted works by Wagner, Chabrier, Mendelssohn and Brahms with vigorous warmth.

Notable Group of Singers.

The audience fairly went wild over the opera folk. There were Melba, Plancon, Scalchi and Maugiere, who, "singly and in groups," caused the house to ring with plaudits.

Melba, the Second Patti.

Melba is a second Patti in some respects. Her voice is so rare a combination of purity, power and brilliance, controlled by perfect vocal art, that it would seem as if this dashing Australian woman could easily rank with the foremost lyric sopranos in the world. She takes every note in her compass without effort or distortion of face. Her attack is precise and her voice wonderfully flexible, but she has not the warmth of a great dramatic soprano.

Plancon, the Great Tenor.

When a little door on the side of the stage opened and a tall, good-natured looking Mephisto entered, the audience at once took on an air of expectancy, for Mons. Pol Plancon—it was he, the great French basso—walked in with an irresistable air of owning the earth, which he soon did own or at least that part of it represented in the new Music Hall. Melba may have won her hearers by her great voice, but Plancon carried his hearers by force of his artist temperament. He is simply a bundle of temperament. It gushes out in his glorious voice, it proclaims itself in the heartfelt and melodious French which rolls from his throat in resonant verse, and it brought him in touch with every listener. There was something characteristically French about this huge singer, and when, in Schumann's "Two Grenadiers," he burst out with the national anthem, it made every man and woman in the audience feel like standing up and singing with him, or of doing something equally rash or impossible.

Scalchi and Maugiere.

Mme. Scalchi's big voice was heard in two solos, which showed her to be still a great contralto, with a voice uneven and somewhat worn in its upper register, but still so round and rich as a whole that its very brusqueness fascinated her hearers as of old.

Mons. Maugiere, a French tenor, sang an aria from "Faust" with success.

Quartette from "Rigoletto."

In the brilliant vocal finale the four singers joined their voices in the famous quartette from "Rigoletto," with Melba's tones soaring flute-like over the others, Scalchi's rolling out with beautiful sonority, and the two male voices according well with their companions. It seemed for the time as if the old days of Italian opera were again at hand, and as if brilliant colorature singing and vocal feats were the things of the hour. The audience longed for an encore. Again and again the singers were brought to the stage, Melba each time making a little move as of a spoilt child that didn't want to speak its little piece again, a coquettish touch of babyishness that was found charming in the great diva, but would not have been tolerated in a smaller light. The encore was not forthcoming, so Paur took his stand and closed the concert with the "Academic Overture," by Brahms, after which the audience went slowly out into the street, comparing notes delightedly about hall and concert and singers.

How the Hall was Built.

Although several articles descriptive of the Music Hall have been published in THE SUN from time to time, a short resume of the origin of the enterprise which has given to Baltimore one of the best halls in the country, and a short description of the building itself are appropriate at this time.

Mr. Frank Frick and Mr. B. N. Baker deserve the credit for having put on foot the project for building a hall that would be suitable for holding large concerts and balls and for the meeting place of conventions and other large gatherings. Baltimore needed such a hall, and the need was felt more plainly than ever after the destruction of the old Concordia Opera House, in which so many great conventions had been held. It is difficult to secure the theatres during the dramatic season, and, with the exception of these, the Fifth Regiment Armory has been the only available large hall in the city, and this is almost entirely unsuited to the uses for which the Music Hall has been built.

Messrs. Frick and Baker had a consultation with a number of prominent business men, which resulted in a meeting at the Mount Vernon Hotel in November of 1891, at which it was determined to raise [illegible] $250,000, if possible, for the erection of the hall. Times were hard and the subscriptions came in slowly. It was found that the whole amount desired could not be raised by the time it was desired to begin building, and as subscriptions for $150,000 had been received by April of 1893, it was decided to go ahead with the amount in hand.

Competitive plans had been submitted by some of the leading architects of the country. Those furnished by Griffin & Randall of New York, were decided by the expert, Mr. Richard M. Hunt, of New York, to be best adapted for the uses which the proposed hall was to be put, and they were adopted. Building operations were begun in the summer of 1893, and on September 22 the corner-stone of the building was laid by Mr. Frick. At the time of the laying of the corner-stone subscriptions amounting to about $190,000 had been received.

Exterior and Interior.

The lot on which the building stands has a frontage of 223 feet on Mount Royal avenue and runs back to Maryland avenue, on which it has a frontage of 117 feet. The ground cost the company $43,000. The money remaining after the purchase of the lot was not sufficient for the erection of the building according to the architect's designs, so it was deemed better to go ahead and put up the hall with its essential useful features first, leaving the architectural and ornamental features to be added when sufficient money is raised to enable the company to proceed. It was also necessary to omit a portion of the ornamental work of the interior. This can be added to the building as it now stands at any time.

The exterior, however, needs as soon as possible the handsome semi-circular front which is intended to be the building's most attractive feature. Without it the structure presents a big, rough, barn-like appearance, and is but little more attractive looking than the storage warehouse a few blocks away. As the building now stands, with the ground, it has cost about $225,000. It will take fully $60,000 to add the semi-circular front, so that completed according to the designs of the architects, and including the cost of the ground on which it stands, the Music Hall will represent an investment of nearly $300,000.

Even without the imposing semi-circular front, with its stately entrance hall and broad promenade, the building is remarkably complete in its details. Its principal feature is, of course, the main hall in which last night's concert was given. This is 110 feet long exclusive of the stage and 100 feet wide. Its full seating capacity is 3,000. The central portion of the main floor is flat and is provided with 1,100 seats on a canvas covering so that they can be easily removed when balls are given or any other entertainment that requires a clear floor space. This space contains 6,000 square feet of surface. Under the galleries are nearly 300 seats which can be divided into sections by light partitions and converted into stalls. The galleries on the three sides of the auditorium have a seating capacity of over 1,000 persons. The stage is elliptical in plan, is 70 feet wide and 40 feet deep, and will seat 500 persons.

Under the stage is another hall, and adjoining it is a banquet hall, finished in dark wood, with pantries and kitchens adjoining.

An assembly-room is on the second floor over the lobby and dressing-rooms. It will make a comparatively small but beautiful ball-room, lecture-room or concert hall. Its open floor space is 40 by 60 feet, and the ceiling is 40 feet above the floor. At either end are passages or lobbies containing together more than half the clear floor space, and above them galleries for musicians. The decoration of the assembly-room is more elaborate in detail, and in coloring is more striking than that of any other portion of the building.

Officers and Directors.

The company which was formed for the erection of the hall was incorporated under the name of the Auditorium Company of Baltimore, with a capital stock of $200,000. It is said that the intention was originally to call the building the Auditorium. Before this name was formally adopted the building was called, by general consent, Music Hall, and it has never been changed. It is not likely to be, for it is particularly fitting and means a great deal more than Auditorium.

The officers and directors of the Auditorium Company are as follows: Frank Frick, president; W. Graham Bowdoin, vice-president; Robert C. Davidson, treasurer; R. S. Albert, secretary; Charles Keidel, Alexander Frank, Bernard N. Baker, David L. Bartlett and J. Le Roy White.

[44]

sion of Flowers, Both in the Audience and on the Stage—Foreign Artists Receive a Warm Welcome—Acoustic Properties.

Rarely has any event, either social or musical, created such widespread interest as the opening of the new Music Hall yesterday evening. It was a red-letter night for Baltimoreans, and about three thousand of her most representative citizens graced the occasion with their presence. The occasion was doubly interesting—first, the formal opening of the building itself, and second, the initial appearance this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The opening night of the latter is always an event of importance in the musical circles, and is welcome to Baltimore, but when it brings four such artists with it as Madame Melba, Madame Scalchi, Monsieur Maugiere and Monsieur Plancon, it is indeed a time of rejoicing. By half-past seven o'clock yesterday evening all roads seemed to lead to the Music Hall. The street cars were crowded, the streets were filled with pedestrians, while in front of the building there was a mass of carriages, each waiting in line for a place in front of the main entrance.

Within the large lobby all was animation. Those who already had tickets quietly waited to get in line and file into the spacious auditorium, while those who had none eagerly tried to get to the ticket window. Just before eight o'clock there was a solid phalanx of humanity entering the three gates and moving onto the main floor or up to the galleries. The scene was a very brilliant one, as beautifully gowned women, many of whom were in exquisite costume, and men in evening dress, were shown to their seats by a well-trained corps of ushers in charge of Mr. A. L. Watkins. A few women were without any head covering, but most of them wore either crownless bonnets or velvet or jeweled bandeaux. Flowers adorned many corsages, and chrysanthemum boutonnieres were in the coats of most of the men.

Floral Decorations.

The stage, where the orchestra was arranged, was decorated with a quantity of tall fresh palms that formed a background for the musicians, while in front, at the base, were arranged variegated palms and tropical plants. The hall was brilliantly lighted with electric bulbs, which unfortunately ceased to glow in the early part of the evening. The gas was then lighted and gave a dim, religious light for the remainder of the time. The flowers presented by the directors of the hall to Madame Melba, Madame Scalchi and to Mr. Emil Paur, the director, were simply superb. At the beginning of the concert Mr. Paur was given a director's stand with music rest and baton complete, made of chrysanthemums and American beauty roses. Madame Melba and Madame Scalchi received immense baskets of pink and white chrysanthemums that were so large they could scarcely carry them, and tremendous bouquets of roses that filled the air with fragrance as they were taken down the aisle. As each soloist appeared there was loud applause, and when Melba came out the air was rent in twain.

She wore a beautiful trained, low-necked gown of pale blue satin, spangled with silver discs, and a blue chiffon waist studded with diamond pins. Around her throat was a gorgeous diamond necklace.

Madame Scalchi's gown was a French creation of striped satin, brocaded with pink nosegays, and embellished with rare cream-colored lace. Her jewels were diamonds in the shape of odd brooches, and she wore a jeweled butterfly in her hair. The acoustics of the new hall were very satisfactory, and the voices could be clearly and distinctly heard at any point in the auditorium. The orchestra also carried well, and all the musicians expressed themselves as pleased with the new building in this respect.

The dimensions of the hall make it unusually resonant, and an orchestra which sounds large in a theater seems to double in size when heard in this grand enclosure, without the interference of scenery and the large space back of the curtain in theaters. There was, therefore, much speculation as to the probable acoustic properties of the new hall, as its breadth and length are very nearly the same, thereby approaching the square form, which is generally very damaging to musical productions. The hall would undoubtedly be imperfect in this respect but for the balcony extending around the three sides, and which prevents extreme reverberation. The happy medium between a non-resonant and a too-resonant auditorium is thereby attained.

As Melba and Scalchi left last night for New York, and as they wished to show their appreciation of the flowers received from the directors of the Music Hall, they telephoned to The American for advice as to how they should dispose of the flowers, and at the suggestion of this paper the flowers were sent to the Home for Incurables with the compliments of Melba and Scalchi, in appreciation of their gracious reception in this city. After the concert there were more adjectives hurled through the doors of the new Music Hall than will soon be heard again, and most of them were qualified by an adverb, and they were all in the superlative degree. Success, with a big S, is the one word that conveys the result of yesterday evening.

Music of the Concert.

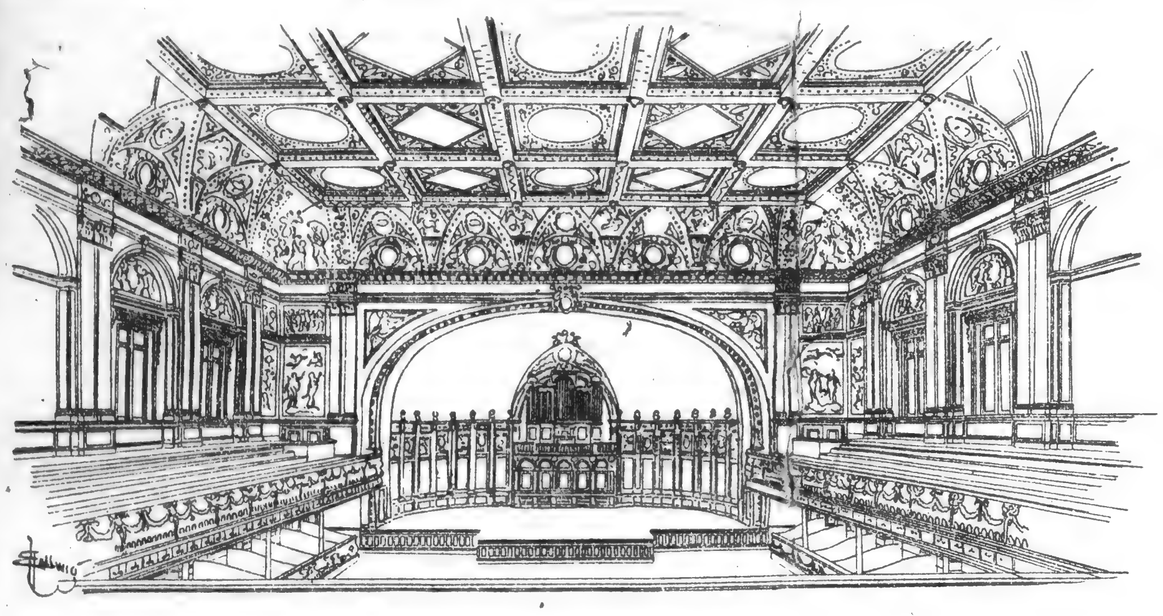
The Vorspiel, or prelude to the Wagner opera The Mastersinger, gave the orchestra an opportunity to display itself to great advantage. The full size of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with its thirty violins, ten violas, sixteen cellos and double basses, fifty-six strings in all, was realized for the first time in this city.

The vocal numbers on the program were singularly lacking in novelty. Monsieur Maugiere delivered the first, and at the same time made his first appearance in Baltimore, in the familiar "Salve Dimora" from Faust, changing the program by substituting this number for the Romance from Mignon. He was evidently not in good voice, as he used the falsetto for the celebrated high C, and was not always perfect in intonation.

Mons. Plancon, the French baritone, chose an aria from Verdi's "Don Carlos," composed about thirty years ago, and which does not compare very favorably with Verdi's more modern works, as Falstaff, or the Prologue in Pagliacci, which gained for Campanari such an immense ovation at the Seidl concert last week. Plancon has a large voice, which comes out very fully in the resonant hall, but lacks somewhat in smoothness and evenness. He was heartily recalled.

Melba's debut in Baltimore was made in the old-fashioned aria "Sweet Bird," from Handel's "Il Penserosa." The music is of the classic bravura style, filled with the vocal exercises, roulades, trills and the like, that were considered the most important requisite of music a hundred and fifty years ago. Melba's method proved that she could triumph easily over all the obstacles and difficulties of the old school, and in which many modern prima donnas are sadly deficient. Handel's music gives the vocal organs the best exercise they can possibly have, and the singer who has mastered his works will have little difficulty in anything modern. At the same time, the old songs can not compare in expression or intensity with musical conceptions of modern masters. Melba was accorded a storm of applause on finishing, and recalled several times. The flute obligato of Mons. Moie added greatly to the effect of her triumph. She is a great artist in the concert stage, but will never be thoroughly heard in Baltimore until she appears, as she will, later in the season, in grand opera. She was well loaded with various designs in floral offerings, which obliged her to come to the footlights several times to receive the well continued applause. She finally responded to encores for both her numbers. Baltimore will await her coming and appearance in grand opera with great interest.

Madame Scalchi repeated the beautiful Gluck's aria "Che Faro," from Orpheus and



INTERIOR OF THE NEW MUSIC HALL.

Mr. and Mrs. Charles H. Smith, Mr. and Mrs. Wm. B. Ogden, Mr. and Mrs. Hough Cottman, Mr. and Mrs. Edwin Howland, Dr. and Mrs. Robert Johnson, Mr. and Mrs. D. Buchanan Merryman, General and Mrs. Felix Agnus, Mrs. N. G. Penniman, Mr. and Mrs. Stanley Gary, Miss Nellie Stirling, Miss Helen Harvey, the Misses Lurman, Miss Mary Boone, Miss Mary Keyser, Miss Josephine Poe, Miss Mary Shearer, Miss Fannie Gray, Miss Florence Ranstead, Miss Eleanor Smith, the Misses Agnus, the Misses Gary, Miss Coulter, Mr. and Mrs. G. A. Von Lingen, Miss Bertie Von Lingen, Mrs. O. N. Butler, Miss Mary Butler, Mr. Thomas Baker, Mr. Barton Smith, Mr. Percy McLaran, the Messrs. Ahrens, Mr. Geo. Armistead, Miss Mary Goldsborough, Miss Ellen Goldsborough, Mrs. H. C. Evans, Mr. and Mrs. J. P. Wright, Mr. and Mrs. Randolph Pendleton, Dr. and Mrs. B. Merrill Hopkinson, Miss Alice Key Blunt, Mrs. George W. Dobbin, Miss Florence Basshor, Mr. and Mrs. Bartlett S. Johnson, Mr. and Mrs. Wm. Whitelock, Dr. Wm. F. Lockwood, Mr. and Mrs. Winslow Williams, Miss Virginia Cooper, Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Whitridge, Mrs. Fitzgerald Smith, Miss Margaret Atkinson, Miss HenriettaTilghman, Mrs. Lovell, Miss Beulah Smith, Miss Mabel Ford, Mrs. Arthur Shreve, Mrs. Joshua Harvey; Miss Laura Jenkins, Miss Lulu Jenkins, Miss Mary H. Jenness, Mrs. Charles P. Montague, Mr. and Mrs. Tunstall Smith, Messrs. S. Johnson Poe, George May, B. N. Baker, Charles Keidel, Edward Gray, Otto Sutro, John McKim, the Messrs. Farber, J. Crossan Cooper, the Messrs. Riggs, Signor Minetti, Dr. Eugene Van Ness, Frank Taylor, Messrs. Charles Boone, Gerard S. Hopkins, Samuel S. Keyser, George Andrews, Dr. Thomas L. Shearer, Mr. Redmond C. Stewart, Dr. Mactier Warfield, Dr. Robert Reuling, Dr. Geo. Reuling, Mr. Frank Harvey, Mr. Douglas Gordon, Mr. John S. Ford, the Messrs. Penniman, A. L. Gambrill, George W. Dobbin, Jr., Thomas C. Basshor, Robert Lehr, Lucien Odend'hal, Edwin Aler, Harold Randolph, F. F. Peard, B. Howard Tyson, Arthur Robson, J. Seth Hopkins, H. P. C. Wilson, Dr. T. Buckler, Miss Mary Chatard, Dr. Ferdinand Chatard, Miss Bond, Mr. Heber Stryker, Mr. and Mrs. George Gibson, Mr. and Mrs. Carlos Sanchez, Mr. Leonce Rabillon, Mr. and Mrs. Wesley M. Oler, Miss Mary Murdoch, Mr. John Middleton, Mr. and Mrs. Alan P. Smith, Dr. and Mrs. John N. Mackenzie, Mr. and Mrs. Lynn R. Meekins, Mrs. Fisher Sloan, Miss Ella Buzby, Mrs. Joel Gutman, Mr. and Mrs. Edward Key, Miss Alice Horwitz, Miss Nellie Porter, Miss Olivia Gill, General and Mrs. John Gill, Miss Belle Berry, Mr. and Mrs. Gustav Lurman, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Keidel, the Misses Hall, Dr. and Mrs. F. M. Chisolm, Mr. and Mrs. Charles D. Fisher, Miss Sally Fisher, Miss Dugan, the Misses Devries, the Misses Dammann, Miss Buckler, Dr. P. C. Williams, Miss Williams, Miss Maude Thompson.

DESCRIPTION OF BUILDING.

Inception of Movement Which Led to Its Erection.

The new Music Hall was begun about three years ago, when Mr. Frank Frick and the late Ernest Knabe conceived the idea of its need in this community.

The first meeting looking to its accomplishment was held at the Mount Vernon Hotel, and subscriptions were at once solicited, after which stock was apportioned. A board of directors was appointed, and the scheme rapidly assumed definite shape, the company taking the name of the Auditorium Company of Baltimore.

The new Music Hall stands between Mount Royal and Maryland avenues, near their junction, and has entrances from both. It may be said, in a general way, to meet the requirements of every variety of entertainment—musical, social, political and educational— for which there is a demand. Not only on account of the auditorium itself is it adapted to present needs, but, through the number and arrangement of the other halls, passages, dressing-rooms, &c., which are especially planned to be used in connection with it, or for separate and distinct performances. The site is wisely selected, being almost in the center of the best quarter of city residences, surrounded by the principal lines of street railways, and near both the Baltimore and Ohio and the Pennsylvania stations. The building still lacks, however, its semi-circular front, the absence of which not only mars the entire effect of the building as seen from Mount Royal avenue, but deprives the general plan of the interior of its most striking and unusual feature. A temporary vestibule of frame has, however, been erected where the semi-circular hall will stand, leading to the lobby and to the dressing-rooms, and making an ample and convenient entrance to the building from that direction. The lobby (30x40 feet) gives access to the main floor of the auditorium and to the staircases to the gallery and assembly rooms above. It is flanked by dressing-rooms, coat-rooms and lavatories, which are so arranged that they can be used in connection with the assembly room above them, as well as with the auditorium itself, according to the character of the entertainments in progress.

A Splendid Auditorium.

The auditorium itself is one of the largest music halls in this country, being 110 feet in length, exclusive of the stage, and 100 feet in width. It has a full seating capacity of 3,000 persons, although at present only 2,634 seats have been provided, as sufficient for its present needs. The central portion of the main floor (70x85 feet) is flat, and provided with 1,100 movable seats upon a canvas covering. These will be removed when balls are given, or any other entertainment that requires a clear floor space. The 240 seats under the galleries and overlooking this space are so arranged that they can at any time be divided into sections by light partitions and converted into stalls thereby. The galleries on the three sides of the auditorium have a full seating capacity of 1,044 persons. The stage is elliptical in plan. Its width is 70 feet, its depth 40 feet, and its seating capacity about 500 persons. The organ gallery is in the center of the east wall, and forms the principal feature of the stage.

On either side are large dressing-rooms, with lavatories adjoining, for the performers' use, and above them again other rooms, suitable either as dressing-rooms or store-rooms. Easy access is provided to the auditorium on each floor, both from the Maryland avenue and Mount Royal avenue entrances. The staircases to the former will be used, as a general rule, for exits only.

The general effect of the auditorium and of the stage is simple, but good. The decoration has been used sparingly and with great care, and the color scheme, while in keeping with the general simplicity of the interior, is light and attracsupplemented with gas for special occasions. The heating and ventilating apparatus is most complete, and the fan system with which the building has been provided has already proved most thorough and satisfactory in its effects in both conditions of heat and cold. The Music Hall was built by Henry Smith & Sons, of Baltimore, from drawings and under the supervision of Griffin & Randall, architects, New York.

Officers of the Company.

The officers and directors of the Auditorium Company of Baltimore are: Frank Frick, president; W. Graham Bowdoin, vice president; Robert C. Davidson, treasurer; R. S. Albert, secretary, and Charles Keidel, Alexander Frank, Bernard N. Baker, David L. Bartlett and Julian Le Roy White.

THE SUN, BALTIMORE,
THURSDAY MORNING,
NOVEMBER 1, 1894.

MELBA AT MUSIC HALL.

She and Other Celebrated Singers at the Grand Opening

WITH BOSTON'S FAMOUS ORCHESTRA

A Large and Brilliant Audience Delighted with the Concert and also with the Splendid New Building which Has Been Dedicated to Music

Illumined by a flood of soft radiance falling on delicate tints of buff and cream and blue, the new Music Hall was thrown open last night to the gaze of 2,800 Baltimoreans at one of the most brilliant musical events of many years.

With the combined attractions of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a group of some of the greatest opera singers of the day and a new hall which ranks among the best in the country, the faces of the auditors, animated at first with sudden surprised delight, wore a continuously happy expression that deepened as the evening wore on and the majestic strains of opera music, old and new, filled the beautiful hall.

The audience was one of the most brilliant that has ever gathered in a Baltimore place of amusement. The musical world, the social world, the literary world—indeed, the cultured world in general of the city was represented by prominent men and women who assembled partly out of interest in the Boston Orchestra's programme, partly out of pride in the new home of art and partly because they had chimed in with the contagious impression that everybody else was going to be there.

A Magnificent Hall.

The hall was seen at its best when the audience was first seated, for later in the evening, when the musical programme had begun, the lights began to misbehave and glaring calciums had to be pressed into service for fear the hall would be plunged into darkness.

The first impression, with the incandescent lights glowing softly and steadily, was this: A vast auditorium formed of graceful arches and squares, colored in creamy shades and so tastefully arranged that the vision became enchanted with the harmonious whole before the fine details were thought of.

of "growing things" in the picture, and taken all in all the scene was one that was a fitting artistic setting to the musical feast to be first set forth in its walls.

Test of Acoustics.

Naturally a great deal of interest was felt in the concert as a test of the acoustics of the new hall, and the test seemed a successful one. The music resounded clearly and brilliantly, perhaps a little too brilliantly, suggesting an interesting question in acoustics. If a new violin or a new bell needs the seasoning power of time to mellow it and tone it down, why should not the same be true of the plaster and bricks of a music hall? At all events it seems natural to suppose that the new hall, already so well equipped acoustically, should become better and better with every concert given in it and with every strain of music that resounds against its heavy walls.

Compliment to Paur.

The opening concert was an especially appropriate one. The programme was almost wholly operatic, and although operatic concerts in the abstract are far from being the most artistic and satisfactory kind, there was so much that was admirable in the exponents and so much reason why the programme should not be too serious or heavy for the occasion that the affair was a success from beginning to end.

Emil Paur, the leader, had just stepped on his stand and picked up his baton when a sensation was created by the sight of a great floral music stand and baton going up the aisle with ushers staggering under it. The appropriate emblems were handed to the smiling director, who thereafter directed from the floral stand.

The director was warmly welcomed. There is something earnest and rugged and hearty about the thick-set little Viennese that makes him wear well. He conducted works by Wagner, Chabrier, Mendelssohn and Brahms with vigorous warmth.

Notable Group of Singers.

The audience fairly went wild over the opera folk. There were Melba, Plancon, Scalchi and Maugiere, who, "singly and in groups," caused the house to ring with plaudits.

Melba, the Second Patti.

Melba is a second Patti in some respects. Her voice is so rare a combination of purity, power and brilliance, controlled by perfect vocal art, that it would seem as if this dashing Australian woman could easily rank with the foremost lyric sopranos in the world. She takes every note in her compass without effort or distortion of face. Her attack is precise and her voice wonderfully flexible, but she has not the warmth of a great dramatic soprano.

Plancon, the Great Tenor.

When a little door on the side of the stage opened and a tall, good-natured looking Mephisto entered, the audience at once took on an air of expectancy, for Mons. Pol Plancon—it was he, the great French basso—walked in with an irresistable air of owning the earth, which he soon did own or at least that part of it represented in the new Music Hall. Melba may have won her hearers by her great voice, but Plancon carried his hearers by force of his artist temperament. He is simply a bundle of temperament. It gushes out in his glorious voice, it proclaims itself in the heartfelt and melodious French which rolls from his throat in resonant verse, and it brought him in touch with every listener. There was something characteristically French about this huge singer, and when, in Schumann's "Two Grenadiers," he burst out with the national anthem, it made every man and woman in the audience feel like standing up and singing with him, or of doing something equally rash or impossible.

Scalchi and Maugiere.

Mme. Scalchi's big voice was heard in two solos, which showed her to be still a great contralto, with a voice uneven and somewhat worn in its upper register, but still so round and rich as a whole that its very brusqueness fascinated her hearers as of old.

Mons. Maugiere, a French tenor, sang an aria from "Faust" with success.

Quartette from "Rigoletto."

In the brilliant vocal finale the four singers joined their voices in the famous quartette from "Rigoletto," with Melba's tones soaring flute-like over the others, Scalchi's rolling out with beautiful sonority, and the two male voices according well with their companions. It seemed for the time as if the old days of Italian opera were again at hand, and as if brilliant colorature singing and vocal feats were the things of the hour. The audience longed for an encore. Again and again the singers were brought to the stage, Melba each time making a little move as of a spoilt child that didn't want to speak its little piece again, a coquettish touch of babyishness that was found charming in the great diva, but would not have been tolerated in a smaller light. The encore was not forthcoming, so Paur took his stand and closed the concert with the "Academic Overture," by Brahms, after which the audience went slowly out into the street, comparing notes delightedly about hall and concert and singers.

How the Hall was Built.

Although several articles descriptive of the Music Hall have been published in THE SUN from time to time, a short resume of the origin of the enterprise which has given to Baltimore one of the best halls in the country, and a short description of the building itself are appropriate at this time.

Mr. Frank Frick and Mr. B. N. Baker deserve the credit for having put on foot the project for building a hall that would be suitable for holding large concerts and balls and for the meeting place of conventions and other large gatherings. Baltimore needed such a hall, and the need was felt more plainly than ever after the destruction of the old Concordia Opera House, in which so many great conventions had been held. It is difficult to secure the theatres during the dramatic season, and, with the exception of these, the Fifth Regiment Armory has been the only available large hall in the city, and this is almost entirely unsuited to the uses for which the Music Hall has been built.

Messrs. Frick and Baker had a consultation with a number of prominent business men, which resulted in a meeting at the Mount Vernon Hotel in November of 1891, at which time of the laying of the corner-stone subscriptions amounting to about $190,000 had been received.

Exterior and Interior.

The lot on which the building stands has a frontage of 228 feet on Mount Royal avenue and runs back to Maryland avenue, on which it has a frontage of 117 feet. The ground cost the company $43,000. The money remaining after the purchase of the lot was not sufficient for the erection of the building according to the architect's designs, so it was deemed better to go ahead and put up the hall with its essential useful features first, leaving the architectural and ornamental features to be added when sufficient money is raised to enable the company to proceed. It was also necessary to omit a portion of the ornamental work of the interior. This can be added to the building as it now stands at any time.

The exterior, however, needs as soon as possible the handsome semi-circular front which is intended to be the building's most attractive feature. Without it the structure presents a big, rough, barn-like appearance, and is but little more attractive looking than the storage warehouse a few blocks away. As the building now stands, with the ground, it has cost about $225,000. It will take fully $80,000 to add the semi-circular front, so that completed according to the designs of the architects, and including the cost of the ground on which it stands, the Music Hall will represent an investment of nearly $300,000.

Even without the imposing semi-circular front, with its stately entrance hall and broad promenade, the building is remarkably complete in its details. Its principal feature is, of course, the main hall in which last night's concert was given. This is 110 feet long exclusive of the stage and 100 feet wide. Its full seating capacity is 3,000. The central portion of the main floor is flat and is provided with 1,100 seats on a canvas covering so that they can be easily removed when balls are given or any other entertainment that requires a clear floor space. This space contains 6,000 square feet of surface. Under the galleries are nearly 300 seats which can be divided into sections by light partitions and converted into stalls. The galleries on the three sides of the auditorium have a seating capacity of over 1,000 persons. The stage is elliptical in plan, is 70 feet wide and 40 feet deep, and will seat 500 persons.

Under the stage is another hall, and adjoining it is a banquet hall, finished in dark wood, with pantries and kitchens adjoining.

An assembly-room is on the second floor over the lobby and dressing-rooms. It will make a comparatively small but beautiful ball-room, lecture-room or concert hall. Its open floor space is 40 by 60 feet, and the ceiling is 40 feet above the floor. At either end are passages or lobbies containing together more than half the clear floor space, and above them galleries for musicians. The decoration of the assembly-room is more elaborate in detail, and in coloring is more striking than that of any other portion of the building.

Officers and Directors.

The company which was formed for the erection of the hall was incorporated under the name of the Auditorium Company of Baltimore, with a capital stock of $200,000. It is said that the intention was originally to call the building the Auditorium. Before this name was formally adopted the building was called, by general consent, Music Hall, and it has never been changed. It is not likely to be, for it is particularly fitting and means a great deal more than Auditorium.

The officers and directors of the Auditorium Company are as follows: Frank Frick, president; W. Graham Bowdoin, vice-president; Robert C. Davidson, treasurer; R. S. Albert, secretary; Charles Keidel, Alexander Frank, Bernard N. Baker, David L. Bartlett and J. Le Roy White.

Rarely has any event, either social or musical, created such widespread interest as the opening of the new Music Hall yesterday evening. It was a red-letter night for Baltimoreans, and about three thousand of her most representative citizens graced the occasion with their presence. The occasion was doubly interesting—first, the formal opening of the building itself, and second, the initial appearance this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The opening night of the latter is always an event of importance in the musical circles, and is welcome to Baltimore, but when it brings four such artists with it as Madame Melba, Madame Scalchi, Monsieur Maugiere and Monsieur Plancon, it is indeed a time of rejoicing. By half-past seven o'clock yesterday evening all roads seemed to lead to the Music Hall. The street cars were crowded, the streets were filled with pedestrians, while in front of the building there was a mass of carriages, each waiting in line for a place in front of the main entrance.

Within the large lobby all was animation. Those who already had tickets quietly waited to get in line and file into the spacious auditorium, while those who had none eagerly tried to get to the ticket window. Just before eight o'clock there was a solid phalanx of humanity entering the three gates and moving onto the main floor or up to the galleries. The scene was a very brilliant one, as beautifully gowned women, many of whom were in exquisite costume, and men in evening dress, were shown to their seats by a well-trained corps of ushers in charge of Mr. A. L. Watkins. A few women were without any head covering, but most of them wore either crownless bonnets or velvet or jeweled bandeaux. Flowers adorned many corsages, and chrysanthemum boutonnieres were in the coats of most of the men.

Floral Decorations.

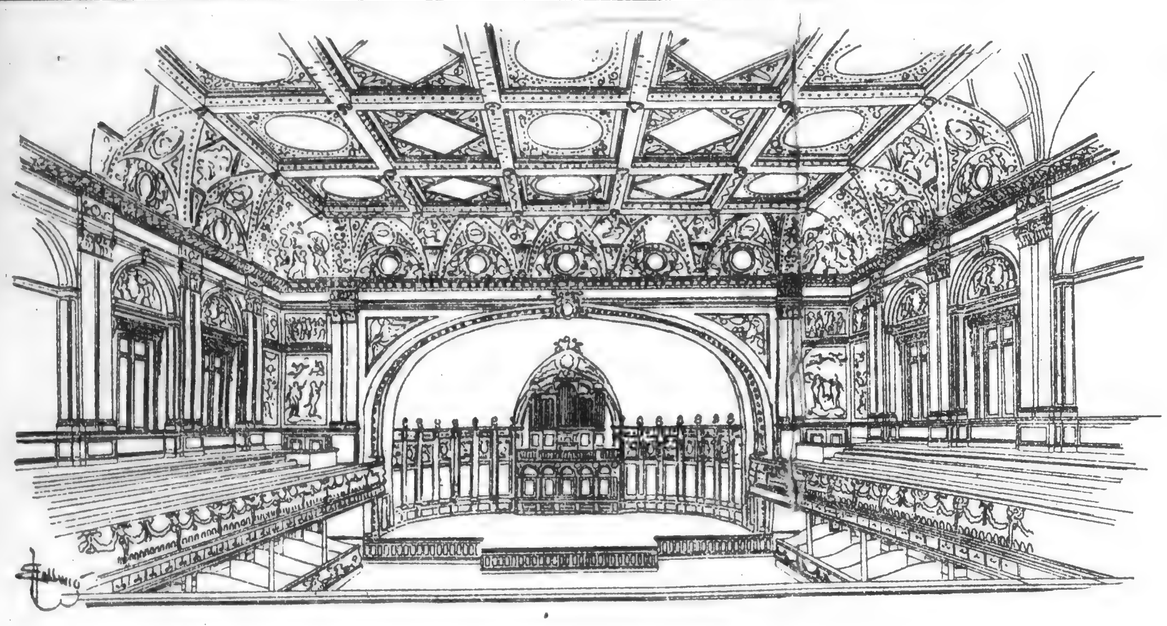
The stage, where the orchestra was arranged, was decorated with a quantity of tall fresh palms that formed a background for the musicians, while in front, at the base, were arranged variegated palms and tropical plants. The hall was brilliantly lighted with electric bulbs, which unfortunately ceased to glow in the early part of the evening. The gas was then lighted and gave a dim, religious light for the remainder of the time. The flowers presented by the directors of the hall to Madame Melba, Madame Scalchi and to Mr. Emil Paur, the director, were simply superb. At the beginning of the concert Mr. Paur was given a director's stand with music rest and baton complete, made of chrysanthemums and American beauty roses. Madame Melba and Madame Scalchi received immense baskets of pink and white chrysanthemums that were so large they could scarcely carry them, and tremendous bouquets of roses that filled the air with fragrance as they were taken down the aisle. As each soloist appeared there was loud applause, and when Melba came out the air was rent in twain.

She wore a beautiful trained, low-necked gown of pale blue satin, spangled with silver discs, and a blue chiffon waist studded with diamond pins. Around her throat was a gorgeous diamond necklace.

Madame Scalchi's gown was a French creation of striped satin, brocaded with pink nosegays, and embellished with rare cream-colored lace. Her jewels were diamonds in the shape of odd brooches, and she wore a jeweled butterfly in her hair. The acoustics of the new hall were very satisfactory, and the voices could be clearly and distinctly heard at any point in the auditorium. The orchestra also carried well, and all the musicians expressed themselves as pleased with the new building in this respect.

The dimensions of the hall make it unusually resonant, and an orchestra which sounds large in a theater seems to double in size when heard in this grand enclosure, without the interference of scenery and the large space back of the curtain in theaters. There was, therefore, much speculation as to the probable acoustic properties of the new hall, as its breadth and length are very nearly the same, thereby approaching the square form, which is generally very damaging to musical productions. The hall would undoubtedly be imperfect in this respect but for the balcony extending around the three sides, and which prevents extreme reverberation. The happy medium between a non-resonant and a too-resonant auditorium is thereby attained.

As Melba and Scalchi left last night for New York, and as they wished to show their appreciation of the flowers received from the directors of the Music Hall, they telephoned to The American for advice as to how they should dispose of the flowers, and at the suggestion of this paper the flowers were sent to the Home for In-



INTERIOR OF THE NEW MUSIC HALL.

Mr. and Mrs. Charles H. Smith, Mr. and Mrs. Wm. B. Ogden, Mr. and Mrs. Hough Cottman, Mr. and Mrs. Edwin Howland, Dr. and Mrs. Robert Johnson, Mr. and Mrs. D. Buchanan Merryman, General and Mrs. Felix Agnus, Mrs. N. G. Penniman, Mr. and Mrs. Stanley Gary, Miss Nellie Stirling, Miss Helen Harvey, the Misses Lurman, Miss Mary Boone, Miss Mary Keyser, Miss Josephine Poe, Miss Mary Shearer, Miss Fannie Gray, Miss Florence Ranstead, Miss Eleanor Smith, the Misses Agnus, the Misses Gary, Miss Coulter, Mr. and Mrs. G. A. Von Lingen, Miss Bertie Von Lingen, Mrs. O. N. Butler, Miss Mary Butler, Mr. Thomas Baker, Mr. Barton Smith, Mr. Percy McLaran, the Messrs. Ahrens, Mr. Geo. Armistead, Miss Mary Goldsborough, Miss Ellen Goldsborough, Mrs. H. C. Evans, Mr. and Mrs. J. P. Wright, Mr. and Mrs. Randolph Pendleton, Dr. and Mrs. B. Merrill Hopkinson, Miss Alice Key Blunt, Mrs. George W. Dobbin, Miss Florence Basshor, Mr. and Mrs. Bartlett S. Johnson, Mr. and Mrs. Wm. Whitelock, Dr. Wm. F. Lockwood, Mr. and Mrs. Winslow Williams, Miss Virginia Cooper, Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Whitridge, Mrs. Fitzgerald Smith, Miss Margaret Atkinson, Miss Henrietta Tilghman, Mrs. Lovell, Miss Beulah Smith, Miss Mabel Ford, Mrs. Arthur Shreve, Mrs. Joshua Harvey, Miss Laura Jenkins, Miss Lulu Jenkins, Miss Mary H. Jenness, Mrs. Charles P. Montague, Mr. and Mrs. Tunstall Smith, Messrs. S. Johnson Poe, George May, B. N. Baker, Charles Keidel, Edward Gray, Otto Sutro, John McKim, the Messrs. Farber, J. Crossan Cooper, the Messrs. Riggs, Signor Minetti, Dr. Eugene Van Ness, Frank Taylor, Messrs. Charles Boone, Gerard S. Hopkins, Samuel S. Keyser, George Andrews, Dr. Thomas L. Shearer, Mr. Redmond C. Stewart, Dr. Mactier Warfield, Dr. Robert Reuling, Dr. Geo. Reuling, Mr. Frank Harvey, Mr. Douglas Gordon, Mr. John S. Ford, the Messrs. Penniman, A. L. Gambrill, George W. Dobbin, Jr., Thomas C. Basshor, Robert Lehr, Lucien Odend'hal, Edwin Aler, Harold Randolph, F. F. Peard, B. Howard Tyson, Arthur Robson, J. Seth Hopkins, H. P. C. Wilson, Dr. T. Buckler, Miss Mary Chatard, Dr. Ferdinand Chatard, Miss Bond, Mr. Heber Stryker, Mr. and Mrs. George Gibson, Mr. and Mrs. Carlos Sanchez, Mr. Leonce Rabillon, Mr. and Mrs. Wesley M. Oler, Miss Mary Murdoch, Mr. John Middleton, Mr. and Mrs. Alan P. Smith, Dr. and Mrs. John N. Mackenzie, Mr. and Mrs. Lynn R. Meekins, Mrs. Fisher Sloan, Miss Ella Buzby, Mrs. Joel Gutman, Mr. and Mrs. Edward Key, Miss Alice Horwitz, Miss Nellie Porter, Miss Olivia Gill, General and Mrs. John Gill, Miss Belle Berry, Mr. and Mrs. Gustav Lurman, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Keidel, the Misses Hall, Dr. and Mrs. F. M. Chisolm, Mr. and Mrs. Charles D. Fisher, Miss Sally Fisher, Miss Dugan, the Misses Devries, the Misses Dammann, Miss Buckler, Dr. P. C. Williams, Miss Williams, Miss Maude Thompson.

DESCRIPTION OF BUILDING.

Inception of Movement Which Led to Its Erection.

The new Music Hall was begun about three years ago, when Mr. Frank Frick and the late Ernest Knabe conceived the idea of its need in this community.

The first meeting looking to its accomplishment was held at the Mount Vernon Hotel, and subscriptions were at once solicited, after which stock was apportioned. A board of directors was appointed, and the scheme rapidly assumed definite shape, the company taking the name of the Auditorium Company of Baltimore.

The new Music Hall stands between Mount Royal and Maryland avenues, near their junction, and has entrances from both. It may be said, in a general way, to meet the requirements of every variety of entertainment—musical, social, political and educational— for which there is a demand. Not only on account fifty years ago. Melba's method proved that she could triumph easily over all the obstacles and difficulties of the old school, and in which many modern prima donnas are sadly deficient. Handel's music gives the vocal organs the best exercise they can possibly have, and the singer who has mastered his works will have little difficulty in anything modern. At the same time, the old songs can not compare in expression or intensity with musical conceptions of modern masters. Melba was accorded a storm of applause on finishing, and recalled several times. The flute obligato of Mons. Mole added greatly to the effect of her triumph. She is a great artist on the concert stage, but will never be thoroughly heard in Baltimore until she appears, as she will, later in the season, in grand opera. She was well loaded with various designs in floral offerings, which obliged her to come to the footlights several times to receive the well continued applause. She finally responded to encores for both her numbers. Baltimore will await her coming and appearance in grand opera with great interest.

Madame Scalchi repeated the beautiful Gluck aria "Che Faro," from Orpheus and Eurydice, which she has sung so often in this city. This aria, although of the old French-German school, is one of music's immortal numbers. It is as fresh today as it was a hundred years ago. It was true to nature at first, and will be enjoyed as long as music is sung. In dramatic force and art, Scalchi is still herself, but her voice cannot be compared to that of her supplemented with gas for special occasions. The heating and ventilating apparatus is most complete, and the fan system with which the building has been provided has already proved most thorough and satisfactory in its effects in both conditions of heat and cold. The Music Hall was built by Henry Smith & Sons, of Baltimore, from drawings and under the supervision of Griffin & Randall, architects, New York.

Officers of the Company.

The officers and directors of the Auditorium Company of Baltimore are: Frank Frick, president; W. Graham Bowdoin, vice president; Robert C. Davidson, treasurer; R. S. Albert, secretary, and Charles Keidel, Alexander Frank, Bernard N. Baker, David L. Bartlett and Julian Le Roy White.

ing-rooms and lavatories adjoining these two halls, to make their purposes complete, and special facilities for a great variety of entertainments have thereby been assured. Furthermore, being connected with the auditorium by staircases at either end, these halls can be used in connection with the larger hall when balls, fairs and public meetings are being given.

On account of the number of staircases and entrances connected with all of the halls in the building opening upon the streets at both ends, not only the convenience, but the safety, of the public has been well provided for. Openings for four fire-escapes from each floor of the auditorium have been arranged, to add, if necessary, further security against danger of fire or panic. The building is provided with electric light in abundance, a special plant in the building,

THE SUN, BALTIMORE,

THURSDAY MORNING,

NOVEMBER 1, 1894.

MELBA AT MUSIC HALL.

She and Other Celebrated Singers at the Grand Opening

WITH BOSTON'S FAMOUS ORCHESTRA

A Large and Brilliant Audience Delighted with the Concert and also with the Splendid New Building which Has Been Dedicated to Music

Illumined by a flood of soft radiance falling on delicate tints of buff and cream and blue, the new Music Hall was thrown open last night to the gaze of 2,800 Baltimoreans at one of the most brilliant musical events of many years.

With the combined attractions of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a group of some of the greatest opera singers of the day and a new hall which ranks among the best in the country, the faces of the auditors, animated at first with sudden surprised delight, wore a continuously happy expression that deepened as the evening wore on and the majestic strains of opera music, old and new, filled the beautiful hall.

The audience was one of the most brilliant that has ever gathered in a Baltimore place of amusement. The musical world, the social world, the literary world—indeed, the cultured world in general of the city was represented by prominent men and women who assembled partly out of interest in the Boston Orchestra's programme, partly out of pride in the new home of art and partly because they had chimed in with the contagious impression that everybody else was going to be there.

A Magnificent Hall.

The hall was seen at its best when the audience was first seated, for later in the evening, when the musical programme had begun, the lights began to misbehave and glaring calciums had to be pressed into service for fear the hall would be plunged into darkness.

The first impression, with the incandescent lights glowing softly and steadily, was this: A vast auditorium formed of graceful arches and squares, colored in creamy shades and so tastefully arranged that the vision became enchanted with the harmonious whole before the fine details were thought of.

suggesting an interesting question in acoustics. If a new violin or a new bell needs the seasoning power of time to mellow it and tone it down, why should not the same be true of the plaster and bricks of a music hall? At all events it seems natural to suppose that the new hall, already so well equipped acoustically, should become better and better with every concert given in it and with every strain of music that resounds against its heavy walls.

Compliment to Paur.

The opening concert was an especially appropriate one. The programme was almost wholly operatic, and although operatic concerts in the abstract are far from being the most artistic and satisfactory kind, there was so much that was admirable in the exponents and so much reason why the programme should not be too serious or heavy for the occasion that the affair was a success from beginning to end.

Emil Paur, the leader, had just stepped on his stand and picked up his baton when a sensation was created by the sight of a great floral music stand and baton going up the aisle with ushers staggering under it. The appropriate emblems were handed to the smiling director, who thereafter directed from the floral stand.

The director was warmly welcomed. There is something earnest and rugged and hearty about the thick-set little Viennese that makes him wear well. He conducted works by Wagner, Chabrier, Mendelssohn and Brahms with vigorous warmth.

Notable Group of Singers.

The audience fairly went wild over the opera folk. There were Melba, Plancon, Scalchi and Maugiere, who, "singly and in groups," caused the house to ring with plaudits.

Melba, the Second Patti.

Melba is a second Patti in some respects. Her voice is so rare a combination of purity, power and brilliance, controlled by perfect vocal art, that it would seem as if this dashing Australian woman could easily rank with the foremost lyric sopranos in the world. She takes every note in her compass without effort or distortion of face. Her attack is precise and her voice wonderfully flexible, but she has not the warmth of a great dramatic soprano.

Plancon, the Great Tenor.

When a little door on the side of the stage opened and a tall, good-natured looking Mephisto entered, the audience at once took on an air of expectancy, for Mons. Pol Plancon—it was he, the great French basso—walked in with an irresistable air of owning the earth, which he soon did own or at least that part of it represented in the new Music Hall. Melba may have won her hearers by her great voice, but Plancon carried his hearers by force of his artist temperament. He is simply a bundle of temperament. It gushes out in his glorious voice, it proclaims itself in the heartfelt and melodious French which rolls from his throat in resonant verse, and it brought him in touch with every listener. There was something characteristically French about this huge singer, and when, in Schumann's "Two Grenadiers," he burst out with the national anthem, it made every man and woman in the audience feel like standing up and singing with him, or of doing something equally rash or impossible.

Scalchi and Maugiere.

Mme. Scalchi's big voice was heard in two solos, which showed her to be still a great contralto, with a voice uneven and somewhat worn in its upper register, but still so round and rich as a whole that its very brusqueness fascinated her hearers as of old.

Mons. Maugiere, a French tenor, sang an aria from "Faust" with success.

Quartette from "Rigoletto."

In the brilliant vocal finale the four singers joined their voices in the famous quartette from "Rigoletto," with Melba's tones soaring flute-like over the others, Scalchi's rolling out with beautiful sonority, and the two male voices according well with their companions. It seemed for the time as if the old days of Italian opera were again at hand, and as if brilliant colorature singing and vocal feats were the things of the hour. The audience longed for an encore. Again and again the singers were brought to the stage, Melba each time making a little move as of a spoilt child that didn't want to speak its little piece again, a coquettish touch of babyishness that was found charming in the great diva, but would not have been tolerated in a smaller light. The encore was not forthcoming, so Paur took his stand and closed the concert with the "Academic Overture," by Brahms, after which the audience went slowly out into the street, comparing notes delightedly about hall and concert and singers.

How the Hall was Built.

Although several articles descriptive of the Music Hall have been published in THE SUN from time to time, a short resume of the origin of the enterprise which has given to Baltimore one of the best halls in the country, and a short description of the building itself are appropriate at this time.

Mr. Frank Frick and Mr. B. N. Baker deserve the credit for having put on foot the project for building a hall that would be suitable for holding large concerts and balls and for the meeting place of conventions and other large gatherings. Baltimore needed such a hall, and the need was felt more plainly than ever after the destruction of the old Concordia Opera House, in which so many great conventions had been held. It is difficult to secure the theatres during the dramatic season, and, with the exception of these, the Fifth Regiment Armory has been the only available large hall in the city, and this is almost entirely unsuited to the uses for which the Music Hall has been built.

Messrs. Frick and Baker had a consultation with a number of prominent business men, which resulted in a meeting at the Mount Vernon Hotel in November of 1891, at which not sufficient for the erection of the building according to the architect's designs, so it was deemed better to go ahead and put up the hall with its essential useful features first, leaving the architectural and ornamental features to be added when sufficient money is raised to enable the company to proceed. It was also necessary to omit a portion of the ornamental work of the interior. This can be added to the building as it now stands at any time.

The exterior, however, needs as soon as possible the handsome semi-circular front which is intended to be the building's most attractive feature. Without it the structure presents a big, rough, barn-like appearance, and is but little more attractive looking than the storage warehouse a few blocks away. As the building now stands, with the ground, it has cost about $225,000. It will take fully $80,000 to add the semi-circular front, so that completed according to the designs of the architects, and including the cost of the ground on which it stands, the Music Hall will represent an investment of nearly $300,000.

Even without the imposing semi-circular front, with its stately entrance hall and broad promenade, the building is remarkably complete in its details. Its principal feature is, of course, the main hall in which last night's concert was given. This is 110 feet long exclusive of the stage and 100 feet wide. Its full seating capacity is 3,000. The central portion of the main floor is flat and is provided with 1,100 seats on a canvas covering so that they can be easily removed when balls are given or any other entertainment that requires a clear floor space. This space contains 6,000 square feet of surface. Under the galleries are nearly 300 seats which can be divided into sections by light partitions and converted into stalls. The galleries on the three sides of the auditorium have a seating capacity of over 1,000 persons. The stage is elliptical in plan, is 70 feet wide and 40 feet deep, and will seat 500 persons.

Under the stage is another hall, and adjoining it is a banquet hall, finished in dark wood, with pantries and kitchens adjoining.

An assembly-room is on the second floor over the lobby and dressing-rooms. It will make a comparatively small but beautiful ball-room, lecture-room or concert hall. Its open floor space is 40 by 60 feet, and the ceiling is 40 feet above the floor. At either end are passages or lobbies containing together more than half the clear floor space, and above them galleries for musicians. The decoration of the assembly-room is more elaborate in detail, and in coloring is more striking than that of any other portion of the building.

Officers and Directors.

The company which was formed for the erection of the hall was incorporated under the name of the Auditorium Company of Baltimore, with a capital stock of $200,000. It is said that the intention was originally to call the building the Auditorium. Before this name was formally adopted the building was called, by general consent, Music Hall, and it has never been changed. It is not likely to be, for it is particularly fitting and means a great deal more than Auditorium.

The officers and directors of the Auditorium Company are as follows: Frank Frick, president; W. Graham Bowdoin, vice-president; Robert C. Davidson, treasurer; R. S. Albert, secretary; Charles Keidel, Alexander Frank, Bernard N. Baker, David L. Bartlett and J. Le Roy White.

[44]

THE BALTIMORE NEWS.

PUBLISHED BY
THE EVENING NEWS PUBLISHING COMPANY OF BALTIMORE CITY.
Office, No. 201 East Baltimore Street.

CHAS. H. GRASTY, President. DOUGLAS H. GORDON, Secretary-Treasurer.

WEDNESDAY EVENING, OCT. 31, 1894.

OPENING OF MUSIC HALL.

EVERY INDICATION POINTS TO IT BEING A GREAT EVENT.

The Famous Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Soloists, Mme. Melba, Mme. Scalchi, Mons. Plancon and Mons. Maugiere Hold a Morning Rehearsal—The Acoustics of the Great Auditorium Pronounced Most Excellent.

The new Music Hall thrilled with the vibrations of song for the first time at noon today, when Mme. Melba poured forth a wonderful melody of bird notes in a private rehearsal, in which she was supported by the Boston Symphony Company's orchestra, and Mme. Scalchi, contralto; M. Maugiere, tenor, and M. Plancon, baritone.

The Hall was found to be almost perfect. Its acoustics were declared to be excellent. Mme. Melba was highly pleased and will fill the place with the sweetest vibrations of her wonderful voice tonight.

The opening of the Hall has been an event looked forward to for months. The subscription sale of seats was very large and the single seats were taken rapidly as soon as the sale opened. All the indications promise a great event. There is a great auditorium, there is a great combination of artists to open it and there will be a great crowd to lend the magnetism of numbers and inspire the performers and soloists to their best efforts. Tonight's audience will be a superb compliment to Mme. Melba and her associates in the evening's entertainment as well as to the owners of Music Hall, whose enterprise has pushed the great project to completion. In the qualities of wealth and culture it will be such an audience as is rarely gathered in any auditorium in America.

The Morning Rehearsal.

There was a rehearsal this morning at the hall. It was announced for 11.30 o'clock, and the 87 members of the orchestra were right on time, for Conductor Emil Paur doesn't have his performers coming in late. The stage was filled with men, chairs, music stands and instruments. A big golden harp stood at one corner, with a slender young man to twang it. All around the back was a row of big basses. The librarian of the orchestra, Mr. Sauerkraut, stood with an elbow on the piano watching his friends. He takes care of the music and has to make himself scarce when the hearty German performers get hungry.

The central figure was Mr. Emil Paur, the conductor, dressed in an ordinary brown business suit, with a close-cropped reddish beard and hair neatly cut. He is one of the most noted conductors in the world. He has a harsh, heavy voice, which he occasionally uses on members of the orchestra. In a rehearsal Mr. Paur taps with his baton and says, "Ein, zwei, drei," and the orchestra begins playing.

The orchestra is under good discipline and moves as one person. It contains 15 nationalities among its performers, gives an average of three concerts a week, 24 matinees and 24 evening concerts in Boston, and an annual series in New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, Brooklyn, Cambridge and Richmond. It was organized in 1881 by Mr. Henry L. Higginson of Boston from musical and not commercial motives. Each of its members is an artist, and there is a constant effort to improve the standard.

The orchestra was playing its selections running as lightly as a flowing brook, when a messenger went hurriedly to Manager C. A. Ellis under some excitement with the announcement:

"Mme. Melba has arrived and she ought to be introduced to Mr. Paur!"

Mr. Ellis did not exactly do it that way. He took Mr. Paur down from the stage and presented him to Mme. Melba, who stood down near the front under the left balcony. They had never met before, but they wasted no time in becoming friends and forming a high regard for the ability of each other.

Mme. Melba's Conquest.

Soon Mme. Melba went to the stage to sing. She stood by the conductor and kept her face turned much of the time toward the orchestra. She wore black silk with jet ornaments, a black hat with black plumes and a black veil, but her hands were covered with snowy-white gloves. She made immediate conquest of everyone in the room by her magnetism of manner.

As for the members of the orchestra they became at once enthusiastic over her. She sang a few notes with an easy off-hand manner, smiling toward the orchestra. When she finished the performers set up a great clatter, pounding with their bows on the music stands and instruments. It was their way of applauding.

Later on they became so enthusiastic they dropped their instruments and clapped their hands when she finished. While they played she smiled at them and they smiled back and at each other. She enthused them and won them. When she sings tonight it will be with the support of an orchestra thoroughly in sympathy with her slightest effort and desire.

Mme. Melba's supremacy was as thorough over the few persons sitting in the body of the hall as it was over the musicians. Once she dropped a sheet of music and an elderly gentleman seven rows of seats away from the stage made a convulsive spring forward as if to pick it up, and then smiled sheepishly as he realized how far he was from her.

She sang more to try the orchestra than for any other purpose and found it perfectly responsive. She sent out some trills [illegible] around the hall and then stopped [illegible] of herself.

When she thought the movement might be improved on she gestured with her white-gloved hands and pointed with her finger on Mr. Paur's score. When she came to the climax containing an unusually high note she gave a little laugh and pointed playfully to the ceiling without trying the note. She was saving her voice for tonight, when she will take all the notes high and low.

Gossip About the Great Singer.

Mme. Melba's home is in Paris. Her husband does not travel with her, but she spends as much time at home as possible. She does not like the American way of heating houses. She is not accustomed to it, and it makes her take cold. She lives like any other woman, eats what she likes, enjoys the theatre and takes frequent walks. She is accompanied on her tours by Miss Bennett as companion, and by two maids.

She has some of the finest dresses ever seen on the stage. Tonight she will appear in a concert dress of pale blue. The skirt will be satin spangled, and she will wear a chiffon bodice, trimmed with heliotrope flowers. Her ornaments will be turquoise and diamonds.

Mme Melba practices but little while she s touring. Her voice is natural and does not require much practice. She will leave after the concert tonight on a late train for New York. She will sing in New Haven, Conn., Friday night and will open the season of grand opera in New York November 19 in "Romeo and Juliet."

The Orchestra and Programme.

The Boston Symphony Company has the following instruments.

Sixteen first violins, 14 second violins, 9 violas, 8 violoncelli, 8 basses, 1 harp, 2 flutes, 1 piccolo, 2 oboes, 1 Eng horn, 2 clarionets, 1 bass clarinet, 2 bassoons, 1 contra bassoon, 3 trumpets, 4 horns, 3 trombones, 1 tuba, 1 typani, 6 percussion instruments.

Tonight's programme follows:

Vorspiel, "Dei Meistersinger".....Wagner
Romanza from "Mignon".....A. Thomas
Mons. Maugiere.
Aria from "Don Carlos".....Verdi
Mons Plancon.
Aria, "Sweet Bird" (l'allegro il pensoso).....Handel
(Flute obligato, Mons. Mole)...Mme. Melba
Etnr' acte, "Gwendoline," first time..
.....Chabrier
Aria, "Che Faro," from "Orpheus"..Gluck
Mme. Scalchi.
Song, "The Two Grenadiers"..Schumann
Mons. Plancon.
Waltz, "Se Seran Rose".....Arditi
Mme. Melba.
Overture, scherzo, notturno and wedding march from "The Midsummer Night's Dream".....Mendelssohn
Quartette from "Rigoletto".....Verdi
Mesdames Melba and Scalchi, Messrs. Maugiere and Plancon.
Overture, "Egmout".....Beethoven

The doors tonight will be open at 7 o'clock to permit inspection of the building. The concert will begin at 8 o'clock. Carriages approaching from Maryland avenue will use the South drive. Carriages approaching from the west will use the North drive.

OPENING OF THE MUSIC HALL.

The opening of the new Music Hall tonight is an event of interest, not only to the musical world, but to Baltimoreans generally, as such a place for public assembly has long been needed in this city, and with its completion we now have, it is declared, the finest in the country. All that experts could suggest as required to make such a building perfect has been supplied, almost regardless of cost, and in ours other cities will seek a model when they may desire to erect a similar structure.

The musical art is growing here and those who follow it are receiving more encouragement than formerly. Musical taste has developed rapidly and extensively within recent years and is no longer confined to a few. With the new Music Hall it will be possible to give public entertainments on the finest scale, and the building may also be put to a multitude of other uses, even large political conventions, if necessary. The auditorium is of great size and will accommodate vast assemblies. During the last half a dozen years the complaint, well founded, has constantly been made that Baltimore had no large hall, particularly for concert entertainments on a grand scale, and on this account, no doubt, some of the best musical enterprises have failed to visit the city. There will now be no further ground for expressions of regret on this account, as the new Music Hall supplies in every particular the public want.

Brooklyn Daily Eagle

SATURDAY EVENING, NOVEMBER 3, 1894.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The finest orchestra in the world played some of the finest music in the world in a city of a million people yesterday and gathered half of a house to hear it. And Philharmonic weather had not set in either. It is hardly to be wondered at that the managers have thought of discontinuing the concerts in this city and have put off the next one until January, for it is said that the audiences in Brooklyn are smaller than those in any town where the orchestra plays. It comes this season larger, stronger and if possible, better than ever, and Mr. Paur gets more out of it, now that he has grown accustomed to his men. While most of the faces are familiar, there are several new players, but the animating spirit has suffered no change. There is no band in the world that is so awake as this, none that seems to have such a sense of enjoyment of its own work, none that is so quickly responsive, not only to the baton of the conductor, but to his very thought. The strings are of magical lucency and smoothness, the brasses, though powerful, are never coarse and in all divisions there is a unity of tone and a singleness of expression that would be little less than amazing had we not become used to it. Nothing but incessant practice as an orchestra can accomplish these results and the superiority of this band is due to the fact that its members are always together in their work, whereas in most of the orchestras the performers are allowed to play in their leisure evenings and afternoons in theaters, small halls and military bands. Mr. Paur has magnetism among his men, though he does not exercise it much upon the audience. He is trying to correct some of his uncouth habits and has measurably succeeded. He seldom stamps on the floor now, but he has had his hair cut and while the result is not as disastrous as it was in the case of Mr. Panks, it is not agreeble. Most people, however, like to see other people just like all people, and it will console them to know that Mr. Paur's hair is now of the same length as the hair of the customary laborer, mechanic and dry goods clerk and that he has no individuality in his clothes. He has individuality in his mind and that suffices without ocular proof of it. He furnishes this week a programme that is short and sweet; a symphony, an overture, a march, a set of dances and two songs. The bill is too short by a quarter of an hour. It opens with Wagner's "Kaiser" march, and it was a revelation. To many it was as if they had heard the music for the first time. It had all the pomp and glory and force of an imperial function. The dynamic effects were tremendous, the battery alone having been increased to seven men. The thing grew and grew until it shadowed the earth like thunder clouds, and the outpour was a deluge of harmony. It was Jovian. Mr. Paur was equally happy in the Berlioz number, the "Roman Carnival" overture, with its fantastic instrumentation—you can generally tell Berlioz in the dark—its jingling saltarello and its air of threatening gayety. There was a set of dances by Gluck, too, that was played with taste and discrimination, a tambourin, a gavotte and a chaconne—a sweet and sunny episode in the concert that made a softly lighted picture of old days when men were gallant and women were as they always are; when there were rustling robes and periwigs, silver and sconces, and a scent of rosemary and lavender. We hear too little of Gluck. He has the brightness and purity of Mozart, but he has heart and thought, which Mozart has not. Mozart was a happy child; Gluck, a man. Strange to say, Mr. Paur did not interpret Schumann when he played his symphony in C major as sympathetically or as felicitously as he translates the scores of Wagner or Beethoven. There was a lack on the emotional side. Schumann is perhaps the most intellectual of all composers, unless the rising generation shall award that distinction to the now abstruse and often dreary Brahms, but he is also one of the sweetest singers and most refined of poets. The C major symphony is a delightful example of his work and its charm and sway are perennial. Its seriousness is at times almost churchly, as in the opening measures and the adagio, though the scherzo is as full of spring happiness. But, if there was a want in the reading, there was nothing in the technical performance that called for criticism. The strings were firm and solid, the staccato for the wood wind in the first trio had the crystaline tinkle of the harp, and in the allegro the flute run was like the song of a distant thrush in a wood. Yes, there was one fault, though. It was in the tuning of the drums, one of which was nearly half a tone out of key in the closing movement. The drummer dragged the time also when he touched the tambourine in the Gluck number. The soloist was Julie M. Wyman, who wore street dress and a medal and sang pleasantly. Her selections were a rather mournful air from Bemberg's "Death of Joan of Arc" and a bit from Masse's "Galatea." This latter piece is dramatic, varied, originally harmonized as to the accompaniment—why was it not played by the orchestra instead of on the piano?—and it has the curious avoidance of form that we note in all later French art, pictorial, musical and poetic, Verlaine standing as the type of the sensitivist in verse. Mrs. Wyman was applauded heartily and Mr. Paur had also to bow his acknowledgments at the end of every numebr. The regular concert will be given at the Academy this evening, and for the honor of art and the honor of Brooklyn it is hoped that the public will make a better show than it did yesterday.

NEW YORK HERALD.

HERALD SQUARE.

NEW YORK, FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 2, 1894.

FIRST BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A concert without a virtuoso of some sort as the chief attraction has become such a rarity here that an entertainment, such as was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Metropolitan Opera House last evening, should be hailed as a delightful relief.

Not that there was an utter absence of soloists upon this occasion. But M. Plancon is only an artist, thank heaven, not a virtuoso, and he can do many things without ever doing anything that is bad. He sang an aria from "The Seasons," by Gluck, with exquisite finish of style, and he delivered Pogner's "Address' from "Die Meistersinger" with wonderful enthusiasm.

The numbers which were looked forward to with more than common interest were a symphony by Sgambati, and a new overture entitled "Sappho," by Goldmark.

The former, to tell the truth, is not a very impressive work. It is dignified, is interesting enough contrapuntally, and all the fine movements, an allegro in D major, and an andante in G minor, a Schumannesque scherzo in B flat major, a serenata in D minor, and a final allegro in D major are well written. Melodically, however, the ideas are too small for symphonic development, and the composer constantly strives after new instrumental combinations, which may sound remarkably well—on paper.

As for Goldmark's new overture, it is simply an orchestral tumult. The music glows with the color of Sulamith and Assad, but you cannot mention this "Sappho" in the same breath with "Sakuntala," "Penthisilea," or "Prometheus."

Besides these numbers the orchestra played with that smoothness, sonority and that splendid balance of tone three dances by Gluck.

But the "Phaeton" was not well done. From the very start the tempo was taken at such a headlong pace that a climax became impossible, and Herr Paur missed, to my thinking, the dramatic possibilities of Saint Saens' music.

The World.

Published by the Press Publishing Company,
53 to 63 PARK ROW, New York.

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 2, 1894.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Work of Sgambati's and Goldmark's "Sappho" Overture the Two Chief Novelties Presented.

The season of symphony concerts was appropriately inaugurated at the Metropolitan last night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, still the best organization of its kind on this side the water. The word "still" is used advisedly, for though Boston seems inclined to glorify Mr. Paur at the expense of former conductors, it can hardly be denied that this orchestra does not play as well as it did. There is perhaps little difference from a purely technical standpoint rather wold there seem to be now a lack of that entire sympathy between conductor and players essential if the best artistic results are to be produced.

The playing of the orchestra has certainly not gained in either precision or brilliancy under the present regime. The feature of the pr gramme was a symphony (No. 1) by Giovanni Sgambati, the well-known Italian pianist and composer (first performed Rome, 1881). This symphony in five movements—allegro vivace, andante mesto, scherzo (double) and trio, serenata and finale is an exceedingly erudite and it must be confessed rather dull work. Severe in style, it is more remarkable for constructive ability than for original melodic thought or imagination. The orchestral treatment suggests both Berlioz and Liszt, and there is little of either Italian sunshine or poetic feeling in the themes or in their treatment.

Only once does the Italian throw off his Teutonic lion-skin, and that is in the serenatas, a movement full of grace and charm. The first two movements are diffuse and sombre, while the finale lacks distinction. The scherzo, really a double one and quite original in form, is also both individual, rhythmic and interesting. Altogether a work showing solid musical attainments, but hardly marked symphonic genius or aptitude.

Another novelty on the programme was Goldmark's latest orchestral composition, op. 44, an overture, "Sappho," which in form and general treatment suggests the composer's former "Sakuntala" overture. A charming, poetic composition, this new overture, full of life, color and variety—possibly, like the knowledge we have of the great poetess whose name it bears, somewhat fragmentary in thematic character; this, too, perhaps, intentional with the composer. The work is brilliantly scored for very large orchestra—bass clarinet and other extras—and will undoubtedly prove a popular concert number. Its fault lies in being entirely too modern in tone for its text; there is no suspicion of the classic, even archaic, flavor of the times of the great unknown Sappho. But it has poetry, sentiment, power and mystery, and so is not unpictorial and certainly powerful.

The orchestra also played a tambourin, gavotte and chaconne of Gluck, and Saint-Saens's symphonic poem, "Phaeton," the latter very well, though the best work of the evening was done in the overture, which was splendidly rendered. M. Plancon, who was the soloist of the evening, was in excellent voice and never sang better. His rendering of "Le Laboreur," from Haydn's "The Seasons," both as to phrasing and delivery, was simply delightful, and he was equally successful in "Pogner's Address," from "Die Meistersinger," both numbers being rapturously applauded.

The symphony once disposed of, the concert was most enjoyable, though the Metropolitan does not seem to be the best place in the world for orchestral music. REGINALD DE KOVEN.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 4, 1894.

ABOUT MUSIC.

A Few Words About These "Educational" Programs.

"Musicians and Music Lovers," a Book by W. F. Apthorp.

Essays That Interest and Abound in Valuable Suggestion.

It seems that the program of the Symphony concert on the 27th ult. was regarded by some as highly "educational," and, therefore, to be praised loudly. This program was made up of Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony; Beethoven's E flat concerto for piano and orchestra; and Schumann's C major Symphony. It is true that the performance was excellent for the most part, and at times unusually fine. It is true that piano students and piano teachers might have learned some valuable lessons by hearing Mr. Baermann play. But why was the program per se educational? Why should it be more educational than that of next Saturday, which will include an overture by Smetana, a symphony by Sgambati, and a suite by Bizet?

Is not such characterization of an eminently respectable and familiar program a phase of fetich worship.

It is now agreed generally that it is safe to applaud heartily works by Bach, Mozart, Beethoven, Schubert and Schumann. Their position is secure. Even Schumann is now regarded by the majority as a classic. Truly are they great names, glories of the Temple of Music, but there are other names to be respectfully considered. Strict and undeviating attention paid to the works of those here mentioned does not necessarily make for musical righteousness.

All sorts and conditions of music should be known. Education does not consist merely in slavish adoration of respectability, in love, wonder and praise of music of the past. It is just as necessary to know what contemporaries are doing as to be reminded of what the ancients did. It is of greater importance that young musicians and music lovers should hear for the first time a symphony by Sgambati than for the tenth time a symphony by Schumann.

You should not, you cannot ignore the existence of composers of today. Because a composition is signed Chabrier, or MacDowell, or Sinding, or Chadwick, you have a right to say, "These works are interesting or dull, well-made or of inferior workmanship;" but you have no right to dismiss them carelessly because they have not won the approval of two or three generations of hearers.

There are certain musical works that resemble Hume's History of England, a complete set of Walter Scott, the Spectator, and the long line of books which "no gentleman's library should be without;" but to depend upon them alone for "educational" purposes would be to imitate the conservatism of the Chinese.

It may be said, although some shriek out "A blasphemer! Stone him to death!" that any student of instrumentation will learn more by suggestion and stimulation in hearing and by study of the score from Chabrier's Prelude to the second act of "Gwendoline," or from MacDowell's suite than from repeated examinations and hearings of Schumann's C major Symphony. I am not comparing the musical worth of these compositions. I speak only of a detail in practical education.

Nothing can show more plainly the parochial condition of music in the United States than this absurd exaltation of the ancients at the expense of the moderns. Why, Beethoven and Schumann were moderns once and looked at askew by many contemporaries who no doubt talked of the educational advantages to be gained by hearing the works of their predecessors.

There is much modern music that is weak, or extravagant, or bad. No one disputes this assertion. On the other hand how much that is dull and hopelessly old fashioned and merely routine work is to be found in these same ancients who are held in awful veneration.

So in opera, the tendency is to approve only that which is familiar: "Faust" with the faithful Miss Bauermeister as Martha, or "Lohengrin" with an Ortrud who occasionally does not stray from the true pitch. The first decent performance of "Cavalleria Rusticana," or "I Pagliacci," was of greater educational value to the musicans of this town than was the fiftieth performance of a well-known opera; not because it was a "novelty," but because it showed the spirit and the purpose of a new and intelligent school of opera-makers.

Because there was the mighty Elizabethan age, or because Goethe and Byron lived, shall Hugo, Browning, Whitman, Verlaine be neglected? Because the humane Fielding described man for all time, shall Hardy or De Maupassant go unread, or be admitted to the library under protest?

One may well exclaim with Walt Whitman:

"Great are the myths—I too delight in them;
Great are Adam and Eve—I too look back and accept them;
Great the risen and fallen nations, and their poets,
Women, sages, inventors, rulers, warriors and priests,
Great is today, and beautiful,
It is good to live in this age—there never was any better."

***

prepar... repeatedly occasions by William F. Apt... The book is published by Charles Scribner's Sons.

Mr. Apthorp's book has, first of all, this great merit: it is almost always interesting. Some may find traces of irritating arrogance, or undue familiarity, or affectation in the choice of words. I confess I like these faults, if they are faults. I like, for instance, this familiar, colloquial, everyday comparison, on page 74: "I have heard many people complain that fugues are dry; you might say, with equal reason, that demijohns are dry—some are and some are not—it all depends upon what is in them." It is also true that somebody is always a-talking or a-writing to Mr. Apthorp. It's Buelow, or Franz, or Lowell, or Dresel. But what was said is often worthy of repeating. It is very likely that Mr. Apthorp's intercourse with Mr. Dresel led him to value him extravagantly as a musical guide, philosopher and friend. But the enthusiasm evoked is a reward. The voice of Mr. Apthorp trembles and his face flushes when he speaks of the dead man and remembers what he said, and imagines what he might have said. He is also enthusiastic over Bach. "I know," says Mr. Apthorp, "that I can hardly open a volume of Bach without a certain feeling of superstitious terror." He talks prettily about "the sacred mysteries of Bach's art." "Donizetti and Bellini, the melodious exterior of whose music, beautiful as an archangel, but thinly veils the imperfect anatomy of a Mollusk, are already falling into oblivion. A Bach chorus is eternal." But why compare such dissimilar men, oh, Mr. Apthorp? Why plunge madly into such molluscan rhetoric? If your friend Bach, in his own day, had tried to write opera, he would have made a sorry mess of it. And why focus together men of such utterly different characters, purposes and times? Furthermore, you are not discriminating, you say a Bach chorus is "eternal." If you mean by this that it will live forever in the sense of the eternity of the finale of "The Passion Music According to Matthew," your proposition may easily be disputed. Some of Bach's music, much of it, is dull, dull beyond redemption. There are organ fugues and choral variations that even the adoring Haupt would not play or give to his pupils. He would frame some excuse; he would shake his head, take snuff, and turn the pages until he could conscientiously say: "But this, this is a masterpiece." No, Mr. Apthorp, there are many choruses by Bach that are simply daily spider-spinnings of counterpoint. You, however, seem to fall "nearly into the frame of mind of the French critic who wrote of Victor Hugo: 'Every one has his own way. As for me who speak here, I admire everything; like a brute.'" Stop a moment. Was it not Hugo himself who said this of Shakspeare in regard to a famous command of Falstaff?

In your article on Bach you say "The one point which differentiates the organ from all other instruments is that it has no accent, no power of emphasis. Its tone is dead." This is perhaps true to a certain degree, although much depends on how the instrument is played. They that have heard Haupt, Merkel, Guilmant, Gigout, Saint-Saens, Widor would not be likely to make this reproach.

"Some of his (Bach's) greater organ pieces have been arranged for orchestra: the Passacaglia in C minor and the Toccata in F." But it is not at all likely that the latter piece was written originally for the organ, and some of the acute students of Bach believe that the former was composed for a piano with two keyboards and a set of pedals.

The article "Additional Accomplishments to Bach's and Handel's Scores" will interest chiefly those who are willing to indulge in fisticuffs over a tradition or a breach of reverence, so-called. Here, Mr. Apthorp says, and his manner is cocky, "whether a musical phrase be played on an organ or on a clarinet, it still remains one and the same phrase." "Yes," or "no" may be the answer here. For the question of modification through color enters. To some the phrase would be a skeleton clothed by the organ in maiden white, but by the clarinet in robe of yellow or purple.

Of interest to all and of undoubted value to many is the opening article, "Musicians and Music Lovers," and full of shrewd, cool sense are the pages devoted to "Some thoughts on Musical Criticism." Mr. Apthorp pays a noble tribute to the memory of the late J. S. Dwight, a tribute of friendship and appreciation. Nor does his affection prevent him from telling the truth about Mr. Dwight's musical equipment: "Of specifically musical organization he had extremely little; his only native aptitude for the art consisted in what is commonly called 'a fair ear' and general aesthetic sensibility. It may be doubted whether he ever really studied music; his technical knowledge of the art was always slight. * * * He had a certain rather superficial knowledge of the rudiments of harmony. * * * He never developed anything that could fairly be called musical facility; he never handled musical notation with the ease of a craftsman, and always found some difficulty in following performances from the score, especially when things went at a rapid tempo. His naturally musical ear never developed to more than an average pitch of delicacy; technical slips seldom disturbed him, and 'rough performances' fully satisfied him, if only the right spirit was there."

Admirable, most admirable in many respects, although the reader may not sympathize always with the spirit or agree in the conclusions, are the articles on Meyerbeer and Offenbach. And yet the article on the supreme master of opera-bouffe, as great a genius in his way as Palestrina in his, or Wagner in his, is well-nigh brought to naught by an unaccountable, fatal, indecent, outrageous omission. "When he (Offenbach) tried to mount still higher in the scale, as in 'Barkouf' (1860) and 'Robinson Crusoe' (1867), he failed signally; he could not walk securely in the higher forms of composition." And you have never heard, Mr. Apthorp, of "Les Contes d'Hoffmann," an "opéra fantastique," first performed Feb. 10, 1881, at the Opéra-Comique, four months after the death of the composer? You may say that your article on Offenbach appeared originally in the International Review for March, 1881, and that it was written before the production of the said opera. But in your preface to this volume you state that the essay has been repeatedly ... enthusiastically in Berlin, associated in Vienna with the terrible tragedy of the Ring Theatre, played in the United States wretchedly and in a wretched version by the Soldene company, is not even mentioned by you, not even in a partial and hurried catalogue. And yet it was the one work on which Offenbach labored faithfully and with hope of immortality.

The critics of Berlin, who are not given to slopping over, spoke of pages in this strange, fascinating work as worthy of Mozart. Reyer, after hearing it, repented publicly of harsh things written by him in former years against the composer. In Hanslick's "Aus dem Opernleben der Gegenwart" (pp. 81-91) there is a careful and most appreciative review of this posthumous work. This "Contes d'Hoffmann" is to Offenbach what "William Tell" is to Rossini. "La Belle Hélene," like "Il Barbiere di Siviglia," is the more characteristic, more genial work; but in each case the more serious opera shows a musical strength and purpose that had been denied by carpers, and even by admirers. It is true that Offenbach left only the piano and voice arrangement, with copious indications for the instrumentation, and that Guiraud, following these instructions, prepared the work for performance; but the wealth of beautiful, gay and melancholy melody, the surprising richness and dramatic quality of harmony, the sustained dramatic power, as in the two trios of the third act, where Dr. Miracle invokes the demon's aid to induce Antonio to sing, although he knows that it will be her swan song, and rejoices with horrid joy, as she will thereby be separated eternally from Hoffmann—the ghastly trio of the men in the darkness, relieved at times by the electric sparks from the fiend's knuckles, the trio between the hesitating maiden, the demonical physician and the dead mother, who, from her portrait, urges Antonia to sing—these, in their full mastery of dramatic and musical technique, are the work of Offenbach. If you were to hear this most original work, Mr. Apthorp, you would rewrite that sentence on page 197.

***

There is much to admire and praise in this volume, and, if space allowed, it would be a pleasure to quote passage after passage that stated or suggested something of value. Mr. Apthorp, like a sensible man, knows that in criticism horizons shift. Woe to that man who always sees to the same inflexible boundary, never contradicts himself, never recants. Here is a book that will interest the amateur as well as the practical musician. And even he that reads about music and the drama only to be at ease in general conversation will find here an agreeable task and much that will be of profit to him, although in the reading he may be unconscious of instruction. It is a good thing for music, it is a good thing for Boston that Mr. Apthorp dwells here and writes.

PHILIP HALE.

The New York Recorder.

BY GEORGE W. TURNER.

FRIDAY, November 2, 1894.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ARTISTS

Their Season Opened Last Evening in the Metropolitan Opera House.

The Pulse of Passion Missed, but More Freshness and Fire than Last Season.

The Metropolitan Opera House is to be the scene of the operations of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season. Whether or not the big house had anything to do with the sonorous side of the case, certainly last night, at the first concert of the series, there was a marked improvement on the purely dynamic end of the story. Emil Paur, the conductor, not only looks more American, but he seemed warmer, more virile and less scholastic. One misses, naturally enough, the pulse of passion, but there is more freshness, more fire, than last season.

The programme was not so edifying as it looked. A symphony—his first—by the Italian composer Sgambate and a new overture by Karl Goldmark created a pleasant anticipation, which was not by any means realized. The symphony is weak structurally, although fairly warm in coloring. The overture called "Sappho" is most richly instrumented, yet displays a paucity of ideas that was disheartening. Goldmark has for years stood for all that is Semitic in music. But his "Sakuntala" and his "Phometheus" overtures represent his best say. He is not only distinctively influenced by his contemporaries, but he is more "up-to-date" than most of them, as he absorbs Mascagni and Brahms with equal facility. Of the Lesbian side of the music we saw very little. The Vale of Hebron and that warm place where the Venus of "Tannhauses" lived and loved were in evidence, but not anything more tangible in the way of originality.

The Symphony did not redeem the promise of its first start, although the last movement was energetic. There was a Serenata which was trivial and out of place. The slow movement was labored; the Scherzo of a conventional type with a touch of "diabelrie," put there by a student of modern masters. The "raison d'etre" of the horn-fanfare in the first movement was not apparent. Sgambuti, however, can be congratulated on penning always effective codas. He always comes in under the tapeline, as racing men would say, with great effect.

Gluck was represented by some pretty and well selected dance measures, and that arch-master of representation, Saint-Saens, by his symphonic poem, "Phaeton." M. Pol Planton was the singer. He was in superb form, and gave us an aria from Haydn's "Creation" and "Pogner's Addres." He made a distinct hit. Mr. Paur was well received, and the band played marvelously well.

American Art Journal.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, NOV. 3, 1894.

Baltimore's New Music Hall.

Baltimore, Md., Oct. 31, 1894.—Baltimore's new music hall was dedicated to-night in the presence of one of the largest audiences that have assembled herein many years. Thanks to the liberality and enterprise of a number of leading citizens, an edifice which artists pronounce the most complete in all its appointments of any music hall in the country has been erected. The auditorium is large enough to seat over 3,000 people, and the platform is sufficiently large to accommodate the largest orchestra without crowding. The auditorium is 110 feet in length, and upon the main floor are 1,100 movable seats, which can be done away with when open space is required for balls or other entertainments of a like nature. The platform, which is at the far end under the organ gallery, is ellipsical in shape. The Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Melba Concert Company provided the inaugural program.

Ten new faces are seen in the ranks of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season. All but two are string players at the "back desks." One, however, ought to fill a long felt want. He is the new first clarinet, M. Pourtau, formerly of the opera orchestra at Lyons. The French wood-wind players are noted for their elegance of style and their general technical certainty. If M. Pourtau comes up to the standard set by the other admirable French artists in the orchestra, Messrs. Mole and Sautet, he will be a valuable acquisition. The other new player is Herr Litke, bassoon, a former resident of this city.

[46]

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCVI., NO. 127.

SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 4, 1894.

The Symphony Orchestra on Its Travels.

Last Week of "1492" at the Tremont—Dan Daly in "Prince Pro Tem" at the Museum—The Melba Concerts This Week—Benefit for an Industrial School—Notes.

The Boston Symphony orchestra went on its first trip of the season last week, and appeared in Brooklyn, Washington, Baltimore, where it assisted at the opening of the magnificent new music hall, and New York. In all these places it was received with great enthusiasm, and its performances and its conductor were freely and cordially praised, except by the critics of the last named city. In fact, there was much of reserve in the comments of the New York press, which, though it was not lacking in praise, praised grudgingly as a whole. This, however, was expected, for the majority of the crtics of that city have for some reason or other resolved to be displeased with Mr. Paur, no need how brilliant may be the results he obtains from the splendid body of artists that he conducts. Mr. de Koven of the World concedes that the orchestra is still the best organization of its kind on this side the water, but the word "still" is used advisedly, for, as Mr. de Koven sapiently remarks: "Though Boston seems inclined to glorify Mr. Paur at the expense of former conductors, it can hardly be denied that this orchestra does not play as well as it did. There is, perhaps, little difference from a purely technical standpoint; rather would there seem to be now a lack of that entire sympathy between conductor and players, essential, if the best results are to be produced. The playing of the orchestra has certainly not gained in either precision or brilliancy under the present regime." From which may be derived the belief that Mr. de Koven still worships at the shrine of the faraway Nikisch, and yearns for that peculiar style of conducting that the new director of music at the Buda-Pesth opera house exemplified. It is difficult to understand how the orchestra should have lost anything in precision in its release from a conductor whose method of directing made precision almost impossible. While Mr. de Koven says that there is, perhaps, little difference in the performances of the orchestra from a purely technical standpoint, and that it certainly has not gained in brilliancy, Mr. Krehbiel of the Tribune says that it "played with incisive brilliancy and vigor, but not always with that technical finish which its hearers have been accustomed to. "As will be seen, the one observes a loss in brilliancy and a technique worthy praise, the other finds incisive brilliancy and a loss in technique. It is true that Mr. de Koven is, to some extent, a musician, and that Mr. Krehbiel is not, but both agree in finding fault with the orchestra, though they contradict each other. If the plan be, as it is strongly suspected to be, to "down" Mr. Paur in New York, there should be some agreement regarding the details, as far as fundamental principles are concerned.

Mr. Krehbiel does not say much of the performances, but he contrives to give a passing sneer at the conductor, in saying: "The programme, with the exception of the group of dances by Gluck, was made up of works of the most modern utterance in music—works in which Mr. Paur is most effective as an interpreter"; which means, if it means anything, that our conductor is not as happy in reading Mozart, Haydn, Beethoven, Schubert and Schumann as he is in reading the music of the present day. The compliment is decidedly a back-handed one. Mr. Henderson of the Times finds something more pleasant to say, and rises to rapture in the following fervid expressions of sentiment: "The Boston Symphony Orchestra is a great and abiding joy. True, its visits are few and far between, but it does come around every year, and those of us who are not suffering from local pride go and revel in the wealth of beauty it brings us. Think of 85 players with but a single thought; 85 instruments that breathe as one! It is simply overmastering. This grand and glorious orchestra is so full of power, so prodigal in the luxury of its tone-giving, so superb in the pulsating thunders of its attack, so gentle in the sighing of its pianissimo, that it fills the whole atmosphere of an auditorium with such a throbbing vitality of sound that every hearer breathes music and lives a symphony. One of their concerts is the very vintage of melody and harvest of harmony. The senuous embrace of the warm tone that surrounds one is in itself a musical experience of a lifetime. He is a cold man who can sit through one of their concerts unmoved." This is praise, indeed, despite the conflict between the singular and the plural number in some of the pronouns. "The vintage of melody and harvest of harmony" is good; as is also "pulsating thunders" and likewise "the sensuous embrace of the warm tone." However, Mr. Henderson was carried away by delight, and his resort to the rich rhetorical literary style of the emotional West may be forgiven. Then, too, he compliments Mr. Paur on his fine reading and the orchestra on its superb precision, its vigor and its tone. Mr. De Koven finds a falling off in precision; Mr. Henderson finds the vigor superb and he also finds the tonal quality of the strings clearer and purer than it was last season.

The musical critic of the Recorder discovered "a marked improvement on the purely dynamic end of the story," and waxes eloquent on Mr. Paur, of whom it is said, he "not only looks more American, but he seemed warmer, more virile and less scho[illegible] misses, naturally enough, the pulse of passion, but there is more freshness, more fire than last season." Why one should miss the pulse of passion, "naturally enough," is not explained, to say nothing of the alleged absence of this "pulse of passion," being something of a contradiction of Mr. Henderson's remarks about "throbbing vitality," "pulsating thunders," and "sensuous embrace of warm tone." The Recorder brings a [illegible] reminiscence of the race track [illegible] of the Scambati sym-

The New York Sun's comments on the orchestra are brief, and are chiefly confined to considerations of acoustics. The change of the place of performance from Carnegie Hall to the Metropolitan Opera House is thus lucidly discussed: "The body of tone was less concentrated and consequently less intense in volume and less marked in coloring and effect. Perhaps Mr. Paur has scarcely yet got the gauge of the Metropolitan's requirements. It is like the giant of childhood's tales, who had such an enormous appetite that Jack the Giant Killer stood amazed to witness his gastronomic capacity. The Opera House swallows up sound with extreme avidity, and if the Boston Symphony orchestra can make more forte their fortissimos their audiences will be more deeply impressed and better satisfied. It must not be construed that things did not go well last evening, however. One only missed the pithy centrality and strong focus and the sense of power and weight of tone which would obtain from the same playing in a smaller invironment where the sound would necessarily be less diffused." "Pithy centrality" and the allusion to Jack the Giant Killer are very felicitous, only it is to be regretted that nothing whatever is said of the performances of the orchestra.

The Evening Post says little of the orchestra's playing, contenting itself with the remark that the Boston orchestra and their conductor played Goldmark's "Sappho" overture and the "Phaeton" of Saint-Saens, "admirably," except that the climax of the latter, when "Jupiter smites the foolish charioteer with a thunderbolt, was much too tame." And by way of emphasizing his observation the critic thus drops into anecdotage: "We were once present at a rehearsal of the old Harvard Symphony orchestra in Boston when the director gave the cymbal-player directions to smash his instrument if necessary, adding that the society would pay for a new pair. In truth, the cymbals in this piece ought to be played by a Chinaman." Only this and nothing more, except that in writing of the scherzo of the Sgambati symphony, the critic says: "This scherzo is in quasi-waltz rhythm, which may be the reason why Mr. Paur produced it, for we know now that he dallies with dances. Possibly he would even commit the atrocity of playing a Strauss waltz, if it could be smuggled in as a symphonic movement." The alliterative phrase, "dallies with dances," is a bold plagiarism from Mr. Krehbiel's sneer of the week before; but wherein Mr. Paur has "dallied with dances" is a mystery in Boston.

Such is the pith of New York critical comments on the first concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, as far as it regards the orchestra and its playing. It is not very critical and not very generous, save in the case of Mr. Henderson; and much of it is very silly and strikingly ill-natured. However, the critical public was enthusiastic, and with it, Mr. Paur and his orchestra made an overwhelming success.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 7, 1894.

BOSTON VERSUS NEW YORK.

MR. H. E. KREHBIEL, the musical critic of the "Tribune," recently went to Boston, and when he came back he said in print things which stirred up his friends at the Hub. They replied to him with courteous incisiveness. It was not good of them to drop those sparks about the infrequency of Mr. Krehbiel's lectures in Boston; for how can Boston possibly stand in need of instruction from the lecture platform when every blessed and beautiful one of its twenty-four symphony concerts is illuminated by the clear sunlight of Mr. Apthorpe's program notes? Mr. Krehbiel went to Boston to lecture once upon a time, and even though the one and only Mrs. Jack attended each discourse and hung in mute rapture upon his accents, he returned to New York like Khem Singh in Kipling's "On the City Wall," and said, "It is no good out yonder." Westward the star of discourse turned its way. Mr. Krehbiel has a delightful route, extending from Cincinnati to Alton, Ill. If Boston can live without him, he can certainly live without Boston.

But there was really no good reason why the Bostonians should be so stirred up. Mr. Krehbiel merely confessed that he was unable to comprehend the grounds upon which musical judgments were formed in Boston. We take this to have been a most delicate tribute to the genius of the St. Botolphians. Their wisdom is like the peace of God, in that it passeth understanding. But Mr. Krehbiel's opinion is not necessarily that of all New York. There are others.

The critical judgment of the professional reviewers of New York and Boston, as a plain matter of fact, does not differ any more widely than does the critical judgment of the New Yorkers among themselves; and this declaration is made with a full estimate of the importance of the statements contained in the Boston "Transcript's" dissection of Mr. Krehbiel. The writer of this article, who certainly permitted his warmth of feeling to get the better of his memory, declared that in New York the critics were in the habit of co-operating in the formation of critical judgments. It was unfortunate, indeed, that almost on the heels of his assertion that "when you take up the 'Morning Trumpet' and read the judgment of this opera or that pianist, just appealing for metropolitan favors, you need rarely go further to learn the opinions of the guild," came the production of "Rob Roy" and the débuts of César Thomson and Marie Louise Bailey. The "Herald," "Times" and "World" were most hearty in their praise of the operetta; the "Tribune" was politely disappointed, and the "Sun" bitterly condemnatory. All the papers, except the "Tribune," were swift and emphatic in their approval of M. Thomson; but Mr. Krehbiel was not quite certain what he thought. This does not look as if there was any general agreement among the critics.

But our good friend of the "Transcript" is ignorant of one or two other interesting things, in regard to which we take pleasure in enlightening him. It is popularly supposed among musical persons that Krehbiel, of the "Tribune;" Finck, of the "Evening Post," and Henderson, of the "Times," form an alliance of fierce and determined Wagnerites. As a matter of fact, Mr. Krehbiel and Mr. Henderson differ radically on Wagnerian questions, as anyone can ascertain by reading their books. A year ago or more Mr. Finck and Mr. Henderson quarreled about the latter's review of the former's "Life of Wagner," and they have not spoken to one another since. Mr. Steinberg, of the "Herald," does not "train" with the other critics at all and never enters the press room of the opera house. Mr. De Koven, of the "World," writes his articles on a pad while sitting in his seat in the auditorium, and hence does not wait to hear the opinions of his confrères. It was unworthy of the dignity of a great newspaper like the Boston "Transcript" to assert that any person or any work is condemned or praised in New York at the suggestion of some one critic. Such stories are frequently told by disappointed virtuosi, who are astounded by the fact that American critics do not blindly follow the lead of certain amiable gentlemen in Leipsic, Vienna and Berlin. But THE MUSICAL COURIER knows the independence of the New York critics. They frequently disagree, and they are sometimes unanimously wrong. But they never form a cabal against any musician. They may be poor, but they are honest.

It has already been asserted in this article that the opinion of Mr. Krehbiel is not necessarily that of all New York. His assertion that this city hears more good music in a season than Boston did not mean that we hear better music. He meant simply what he said—that there are a greater number of good musical entertainments given in New York than in Boston. That this is true is not due to the existence of a finer musical taste here, but simply to the presence of a greater population and a larger wealth. If Messrs. Abbey, Schoeffel & Grau give fifty performances of opera here against a dozen there, it is because there are more wealthy people here to pay for them.

But we think that neither Mr. Krehbiel nor any other critic in this city will assert that we possess an orchestra superior in merit to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, or a quartet that surpasses that led by Mr. Kneisel. We pay for more than twenty-four orchestral concerts in one season and we hear more than two good quartets. We even pay for the pleasure of listening to our friends from Boston, and we are quite willing to admit that we pay for nothing that gives us a better return for our money. But our friends at the Hub will at least do us New Yorkers the justice to admit that we appreciate them, and therefore we must have a certain amount of musical taste behind our members and our bank accounts.

Boston is a good city. We have no sympathy with any New Yorker who assumes a patronizing air and lugs in references to "the provinces." Nothing can be more provincial than the assumption of such an attitude by a New Yorker. Boston is smaller than New York, but it is time that we Americans gave over measuring merit by size, And it would be more seemly in smaller cities to abandon their custom of flying to arms every time a New Yorker utters a criticism. They should remember that these outcries are confessions that our opinions have weight. The musical critics of Boston treated Mr. Krehbiel with altogether too much consideration; a paragraph would have been enough for him. Other men in New York, whose opinions are perhaps quite as valuable as his, delight in praising the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Boston musical taste and even Mr. Paur. THE MUSICAL COURIER gladly declares its belief in Boston. That city has a great deal of fine music, a goodly array of admirable performances, a strong corps of teachers, a notable body of young composers, a scholarly conductor, and a staff of critics who are gentlemen and good fellows, and who can never by any possible chance be suspected of agreeing in their judgments.

THE playing of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at their first concert last week displayed no especial difference from last season. Nor has Mr. Paur changed one iota in his methods of conducting. An extended review of the concert may be found elsewhere.

First Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

SGAMBATI'S first symphony in D is thirteen years and more of age. The work of a man in whom the scholastic predominates at the expense of the emotional, it nevertheless contains many interesting moments. It is sometime dramatic, it has color, the tonality is modern in its restlessness, and the work is unquestionably penned by a sound musician, yet it does not carry conviction, it does not give the impression of supreme mastery or of what the last generation called inspiration. Giovanni Sgambati, pianist pupil of Liszt, ardent student of modern music, somehow or other leaves the imagination unfired. In its entirety the symphony does not suggest coherence or concentration. In structure it is amorphous and its themes are not original. But there are the marks of the workman on it and enough of the surge of intellectual passion to render it a composition which demands our respect, even our admiration.

It was the "pièce de résistance" at the first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Metropolitan Opera House last Thursday evening.

The first movement, while not largely molded, has plenty of rhythmic life, nor is the treatment of the main ideas unfruitful. It is in the slow movement the composer betrays his lack of intensity and warmth. The scherzo and serenata which follow are well made, but the relevancy of the latter is not apparent. The finale is spirited and the ending is quite vigorous. In the work there is an odd blending of the conservatory and the stage. Sgambati is divided in his artistic ideals. Half a century ago he would have been a rigid classicist, rejecting unceremoniously the flowery temptations of the romantics. He has studied Schumann, Liszt and Brahms to good advantage. He works better in smaller forms, as evidenced in his quintets and other chamber music. His piano concerto is not very interesting.

Gluck was represented on the program by some classical dances from his operas. A tambourin from "Iphigenie en Aulide," a gavot from "Armide," and the grand chaconne from the first named opera and "Orphée" were played with taste and finish.

Saint-Saëns' symphonic poem, "Phaeton," lacked the climacteric point in Mr. Paur's reading. Technically it was well played, of course.

Goldmark's new overture, "Sappho." is only its creator's forty-fourth work, and is in the key of G flat. Its opening phrases for harp are Oriental and chant-like. But we soon are pitched overboard into a troubled sea. Goldmark's passion is Eastern and short lived. His big, sensuous cantabile theme, which is the apex of the tumultuous first subject, is truly Goldmarkian. The working out is interesting, and there is altogether a strong savor of romance in the overture, which, we believe, was played by Mr. Seidl last summer. It has not the freshness nor charm of several earlier works in the same form, but it was welcome, with its commanding manner and gorgeous orchestral garb, after the rather halting utterances of the muse of the Italian composer.

The solo singer of the evening was M. Pol Plançon, the French basso, who gave the "Laborer" aria from the "Seasons" and "Pogner's Address." His singing was, as usual, marked by taste and intelligence. He was in good voice.

The orchestra, which is always on its mettle while in this city, played with unusual freedom and warmth.

It is still the best permanent orchestra in the country, just as its conductor, Mr. Emil Paur, has still the same angular beat, the same cut and dried conception and the same non-magnetic personality. He is a drillmaster and not a great conductor. The next concert occurs December 6 with César Thomson as soloist.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCVI., NO. 127.
SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 4, 1894.

The Symphony Orchestra on Its Travels.

Last Week of "1492" at the Tremont—Dan Daly in "Prince Pro Tem" at the Museum—The Melba Concerts This Week—Benefit for an Industrial School—Notes.

The Boston Symphony orchestra went on its first trip of the season last week, and appeared in Brooklyn, Washington, Baltimore, where it assisted at the opening of the magnificent new music hall, and New York. In all these places it was received with great enthusiasm, and its performances and its conductor were freely and cordially praised, except by the critics of the last named city. In fact, there was much of reserve in the comments of the New York press, which, though it was not lacking in praise, praised grudgingly as a whole. This, however, was expected, for the majority of the critics of that city have for some reason or other resolved to be displeased with Mr. Paur, no heed how brilliant may be the results he obtains from the splendid body of artists that he conducts. Mr. de Koven of the World concedes that the orchestra is still the best organization of its kind on this side the water, but the word "still" is used advisedly, for, as Mr. de Koven saplently remarks: "Though Boston seems inclined to glorify Mr. Paur at the expense of former conductors, it can hardly be denied that this orchestra does not play as well as it did. There is, perhaps, little difference from a purely technical standpoint; rather would there seem to be now a lack of that entire sympathy between conductor and players, essential, if the best results are to be produced. The playing of the orchestra has certainly not gained in either precision or brilliancy under the present regime." From which may be derived the belief that Mr. de Koven still worships at the shrine of the faraway Nikisch, and yearns for that peculiar style of conducting that the new director of music at the Buda-Pesth opera house exemplified. It is difficult to understand how the orchestra should have lost anything in precision in its release from a conductor whose methods of directing made precision almost impossible. While Mr. de Koven says that there is, perhaps, little difference in the performances of the orchestra from a purely technical standpoint, and that it certainly has not gained in brilliancy, Mr. Krehbiel of the Tribune says that it "played with incisive brilliancy and vigor, but not always with that technical finish which its hearers have been accustomed to. "As will be seen, the one observes a loss in brilliancy and a technique worthy praise, the other finds incisive brilliancy and a loss in technique. It is true that Mr. de Koven is, to some extent, a musician, and that Mr. Krehbiel is not, but both agree in finding fault with the orchestra, though they contradict each other. If the plan be, as it is strongly suspected to be, to "down" Mr. Paur in New York, there should be some agreement regarding the details, as far as fundamental principles are concerned.

Mr. Krehbiel does not say much of the performances, but he contrives to give a passing sneer at the conductor, in saying: "The programme, with the exception of the group of dances by Gluck, was made up of works of the most modern utterance in music—works in which Mr. Paur is most effective as an interpreter"; which means, if it means anything, that our conductor is not as happy in reading Mozart, Haydn, Beethoven, Schubert and Schumann as he is in reading the music of the present day. The compliment is decidedly a back-handed one. Mr. Henderson of the Times finds something more pleasant to say, and rises to rapture in the following fervid expressions of sentiment: "The Boston Symphony Orchestra is a great and abiding joy. True, its visits are few and far between, but it does come around every year, and those of us who are not suffering from local pride go and revel in the wealth of beauty it brings us. Think of 85 players with but a single thought; 85 instruments that breathe as one! It is simply overmastering. This grand and glorious orchestra is so full of power, so prodigal in the luxury of its tone-giving, so superb in the pulsating thunders of its attack, so gentle in the sighing of its pianissimo, that it fills the whole atmosphere of an auditorium with such a throbbing vitality of sound that every hearer breathes music and lives a symphony. One of their concerts is the very vintage of melody and harvest of harmony. The senuous embrace of the warm tone that surrounds one is in itself a musical experience of a lifetime. He is a cold man who can sit through one of their concerts unmoved." This is praise, indeed, despite the conflict between the singular and the plural number in some of the pronouns. "The vintage of melody and harvest of harmony" is good; as is also "pulsating thunders" and likewise "the sensuous embrace of the warm tone." However, Mr. Henderson was carried away by delight, and his resort to the rich rhetorical literary style of the emotional West may be forgiven. Then, too, he compliments Mr. Paur on his fine reading and the orchestra on its superb precision, its vigor and its tone. Mr. De Koven finds a falling off in precision; Mr. Henderson finds the vigor superb and he also finds the tonal quality of the strings clearer and purer than it was last season.

The musical critic of the Recorder discovered "a marked improvement on the purely dynamic end of the story," and waxes eloquent on Mr. Paur, of whom it is said, he "not only looks more American, but he seemed warmer, more virile and less scho[illegible] misses, naturally enough, the pulse of passion, but there is more freshness, more fire than last season." Why one should miss the pulse of passion, "naturally enough," is not explained, to say nothing of the alleged absence of this "pulse of passion," being something of a contradiction of Mr. Henderson's remarks about "throbbing vitality," "pulsating thunders," and "sensuous embrace of warm tone." The Recorder brings a pleasing reminiscence of the race track into its notice of the Sgambati sym-congratulated on penning always effective codas. He always comes in under the tape line, as racing men would say, with great effect." It is probable that such playfully critical remarks gave rise to a prevailing belief that the musical criticisms in some of the metropolitan journals are written by the sporting editor.

The New York Sun's comments on the orchestra are brief, and are chiefly confined to considerations of acoustics. The change of the place of performance from Carnegie Hall to the Metropolitan Opera House is thus lucidly discussed: "The body of tone was less concentrated and consequently less intense in volume and less marked in coloring and effect. Perhaps Mr. Paur has scarcely yet got the gauge of the Metropolitan's requirements. It is like the giant of childhood's tales, who had such an enormous appetite that Jack the Giant Killer stood amazed to witness his gastronomic capacity. The Opera House swallows up sound with extreme avidity, and if the Boston Symphony orchestra can make more forte their fortissimos their audiences will be more deeply impressed and better satisfied. It must not be construed that things did not go well last evening, however. One only missed the pithy centrality and strong focus and the sense of power and weight of tone which would obtain from the same playing in a smaller invironment where the sound would necessarily be less diffused." "Pithy centrality" and the allusion to Jack the Giant Killer are very felicitous, only it is to be regretted that nothing whatever is said of the performances of the orchestra.

The Evening Post says little of the orchestra's playing, contenting itself with the remark that the Boston orchestra and their conductor played Goldmark's "Sappho" overture and the "Phaeton" of Saint-Saens, "admirably," except that the climax of the latter, when "Jupiter smites the foolish charioteer with a thunderbolt, was much too tame." And by way of emphasizing his observation the critic thus drops into anecdotage: "We were once present at a rehearsal of the old Harvard Symphony orchestra in Boston when the director gave the cymbal-player directions to smash his instrument if necessary, adding that the society would pay for a new pair. In truth, the cymbals in this piece ought to be played by a Chinaman." Only this and nothing more, except that in writing of the scherzo of the Sgambati symphony, the critic says: "This scherzo is in quasi-waltz rhythm, which may be the reason why Mr. Paur produced it, for we know now that he dallies with dances. Possibly he would even commit the atrocity of playing a Strauss waltz, if it could be smuggled in as a symphonic movement." The alliterative phrase, "dallies with dances," is a bold plagiarism from Mr. Krehbiel's sneer of the week before; but wherein Mr. Paur has "dallied with dances" is a mystery in Boston.

Such is the pith of New York critical comments on the first concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, as far as it regards the orchestra and its playing. It is not very critical and not very generous, save in the case of Mr. Henderson; and much of it is very silly and strikingly ill-natured. However, the critical public was enthusiastic, and with it, Mr. Paur and his orchestra made an overwhelming success.

The Musical Courier.
NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 7, 1894.

BOSTON VERSUS NEW YORK.

MR. H. E. KREHBIEL, the musical critic of the "Tribune," recently went to Boston, and when he came back he said in print things which stirred up his friends at the Hub. They replied to him with courteous incisiveness. It was not good of them to drop those sparks about the infrequency of Mr. Krehbiel's lectures in Boston; for how can Boston possibly stand in need of instruction from the lecture platform when every blessed and beautiful one of its twenty-four symphony concerts is illuminated by the clear sunlight of Mr. Apthorpe's program notes? Mr. Krehbiel went to Boston to lecture once upon a time, and even though the one and only Mrs. Jack attended each discourse and hung in mute rapture upon his accents, he returned to New York like Khem Singh in Kipling's "On the City Wall," and said, "It is no good out yonder." Westward the star of discourse turned its way. Mr. Krehbiel has a delightful route, extending from Cincinnati to Alton, Ill. If Boston can live without him, he can certainly live without Boston.

But there was really no good reason why the Bostonians should be so stirred up. Mr. Krehbiel merely confessed that he was unable to comprehend the grounds upon which musical judgments were formed in Boston. We take this to have been a most delicate tribute to the genius of the St. Botolphians. Their wisdom is like the peace of God, in that it passeth understanding. But Mr. Krehbiel's opinion is not necessarily that of all New York. There are others.

The critical judgment of the professional reviewers of New York and Boston, as a plain matter of fact, does not differ any more widely than does the critical judgment of the New Yorkers among themselves; and this declaration is made with a full estimate of the importance of the statements contained in the Boston "Transcript's" dissection of Mr. Krehbiel. The writer of this article, who certainly permitted his warmth of feeling to get the better of his memory, declared that in New York the critics were in the habit of co-operating in the formation of critical judgments. It was unfortunate, indeed, that almost on the heels of his assertion that "when you take up the 'Morning Trumpet' and read the judgment of this opera or that pianist, just appealing for metropolitan favors, you need rarely go further to learn the opinions of the guild," came the production of "Rob Roy" and the débuts of César Thomson and Marie Louise Bailey. The "Herald," "Times" and "World" were most hearty in their praise of the operetta; the "Tribune" was politely disappointed, and the "Sun" bitterly condemnatory. All the papers, except the "Tribune," were swift and emphatic in their approval of M. Thomson; but Mr. Krehbiel was not quite certain what he thought. This does not look as if there was any general agreement among the critics.

But our good friend of the "Transcript" is ignorant of one or two other interesting things, in regard to which we take pleasure in enlightening him. It is popularly supposed among musical persons that Krehbiel, of the "Tribune;" Finck, of the "Evening Post," and Henderson, of the "Times," form an alliance of fierce and determined Wagnerites. As a matter of fact, Mr. Krehbiel and Mr. Henderson differ radically on Wagnerian questions, as anyone can ascertain by reading their books. A year ago or more Mr. Finck and Mr. Henderson quarreled about the latter's review of the former's "Life of Wagner," and they have not spoken to one another since. Mr. Steinberg, of the "Herald," does not "train" with the other critics at all and never enters the press room of the opera house. Mr. De Koven, of the "World," writes his articles on a pad while sitting in his seat in the auditorium, and hence does not wait to hear the opinions of his confrères. It was unworthy of the dignity of a great newspaper like the Boston "Transcript" to assert that any person or any work is condemned or praised in New York at the suggestion of some one critic. Such stories are frequently told by disappointed virtuosi, who are astounded by the fact that American critics do not blindly follow the lead of certain amiable gentlemen in Leipsic, Vienna and Berlin. But THE MUSICAL COURIER knows the independence of the New York critics. They frequently disagree, and they are sometimes unanimously wrong. But they never form a cabal against any musician. They may be poor, but they are honest.

It has already been asserted in this article that the opinion of Mr. Krehbiel is not necessarily that of all New York. His assertion that this city hears more good music in a season than Boston did not mean that we hear better music. He meant simply what he said—that there are a greater number of good musical entertainments given in New York than in Boston. That this is true is not due to the existence of a finer musical taste here, but simply to the presence of a greater population and a larger wealth. If Messrs. Abbey, Schoeffel & Grau give fifty performances of opera here against a dozen there, it is because there are more wealthy people here to pay for them.

But we think that neither Mr. Krehbiel nor any other critic in this city will assert that we possess an orchestra superior in merit to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, or a quartet that surpasses that led by Mr. Kneisel. We pay for more than twenty-four orchestral concerts in one season and we hear more than two good quartets. We even pay for the pleasure of listening to our friends from Boston, and we are quite willing to admit that we pay for nothing that gives us a better return for our money. But our friends at the Hub will at least do us New Yorkers the justice to admit that we appreciate them, and therefore we must have a certain amount of musical taste behind our members and our bank accounts.

Boston is a good city. We have no sympathy with any New Yorker who assumes a patronizing air and lugs in references to "the provinces." Nothing can be more provincial than the assumption of such an attitude by a New Yorker. Boston is smaller than New York, but it is time that we Americans gave over measuring merit by size, And it would be more seemly in smaller cities to abandon their custom of flying to arms every time a New Yorker utters a criticism. They should remember that these outcries are confessions that our opinions have weight. The musical critics of Boston treated Mr. Krehbiel with altogether too much consideration; a paragraph would have been enough for him. Other men in New York, whose opinions are perhaps quite as valuable as his, delight in praising the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Boston musical taste and even Mr. Paur. THE MUSICAL COURIER gladly declares its belief in Boston. That city has a great deal of fine music, a goodly array of admirable performances, a strong corps of teachers, a notable body of young composers, a scholarly conductor, and a staff of critics who are gentlemen and good fellows, and who can never by any possible chance be suspected of agreeing in their judgments.

THE playing of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at their first concert last week displayed no especial difference from last season. Nor has Mr. Paur changed one iota in his methods of conducting. An extended review of the concert may be found elsewhere.

First Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

SGAMBATI'S first symphony in D is thirteen years and more of age. The work of a man in whom the scholastic predominates at the expense of the emotional, it nevertheless contains many interesting moments. It is sometime dramatic, it has color, the tonality is modern in its restlessness, and the work is unquestionably penned by a sound musician, yet it does not carry conviction, it does not give the impression of supreme mastery or of what the last generation called inspiration. Giovanni Sgambati, pianist pupil of Liszt, ardent student of modern music, somehow or other leaves the imagination unfired. In its entirety the symphony does not suggest coherence or concentration. In structure it is amorphous and its themes are not original. But there are the marks of the workman on it and enough of the surge of intellectual passion to render it a composition which demands our respect, even our admiration.

It was the "pièce de résistance" at the first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Metropolitan Opera House last Thursday evening.

The first movement, while not largely molded, has plenty of rhythmic life, nor is the treatment of the main ideas unfruitful. It is in the slow movement the composer betrays his lack of intensity and warmth. The scherzo and serenata which follow are well made, but the relevancy of the latter is not apparent. The finale is spirited and the ending is quite vigorous. In the work there is an odd blending of the conservatory and the stage. Sgambati is divided in his artistic ideals. Half a century ago he would have been a rigid classicist, rejecting unceremoniously the flowery temptations of the romantics. He has studied Schumann, Liszt and Brahms to good advantage. He works better in smaller forms, as evidenced in his quintets and other chamber music. His piano concerto is not very interesting.

Gluck was represented on the program by some classical dances from his operas. A tambourin from "Iphigenie en Aulide," a gavot from "Armide," and the grand chaconne from the first named opera and "Orphée" were played with taste and finish.

Saint-Saëns' symphonic poem, "Phaeton," lacked the climacteric point in Mr. Paur's reading. Technically it was well played, of course.

Goldmark's new overture, "Sappho," is only its creator's forty-fourth work, and is in the key of G flat. Its opening phrases for harp are Oriental and chant-like. But we soon are pitched overboard into a troubled sea. Goldmark's passion is Eastern and short lived. His big, sensuous cantabile theme, which is the apex of the tumultuous first subject, is truly Goldmarkian. The working out is interesting, and there is altogether a strong savor of romance in the overture, which, we believe, was played by Mr. Seidl last summer. It has not the freshness nor charm of several earlier works in the same form, but it was welcome, with its commanding manner and gorgeous orchestral garb, after the rather halting utterances of the muse of the Italian composer.

The solo singer of the evening was M. Pol Plançon, the French basso, who gave the "Laborer" aria from the "Seasons" and "Pogner's Address." His singing was, as usual, marked by taste and intelligence. He was in good voice.

The orchestra, which is always on its mettle while in this city, played with unusual freedom and warmth.

It is still the best permanent orchestra in the country, just as its conductor, Mr. Emil Paur, has still the same angular beat, the same cut and dried conception and the same non-magnetic personality. He is a drillmaster and not a great conductor. The next concert occurs December 6 with César Thomson as soloist.

Hartford Post.

Largest Circulation of any Republican Paper in Connecticut.

Hartford, Tuesday, Nov. 6, 1894.

THE KNEISEL CONCERT.

Greatly Enjoyed by a Cultured Audience Yesterday Afternoon.

Mr. Kneisel's Famous Stradiuarius Violin, and the Other Noted Instruments.

This celebrated Kneisel quartette, which is named after its famous leader Franz Kneisel made its first appearance before a Hartford audience for the season of 1894 yesterday afternoon, and in spite of the severe storm, which raged all the afternoon, a good audience had assembled to greet it This quartette has established itself in the affections of Hartford music-lovers through its former visits and its performance of yesterday only strengthened and intensified the high regard in which it is held.

The opening number on the programme was Beethoven's B flat major quartette, opus 18, and was played with that rare delicacy of treatment and conscientious adherence to the composer's idea which is a characteristic of this famous club. The second number, the D flat major quartette by Sgambati, was new to most Hartford people and aroused a high degree of enthusiasm by its original and masterly construction, as well as by its wonderful performance. This work calls for the highest perfection of technical skill and the quartette showed itself fully equal to its requirements. The most enthusiastic applause following each movement, testified to the great delight it afforded the cultured audience present. The final number was Hayden's well-known G major quartette, opus 77 and was a worthy finale to a most interesting and highly instructive programme.

Franz Kneisel, the leader of the quartette, played for the first time in Hartford, upon a celebrated violin, which has but just come into his possession. It is by the king of all Cremonese violin makers, Antonius Stradiuarius and was made in 1717. It belonged to the former teacher of Mr. Kneisel, Professor Gruen of Vienna, and Mr. Kneisel made a visit to his teacher this summer for the express purpose of securing this instrument which has been known to him for many years. It took a deal of persuasion and a large amount of money to accomplish its possession but the high esteem in which Mr. Kneisel is held by Professor Gruen together with $5,000 in cash paid for the instrument, accomplished the object of his journey.

Mr. Kneisel is in raptures over the possession of such a rare instrument and those who heard its delicious singing quality of tone at yesterday's concert can understand his feeling, its pure and far-reaching tone being apparent to every one.

This quartette is famed for the fine instruments possessed by its members as well as for its artistic performances, Mr. Schroeder the 'cellist possessing a remarkably fine specimen of the work of Nicholas Amati, the predecessor and master of Stradiuarius, upon which he played yesterday. Mr. Svecenski the viola player possesses a remarkably unique and ancient specimen of the Cremonese school whose tone no one who has heard the quartette will soon forget, while Mr. Roth the second violin, plays upon Mr. Kneisel's former instrument, an old and fine one.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, NOV. 11, 1894.

The hearing provided for the chamber music of Sgambati by the Kneisel Quartette at their first concert of the season was soon succeeded by an opportunity for becoming acquainted with his orchestral music as illustrated in his first symphony, inasmuch as that work occupied the central position on Mr. Paur's fourth programme. It was listened to with close attention and apparently made a very favorable impression, although the hesitancy of the Symphony audiences to commit themselves outright according to their real likes and dislikes always renders it difficult to be sure what they actually feel in regard to a new work which comes to them without any particular label or commendation.

Allowance made for the vaster and stronger scheme of symphonic composition, one derives from a single hearing of this work notions akin to those received from the string quartette. A tentative and doubtful state of mood and fancy apparently supplied the creative impulse, which finds its full scope for speech and expression in a large, various, rich and potent orchestration, free from tricks and whims, individual enough in spite of some suggestions of admiration for the modern German school and some traces of the influence of Berlioz and even of Gounod, and courage enough to dare to be rude in form and rough in tone upon occasion.

As was said in our remarks upon the quartette, Sgambati is one of the men who think and feel, who walk slowly, are more careful than prolific, and yet may be obscure and illogical simply because the time of full command of themselves and their means has not arrived. Of this last condition they may not be aware, imagining that what signifies to them meaning and purpose must convey these to others with corresponding definiteness.

In this symphony, first performed in Rome about thirteen years ago, it is easy to find its author's nationality, in spite of his respect for forms into which the music of his country is only just beginning to mould itself. The fondness for melody, the free flow and sensitive spirit of the airs, whether they be gay and pulsing briskly, as in the scherzo, or pleasingly melancholy and musingly amorous, as in the andante and serenade,—the calm gravity, as of solemn services, and the delight in beautiful tones drawn from the most favorable registers of the instruments, are all distinctively Italian. So too is the erratic, episodic and occasionally surprising course of the first movement; for the more advanced Italian writers even of songs have for a good many years evinced a disposition to break their regular rhythms with sudden ejaculatory phrases which have a wonderfully dramatic effect when properly uttered, but seem quite irrelevant to the general plan of the song. For this movement seems almost—and we do not mean the comparison to be a petty one—like a condensed opera, in its queer, brief irruptions of violent phrases into smoothly going passages, its climaxes which do not conclude, and its bland pages which shift without warning into other pages of vehement assertiveness. Nor is it at all unreasonable that if the influence of the better kinds of religious music should be recognizable in portions of Sgambati's writing, that of the strongest emotional school should also be felt there.

The finale is akin to the first movement in its multiciplicity of themes, its frequent interpolation of by-thoughts and its unexpected deductions from announced premisses. It has vigor and strength, and it ends with a good appeal to enthusiasm in the listener. The great beauties of the symphony and the best suggestions of its composer's personality are to be found in the middle movements. There are in these deep tenderness, unaffected pathos, pure song, sportiveness and real melody, while there is almost nothing harsh, ugly or abrupt.

The instrumentation is almost always masterly, and the composer's affection for what is mellifluous is constantly illustrated by his skill in bringing not only the lower voices of the orchestra in prominence, but in using their deepest registers to emphasize an idea or to give a mood fulness and impressiveness.

The programme began with that vigorous, peculiar and entertaining overture to "The Sold Bride" of Smetana, about which one would be glad to know more than merely its author's name. If the overture represents the opera and is a true prelude to it, the story ought to be exciting and the action full of busy contrasts; for the tremendous activity of the brilliant fugal passages, and the gentle episodes which are let into the vehement ensembles, almost portentous with unisons and octaves, indicate a drama of strong contrasts and energetic exposition.

The only other number was the first of the suites arranged by Bizet from his music to Daudet's "L'Arlesienne." This included the Prelude, with its sturdy, emphatic march and its softer, slower measures; the Minuet; the brief little Adagio for the muted strings and the lively, stirring Carillon and it is always a favorite.

The virtuosity of the orchestra was [especially displayed in the overture, portions of which were taken at an almost breakneck pace and carried through without a stumble or a check, each group of players in turn making capitally the odd little crescendo in the long first theme, but none—and the same is to be said of them all in union—ever getting quite down to the pianissimi on which the effects depend for their extreme value.

Mr. Paur's intelligence, excellent intention and firmness did well by the symphony, so that if any oddities perplexed or any disagreeable bits displeased; the composer and not he was to be blamed, while it certainly seemed as if all which could be made of the work as a whole was derived from it.

The Bizet also had an admirable rendering, although more softness of touch and more delicacy of tone would have improved the adagio, which ought to be very nigh to the evanescent in its effect.

The opportunities for the direct appearance of leading instruments happened to be unusually numerous in this programme and it was most agreeable to observe the fine tone and the artistic phrasing of the new first clarinet and bassoon, while the rarely heard voice of the saxophone was most obedient to Mr. Strasser's skill.

The next programme stands thus:—Mozart's E-flat symphony; Peter Benoit's symphonic poem for flute and orchestra, to be heard for the first time. Mr. Mole being the soloist; the entr'-acte from Schubert's "Rosamunde;" the B-minor Schubert march in Liszt's orchestral arangement, and Auber's "Carlo Broschi" overture.

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

PUBLISHED EVERY [illegible]

VOL. X. VI., NO. 1[illegible]

SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 11, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Sgambati's Work Finely Read and Brilliantly Played.

This Symphony Heard for the First Time Here—It Is Stronger in Treatment Than in Invention—The Delightful Smetana Overture and the Exquisite Bizet Suite.

The concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall, last night, was an exceptionally interesting one. The programme was:

Overture, "The Sold Bride".....Smetana
Symphony No. 1, D major, op. 16....Sgambati
Suite, "L'Arlesienne," No. 1.....Bizet

The symphony was heard for the first time at these concerts. It is much clearer and much more genial than is the quartet by the same composer, recently performed by the Kneisel quartet, but the composer seems to be constantly struggling toward a point that he as constantly fails to reach. The work is more positive in intention than it is in achievement, and yet it is steadily interesting, owing to the fine workmanship and the independent originality that mark it. In some respects it does violence to the generally received idea of what a symphony should be, but it is wholly symphonic in character, as far as dignity of style, high aim and seriousness of treatment are concerned. Unfortunately, when all is over, no very deep or abiding impression has been made and a feeling prevails that the work as a whole is hollow—is without pith; in fact, to compare large things with small, it suggests a pie, of which the upper crust and the bottom layer are of the very best puff paste, but without any filling between them. Here and there are fragments of melody that are exquisite in their grace and delicacy, and in the fourth movement a serenata that takes something of the form of an elaborate introduction to the finale. Here is an accompaniment that on its first appearance is almost alarmingly suggestive of a familiar figure in conventional Italian opera scores; but the composer uses it so ingeniously and so effectively that he escapes anything resembling a realization of the apparent threat of sinking into vulgar commonplace. The orchestration is very brilliant and masterly throughout, and taxes the performers to the utmost, especially the wind; but the distinctive qualities of the different instruments are never lost sight of and their capacities are never abused, while the scoring is always faultlessly clear.

The opening movement is the most elaborate and the most carefully worked out. It is prolific in charming movements for the wood wind, but they lead to nowhere in particular, and seem to be produced for the effect they produce rather than because they are any logical outcome of the underlying design of the movement. The andante is broad in style and dignified in effect, but its themes are vague in both structure and development, such charm as the movement has, lying in its rich, if sombre, instrumentation. The scherzo is piquant, picturesque and strikingly new, and is peculiarly interesting for its rhythmic swing and for its fresh and graceful trio, with its elaborate and beautiful scoring. The serenata, already alluded to, is full of the spirit of refined romance, but is somewhat unsatisfying by reason of its uncertain tonality. The finale is pervaded by fire and impetuosity and occasionally reaches to a power almost thrilling, the orchestration again, even in its most tumultuous striving after climax upon climax, showing the most perfect clearness, the whole culminating with splendid brilliancy. Still, notwithstanding there is so much to admire in the work and the finish that marks it in every technical essential, it is stronger in treatment than in invention, and has the aspect of a colossal sketch rather than that of a complete and well-rounded whole. There is much in it that conveys the impression of a series of well conceived episodes, interesting instrumentally, and that have been carefully pieced together, but without fully concealing the points at which they are joined. It is thoroughly of the modern school, but although Sgambati's artistic affiliations are known to be strongly German, the symphony suggests the more advanced contemporary music of France than it does that of the fatherland. It shows the great progress that has been made in instrumental music in Italy, and it was well that it was accorded a hearing here for that reason. No such important work for the orchestra has been written by an Italian since the day of Cherubini, and with all its shortcomings no symphony of such general worth has been produced by any living composer except Brahms. It was finely read by Mr. Paur and brilliantly played by the orchestra. Once more the great improvement that has been made in the wood wind this season made itself felt in the fine body and admirable balance of tone, as well as in the precision that distinguished the playing of the florid and difficult passages written for this element of the orchestra.

The spirited and delightful Smetana overture was given in a manner that reflected honor on both the strings and the wood wind. The Bizet suite continues to grow on further acquaintance. It is exquisite music, alike in conception and treatment. Mr. Paur was particularly happy in his reading of the work throughout, notably in the lovely andante of the first number, which was taken at a pace that permitted the saxophone solo to be heard to the best advantage, and with the effect intended by the composer. The dainty minuet was interpreted with peculiar felicity, and nothing could have been more refined in its grace and delicacy than the rendering of the tender adagietto. In fact, the performance of the orchestra through the whole concert presented no opportunity for even the most confirmed fault finder to exercise his gifts in that capacity. The applause through the evening was frequent and heartily appreciative. The symphony was well received, and it was evident that it made a very favorable impression.

The programme for the next concert is: Symphony, E flat, Mozart; symphonic poem for flute and orchestra, Peter Benoit (first time); entr'acte from "Rosamunde," Schubert; march in B minor, Schubert-Liszt; overture, "Le Part du Diable," Auber. Mr. Charles Mole is to be the soloist.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, NOV. 11.

The Symphony Concert.

The fourth Symphony concert called forth a large audience to hear the following programme:

Overture, Die verkaufte Braut.....Smetana
Symphony No, 1.....Sgambati
Suite L' Arlesieane No. 1.....Bizet

The Sgambati symphony is a large work, not always faithful to set forms, and suggestive of modern iconoclasm in its strivings after strange effects, and its excessive devotion to orchestration as a something to be worshipped for itself rather than a fitting accompaniment to ideas. And yet there is no lack of ideas in the symphony, and they are worthy of being developed; but it may be objected that the development is over-obtrusive. Modern musicians seem to have lost the skill and art of saying anything quietly; like a woman's letter, modern music is all unduly italicized, very frequently to draw attention to ideas that should, from their insignificance, be allowed to remain in the background. A sense of repose, an absence of all evidence of effort, a proper balance of effect, an appropriate gradation of colors are all essential to the highest works of art, and yet they are generally missing in modern music. The typical present day symphony is a restless striving after novelties; excessive and yet vague groping for striking effects; an early using up of all the contrasts of which an orchestra is capable, and a consequent monotony in repeating what has already been done; a never-ending restlessness, for which there is no reason, and an over-abundance of ornamentation for which there is no excuse. These defects (others may call them virtues) are all apparent in a greater or less degree in Sgambati's symphony. There are always interesting points to keep the attention fixed and to stimulate curiosity; there are also positive beauties that arouse enthusiasm and are dwelt on lovingly by memory; but the expenditure of nerve force is in excess, and what should be a long pleasure is a short luxury, interrupted by a long pain. There are but few contrasts, by means of which exhaustive nerve tissue has the opportunity to repair itself, and so prepare for fresh stimulation; the one species of stimulation is kept up without pause, and ever-worked nerves rebel. The symphony is the work of a symphony-maker, who is a musician, and not the work of a musician whose large ideas flow in symphonic dimensions. It is artificial in that it is a reflection of Sgambati's German studies; what he has learned is far more prominent than what he has felt, and as the result of allowing knowledge to take the place of inspiration, he is sometimes diffuse, sometimes unmeaning, and sometimes even dull. There is no evidence of self-restraint or of reserve power; there is rather the garrulousness of the pedant who delights to dwell on the small things of his loved art or science, and who gives us microscopic measurements when we ask for aerial perspective and barbarous high-sounding nomenclature when we are seeking for the beauties of nature. The first movement seems desirous of saying something whose meaning we miss, then it sought to do by force what would not be done by gentleness. It suggested a savage trying to make himself understood in a partially understood civilized language. The second movement, andante mesto was beautiful in subject and in treatment filled with fine fancies developed in the most delicate manner with an exquisite sense of artistic proportion and contrasts. The scherzo is heavy, the serenata somewhat commonplace in theme and over elaborate in ornament, a struggle after simplicity that ends in affectation. The finale is brilliant, and the working out of the very finest quality. From a technical viewpoint it is a fine and most elaborate piece of work.

Mr. Paur conducted the symphony with fine direction and with faultless taste. The interpretation of the Smetana overture and of the Bizet suite was delightful, the delicate playing of the minuetto and adagio in the latter work winning for Mr. Paur and his orchestra the most enthusiastic applause.

The programme for the next concert is the Mozart Symphony in E-flat; a Symphonic Poem (first time) by Peter Benoit; Schumann's Entr'acte from "Rosamunde"; the Schubert-Liszt March in B-minor, and Auber's "Carlo Broschi" overture. The soloist is Mr. Charles Mole.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, NOV. 11, 1894.

The Fourth Symphony.

The usual large audience crowded Music hall last evening, and with the customary well-considered applause gave evidence of enjoying the program provided by director Paur for the fourth of this season's symphony concerts. Variety was not a feature of the program, and the concert was unusually short, but no one was ever yet heard to complain of the briefness of a symphony. These were the selections played: Overture to "The Sold Bride," Bedrich Smetana; symphony No. 1, in D major, op 16, Giovanni Sgambati; "L'Arlesienne," orchestral suite No. 1, Georges Bizet.

The symphony was heard here for the first time. It is a pretentious scholarly composition, and is notable for occasional brilliancy in scoring and uniqueness in harmonic effects. In style Sgambati's symphony is suggestive of the modern Italian school, a school which shows the strong influence of German composers in orchestral works. There are several passages for strings in the second movement which might readily have suggested to Mascagui some of the most beautiful effects in his "Cavalleria Rusticana." This suggestion is, however, no discredit to Mascagui, the resemblance is only such as may be expected from writers of the same school. The symphony was first played in Rome, March, 1881.

Of the five movements the first and second, allegro and andante, are the most interesting. There are several delicious melodies in the allegro, also some very dainty effects are gained by the clarinets and violas playing a little sighing, chromatic figure against a novel, twittering accompaniment by the violins and flutes. Another pleasing feature of this movement is an exquisite passage for the horns. The horns are given considerable prominence throughout the symphony, and as played yesterday it was a treat to hear them. The solo horn was particularly well played.

The second movement is interesting chiefly because of the fanciful treatment of a variety of wonderful little themes and the effective introduction of an impressive choral melody. The scherzo is not devoid of duiness, and the serenade, or fourth movement, would be tiresome were it not for a guitar like accompaniment by the strings, which is interesting because of its novelty if for nothing more. The brilliant finale is elaborately scored. A splendid performance was given by the orchestra.

The several charming numbers of Bizet's orchestral suite were exquisitely played, and were immensely enjoyed by the audience. Particularly pleasing was the minuet, in the performance of which the precision of the violin players was shown to great advantage.

Mr Chas. Mole will be the soloist at the next concert, when the program will be as follows:

Symphony in E-flat .....Mozart
Symphonic poem, for flute and orchestra .....Peter Benoit
(First time.)
Entr'acte from "Rosamunde" .....Schubert
March in B minor .....Schubert-Liszt
Overture, "Carlo Broschi" .....Auber

[48]

The Hartford Post.

Largest Circulation of any Republican Paper in Connecticut.

Hartford, Tuesday, Nov. 6, 1894.

THE KNEISEL CONCERT.

Greatly Enjoyed by a Cultured Audience Yesterday Afternoon.

Mr. Kneisel's Famous Stradivarius Violin, and the Other Noted Instruments.

This celebrated Kneisel quartette, which is named after its famous leader Franz Kneisel made its first appearance before a Hartford audience for the season of 1894 yesterday afternoon, and in spite of the severe storm, which raged all the afternoon, a good audience had assembled to greet it This quartette has established itself in the affections of Hartford music-lovers through its former visits and its performance of yesterday only strengthened and intensified the high regard in which it is held.

The opening number on the programme was Beethoven's B flat major quartette, opus 18, and was played with that rare delicacy of treatment and conscientious adherence to the composer's idea which is a characteristic of this famous club. The second number, the D flat major quartette by Sgambati, was new to most Hartford people and aroused a high degree of enthusiasm by its original and masterly construction, as well as by its wonderful performance. This work calls for the highest perfection of technical skill and the quartette showed itself fully equal to its requirements. The most enthusiastic applause following each movement, testified to the great delight it afforded the cultured audience present. The final number was Hayden's well-known G major quartette, opus 77 and was a worthy finale to a most interesting and highly instructive programme.

Franz Kneisel, the leader of the quartette, played for the first time in Hartford, upon a celebrated violin, which has but just come into his possession. It is by the king of all Cremonese violin makers, Antonius Stradiuarius and was made in 1717. It belonged to the former teacher of Mr. Kneisel, Professor Gruen of Vienna, and Mr. Kneisel made a visit to his teacher this summer for the express purpose of securing this instrument which has been known to him for many years. It took a deal of persuasion and a large amount of money to accomplish its possession but the high esteem in which Mr. Kneisel is held by Professor Gruen together with $5,000 in cash paid for the instrument, accomplished the object of his journey.

Mr. Kneisel is in raptures over the possession of such a rare instrument and those who heard its delicious singing quality of tone at yesterday's concert can understand his feeling, its pure and far-reaching tone being apparent to every one.

This quartette is famed for the fine instruments possessed by its members as well as for its artistic performances, Mr. Schroeder the 'cellist possessing a remarkably fine specimen of the work of Nicholas Amati, the predecessor and master of Stradiuarius, upon which he played yesterday. Mr. Svecenski the viola player possesses a remarkably unique and ancient specimen of the Cremonese school whose tone no one who has heard the quartette will soon forget, while Mr. Roth the second violin, plays upon Mr. Kneisel's former instrument, an old and fine one.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, NOV. 11, 1894.

The hearing provided for the chamber music of Sgambati by the Kneisel Quartette at their first concert of the season was soon succeeded by an opportunity for becoming acquainted with his orchestral music as illustrated in his first symphony, inasmuch as that work occupied the central position on Mr. Paur's fourth programme. It was listened to with close attention and apparently made a very favorable impression, although the hesitancy of the Symphony audiences to commit themselves outright according to their real likes and dislikes always renders it difficult to be sure what they actually feel in regard to a new work which comes to them without any particular label or commendation.

Allowance made for the vaster and stronger scheme of symphonic composition, one derives from a single hearing of this work notions akin to those received from the string quartette. A tentative and doubtful state of mood and fancy apparently supplied the creative impulse, which finds its full scope for speech and expression in a large, various, rich and potent orchestration, free from tricks and whims, individual enough in spite of some suggestions of admiration for the modern German school and some traces of the influence of Berlioz and even of Gounod, and courage enough to dare to be rude in form and rough in tone upon occasion.

As was said in our remarks upon the quartette, Sgambati is one of the men who think and feel, who walk slowly, are more careful than prolific, and yet may be obscure and illogical simply because the time of full command of themselves and their means has not arrived. Of this last condition they may not be aware, imagining that what signifies to them meaning and purpose must convey these to others with corresponding definiteness.

In this symphony, first performed in Rome about thirteen years ago, it is easy to find its author's nationality, in spite of his respect for forms into which the music of his country is only just beginning to mould itself. The fondness for melody, the free flow and sensitive spirit of the airs, whether they be gay and pulsing briskly, as in the scherzo, or pleasingly melancholy and musingly amorous, as in the andante and serenade,—the calm gravity, as of solemn services, and the delight in beautiful tones drawn from the most favorable registers of the instruments, are all distinctively Italian. So too is the erratic, episodic and occasionally surprising course of the first movement; for the more advanced Italian writers even of songs have for a good many years evinced a disposition to break their regular rhythms with sudden ejaculatory phrases which have a wonderfully dramatic effect when properly uttered, but seem quite irrelevant to the general plan of the song. For this movement seems almost—and we do not mean the comparison to be a petty one—like a condensed opera, in its queer, brief irruptions of violent phrases into smoothly going passages, its climaxes which do not conclude, and its bland pages which shift without warning into other pages of vehement assertiveness. Nor is it at all unreasonable that if the influence of the better kinds of religious music should be recognizable in portions of Sgambati's writing, that of the strongest emotional school should also be felt there.

The finale is akin to the first movement in its multiciplicity of themes, its frequent interpolation of by-thoughts and its unexpected deductions from announced premisses. It has vigor and strength, and it ends with a good appeal to enthusiasm in the listener. The great beauties of the symphony and the best suggestions of its composef's personality are to be found in the middle movements. There are in these deep tenderness, unaffected pathos, pure song, sportiveness and real melody, while there is almost nothing harsh, ugly or abrupt.

The instrumentation is almost always masterly, and the composer's affection for what is mellifluous is constantly illustrated by his skill in bringing not only the lower voices of the orchestra in prominence, but in using their deepest registers to emphasize an idea or to give a mood fulness and impressiveness.

The programme began with that vigorous, peculiar and entertaining overture to "The Sold Bride" of Smetana, about which one would be glad to know more than merely its author's name. If the overture represents the opera and is a true prelude to it, the story ought to be exciting and the action full of busy contrasts; for the tremendous activity of the brilliant fugal passages, and the gentle episodes which are let into the vehement ensembles, almost portentous with unisons and octaves, indicate a drama of strong contrasts and energetic exposition.

The only other number was the first of the suites arranged by Bizet from his music to Daudet's "L'Arlesienne." This included the Prelude, with its sturdy, emphatic march and its softer, slower measures; the Minuet; the brief little Adagio for the muted strings and the lively, stirring Carillon and it is always a favorite.

The virtuosity of the orchestra was especially displayed in the overture, portions of which were taken at an almost breakneck pace and carried through without a stumble or a check, each group of players in turn making capitally the odd little crescendo in the long first theme, but none—and the same is to be said of them all in union—ever getting quite down to the pianissimi on which the effects depend for their extreme value.

Mr. Paur's intelligence, excellent intention and firmness did well by the symphony, so that if any oddities perplexed or any disagreeable bits displeased, the composer and not he was to be blamed, while it certainly seemed as if all which could be made of the work as a whole was derived from it.

The Bizet also had an admirable rendering, although more softness of touch and more delicacy of tone would have improved the adagio, which ought to be very nigh to the evanescent in its effect.

The opportunities for the direct appearance of leading instruments happened to be unusually numerous in this programme and it was most agreeable to observe the fine tone and the artistic phrasing of the new first clarinet and bassoon, while the rarely heard voice of the saxophone was most obedient to Mr. Strasser's skill.

The next programme stands thus:—Mozart's E-flat symphony; Peter Benoit's symphonic poem for flute and orchestra, to be heard for the first time. Mr. Mole being the soloist; the entr'-acte from Schubert's "Rosamunde;" the B-minor Schubert march in Liszt's orchestral arangement, and Auber's "Carlo Broschi" overture.

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

SUNDAY HERALD

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR

VOL. XVI., NO. 134.

SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 11, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Sgambati's Work Finely Read and Brilliantly Played.

This Symphony Heard for the First Time Here—It Is Stronger in Treatment Than in Invention—The Delightful Smetana Overture and the Exquisite Bizet Suite.

The concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall, last night, was an exceptionally interesting one. The programme was:

Overture, "The Sold Bride".....Smetana
Symphony No. 1, D major, op. 16....Sgambati
Suite, "L'Arlesienne," No. 1.....Bizet

The symphony was heard for the first time at these concerts. It is much clearer and much more genial than is the quartet by the same composer, recently performed by the Kneisel quartet, but the composer seems to be constantly struggling toward a point that he as constantly fails to reach. The work is more positive in intention than it is in achievement, and yet it is steadily interesting, owing to the fine workmanship and the independent originality that mark it. In some respects it does violence to the generally received idea of what a symphony should be, but it is wholly symphonic in character, as far as dignity of style, high aim and seriousness of treatment are concerned. Unfortunately, when all is over, no very deep or abiding impression has been made and a feeling prevails that the work as a whole is hollow—is without pith; in fact, to compare large things with small, it suggests a pie, of which the upper crust and the bottom layer are of the very best puff paste, but without any filling between them. Here and there are fragments of melody that are exquisite in their grace and delicacy, and in the fourth movement a serenata that takes something of the form of an elaborate introduction to the finale. Here is an accompaniment that on its first appearance is almost alarmingly suggestive of a familiar figure in conventional Italian opera scores; but the composer uses it so ingeniously and so effectively that he escapes anything resembling a realization of the apparent threat of sinking into vulgar commonplace. The orchestration is very brilliant and masterly throughout, and taxes the performers to the utmost, especially the wind; but the distinctive qualities of the different instruments are never lost sight of and their capacities are never abused, while the scoring is always faultlessly clear.

The opening movement is the most elaborate and the most carefully worked out. It is prolific in charming movements for the wood wind, but they lead to nowhere in particular, and seem to be produced for the effect they produce rather than because they are any logical outcome of the underlying design of the movement. The andante is broad in style and dignified in effect, but its themes are vague in both structure and development, such charm as the movement has, lying in its rich, if sombre, instrumentation. The scherzo is piquant, picturesque and strikingly new, and is peculiarly interesting for its rhythmic swing and for its fresh and graceful trio, with its elaborate and beautiful scoring. The serenata, already alluded to, is full of the spirit of refined romance, but is somewhat unsatisfying by reason of its uncertain tonality. The finale is pervaded by fire and impetuosity and occasionally reaches to a power almost thrilling, the orchestration again, even in its most tumultuous striving after climax upon climax, showing the most perfect clearness, the whole culminating with splendid brilliancy. Still, notwithstanding there is so much to admire in the work and the finish that marks it in every technical essential, it is stronger in treatment than in invention, and has the aspect of a colossal sketch rather than that of a complete and well-rounded whole. There is much in it that conveys the impression of a series of well conceived episodes, interesting instrumentally, and that have been carefully pieced together, but without fully concealing the points at which they are joined. It is thoroughly of the modern school, but although Sgambati's artistic affiliations are known to be strongly German, the symphony suggests the more advanced contemporary music of France than it does that of the fatherland. It shows the great progress that has been made in instrumental music in Italy, and it was well that it was accorded a hearing here for that reason. No such important work for the orchestra has been written by an Italian since the day of Cherubini, and with all its shortcomings no symphony of such general worth has been produced by any living composer except Brahms. It was finely read by Mr. Paur and brilliantly played by the orchestra. Once more the great improvement that has been made in the wood wind this season made itself felt in the fine body and admirable balance of tone, as well as in the precision that distinguished the playing of the florid and difficult passages written for this element of the orchestra.

The spirited and delightful Smetana overture was given in a manner that reflected honor on both the strings and the wood wind. The Bizet suite continues to grow on further acquaintance. It is exquisite music, alike in conception and treatment. Mr. Paur was particularly happy in his reading of the work throughout, notably in the lovely andante of the first number, which was taken at a pace that permitted the saxophone solo to be heard to the best advantage, and with the effect intended by the composer. The dainty minuet was interpreted with peculiar felicity, and nothing could have been more refined in its grace and delicacy than the rendering of the tender adagietto. In fact, the performance of the orchestra through the whole concert presented no opportunity for even the most confirmed fault finder to exercise his gifts in that capacity. The applause through the evening was frequent and heartily appreciative. The symphony was well received, and it was evident that it made a very favorable impression.

The programme for the next concert is: Symphony, E flat, Mozart; symphonic poem for flute and orchestra, Peter Benoit (first time); entr'acte from "Rosamunde," Schubert; march in B minor, Schubert-Liszt; overture, "Le Part du Diable," Auber. Mr. Charles Mole is to be the soloist.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, NOV. 11.

The Symphony Concert.

The fourth Symphony concert called forth a large audience to hear the following programme:

Overture, Die verkaufte Braut.....Smetana
Symphony No, 1.....Sgambati
Suite L' Arlesienne No. 1.....Bizet

The Sgambati symphony is a large work, not always faithful to set forms, and suggestive of modern iconoclasm in its strivings after strange effects, and its excessive devotion to orchestration as a something to be worshipped for itself rather than a fitting accompaniment to ideas. And yet there is no lack of ideas in the symphony, and they are worthy of being developed; but it may be objected that the development is over-obtrusive. Modern musicians seem to have lost the skill and art of saying anything quietly; like a woman's letter, modern music is all unduly italicized, very frequently to draw attention to ideas that should, from their insignificance, be allowed to remain in the background. A sense of repose, an absence of all evidence of effort, a proper balance of effect, an appropriate gradation of colors are all essential to the highest works of art, and yet they are generally missing in modern music. The typical present day symphony is a restless striving after novelties; excessive and yet vague groping for striking effects; an early using up of all the contrasts of which an orchestra is capable, and a consequent monotony in repeating what has already been done; a never-ending restlessness, for which there is no reason, and an over-abundance of ornamentation for which there is no excuse. These defects (others may call them virtues) are all apparent in a greater or less degree in Sgambati's symphony. There are always interesting points to keep the attention fixed and to stimulate curiosity; there are also positive beauties that arouse enthusiasm and are dwelt on lovingly by memory; but the expenditure of nerve force is in excess, and what should be a long pleasure is a short luxury, interrupted by a long pain. There are but few contrasts, by means of which exhaustive nerve tissue has the opportunity to repair itself, and so prepare for fresh stimulation; the one species of stimulation is kept up without pause, and ever-worked nerves rebel. The symphony is the work of a symphony-maker, who is a musician, and not the work of a musician whose large ideas flow in symphonic dimensions. It is artificial in that it is a reflection of Sgambati's German studies; what he has learned is far more prominent than what he has felt, and as the result of allowing knowledge to take the place of inspiration, he is sometimes diffuse, sometimes unmeaning, and sometimes even dull. There is no evidence of self-restraint or of reserve power; there is rather the garrulousness of the pedant who delights to dwell on the small things of his loved art or science, and who gives us microscopic measurements when we ask for aerial perspective and barbarous high-sounding nomenclature when we are seeking for the beauties of nature. The first movement seems desirous of saying something whose meaning we miss, then it sought to do by force what would not be done by gentleness. It suggested a savage trying to make himself understood in a partially understood civilized language. The second movement, andante mesto was beautiful in subject and in treatment filled with fine fancies developed in the most delicate manner with an exquisite sense of artistic proportion and contrasts. The scherzo is heavy, the serenata somewhat commonplace in theme and over elaborate in ornament, a struggle after simplicity that ends in affectation. The finale is brilliant, and the working out of the very finest quality. From a technical viewpoint it is a fine and most elaborate piece of work.

Mr. Paur conducted the symphony with fine direction and with faultless taste. The interpretation of the Smetana overture and of the Bizet suite was delightful, the delicate playing of the minuetto and adagio in the latter work winning for Mr. Paur and his orchestra the most enthusiastic applause.

The programme for the next concert is the Mozart Symphony in E-flat; a Symphonic Poem (first time) by Peter Benoit; Schumann's Entr'acte from "Rosamunde"; the Schubert-Liszt March in B-minor, and Auber's "Carlo Broschi" overture. The soloist is Mr. Charles Mole.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, NOV. 11, 1894.

The Fourth Symphony.

The usual large audience crowded Music hall last evening, and with the customary well-considered applause gave evidence of enjoying the program provided by director Paur for the fourth of this season's symphony concerts. Variety was not a feature of the program, and the concert was unusually short, but no one was ever yet heard to complain of the briefness of a symphony. These were the selections played: Overture to "The Sold Bride," Bedrich Smetana; symphony No. 1, in D major, op 16, Giovanni Sgambati; "L'Arlesienne," orchestral suite No. 1, Georges Bizet.

The symphony was heard here for the first time. It is a pretentious scholarly composition, and is notable for occasional brilliancy in scoring and uniqueness in harmonic effects. In style Sgambati's symphony is suggestive of the modern Italian school, a school which shows the strong influence of German composers in orchestral works. There are several passages for strings in the second movement which might readily have suggested to Mascagni some of the most beautiful effects in his "Cavalleria Rusticana." This suggestion is, however, no discredit to Mascagni, the resemblance is only such as may be expected from writers of the same school. The symphony was first played in Rome, March, 1881.

Of the five movements the first and second, allegro and andante, are the most interesting. There are several delicious melodies in the allegro, and some very dainty effects are gained by the clarinets and violas playing a little sighing, chromatic figure against a novel, twittering accompaniment by the violins and flutes. Another pleasing feature of this movement is an exquisite passage for the horns. The horns are given considerable prominence throughout the symphony, and as played yesterday it was a treat to hear them. The solo horn was particularly well played.

The second movement is interesting chiefly because of the fanciful treatment of a variety of wonderful little themes and the effective introduction of an impressive choral melody. The scherzo is not devoid of dulness, and the serenade, or fourth movement, would be tiresome were it not for a guitar-like accompaniment by the strings, which is interesting because of its novelty if for nothing more. The brilliant finale is elaborately scored. A splendid performance was given by the orchestra.

The several charming numbers of Bizet's orchestral suite were exquisitely played, and were immensely enjoyed by the audience. Particularly pleasing was the minuet, in the performance of which the precision of the violin players was shown to great advantage.

Mr Chas. Mole will be the soloist at the next concert, when the program will be as follows:

Symphony in E-flat .....Mozart
Symphonic poem, for flute and orchestra (First time.) .....Peter Benoit
Entr'acte from "Rosamunde" .....Schubert
March in B minor .....Schubert-Liszt
Overture, "Carlo Broschi" .....Auber

---

[48]

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 11, 1894.

The program of the fourth symphony concert given last evening in Music Hall was as follows:

Overture, "The Sold Bride".....Smetana
Symphony No. 1, D major, op. 16.....Sgambati
"L'Arlesienne," No. 1.....Bizet

The story of Smetana's opera is told in another column of the Journal. The overture is familiar to concert goers under the title here given, and also under that of "Overture to a Comedy." It is a delightful piece of work, whatever its name is. It is so fresh, so spontaneous, so logical. Here is no pot-pourri, no absurd attempt at fine, yet incongruous writing. The piece is built mainly out of one theme, admirably treated, the theme, I believe, that is used in the vital scene of the opera.

Bizet's suite from the music to "L'Arlésienne" is always welcome, and last night it was read most intelligently by Mr. Paur. Take, for instance, the andante molto of unearthly beauty in which the solo is played by the saxophone. When the work was last given under Mr. Nikisch the tempo was so absurdly fast that the sad and tender melody that characterizes in Daudet's melodrama the appearance of poor Frederi, the "innocent," was without meaning, although the same excellent artist, Mr. Strasser, was the player. It is true that Bizet's music gains greatly when it is performed in the theatre, serves as commentary, establishes, or confirms a mood. To me, at least, it is his masterpiece, a greater work of art even than "Carmen."

Mr. Apthorp, in the program book, says that "this is the first of two orchestral suites arranged by the composer from his entr' actes, and incidental music to Alphonse Daudet's drama." Mr. Apthorp is mistaken. Suite No. 2 was arranged by Guiraud after the death of Bizet. Is not Mr. Apthorp also mistaken in giving the date of the first performance of Daudet's piece as Sept. 30, 1872? The date was Oct. 1. And what does the compiler of the program book mean by saying, "critics have called it (The Sold Bride), the best comic opera since Lortzing and Von Weber." It is true that Weber wrote a comic opera, "Abu Hassan," and at a pinch another dramatic work of his might be dubbed a "comic opera," but he is not distinctively known as a master of this species of entertainment. Mr. Apthorp's calling is here a high one. He is supposed to instruct. He teaches the ignorant or the indifferent to detect a subsidiary theme, to dilate with the proper emotion, to enjoy thoroughly that fetich known as the "Sonata form." It is his solemn duty, therefore, to be painfully accurate in statements of fact.

The Sgambati symphony is a work not to be lightly considered, not to be carelessly dismissed. It is not without its paradox; that is to say, infinite labor leads often to a trifling result. Now Sgambati is least of all superficial. You can almost see the sweat wrung from him by his work, and yet the hearer is often tempted to ask, "Why such labor?" The impressions after a single hearing are these: the chief faults are poverty of genuine melodic thought and an absence of true depth of feeling. Perhaps this latter impression is not properly expressed. Let me put it this way:

There is more true musical thought, there is greater felicity of expression with the simplest means in the adagietto in the suite by Bizet than in this whole symphony by Sgambati. The first movement is interesting, it is at times impressive. Here as in other movements there are charming passages, rare bits of instrumentation, delightful and unexpected harmonic progressions, surprising contrapuntal devices, but the hearer is always able to pry curiously into the means employed by the composer. He is never swept away by passionate outburst, he is never moved profoundly by thoughtful beauty of music. Constantly he is tempted to cry out "Well done; that's mighty clever."

Take the serenata, for instance. If you are priggish you may object to its presence as a fifth wheel to the symphonic coach. But if we must have modern symphonies let there be three, four or six movements, provided they interest. In this serenata there is a dash of Northern mist, a suggestion of Grieg, then you think the conventional serenade of Italy will be sung, a tune perhaps not without vulgarity; but how cunningly and how agreeably he disappoints you. There is always some little touch in the harmonies or the instrumentation that saves the piece from the reproach of triviality. Yet do you miss the sensuous, distinctive tune of Italy.

The second movement is full of suggestions of the gorgeous ceremony of the Holy Catholic church, as in that quartet by Sgambati played lately at a Kneisel concert. Even in the scherzo, full of delightful things, Sgambati cannot get wholly away from the cathedral. In spite of the occasional brilliancy and the ingenious rhythmical devices of the finale, it is the weakest, the most perfunctory of the movements. Here certainly is a work that was worth the playing and worth the hearing. It is easy to say here is Berlioz, here is Liszt, here Wagner shows his head, and here you hear Boito's harp; when you have said all this, there still remains the man Sgambati, earnest and ingenious.

The conclusion of the whole matter is this: The symphony is without entrails.

All in all, the concert gave genuine pleasure. The performance was admirable, the selections were interesting, and the concert was of most reasonable length. It is also a pleasure to see that Mr. Paur is as careful in the performance of pieces called by the ignorant "light" or "unpretentious" as he is in the reading and performance of a "classic" work.

PHILIP HALE.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
MONDAY MORNING, NOV. 11, 1894.

THE SGAMBATI SYMPHONY IN D MAJOR

Given by the Symphony Orchestra Saturday Evening—A Work of Great Merit, but Not a Masterpiece—Smetana's "Sold Bride"—Mme. Melba's Concert.

It no longer requires the presence of a soloist to draw a large audience to the symphony concerts: the programme of Saturday was purely orchestral, yet the hall was filled in every part. The performance justified the attendance, for the very first number of the programme, Smetana's overture to "The Sold Bride," was performed in a manner that proved that the technique of our orchestra, great as it has been, is advancing. No orchestra of the world could have exceeded the brilliancy of the execution of the fugal passages which form the chief theme of this overture. It began with canonic imitations running through every part of the string quintette, even the contrabasses entering independently at one time. The difficulty of such a work, taken at a flying pace, is enormous, yet the different voices were clear and well balanced. The Achilles heel was only to be found in the aforesaid contrabass passages, which is even more trying than the famous passage which ends the Beethoven Fourth Symphony. Most commendable was the virility and hartiness of the interpretation of the entire work, and the Coda was given with a dash that aroused the audience to great enthusiasm. It was the virtuosity of the soloist presented by an entire orchestra.

The next number was the Sgambati symphony in D major. Not a work to be classed with the world's masterpieces, but to be accorded distinguished consideration nevertheless, for Italy has not contributed much to the orchestral repertoire, and her recent efforts in this field deserve the recognition of the world. One may therefore thank Mr. Paur for including such a symphony in his list, for musical education can only grow by comparison of works and schools, and this opportunity has not been sufficiently afford to us in the past. The work is by no means distinctively national, it is not nearly as Italian as Mendelssohn's Symphony in A major, but it shows most interestingly the sprouting of German seeds in Italian soil. "The voice is Jacob's voice, but the hands are the hands of Esau;" the themes are often Italian themes, but the treatment is more frequently German. The modern unrest and the ceaseless modulation are there, and of the production of chromatics there is no end.

Probably the chief fault of the symphony and especially of its first movement is its fragmentary character; many powerful thoughts lead to nowhere in particular; a series of magnificent porticos to which the architect has failed to add a palace.

The second movement, Andante Mesto, has a melancholy oboe theme which recalls Mendelssohn's Scotch symphony and its brooding, but the treatment is again in the freest modern vein. Much harp and flute is brought in here, and the instruments were perfectly played. The strength of the woodwind of the orchestra was clearly shown in this movement, and it is safe to say that this department is better now than it has ever been in our orchestral history. Much excellence was also shown in crescendo and diminuendo effects by the entire orchestra, extending even to the end of the movement with a swell upon the kettledrum, which was given with proper reserve.

The best movement of the whole symphony seemed, at a sigle hearing, to be the Scherzo, which presented quaint themes, little effort and much originality. Here the composer did not feel the necessity of being profound, and the lack of earned endeavor reveals to us the natural Sgambati, melodic, musical and spontaneous.

The serenade which follows is also melodic, but is preceded by an enormous amount of preluding, as if the composer desired to give an apology in skilful modulations for becoming tuneful. Finally the muted violins give a song-like theme, with plenty of pizzicato a companiment, and the first violins deserve praise for the delicacy with which it was played. It led directly into a furious finale (could an irate father have broken up the serenade?) which was less clear than the two preceding movements. In the work, as a whole, Sgambati seems sometimes to have thoroughly mastered his learning, and sometimes to be mastered by it.

The concert ended with a delightful work which showed in every measure how freely a really great composer may indulge in melody. Bizet had more red blood in his musical veins than any of his Gallic contemporaries; had he lived even to middle age it is safe to predict that he would have been the central figure of the modern French school. His "Suite Arlesienne" No. 1 (altogether better than the No. 2 which was compiled subsequently), is neutral ground, where musician and populace may meet and enjoy themselves. It was played gloriously, and proved that our conductor is stronger in the light veins of music than he has received credit for being. The unison passages of the beginning were given with a swing that at once caught the hearty spirit of the work, and the interest and applause of the audience grew with each succeeding movement. For the first time this season (in the variations of the prelude) one had an opportunity of judging definitely of the quality of the bassoons, and the verdict must be a very favorable one; the staccato bass, running in triplets, given by these instruments was superbly played, always clear, never obtrusive. So far as one can judge by the works given thus far there is not a weak spot in our orchestra at present, although the reviewer believs that a couple of additional contrabasses would make a better balance of parts.

A long succession of ecstatic adjectives must weary the reader, therefore it may be succinctly stated that the brilliancy of the concert was maintained to the very end, the muted strings in the adagietto and the hearty, healthy character of the Carillon, as revealed in the reading, calling for especial praise.

The saxophone solo was excellently performed in the first movement. It is a pity that other composers do not take a leaf from Bizet's book and use this instrument in orchestral scores, since it has a distinct and graphic tone-color which deserves a place upon the tone-painter's palette, as also does the rough snore of the ophicleide, the dreamy ecstasy of the viol d'Amore and the funereal black of the basset-horn, none of which instruments are in general use today.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY NOVEMBER 12, 1894.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the fourth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening was as follows:

Smetana: Overture to "Prodaná nevěsta."
Sgambati: Symphony No. 1, in D major, opus 16.
Bizet: Suite, "L'Arlesienne," No. 1.

Here were three examples of as many modern orchestral schools, two of which are not particularly familiar to us as yet; the Czech, the Italian and the French. The Czech school we know principally through Antonin Dvorák, Smetana's most distinguished pupil; to be sure, we have had the master's overture to "Prodaná nevěsta" here once before; but that once hardly prevents its being a new work to us. It is both curious and interesting to find the man whose main object in life was to found a truly national school of music in Bohemia, first presented to us through a work which is essentially a modern development of the old Mozart fugued overture. It gives one a pleasant notion of Smetana and his striving; one feels his artistic sincerity and wisdom; here, at least, in his patriotic ambition to write thoroughly Czech music, he has wisely striven after new matter, not unwisely after new forms. The overture is delightful from beginning to end; the free fugued form fits the material to a T, and is treated with a skill and verve that shows fully what inherent liveliness there is in the fugue. Particularly artistic, too, is the way the composer has treated the little melodious episode in the middle of the overture, giving just hint enough at a cantabile second theme not to break completely with the traditional overture form, and yet not enough to destroy the continuity of development which is one of the essentials of good fugal writing. The performance was in every way worthy of the work; full of vigor, brightness, snap and accent; the music bubbled and sparkled like champagne!

Sgambati's symphony is a charming composition in another way; it is, perhaps, not a work conceived on quite the high plane of his string quartet recently played here by the Kneisels; but it is an eminently genial and beautiful work. There are some current legends about composers which it is well not to believe too unguardedly; among such are those which report certain composers as being rather dry and lacking in melodic invention. These legends are often to be explained by the quarters from which they have come. For instance, it was at one time the common opinion in Paris that Cherubini was a very dry old boy, immeasurably learned and "classical," if you please, but lacking the gift of facile melody, and, upon the whole, somewhat uninspired. Well, to a public brought up on Rossini and Auber it was quite enough to label a composer as "classic" to make it plain to the meanest capacity that he must be dry. In the same way one need not be surprised at the Italian public finding a certain dryness in a man like Sgambati, who was the pioneer of the so-called "classical" movement in Italy; he did not write hand-organ tunes, so it was evident that his melodic inspiration was none of the richest. But, if we may judge from the quartet and the symphony we have lately heard here, the man is anything but dry; true, one does not find in his music that downrightness, that uncompromising glare of passionateness, unrelieved by any poetic penumbra, that is characteristic of a good deal of Italian writing; there is perhaps somewhat too much of ideality in his conceptions to suit a certain grade of Italian taste. But of dryness, in any true sense of the word, we can find exceedingly little in him. More than this, no matter how much he may have learned from German technique, he remains Italian to the backbone; Italian in feeling, Italian in expression, Italian most of all in that he, like Berlioz (who although a Frenchman by birth and heredity, was peculiarly happy in his tone-painting of Italian scenes), evidently looks upon absolute melody as the true musical unit.

We found the symphony not only interesting, but very delightful. Now and then, as in the Scherzo, one comes upon moments that seem a little labored; in the Serenata (fourth movement) the vastness of suggestion of the opening ritornello seems out of proportion to the small form and homely character of the serenade itself. Again, that working-up of a choral melody in the Andante, beautiful as it is, and gorgeously rich in color, strikes one as a little—what shall we call it?—as perhaps a little artlessly ingenuous; this sort of thing recalls the atmosphere of the Henselt concerto, rather than that of any really great master-work; it has a certain tang of salon sentimentalism. Sgambati does the same thing in the Trio of the Scherzo, but he does it better, because more concisely and with a lighter and more suggestive touch. The first movement strikes us as admirable throughout, and the Finale is capital. The Andante mesto is stoutly built and finely proportioned; all in it, save the ecclesiastical interlude in the middle, is on a very high plane; and one may say of the ecclesiastical part that, admitting the thing to be worth doing, it could hardly have been done better. The Scherzo seems to fail, in attempting to enter a domain of poetic imaginativeness in which few Italians have been really at home; Spontini failed in a similar way in his fairy operas, in a field where he could not hope to win in his rivalry with Weber; in this Scherzo of Sgambati's one finds but the glittering outer shell of fantasticism, not the true vital spark. But it is unspeakably good for us here to make the acquaintance of such Italian music as this; it gives us some things, and things of high value, which no German can give us; and it shows the composer as walking with a very firm step, as quite sure of saying what he means to say. We can at present think of no modern French composer treating the symphonic form so well and sympathetically; Sgambati takes liberties with it, to be sure, but takes them as a man does who has a right to it. His instrumentation is truly masterly, and he always gets the full value out of the means he employs. The symphony was admirably played.

Bizet's first "Arlésienne" suite seems more bewitching every time one hears it. Perhaps we have never yet heard that wonderful little interlude (Andante molto in A-flat major) in the first movement given its full effect. The saxophone solo is exceedingly difficult—musically, if not technically—and it takes the most superb playing to give it its due prominence in the movement. It is really the central figure, the principal melody; all the rest is but accompaniment or obbligato. But it takes the greatest skill in phrasing and warmth of sentiment to make the somewhat colorless, stopped-diapason tone of the saxophone maintain its prestige against that ineffably beautiful, ever-recurring sigh of the clarinet, the effect of which is almost to monopolize the listener's attention. We have never yet heard the saxophone melody seem otherwise than in the background. The whole suite was (with this single exception) splendidly played, the dainty minuet just escaping an encore.

The next programme is: Mozart, symphony in E-flat major; Peter Benoit, symphonic poem for flute and orchestra (first time); Schubert, entr'acte from "Rosamunde;" Schubert-Liszt, Reiter-Marsch in B minor; Auber, overture to "Carlo Broschi" ("La Part du Diable"). Mr. Charles Molé will be the flutist.

BOSTON POST.
The Representative Democratic Paper of New England.
SUNDAY MORNING, NOV. 11, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Short and Brilliant Programme at Last Night's Performance.

Although an exceedingly short programme, the Symphony concert of last evening was certainly the most brilliant so far given this season. At all points the work of the musicians was well nigh marvellous, and, although there were but three numbers, they were such as to give Mr. Paur's men splendid opportunities, which, as already stated, they made the most of. Mr. Paur, too, should be given much credit for his careful conducting, and that his labors of the evening were heartily appreciated was amply evidenced by the marked enthusiasm of the audience after each movement.

The novelty of the evening was the D major symphony of Sgambati in five movements. The first movement, somewhat irregular in form, is delightfully worked out, the clarinets and violas being heard to good effect. A pretty little waltz-like movement is noticeable here and there, the first part being brought to a quiet close. In the second movement, which is particularly melodious, the basses play an important part. The third movement is a scherzo, graceful and rhythmic in the extreme, while the last two movements perfectly fulfil the expectations of the previous ones, the final working out being brilliant and elaborate. The symphony is scored for full modern orchestra.

The two other numbers were the overture to Smetana's "The Sold Bride" and Bizet's orchestral suite, "L'Arlesienne." The latter contains four quaint, ingeniously arranged movements, the first opening vigorously with a fortissimo theme, which gradually changes to a short march, then to a poetic melody. The second movement is a sort of minuet, this being followed by a short movement for muted strings. The suite closes with a combination of scherzo and trio of great beauty.

At the next concert Mr. Charles Mole will be the soloist.

BOSTON HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCVI., NO. 136.

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 13, 1894.

KNEISEL CONCERT.

The capacity of Union Hall was tested by the large and enthusiastic audience that gathered to hear the Kneisel quartet in the following programme:

Quartet in D minor, Cherubini.
Quartet in E flat major, op. 74, Beethoven.
Piano trio in A minor, Rubinstein.

The Cherubini quartet is a finely wrought out work, and deserves to be heard more frequently in our concert rooms. It is in the highest degree exhilatory in its direct simplicity, in its freshness, suggestive of the open air. There is technical knowledge enough and to spare, but it is used for the elaboration of ideas, and is held sternly in its subordinate place.

Its absolute sincerity is in marked contrast to many modern and more elaborate, but less artistic, compositions. The sincerity of purpose and of performance that is at the base of all enduring works of art, and without which even genius is a delusion and a snare. The first movement is somewhat of a surprise, and perhaps a disappointment, and it hints a trifle at being dull; the larghetto has a beautiful theme, nobly developed, and it was finely played, calling forth a spontaneous burst of enthusiastic applause, the first of the evening. The scherzo is dainty, quaint and charmingly original in treatment, and was a strange mingling of joy and of sadness; recalling the gayety and sunshine of the open air, and the gloom and sadness of a tomb. It was superbly interpreted, and at its conclusion met with applause that strongly hinted at an encore. The broad, vigorous finale was played with a fire and an enthusiasm that carried all before it, and concluded a work that is of the very finest make, while it received an interpretation that for artistic completeness and conscientiousness is deserving of the highest praise.

The large and noble Beethoven quartet was played with admirable breadth and dignity, and kept the audience in a state of emotion that found vent in applause at inappropriate moments; the adagio with its tender and full utterances gave Mr. Kneisel the opportunity to excel in his best vein. This movement was played throughout with the most exquisite taste and finish; with perfect comprehension of the composer's meaning, and with the very rarest sincerity, the noble violin of Mr. Kneisel responding to his bow with a beauty and fulness of voice that reached the high point of perfection. The presto also received a fine reading, being played with perfect clearness and with perfect gradations of tone color, while the allegretto was a beautiful example of ensemble playing, the fine work of each instrument fitting together in a flawless whole. The enthusiasm of the evening expended itself on this work, and at its conclusion the players were enthusiastically recalled.

The Rubenstein trio just falls short of being a great work; it is filled with novel ideas that are often treated with the hand of a master; the themes are large and dignified; the development is always musicianly and always has a meaning, but when pleasure is at its height some triviality or some little insincerity creeps in and converts the imagined god into the average human being. The flight of the imagination is here always wavering; it begins at a great height and falls in gradually smaller and smaller curves until it touches the earth. The second was the one movement that stirred the audience, and this for its brilliant dash and fire. The difficult and exacting piano part was played by Mr. Ernst Perabo with a fine conscientiousness and with perfect comprehension. It was a brilliant interpretation, musicianly, and based on sound skill and judgment, and in the artistic subordination of means to end in its attention to the finest shades of meaning and in that frankness characteristic of all that Mr. Perabo performs. His work was fully appreciated by the audience, and won for him earnest and deserved applause.

Boston Journal.

TEN PAGES.

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 13, 1894.

The Second Concert of the Kneisel Quartet in Union Hall.

Few in the large audience at the Kneisel Quartet Concert in Union Hall, last evening, could have been unduly mindful that the concert was over two hours in length; for there was the reconciling quality in attendance of an uncommonly good program. From first to last the concert was of fascinating interest. First was given a quartet in D minor by Cherubini.

A well known encyclopedia of music, noted for its elegant binding, would inform the musical world that Cherubini only wrote two string quartets (Sic.). There are actually six in number. His first quartet was composed in 1814; No. 2—C major—in 1829; No. 3—D minor—performed last evening, 1834, and these, prior to 1837, were followed by three more.

Musically considered, the quartet in D minor stands very near Haydn, who, more than any other composer, Cherubini so admired; and we can but find the noble pedagogue far superior to Haydn in richness and also, as need not be told, in his scholarly command of means. Would that he had not so constantly avoided homophony, and that he had imbibed more of his unpretentions, yet none the less indispensable art, from Father Haydn.

The scherzo of the quartet—not so idealized a scherzo as Beethoven would have made—nevertheless charms as but few such movements can. At the moderato sans lenteur of this movement, which is really a polacca, pure and simple, the master has his say with neither reticence nor restraint; and, strangely enough, from Cherubini, the lively emotion of a dance, with gay, well-nigh teasing humor fills the heart.

The elevation and energy of the last movement well sustains the interest to the very end, and yet the great work, as a whole, is, after all, something of a Janus, for one of its two faces is turned backward and the other forward.

The most valuable work on the program was easily Beethoven's opus 74 in E flat major, regarding which masterpiece there is really but little new to say. Certainly in its external proportions, if not in its depth of meaning, it surpasses the bounderies that Beethoven had hitherto reached in chamber music.

The trio, op. 85, by Anton Rubinstein, came last, and a single hearing of the work would itself preclude the necessity of passing judgment. It certainly appears to be all that Mr. Perabo, in a recently published critique, has claimed for it; while the seriousness of thought and nobility of mood of certain portions of it are very impressive. Is the moderato—excepting, of course, the charming meno mosso—mere tone-play? So it seemed at a first hearing. Wagnerish enough, to be sure, is the weird and mysterious finale; but all such thoughts are naught more than impressions; and the "magnificent work" that Mr. Perabo has found after serious and important study is doubtless a reality.

Perhaps the trio shows but few signs of a uniform plan throughout; still it ought not to be demanded that any artistic conventionality—in other words conventionalism—should influence a musical character so capably independent (if not always creative) as Rubinstein.

The technical difficulties of the work are stupendous, and these are mostly confined to the pianoforte part, which Mr. Perabo played with great clearness and all due subordinacy.

He was the real and only Perabo, indeed, in his piquant and winsome rendering of the quasi-berceuse with which the moderato con moto is interpolated. Of Mr. Kneisel and his associates it would seem supererogatory to say more than that both the Cherubini and Beethoven were superbly well played. Let the Cherubini quartet be repeated. It was, doubtless, as great a novelty as the Rubinstein "Trio" to a majority of the Kneisel Quartet's patrons. Thanks, gentlemen, for your liberal "cuts" in the Rubinstein. The work is too long, albeit its lengths are "heavenly."

NOTES

Boston Daily Globe.

TUESDAY, NOV. 13, 1894.

Kneisel Quartet.

The second Kneisel quartet concert in Union hall last night attracted an audience even larger than that which usually attends these popular entertainments, and the program was of more than ordinary interest. The only fault to be found with the performance is that it was a bit too long. An hour and a half of quartet music is all that the most enthusiastic musician cares to listen to in one evening. Last night the concert lasted fully two hours and many people were obliged to go out before it ended.

Ernst Perabo was the soloist. With the assistance of Mr Kneisel and Mr Schroeder he played Rubinstein's piano trio in A minor. This was the last number on the program, and last night's performance was the first time this trio has been performed at these concerts. Perabo played with exquisite taste and his technique was, as usual, almost perfect. The two middle movements of the trio aroused great enthusiasm.

The other numbers were Cherubini's quartet in D minor and the Beethoven quartet in E flat major. The Cherubini has never before been played at the Kneisel concerts; it is interesting and very musical. The larghetto and scherzo movements are full of melody and tone coloring, and the whole composition is a valuable addition to the repertory of the quartet. The next concert will be given Dec 10.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

The Official Paper of the State.

TUESDAY MORNING, NOV. 13, 1894.

The Kneisel Quartette Concert.

The concert at Union Hall last night began with periwigs and ended with dancing dervishes. From the primness of Cherubini to the fury of Rubinstein was a long step, but Beethoven stood between the two as a mediator.

Cherubini's quartette in D minor began with a very clear and concise allegro in which everything was well-adapted to the vehicle of expression, nothing was swollen beyond the powers of the string quartette. The movement which was most attractive in this work was the scherzo, in which there was a large degree of canonic imitation, and almost constant contrapuntal work. The chief theme of the trio of this was especially art active and consiste l of a showy violin theme (excellently played by Mr. Kneisel) accompanied by simple pizzicato effects. The finale was the most modern of the four movements.

One scarcely needs to state that Beethoven's quartette in E flat (op. 74) was well played by the Kneisel Quartette; they are Beethoven players par excellence, and can make even the capricious and subtle final quartettes (the C sharp minor for instance) sound clear and intelligible.

It was noticeable, however, in this work, that Mr. Kneisel's tone has become broader and more virile. This may be partly ascribed to the fine instrument he uses this season.

The concert ended with Rubinstein's piano trio in A minor, a composition, unequal, as almost all of the works of this composer are, but interesting from the first note to the last. The first movement seemed the weakest, the second the strongest of the set. There was a Slavonic flavor even in the opening notes, and the development of the first movement was furious after the Russian manner. The coda was not very clear in tonality and was bizarre even to the final cadence.

The second movement, a free Sherzo, was heavily rhythmic, and dealt very largely in a figure formed of a single note in graphic repetition. This constant reiteration was intentionally mobotonous and became very impressive after exactly the manner of the repeated note in Schubert's C major symphony, or Beethoven's violin concerto. A fine contrast was afforded by the trio (or what stood in place of it) where a beautiful legato theme was announced by the piano. Mr. Ernst Perabo was the pianist.

Mr. Perabo is not only a very poetic pianist but he is, what is rarer still, an excellent chamber musician. Many even of our greatest pianists could take a lesson from his faithful self-abnegation in concerted work; he merges himself entirely in the ensemble, and if one thinks less of the pianist than of the general effect produced, the musician is all the more ready to acknowledge the debt due to the man who never forces his tone, and who does not think of the piano as a solo instrument in trio, quartette or quintette. Such careful work makes one long to hear Mr. Perabo in a concerto, in something more ambitious than a chamber concert.

To return to our piano trio. The andante was not so effective. Its chief theme has a degree of melodic beauty and is contrasted with a rather fiery episode, in which a six-noted figure plays an important part, but here the reiteration becomes tiresome, and the very long organ-point ('cello) with which the movement ends is pushed to the extreme. "Scratch a Russian and you will find a Tartar," says the old proverb. The Tartar begins to show in the development of the themes of the finale, and the fierce and dashing style is kept on to the very end.

The large audience testified a keen appreciation of the work, and pianist, violinist and violoncellist shared the well-earned applause.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

BOSTON POST.

The Representative Democratic Paper

OF NEW ENGLAND.

TUESDAY, MORNING, NOV. 13, 1894.

THE KNEISEL CONCERT.

The second concert of the Kneisel Quartet's season was given last night at Union Hall to the usual crowded audience. The programme consisted of three numbers—the Beethoven quartet in E flat major (op. 74), a quartet by Cherubini in D minor which was given for the first time in these concerts, as was the final number, a Rubinstein trio for violin, 'cello and piano.

The Cherubini quartet is a sufficiently well known composition here, with a remarkably fine second movement (larghetto sostenuto), and a scherzo quite agreeably surprising and out of the usual in Cherubini's music.

The Rubinstein trio, though lacking in "scheme," was thoroughly enjoyable. Ernest Perabo, who assisted the quartet, was hampered by the piano, which was not quite as brilliant as the composition demanded.

The Beethoven selection was taken by the audience quite as a matter of course, and as an old friend. The second violin was a little out of tune in the allegro—the A string slipped, and the consequent jar made the only disagreeable note of the whole concert.

Boston Transcript

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 13, 1894.

Union Hall: The Kneisel Quartet.

The Kneisel Quartet, assisted by Mr. Ernst Perabo, gave its second concert in Union Hall, last evening, the programme being as follows:

Cherubini: Quartet No. 3, in D minor.
Beethoven: Quartet in E-flat major, opus 74.
Rubinstein: Pianoforte Trio No. 4, in A minor, opus 85.

Cherubini's D minor quartet may have been played here before; but we doubt if many of us remember a performance of it. Of all Cherubini's six-string quartets the first, in E-flat major, is the only one that is currently played; and a hearing of this third one, in D minor, suggests a tolerably good explanation of the fact. If the E-flat quartet has maintained its place in the current chamber concert repertory more surely than its companions, it must be because it has more intrinsic life in it than they. It is interesting to have heard the D minor quartet, for once, but not much more than interesting; with all the easy mastery exhibited in it, the work shows the wrinkles of age quite unmistakably. It has had its day, but that day is now past. It was admirably played, in just the right spirit; but one listened to it with effort, and it failed to fix the attention by its own strength.

Beethoven's E-flat quartet (dedicated to Prince Lobkowitz, though not one of the six commonly so-called "Lobkowitz quartets") is a horse of another color. Here all is life and vigor! It is in every way a most remarkable work; few other compositions by the master, belonging to the same period, are what might be called such positive museums of Beethovenish traits; it gives one a quasi-panoramic view of the whole Beethoven. One finds in it Beethoven's warmth and depth of sentiment, a never-failing sense for beauty and proportion, his daring, tricksy fantasticism, and, with all these, that wonderful sense for artistic measure in expression which separates Beethoven from so many of the passionate or fantastic writers who have come after him. There is something entirely Northern—one might almost say Anglo-Saxon—in the modesty Beethoven shows in some pages of this quartet in the matter of profound and poignant emotional expression; he will draw with perfect frankness from the deepest wells of emotion, but he will not let the tear stay glistening on his cheek; he brushes it away, and forthwith meets you with a smile, or a brusque heartiness of manner which can, however, cheat only the superficial observer. Or again, after opening a vista upon all that is most profound in human feeling, he will suddenly play off before you the most dazzling magician's tricks,—brilliantly and lightheartedly, but never frivolously. What many-colored kaleidoscope of a Berlioz or a Liszt can vie in fantastic brilliancy with that wonderful series of virtuoso arpeggj of the first violin (page 8 of Litolff's edition of the score) against the weird pizzicato of the other instruments, with the melody creeping in after a while in imitation in the second violin and viola? Here is the great work of a great master; a work with immortality in it. The performance was exceedingly fine. Perhaps it showed, in a passage or two, a certain shortcoming of our excellent quartet; a lack of perfect and convincing force and freedom in passionate expression; now and then one might feel that the phrase was conceived on a larger and more heroic scale than that of the playing. But it is better, in this matter, to keep a little within the true limit than to overstep it; where the music itself is so brim-full of emotion, the expression had better sin on the side of over-modesty than on that of outrageousness. And in all else the four players rose to the full height of their task.

If the Cherubini Quartet seemed a little dry and mechanical in its perfection of form and treatment—a perfection from which much of the breath of life had gone out—the Rubinstein trio was rough and savage enough in all conscience. One might wonder a little at Mr. Perabo's choosing it, were it not for the well-known fact that, in art as in other matters, the element of sheer Dr. Fell, and his opposite, can never wholly be left out of our calculation; there are times when one likes a thing, and that, too, heartily, simply because one likes it, and one's taste and judgment have nothing to do with the business. And, as Mr. Perabo has admitted with entire frankness that he finds the work uncouth in material and expression, and very faulty in form, one must conclude that he finds some inexplicable hidden link between it and his own emotional receptiveness. The wondrous beauty, and unfeigned enthusiasm of his playing showed well enough how he felt about it. To us the work is dull, hard to listen to, and unmeaning—unless such meaning as one finds in the howling of the wind and the dashing of waves can satisfy one's demands upon a musical composition. Rubinstein never was a master of form and musical development; a fact which is deplorable enough even in those of his works where—as in the B-flat trio, opus 52—the subject matter is often of the finest. But here, where the thematic material itself is so vague in outline and uncouth in character, the almost total lack of logical development and symmetry of form renders his expression well-nigh inarticulate; he descends from the illiterate human being to the brute beast! Of course there is something in the work, even something that gives one a hint at genius; if the composer, for the most part, merely howls, sighs or bellows, one may say that only a man of genius could so howl, sigh and bellow. There is a certain quasi-elemental strength in the work. But savagery remains savagery, take it how you will, and music is, upon the whole, a civilized art. The performance was superb at every point, Mr. Perabo's never-failing beauty of tone doing all it might toward compensating for the roughness of the music, and his two fellow-players aiding and abetting him like true artists.

Boston [illegible]

MONDAY NOVEMBER 12, 1894.

NO NEW MUSIC HALL AT PRESENT.

Colonel H. L. Higginson Says That He Thought It Was Understood That So Long as the Old Music Hall Remained There Would Not Be a New One.

What has become of the new Music Hall that Boston was to have? is a question that has sometimes been asked of late, to which there has been no satisfactory reply. The asking of it has only served to rouse a momentary interest in a subject which less than a year ago occupied a large share of the public attention. This morning, in answer to the inquiry whether there was anything new to report about the project, Colonel Henry L. Higginson, one of the chief promoters of the enterprise, and a member of the committee that has the matter in charge, said—

"No, there is nothing new. I thought that it was generally understood that so long as the old Music Hall remained there would not be a new one. If the present hall were sold tomorrow, then a new hall would of course have to be provided at once. But so long as the old hall stands without danger of alteration or removal on account of rapid transit schemes or any other causes, the plan for a new hall is not likely to be pushed. Then, too, this is not a time to ask people for money for any such project. The model of the new Music Hall, that was shown in the new Public Library building, is still in possession of the committee and is stored in this city."

The other members of the committee are Edward W. Hooper and J. Montgomery Sears. The sum of $400,000, which it was thought would be all that was needed, was subscribed by the end of June, 1893, and since then the site on Huntington and Massachusetts avenues has been secured and the plan for a building submitted by McKim, Mead & White. There the matter now rests, and, according to the statement of Colonel Higginson, there it is likely to rest for some time to come.

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 15, 1894.

Symphony Concert.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last evening at Infantry Hall. As usual the performance was of such even excellence that the critic's task becomes a mere sinecure. This organization has long been universally recognized as the best permanent orchestra in the country, this recognition being heartily accorded even by the wise men of Gotham, who are apt upon occasion to look down as from a superior height upon the city of Boston and all its doings and belongings. Famous musicians from abroad have favored it with complimentary comparisons to the great European orchestras, some even going so far as to assign it the first place. There is then nothing left for Providence to do—speaking in all seriousness—but to accept and admire. The absence this season of the numerous "course" concerts of several years past, some of which have presented first-class attractions, helps to draw renewed attention toward and interest in the Symphony concerts. Last night's programme was as follows:

Schubert.....Symphony No. 9, in C major, Op. posth.
I. Andante—Allegro ma non troppo.
II. Andante con moto.
III. Scherzo: Allegro vivace—Trio.
IV. Finale: Allegro vivace.
Saint-Saens.....Introduction and Rondo Cappriccioso for Violin
Bach.....Passacaglia
Monsigney.....Chaconne and Rigodon from Suite "Aline Reine de Golconde"
Auber.....Overture, "Carlo Broschi"

This was a programme of a decidedly Frenchy flavor, despite the fact that its chief number bears the name of Schubert, and that a bit of Father Bach's ponderous philophony was sandwiched in by way of preserving a proper classical balance. In spite of the assertion so frequently heard that there is no nationality in art, the fact remains that in the art of music there is nothing so impossible as for a man to eliminate from his creations the trace of his blood and birth. It is not a thing that can be described and catalogued or laid bare by any process of musical dissection; it evades analysis and defies description, but as it is there all the time—the subtle flavor, the inner essence, the one unchanging factor that every musician instantly recognizes without the aid of a programme book or a prefatory lecture. Take, for instance, the second and third numbers upon last night's programme, and imagine if you can the composer's names to be reversed; it would be a feat impossible to a musical mind.

Schubert's great symphony, the one which Schumann called "of a divine length," received a most careful and sympathetic reading by Mr. Paur, and a superb rendition at the hands of his skilled players. No finer work in the symphonic form has ever been penned, save two of Beethoven's and possibly one of Schumann's. Bach's C minor Passacaglia (originally written for the organ), is more interesting as a display of his marvellous contrapuntal ability than anything else, though Esser has scored it for orchestra with supreme fidelity and skill.

The soloist of the evening was Mr. T. Adamowski of the orchestra. His number was of the brilliant and pyrotechnical sort, which is well suited to his taste and ability. The result was highly pleasing to the audience, and the applause was vigorous and long, both from them and his brother players. The Chaconne by Monsigny seemed hardly worth a place on the programme, but it served to accentuate the Gallic flavor in the evening's music already alluded to. Auber is a name not often found on symphony programmes, as, although a most prolific composer, his work was chiefly in the operatic line. Few of his operas are sung in this country, and none are familiar, save "Fra Diavolo" and "Masaniello." Yet, although he did not turn his attention to the composing of classic instrumental works, he was a profound master of the art of orchestration, as the overtures and accompaniments to his operas abundantly prove. The overture played last evening is a charming work and it was played in a most satisfactory manner.

The orchestra's third concert will be given on Wednesday, Dec. 12, the name of the soloist for the occasion is not yet announced.

[50]

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 14, 1894.

The program of the fourth Symphony concert was as follows:

Overture, "The Sold Bride".....Smetana
Symphony No. 1, D major.....Sgambati
"L'Arlésienne," No. 1.....Bizet

The ever delightful music of Smetana and Bizet was well played, and Mr. Paur in his reading of the suite from "L'Arlésienne" followed closely the Parisian traditions as observed by Colonne. For instance, it was a pleasure to hear the andante molto in the first number, the characteristic melody of Fréderi, the "innocent," played by the saxophone, taken at its slow and suitable pace. As for the overture by Smetana, it is a model of grace and contrapuntal ease. It whets desire to hear the opera. Will the time ever come when opera will be a live, flourishing institution in this town; when there will be an imperative desire to hear new works; when the fact that Emma Eames did or did not dine with an unmusical branch of an old family tree will not convulse society? I would gladly swap performances of "The Messiah," the "Pastoral" symphony and "Faust" with the stock cast, including the faithful and modest Miss Bauermeister, for a hearing of "L'Attaque du Moulin" or "Mala Vita."

You heard the symphony by Sgambati, and THE MUSICAL COURIER contained an admirable review of the work. To me the first movement is the most logical and the most interesting. The serenata may be a fifth wheel to a symphonic coach, but how skillfully the composer by harmonic device or pleasing instrumentation just avoids vulgarity when you expect the old-fashioned Italian operatic triviality. The second movement and the finale seem to be the weakest, although in the latter there is ingenious use of strong rhythm. In the whole work there is no irresistible outburst of passion; there is no calm, oceanic depth. In the andante, and even in the scherzo, there are suggestions of the incense, the candles, the organ mutterings, the chant, the pomp and the ceremony of the Holy Catholic Church.

The composer, sweatingly sincerely in his labor, still suggests musical insincerity after he is through. And yet this is hardly fair to him. For even if his music sounds labored, artificial; if you find here a composite passage of Berlioz and Liszt, and also hear Boïto's harp, the work is grimly earnest. It often interests. It certainly deserves respect. The chief impressions, however, after a single hearing are these: Poverty of melodic thought, absence of true depth of feeling. Or put it bluntly: The symphony is without entrails.

* * *

The program of the Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall Saturday evening will be as follows: Symphony, E flat, Mozart; symphonic poem, flute and orchestra (first time), Benoit; entr'acte from "Rosamunde," Schubert; march, B minor, Schubert-Liszt; overture, "La Part du Diable," Auber.

The Brooklyn Season Open.

BROOKLYN, November 13, 1894.

THE people of Brooklyn had so much good music all summer that they were a trifle slow in opening their winter season. Seidl was at Brighton Beach, you know, and that is only a step from town. Sousa, too, was at Manhattan Beach, and between them there was music if not harmony. The town season began with a Melba concert, the earnings whereof were not overwhelming, and just before election the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its rehearsal and concert at the Academy of Music. Perhaps you did not know that New York came near getting the rehearsals of this orchestra this winter. Nothing prevented the change in the plan but the appeals of leading members of the old Philharmonic Society. That society is practically dead, but refuses to recognize the fact, and at the performance the other night the only conspicuous member of it was Mr. Henry K. Sheldon, its president, in a box. It was the custom of the society in former times to preface each of its concerts with three afternoon rehearsals. Under Mr. Thomas these were actual rehearsals. Pecuniary considerations led to the abolition of the first two rehearsals, and the one afternoon performance that is now vouchafed to us is one of the precious legacies of Philharmonic management. Mr. Ellis has not been satisfied with the attendance in Brooklyn, and at the close of last season it was practically decided to give concerts in New York on Friday afternoon and Saturday night, and restrict Brooklyn to Thursday evening only. Perhaps he is sorry now that he did not do it, for the attendance at both rehearsal and concert was far from flattering. A city of 1,000,000 people, full of wealth, supplied with good musicians and good teachers, desirous of posing as a musical town, yet it gives half a house to the best concert that it has. It is unaccountable. Of course the advocates of the Boston band swear that it is the Seidl Society that is doing it all, that the energetic women who form that unique society have won all the money that was to be spent for music by solicitation and assault, but that allegation is not to be repeated except in a whisper.

The orchestra was in magnificent shape, though it is not to be denied that there were restful and even lethargic moments under Mr. Paur's conducting. He was at his best in the "Kaiser March," gave a fair performance of a set of dances culled from the works of Gluck, played the "Carnival Romain" overture with bounce, but was unsympathetic in the C major symphony of Schumann. The technical performance of the symphony was nearly perfect, but the soul was absent. It looked a little like hard times to find that the stage of the Academy was not decorated on Saturday night, for it has been an immemorial custom with the Philharmonic society to place palms and flowering plants along the front of the stage, and the Seidl Society always makes a brave display of flowers. The Symphony Orchestra could not get a date at the Academy in December, so it will not make its second appearance here until January.

THE EVENING BULLETIN

PUBLISHED BY THE PROVIDENCE JOURNAL COMPANY.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 15, 1894.

Symphony Concert.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last evening at Infantry Hall. As usual the performance was of such even excellence that the critic's task becomes a mere sinecure. This organization has long been universally recognized as the best permanent orchestra in the country, this recognition being heartily accorded even by the wise men of Gotham, who are apt upon occasion to look down as from a superior height upon the city of Boston and all its doings and belongings. Famous musicians from abroad have favored it with complimentary comparisons to the great European orchestras, some even going so far as to assign it the first place. There is then nothing left for Providence to do—speaking in all seriousness—but to accept and admire. The absence this season of the numerous "course" concerts of several years past, some of which have presented first-class attractions, helps to draw renewed attention toward and interest in the Symphony concerts. Last night's programme was as follows:

Schubert.....
.....Symphony No. 9, in C major, Op. posth.
I. Andante—Allegro ma non troppo.
II. Andante con moto.
III. Scherzo: Allegro vivace—Trio.
IV. Finale: Allegro vivace.
Saint-Saens.....Introduction and Rondo
.....Cappriccioso for Violin
Bach.....Passacaglia...
Monsigney.....Chaconne and Rigodon from
.....Suite "Aline Reine de Golconde"
Auber.....Overture, "Carlo Broschi"

This was a programme of a decidedly Frenchy flavor, despite the fact that its chief number bears the name of Schubert, and that a bit of Father Bach's ponderous philophony was sandwiched in by way of preserving a proper classical balance. In spite of the assertion so frequently heard that there is no nationality in art, the fact remains that in the art of music there is nothing so impossible as for a man to eliminate from his creations the trace of his blood and birth. It is not a thing that can be described and catalogued or laid bare by any process of musical dissection; it evades analysis and defies description, but as it is there all the time—the subtle flavor, the inner essence, the one unchanging factor that every musician instantly recognizes without the aid of a programme book or a prefatory lecture. Take, for instance, the second and third numbers upon last night's programme, and imagine if you can the composer's names to be reversed; it would be a feat impossible to a musical mind.

Schubert's great symphony, the one which Schumann called "of a divine length," received a most careful and sympathetic reading by Mr. Paur, and a superb rendition at the hands of his skilled players. No finer work in the symphonic form has ever been penned, save two of Beethoven's and possibly one of Schumann's. Bach's C minor Passacaglia (originally written for the organ), is more interesting as a display of his marvellous contrapuntal ability than anything else, though Esser has scored it for orchestra with supreme fidelity and skill.

The soloist of the evening was Mr. T. Adamowski of the orchestra. His number was of the brilliant and pyrotechnical sort, which is well suited to his taste and ability. The result was highly pleasing to the audience, and the applause was vigorous and long, both from them and his brother players. The Chaconne by Monsigny seemed hardly worth a place on the programme, but it served to accentuate the Gallic flavor in the evening's music already alluded to. Auber is a name not often found on symphony programmes, as, although a most prolific composer, his work was chiefly in the operatic line. Few of his operas are sung in this country, and none are familiar, save "Fra Diavolo" and "Masaniello." Yet, although he did not turn his attention to the composing of classic instrumental works, he was a profound master of the art of orchestration, as the overtures and accompaniments to his operas abundantly prove. The overture played last evening is a charming work and it was played in a most satisfactory manner.

The orchestra's third concert will be given on Wednesday, Dec. 19; the name of the soloist for the occasion is not yet announced.

The Telegram.

EVENING AND SUNDAY.

PROVIDENCE TELEGRAM PUB. CO.,

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 15, 1894.

The Second Orchestral Concert Proves an Affair of Delight.

Another large and critical audience listened to the second performance by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Infantry hall last evening, and it found in the presentation of the various numbers a most palatable combination of artistic skill and delicious melody. The selections were Schubert's Symphony No. 9, C major, in four movements; Saint Saen's introduction and Rondo Cappricioso, for violin; Bach's "Passacaglia"; Monsigney's Chaconne and Rigedon, from "Aline Reine de Golconde," and Auber's overture, "Carlo Brosch." The interpretations of the scrictly orchestral works were full of impressive intelligence and rare dexterity.

Mr. T. Adamowski filled the part of soloist, and to all who have had opportunities of recognizing his capabilities in the past, his success was simply a repetition of his achievements.

The third concert will take place Dec. 19.

Boston Herald.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 17, 1894.

ABOUT THE NEW MUSIC HALL.

An Official Statement Made by the Directors.

There was issued today by Henry L. Higginson, Edward W. Hooper, William Sturgis Bigelow, Henry F. Sears and Charles E. Cotting, directors of the New Boston Music Hall, the following interesting statement about the project:

To the Stockholders of the New Boston Music Hall—In accordance with the votes which were unanimously passed at the last stockholders' meeting on Jan. 6, 1894, your directors at once bought and paid for the lot of land on the corner of Huntington and Massachusetts avenues, and afterwards submitted for your consideration and criticism the model which had been prepared by the architects, Messrs. McKim, Mead & White, as a suggestion for the new Boston Music Hall. Although your directors have during the past year given much thought to various matters connected with the new hall, they have been and still are unwilling, for business reasons, to advise you to adopt a plan and begin the building.

When your subscriptions were made in the summer of 1893, it seemed to be certain that the old Music Hall would shortly be taken by the city of Boston for its rapid-transit scheme. But for your generous and prompt subscription of $400,000 to build a new hall, the Symphony Concerts would have been at once permanently abandoned by Mr. Higginson. When, a few months later and after the failure of the rapid-transit scheme, you authorized the purchase of the new lot, it was well known that the old Music Hall was for sale, as Mr. Higginson and other owners of its stock were unwilling to maintain it much longer as a public hall. During the year 1894 the owners of the old hall gave an option on the property for conversion into an arcade with shops; but existing business conditions were unfavorable to the scheme, and this option expired on Sept. 25, 1894.

After careful inquiry, your directors are satisfied that so long as the old Music Hall is used as a public hall the income from the new Music Hall would not be sufficient to pay even its current expenses for taxes and administration. They therefore have been unwilling to advise you to build until the fate of the old Music Hall shall be settled. At the annual meeting next February, if not sooner, all questions relating to the new hall should be carefully considered by the stockholders, and such action should be taken as they may then think fit. In the meantime the stockholders should remember that their subscriptions have already done much good by preventing the breaking up of the Symphony Orchestra last year and by providing a suitable lot of land for a new hall.

Mr. Higginson wishes to thank you for your generosity, which carried the orchestra over a crisis and kept it alive.

All your directors believe that a new and better Music Hall will soon have to be built in the interest of music in Boston, and that the land now owned by you is the only available lot in the city which is adapted to your purpose.

BOSTON POST.

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, NOV. 18, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Almost the largest audience thus far this season was present at the Symphony concert last night, drawn thither largely because of the announcement that Charles Mole, the fluter of the orchestra and a thoroughly finished musician, was to be the soloist. The selection in which he chose to appear was Benoit's symphonic poem for flute and orchestra. It is in three short movements, the first of which, by far, offers the largest opportunities for the soloist. It is an elaborately-developed movement, and the solo work of Mr. Mole was little short of marvellous. His work was of the most difficult order, and, although the solo is replete with runs and trills in abundance, he yet had his instrument so completely in control that every note rang out clear as a bell in every portion of the great hall. At the close of the movement Mr. Mole was given almost an ovation for what was undoubtedly the best exhibition of flute playing ever heard in Music Hall. The second movement was very melodic in character and, like the first, offered several opportunities for a generous display of the soloist's virtuosity. The third movement was somewhat shorter, but interest in the comparatively brief composition was kept up to the close.

M. POURTAN,
The new clarinetist of the Symphony Orchestra.

Another interesting work performed last night was the Schubert march in B minor, as scored for orchestra by Liszt, which was played most brilliantly by the band. The work is thoroughly ornamental, and a due regard for its light and shade was observed throughout. In places it is very suggestive of Brahms.

The programme opened with the ever popular Mozart symphony in E flat, and it was given a splendid rendering, especially the second and third movements, albeit the tempo was a trifle more rapid than usual. The other works heard were the "Rosamunde" ballet music of Schubert and Auber's overture to "Carlo Broschi."

At the concert next Saturday the soloist will be Mme. Elene B. Eaton, who will sing the Weber aria, "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster," and the Handel aria, "O, Sleep! Why Dost Thou Leave Me?" The Goldmark overture to "Sappho" will also be heard for the first time at these concerts.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCVI., NO. 141.

SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 18, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Audience Favored with a Delightful Programme.

The following delightful programme was performed at last night's concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall:

Symphony, No. 39, E flat.....Mozart
Symphonic poem, for flute and orchestra.
Peter Benoit
Ballet movement and entr'acte, "Rosamunde".....Schubert
Marche heroique, B minor, No. 3, op. 40.
Liszt-Schubert
Overture, "Le Part du Diable".....Auber

The soloist was Mr. Charles Mole. The selections were light, and pure, and beautiful. Melody ruled the hour and a half. It was a great relief from the profundities that prevail at these concerts, and, on the whole, very properly, and it is to be doubted if even the most earnest sticklers for the aesthetic incomprehensible wholly failed to enjoy the flow of chaste and charming tune that pervaded the concert. The playing of the orchestra was exquisite in its grace and refinement throughout. This noble organization was never in so high a state of efficiency as it is at present. It has entirely recovered from the condition to which it was reduced under the rule of Mr. Nikisch, and has all the finish that it possessed when Mr. Gericke retired, with an added flexibility and warmth of style that has not before characterized it. The symphony was read with faultless sympathy, and for once the andante was taken in the proper tempo and spirit. It is generally played too slow, and with an excess of sickly sentiment, but Mr. Paur interpreted it in a manner that carried instant conviction of its justice.

The Rosamunde music was given with fascinating refinement, especially the entr'acte, in which the new first clarinet was heard with delightful effect. He has a lovely tone and a wonderful pianissimo, and his style is that of a thorough artist. The beautiful conversation between the oboe and the clarinet in this movement was given with a tenderness and a purity that were fine beyond description. The Liszt transcription of the Schubert march is something more discreet than are most of the transcriber's work in kind. It is true that he has taken some liberties with his original, and that he has curiously emphasized the music here and there, but on the whole he has performed his task admirably and interestingly, and without resorting to noise. It was given brilliantly, the violins and 'cellos being heard with notably fine effect in the brad cantabile of the trio.

The Bendoit symphonic poem was heard for the first time at these concerts. It is a well written work, in which the solo instrument does not stand too far apart from the orchestra, but is skilfully made a part of a carefully considered whole. It is not, of especial musical value, but is serious and fairly free from triviality. The second movement, entitled "Melancholie," is perhaps the most interesting feature of the composition. It is simple in theme and is characterized by genuine poetic feeling. The first movement is named "Will-o'-the-Wisps," and the finale, "Dance of Will-o'-the-Wisps," and the composer doubtless expressed his views of these creatures musically with his best skill; but his music, in common with all other that undertakes to depict in tones what it is impossible so to depict, says nothing of itself that makes its meaning clear without a description. The solo part is immensely exacting on the player. Every difficulty that can be conjured up for fingers, lips and tongue is profusely crowded into it. That indefatigably industrious and royal flautist, Frederick the Great, who played more than 300 concertos for that instrument, and was guilty of writing several very bad airs himself, would have stared with dismay at the tremendous solo part of this work.

As composers for the flute, Berbigner, Drouet and even the "Beethoven of the flute," Kulkan, never dreamed of such passages as Benoit has written in this composition to perplex and to tax soloists. Mr. Mole, who was welcomed with great and prolonged cordiality, acquitted himself of his formidable task with surprising ease and smoothness, displaying an amazingly flexible and fluent technique and an artistic taste and style of the highest order. His rapid staccato playing and his double tonguing in complicated passages of the greatest rapidity were almost marvellous. If his performance had been merely a matter of technical display it would have excited astonishment, and no more; but his fine phrasing, the expressiveness of his efforts in the more singing moments of the work, and the deep feeling that distinguished his effort generally, imparted to it a color that pronounced him a thorough artist as well as an extraordinary executant. He made a profound impression, and after the last note had sounded he was rewarded with thunders of applause and twice recalled.

The Auber overture, one of the daintiest and most artistic of its composer's works in kind, and, save for the somewhat vulgar theme for the horns, admirable and charming in every way, was read with infinite judgment by Mr. Paur, and played fascinatingly. Those who feared that the roof of Music Hall might be struck by lightning as a punishment for the introduction of such an overture in a Symphony concert programme, must have felt greatly relieved when no such direful catastrophe followed. In fact, no harm happened to anybody, and what is more, the overture was heartily enjoyed, and received some of the most enthusiastic applause of an evening that was prolific in such expressions of pleasure on the part of the large audience in attendance. It is to be hoped that Mr. Paur may now and then punctuate his season with more such delightful, and, despite their lightness, "educational" programmes. There are some good things even in trifles, and there are some trifles that are no less works of high art than are more imposing achievements.

The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "Sappho," Goldmark (first time); air, "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster," Weber; symphony, "Im Walde," Raff; air, "O, Sleep, Why Dost Thou Leave Me?" Handel; "Les Preludes," Liszt. Mrs. Elene B. Eaton is to be the soloist.

[51]

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 14, 1894.

The program of the fourth Symphony concert was as follows:

Overture, "The Sold Bride".....Smetana
Symphony No. 1, D major.....Sgambati
"L'Arlésienne," No. 1.....Bizet

The ever delightful music of Smetana and Bizet was well played, and Mr. Paur in his reading of the suite from "L'Arlésienne" followed closely the Parisian traditions as observed by Colonne. For instance, it was a pleasure to hear the andante molto in the first number, the characteristic melody of Frédéri, the "innocent," played by the saxophone, taken at its slow and suitable pace. As for the overture by Smetana, it is a model of grace and contrapuntal ease. It whets desire to hear the opera. Will the time ever come when opera will be a live, flourishing institution in this town; when there will be an imperative desire to hear new works; when the fact that Emma Eames did or did not dine with an unmusical branch of an old family tree will not convulse society? I would gladly swap performances of "The Messiah," the "Pastoral" symphony and "Faust" with the stock cast, including the faithful and modest Miss Bauermeister, for a hearing of "L'Attaque du Moulin" or "Mala Vita."

You heard the symphony by Sgambati, and THE MUSICAL COURIER contained an admirable review of the work. To me the first movement is the most logical and the most interesting. The serenata may be a fifth wheel to a symphonic coach, but how skillfully the composer by harmonic device or pleasing instrumentation just avoids vulgarity when you expect the old-fashioned Italian operatic triviality. The second movement and the finale seem to be the weakest, although in the latter there is ingenious use of strong rhythm. In the whole work there is no irresistible outburst of passion; there is no calm, oceanic depth. In the andante, and even in the scherzo, there are suggestions of the incense, the candles, the organ mutterings, the chant, the pomp and the ceremony of the Holy Catholic Church.

The composer, sweatingly sincerely in his labor, still suggests musical insincerity after he is through. And yet this is hardly fair to him. For even if his music sounds labored, artificial; if you find here a composite passage of Berlioz and Liszt, and also hear Boito's harp, the work is grimly earnest. It often interests. It certainly deserves respect. The chief impressions, however, after a single hearing are these: Poverty of melodic thought, absence of true depth of feeling. Or put it bluntly: The symphony is without entrails.

* * *

The program of the Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall Saturday evening will be as follows: Symphony, E flat, Mozart; symphonic poem, flute and orchestra (first time), Benoit; entr'acte from "Rosamunde," Schubert; march, B minor, Schubert-Liszt; overture, "La Part du Diable," Auber.

The Brooklyn Season Open.

BROOKLYN, November 13, 1894.

THE people of Brooklyn had so much good music all summer that they were a trifle slow in opening their winter season. Seidl was at Brighton Beach, you know, and that is only a step from town. Sousa, too, was at Manhattan Beach, and between them there was music if not harmony. The town season began with a Melba concert, the earnings whereof were not overwhelming, and just before election the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its rehearsal and concert at the Academy of Music. Perhaps you did not know that New York came near getting the rehearsals of this orchestra this winter. Nothing prevented the change in the plan but the appeals of leading members of the old Philharmonic Society. That society is practically dead, but refuses to recognize the fact, and at the performance the other night the only conspicuous member of it was Mr. Henry K. Sheldon, its president, in a box. It was the custom of the society in former times to preface each of its concerts with three afternoon rehearsals. Under Mr. Thomas these were actual rehearsals. Pecuniary considerations led to the abolition of the first two rehearsals, and the one afternoon performance that is now vouchafed to us is one of the precious legacies of Philharmonic management. Mr. Ellis has not been satisfied with the attendance in Brooklyn, and at the close of last season it was practically decided to give concerts in New York on Friday afternoon and Saturday night, and restrict Brooklyn to Thursday evening only. Perhaps he is sorry now that he did not do it, for the attendance at both rehearsal and concert was far from flattering. A city of 1,000,000 people, full of wealth, supplied with good musicians and good teachers, desirous of posing as a musical town, yet it gives half a house to the best concert that it has. It is unaccountable. Of course the advocates of the Boston band swear that it is the Seidl Society that is doing it all, that the energetic women who form that unique society have won all the money that was to be spent for music by solicitation and assault, but that allegation is not to be repeated except in a whisper.

The orchestra was in magnificent shape, though it is not to be denied that there were restful and even lethargic moments under Mr. Paur's conducting. He was at his best in the "Kaiser March," gave a fair performance of a set of dances culled from the works of Gluck, played the "Carnival Romain" overture with bounce, but was unsympathetic in the C major symphony of Schumann. The technical performance of the symphony was nearly perfect, but the soul was absent. It looked a little like hard times to find that the stage of the Academy was not decorated on Saturday night, for it has been an immemorial custom with the Philharmonic society to place palms and flowering plants along the front of the stage, and the Seidl Society always makes a brave display of flowers. The Symphony Orchestra could not get a date at the Academy in December, so it will not make its second appearance here until January.

THE EVENING BULLETIN.

PUBLISHED BY THE
PROVIDENCE JOURNAL COMPANY,

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 15, 1894.

Symphony Concert.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last evening at Infantry Hall. As usual the performance was of such even excellence that the critic's task becomes a mere sinecure. This organization has long been universally recognized as the best permanent orchestra in the country, this recognition being heartily accorded even by the wise men of Gotham, who are apt upon occasion to look down as from a superior height upon the city of Boston and all its doings and belongings. Famous musicians from abroad have favored it with complimentary comparisons to the great European orchestras, some even going so far as to assign it the first place. There is then nothing left for Providence to do—speaking in all seriousness—but to accept and admire. The absence this season of the numerous "course" concerts of several years past, some of which have presented first-class attractions, helps to draw renewed attention toward and interest in the Symphony concerts. Last night's programme was as follows:

Schubert .....
.....Symphony No. 9, in C major, Op. posth.
I. Andante—Allegro ma non troppo.
II. Andante con moto.
III. Scherzo: Allegro vivace—Trio.
IV. Finale: Allegro vivace.
Saint-Saens.....Introduction and Rondo
.....Cappriccioso for Violin
Bach .....Passacaglia..
Monsigney.....Chaconne and Rigodon from
.....Suite "Aline Reine de Golconde"
Auber.....Overture, "Carlo Broschi"

This was a programme of a decidedly Frenchy flavor, despite the fact that its chief number bears the name of Schubert, and that a bit of Father Bach's ponderous philophony was sandwiched in by way of preserving a proper classical balance. In spite of the assertion so frequently heard that there is no nationality in art, the fact remains that in the art of music there is nothing so impossible as for a man to eliminate from his creations the trace of his blood and birth. It is not a thing that can be described and catalogued or laid bare by any process of musical dissection; it evades analysis and defies description, but as it is there all the time—the subtle flavor, the inner essence, the one unchanging factor that every musician instantly recognizes without the aid of a programme book or a prefatory lecture. Take, for instance, the second and third numbers upon last night's programme, and imagine if you can the composer's names to be reversed; it would be a feat impossible to a musical mind.

Schubert's great symphony, the one which Schumann called "of a divine length," received a most careful and sympathetic reading by Mr. Paur, and a superb rendition at the hands of his skilled players. No finer work in the symphonic form has ever been penned, save two of Beethoven's and possibly one of Schumann's. Bach's C minor Passacaglia (originally written for the organ), is more interesting as a display of his marvellous contrapuntal ability than anything else, though Esser has scored it for orchestra with supreme fidelity and skill.

The soloist of the evening was Mr. T. Adamowski of the orchestra. His number was of the brilliant and pyrotechnical sort, which is well suited to his taste and ability. The result was highly pleasing to the audience, and the applause was vigorous and long, both from them and his brother players. The Chaconne by Monsigny seemed hardly worth a place on the programme, but it served to accentuate the Gallic flavor in the evening's music already alluded to. Auber is a name not often found on symphony programmes, as, although a most prolific composer, his work was chiefly in the operatic line. Few of his operas are sung in this country, and none are familiar, save "Fra Diavolo" and "Masaniello." Yet, although he did not turn his attention to the composing of classic instrumental works, he was a profound master of the art of orchestration, as the overtures and accompaniments to his operas abundantly prove. The overture played last evening is a charming work and it was played in a most satisfactory manner.

The orchestra's third concert will be given on Wednesday, Dec. 19; the name of the soloist for the occasion is not yet announced.

The Telegram.

EVENING AND SUNDAY.

PROVIDENCE TELEGRAM PUB. CO.,

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 15, 1894.

The Second Orchestral Concert Proves an Affair of Delight.

Another large and critical audience listened to the second performance by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Infantry hall last evening, and it found in the presentation of the various numbers a most palatable combination of artistic skill and delicious melody. The selections were Schubert's Symphony No. 9, C major, in four movements; Saint Saen's introduction and Rondo Cappricioso, for violin; Bach's "Passacaglia"; Monsigney's Chaconne and Rigedon, from "Aline Reine de Golconde," and Auber's overture, "Carlo Brosch." The interpretations of the scrictly orchestral works were full of impressive intelligence and rare dexterity.

Mr. T. Adamowski filled the part of soloist, and to all who have had opportunities of recognizing his capabilities in the past, his success was simply a repetition of his achievements.

The third concert will take place Dec. 19.

Boston Transcript

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 17, 1894.

ABOUT THE NEW MUSIC HALL.

An Official Statement Made by the Directors.

There was issued today by Henry L. Higginson, Edward W. Hooper, William Sturgis Bigelow, Henry F. Sears and Charles E. Cotting, directors of the New Boston Music Hall, the following interesting statement about the project:

To the Stockholders of the New Boston Music Hall—In accordance with the votes which were unanimously passed at the last stockholders' meeting on Jan. 6, 1894, your directors at once bought and paid for the lot of land on the corner of Huntington and Massachusetts avenues, and afterwards submitted for your consideration and criticism the model which had been prepared by the architects, Messrs. McKim, Mead & White, as a suggestion for the new Boston Music Hall. Although your directors have during the past year given much thought to various matters connected with the new hall, they have been and still are unwilling, for business reasons, to advise you to adopt a plan and begin the building.

When your subscriptions were made in the summer of 1893, it seemed to be certain that the old Music Hall would shortly be taken by the city of Boston for its rapid-transit scheme. But for your generous and prompt subscription of $400,000 to build a new hall, the Symphony Concerts would have been at once permanently abandoned by Mr. Higginson. When, a few months later and after the failure of the rapid-transit scheme, you authorized the purchase of the new lot, it was well known that the old Music Hall was for sale, as Mr. Higginson and other owners of its stock were unwilling to maintain it much longer as a public hall. During the year 1894 the owners of the old hall gave an option on the property for conversion into an arcade with shops; but existing business conditions were unfavorable to the scheme, and this option expired on Sept. 25, 1894.

After careful inquiry, your directors are satisfied that so long as the old Music Hall is used as a public hall the income from the new Music Hall would not be sufficient to pay even its current expenses for taxes and administration. They therefore have been unwilling to advise you to build until the fate of the old Music Hall shall be settled. At the annual meeting next February, if not sooner, all questions relating to the new hall should be carefully considered by the stockholders, and such action should be taken as they may then think fit. In the meantime the stockholders should remember that their subscriptions have already done much good by preventing the breaking up of the Symphony Orchestra last year and by providing a suitable lot of land for a new hall.

Mr. Higginson wishes to thank you for your generosity which carried the orchestra over a crisis and kept it alive.

All your directors believe that a new and better Music Hall will soon have to be built in the interest of music in Boston, and that the land now owned by you is the only available lot in the city which is adapted to your purpose.

BOSTON POST.

The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, NOV. 18, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Almost the largest audience thus far this season was present at the Symphony concert last night, drawn thither largely because of the announcement that Charles Mole, the fluter of the orchestra and a thoroughly finished musician, was to be the soloist. The selection in which he chose to appear was Benoit's symphonic poem for flute and orchestra. It is in three short movements, the first of which, by far, offers the largest opportunities for the soloist. It is an elaborately-developed movement, and the solo work of Mr. Mole was little short of marvellous. His work was of the most difficult order, and, although the solo is replete with runs and trills in abundance, he yet had his instrument so completely in control that every note rang out clear as a bell in every portion of the great hall. At the close of the movement Mr. Mole was given almost an ovation for what was undoubtedly the best exhibition of flute playing ever heard in Music Hall. The second movement was very melodic in character and, like the first, offered several opportunities for a generous display of the soloist's virtuosity. The third movement was somewhat shorter, but interest in the comparatively brief composition was kept up to the close.

M. POURTAN,
The new clarinetist of the Symphony Orchestra.

Another interesting work performed last night was the Schubert march in B minor, as scored for orchestra by Liszt, which was played most brilliantly by the band. The work is thoroughly ornamental, and a due regard for its light and shade was observed throughout. In places it is very suggestive of Brahms.

The programme opened with the ever popular Mozart symphony in E flat, and it was given a splendid rendering, especially the second and third movements, albeit the tempo was a trifle more rapid than usual. The other works heard were the "Rosamunde" ballet music of Schubert and Auber's overture to "Carlo Broschi."

At the concert next Saturday the soloist will be Mme. Elene B. Eaton, who will sing the Weber aria, "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster," and the Handel aria, "O, Sleep! Why Dost Thou Leave Me?" The Goldmark overture to "Sappho" will also be heard for the first time at these concerts.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XOVI, NO. 141.

SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 18, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Audience Favored with a Delightful Programme.

The following delightful programme was performed at last night's concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall:

Symphony, No. 89, E flat.....Mozart
Symphonic poem, for flute and orchestra.
Peter Benoit
Ballet movement and entr'acts, "Rosamunde".....Schubert
Marche heroique, B minor, No. 3, op. 40.
Liszt-Schubert
Overture, "La Part du Diable".....Auber

The soloist was Mr. Charles Mole.

The selections were light, and pure, and beautiful. Melody ruled the hour and a half. It was a great relief from the profundities that prevail at these concerts, and, on the whole, very properly, and it is to be doubted if even the most earnest sticklers for the aesthetic incomprehensible wholly failed to enjoy the flow of chaste and charming tune that pervaded the concert. The playing of the orchestra was exquisite in its grace and refinement throughout. This noble organization was never in so high a state of efficiency as it is at present. It has entirely recovered from the condition to which it was reduced under the rule of Mr. Nikisch, and has all the finish that it possessed when Mr. Gericke retired, with an added flexibility and warmth of style that has not before characterized it. The symphony was read with faultless sympathy, and for once the andante was taken in the proper tempo and spirit. It is generally played too slow, and with an excess of sickly sentiment, but Mr. Paur interpreted it in a manner that carried instant conviction of its justice.

The Rosamunde music was given with fascinating refinement, especially the entr'acte, in which the new first clarinet was heard with delightful effect. He has a lovely tone and a wonderful pianissimo, and his style is that of a thorough artist. The beautiful conversation between the oboe and the clarinet in this movement was given with a tenderness and a purity that were fine beyond description. The Liszt transcription of the Schubert march is something more discreet than are most of the transcriber's work in kind. It is true that he has taken some liberties with his original, and that he has curiously emphasized the music here and there, but on the whole he has performed his task admirably and interestingly, and without resorting to noise. It was given brilliantly, the violins and 'cellos being heard with notably fine effect in the brad cantabile of the trio.

The Bendoit symphonic poem was heard for the first time at these concerts. It is a well written work, in which the solo instrument does not stand too far apart from the orchestra, but is skilfully made a part of a carefully considered whole. It is not of especial musical value, but is serious and fairly free from triviality. The second movement, entitled "Melancholie," is perhaps the most interesting feature of the composition. It is simple in theme and is characterized by genuine poetic feeling. The first movement is named "Will-o'-the-Wisps," and the finale, "Dance of Will-o'-the-Wisps," and the composer doubtless expressed his views of these creatures musically with his best skill; but his music, in common with all other that undertakes to depict in tones what it is impossible so to depict, says nothing of itself that makes its meaning clear without a description. The solo part is immensely exacting on the player. Every difficulty that can be conjured up for fingers, lips and tongue is profusely crowded into it. That indefatigably industrious and royal flautist, Frederick the Great, who played more than 300 concertos for that instrument, and was guilty of writing several very bad airs himself, would have stared with dismay at the tremendous solo part of this work.

As composers for the flute, Berbigner, Drouet and even the "Beethoven of the flute," Kulkan, never dreamed of such passages as Benoit has written in this composition to perplex and to tax soloists. Mr. Mole, who was welcomed with great and prolonged cordiality, acquitted himself of his formidable task with surprising ease and smoothness, displaying an amazingly flexible and fluent technique and an artistic taste and style of the highest order. His rapid staccato playing and his double tonguing in complicated passages of the greatest rapidity were almost marvellous. If his performance had been merely a matter of technical display it would have excited astonishment, and no more; but his fine phrasing, the expressiveness of his efforts in the more singing moments of the work, and the deep feeling that distinguished his effort generally, imparted to it a color that pronounced him a thorough artist as well as an extraordinary executant. He made a profound impression, and after the last note had sounded he was rewarded with thunders of applause and twice recalled.

The Auber overture, one of the daintiest and most artistic of its composer's works in kind, and, save for the somewhat vulgar theme for the horns, admirable and charming in every way, was read with infinite judgment by Mr. Paur, and played fascinatingly. Those who feared that the roof of Music Hall might be struck by lightning as a punishment for the introduction of such an overture in a Symphony concert programme, must have felt greatly relieved when no such sinful catastrophe followed. In fact, no harm happened to anybody, and what is more, the overture was heartily enjoyed, and received some of the most enthusiastic applause of an evening that was prolific in such expressions of pleasure on the part of the large audience in attendance. It is to be hoped that Mr. Paur may now and then punctuate his season with more such delightful, and, despite their lightness, "educational" programmes. There are some good things even in trifles, and there are some trifles that are no less works of high art than are more imposing achievements.

The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "Sappho," Goldmark (first time); air, "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster," Weber; symphony, "Im Walde," Raff; air, "O, Sleep, Why Dost Thou Leave Me?" Handel; "Les Preludes," Liszt. Mrs. Elene B. Eaton is to be the soloist.

[51]

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, NOV. 18.

The Symphony Concert.

The following is the programme of the fifth Symphony Concert:

Symphony in E flat, ... Mozart
Symphonic Poem, flute and orchestra, Peter Benoit
Ballet and Entré Acte, from "Rosamunde," Schubert
March in B-minor, Schubert-Liszt
Overture, "Carlo Broschi," Auber

As will be seen, the programme is an excellent example of Mr. Paur's fine, broad taste and ripe judgment. It may seem strange that it is necessary to defend the admission of Auber's name on the classic concert list; but tradition is still a strong power in the world of music, and there are many estimable people who still confound classicism with dulness, and who draw back in dismay from the heterodoxy branded as "tune." They look upon the word "classic" as they regard the label on their dress coats—it is a mark of their own particular tailor; all else is vulgar. It would be curious to inquire what peculiar traits make Wagner a classic, and, on the other hand, Auber a vulgar composer; why a minuet by Brahms is in itself superior to a waltz by Strauss. If dallying with dances is a musical crime what shall be said of Bach, Handel and the old composers generally? Considering the woeful waste of words that mark our end-of-the-century criticism, it is best to accept all art works on their merits, and to leave discussions on classicism to those with whom art is a conventionality and not a vital growth. Mr. Paur's attempt to give good music of every kind, irrespective of the boundary lines drawn by conceited ignorance, will meet with the heartiest approval of all who are interested in music as an art and not as a hobby. The attempt was useful in another way, those who objected to light music found the Auber overture gave them ample time to put on their wraps, overcoats and overshoes, Auber not demanding the respectful attention that is claimed by approved classic composers.

Certainly no objection could be found with the Mozart symphony, either on the score of matter or interpretation. The reading was noticeable for its perfect taste, for its full comprehension of the composer's meaning, which is not a rare gift, and for its realization of the idea, a less common merit. The finest details were lovingly given without loss of broadness; light and shade were exactly defined and nothing could have been better than the delicate and all sufficient rendering of the andante and allegro movements, the beauty, grace and joy of the one, the passion, always dignified, impetuosity and poetry of the other. The delightful finale was given with fascinating gaiety and spirit, it was fairly dazzling in brilliancy, and what is better, it was always a truthful rendering of the intentions of the composer.

The Schubert-Liszt march appealed to the emotions and the intellect at the same time; we felt with Schubert, and indulged in syllogism to prove, what was needless, that Liszt is never greater than himself. The Auber overture was given with fine dash and vigor, and, by its inherent worth, more than demonstrated its right to a place on the programme. It was hardly touched by age; it was brilliant, and it was true music.

The novelty of the evening was the Symphonic Poem. It may be that it did not reveal its beauties at one hearing, but what it did reveal were brilliancy and artificiality. It was meaningless and patchworky. The work is that of a musician, but it is trivial and is somewhat suggestive of the good old-fashioned themes and variations for the piano, where nimble fingers took the place of ideas, and virtuosity elbowed fine art into the background. The flute says nothing with elaborate brilliancy, and the other instruments utter envious comments and try to show how much better they could say nothing if they were allowed the opportunity.

The flute solo part was most ably interpreted by Mr. Molé; there was abundant evidence of taste and the highest skill. The many difficulties were mastered with graceful ease and the soloist was greeted with the heartiest applause, and was twice called out to bow his thanks.

The programme for the next concert is: Goldmark's overture, "Sappho;" Weber's aria, "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster;" Raff's "Im Walde" symphony; Aria from "Semele," Handel and Liszt's symphonic poem "Les Preludes." Mrs. Elene Eaton is the soloist.

The Kneisel Quartet.

A large audience assembled on Monday evening, to hear Mr. Kneisel and his fellow artists interpret the following programme:

Quartet in D-minor.....Cherubini.
Quartet in E-flat.....Beethoven.
Piano Trio in A-minor.....Rubinstein.

The Cherubini quartet is a fine, large, rich work of great dignity, sweetness and fire, pure and firmly cut in outline and filled to fulness with lofty ideas. The finest art is apparent from opening bar to finish, and if this quartet be a specimen of "pedagogue" music, it is a pity that our present day pedagogues do not give us similar kinds of work. The opening movement is the least satisfactory; the second movement is very beautifully colored with rich imagination and developed with the clearest and most incisive artistic taste. The scherzo is delightful, nothing daintier in conception and in carrying out has been written; its fine simplicity is based on the most consummate knowledge, and its open-air freedom and motion suggestive of the firm hand and delicate imagination of a genius; while the finale is a large and vigorous piece of work, filled with fiery impetuosity and with an imagination held in check by the most refined art. The work was beautifully interpreted; the scherzo especially calling forth the most enthusiastic applause.

The Beethoven quartet was in strong contrast to the Cherubini work; it stood alone in its majestic beauty, a perpetual sign of the unerring skill and power of inspiration. Nothing new can be said of it, and yet one is tempted to utter commonplaces in the enthusiasm of beauty-worship. This noble work received noble treatment; it was interpreted with the most loving devotion and care and with the most conscientious art. The playing of the adagio movement calls for particular commendation, Mr. Kneisel's work being of the very finest quality, of exquisite delicacy and refinement and with faultless taste. No finer playing has been heard on the concert stage, and the audience repaid Mr. Kneisel with well deserved and long continued applause.

The Rubinstein trio is a pleasure and a disappointment at one and the same time. It is a large, dignified and noble work, and yet the sincerity not unfrequently sinks to the level of affectation. The nightingale occasionally loses its full, rich voice, and the owl temporarily takes its place; there is noise that means nothing; difficulties are invented because they are difficulties; there are abrupt contrasts that startle one from their unexpectedness and not from their artistic fitness. The continuity of idea is broken with what seems to be mere wilfulness, all evidence of self restraint is absent, the composer seemingly surrendering himself to a capricious mood that rises and sinks without discoverable reason. The beauties are so marked and of so fine a quality, that one is doubly irritated by the faults which mar them. Mr. Perabo played the piano part of this work, a part bristling with difficulties, yet which seemed mere child's play under his hands. He played with clearness and with artistic unobtrusiveness, and with a fine sense of color gradation. It was manly, dignified and broad playing, and won for itself hearty and discriminating applause.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, NOV. 18, 1894.

The solo number of Mr. Paur's fifth Symphony programme was a symphonic poem for the flute, written by the Flemish composer, Peter Leonard Leopold Benoit. It is dedicated to two flutists of eminence, Dumon of Brussels and Anthoni of Antwerp. Whether or not one is to understand by this dedication that it took both of those artists to play it on the other side of the Atlantic, it is certain that Mr. Molé was able singly to cope with its difficulties, thread its intricacies and come out triumphant and by no means breathless. Exactly why so large an adjective as "symphonic" should form part of the title, does not appear, although the first and third movements are fully and elaborately developed in the orchestra as well as wrought up to the extreme limit of possible virtuosity in the solo part. The flute being an absolutely passionless instrument and capable at the most of a certain cool pensiveness, its best capacity being for giving light, play and airiness, through and over the general body of instrumental tone, the composer wisely confined it here to the service of such qualities. The first movement, entitled "The Will-o'-the-Wisp" is full of flying, scurrying, evasive, fantastic figures, whose vivacious speed and far ranges test not only the players' swiftness and clearness of execution, but by the most extended compass of his instrument. It is most skillful in design and application, but it is not always altogether pleasant to hear. The rapidity of fingering and the close continuity of the phrases make one worry lest the player be feeling an exertion and fatigue which very likely do not exist for him, while the frequent sudden leaps and skips force into the sharpest contrast the dissimilar tones which lie in the highest and lowest registers of the flute scale. The second movement, "Melancholy," has but little ornament directly applied to the solo part, which depends chiefly therefore upon pure and placid tone, sustained phrasing and grace of style. The last movement, "The Dance of the Will-o'-the-Wisps," returns to the manner of the first movement, but is less long and exacting and more gay and brilliant. Mr. Mole played the whole marvelously well and got great applause—some sympathy, too, from those who, feeling the execution to be so difficult as almost to pass into impossibility, were vicariously weary for him. There were no breaks in the tremendously long running passages, and, although sometimes the phrasing sounded not quite easy, the fact that the player must catch a sup of breath when the compulsive velocity permitted, would account for that. In the romance all went smoothly and sweetly, however, and its intellectual and simple sentimental character was maintained.

The symphony, which was Mozart's No. 39, the great E-flat major one—was placed first, and was generally well read. In the opening there were some love threads which required a little gathering and binding, and the minuet sounded so cunning from under rather too heavy hands, the strings playing as if they had to oppose the full modern wind choir instead of the small group of wood and brass (without trombones) which enter into the score. The andante had an excellent rendering, however, and the final allegro moved in the right spirit under the right touch.

After Mr. Mole's number were placed three Schubert pieces—the favorite ballet andantino and the entr' acte from "Rosamunde," together with the B-minor "Heroic" march (from the four-hand set, opus 40) in Liszt's orchestration, which came a little heavily and dully after the lightsome beauties of the other excerpts.

The last number was Auber's overture to "Carlo Broschi," with its nice little slow introduction, its whirling violin figure—which seems to anticipate the similar idea in "Le Rouet d' Omphale," its gay hunting-horn measures, and its brisk, vigorous finale, so clearly calculated to send up the curtain with a rush upon some scene of activity and bustle. The playing was capital in respect of life and freshness, and in the violin figure the strings came nearer to a real pianissimo than we have yet heard them this season.

The next concert will include for the orchestra Goldmark's "Sappho" overture, new here, Raff's "Wood" symphony and Liszt's "Preludes." Mrs. Elene B. (Kehew) Eaton will make her re-entree and sing Weber's "Ocean, thou mighty Monster," and Handel's "Oh sleep," from "Semele."

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

The week of music began promptly on Monday evening, when the Kneisel Quartette gave in Union Hall their second concert, a gratifyingly large and largely gratified audience being present. The concert began with Cherubini's quartette in D minor, of which the first movement was not encouraging, for its simplicity seemed to be in danger of degenerating into dulness. But it is not the habit of these players to bring forward anything which will not well repay both artist and hearer, and confidence in their judgment was rewarded by the subsequent movements, in which the best qualities of the master appear in turn—his calm purity of melody, his lightness of heart and hand, his solidity of method and his nobility of spirit. The larghetto is broad and sweet, the scherzo delicately gay or gently pensive, and the finale is strong and earnest. Following this came Beethoven's quartette in E-flat major, opus 94, which seemed richer, deeper and fuller by contrast with the less profound although always earnest and honest sentiment of Cherubini, and stirred the audience to its warmest and most responsive feeling. The third work was Rubinstein's pianoforte trio in A minor, a masterly work, and yet one in which inconsistencies and lapses are not infrequent, and which perhaps will always depend for its chief effect upon the ability of the pianist to cope with its enormous difficulties. On this occasion the pianist was Mr. Ernst Perabo, whose performance was preceded a day or two before by an enthusiastic but slightly rhapsodical analysis and laudation published over his signature in an evening paper. His playing was characterized throughout by the nicety of understanding, the eagerness to make the music mean to the listener what it means to him, and the strong and facile technique which in happy union have made him and kept him a favorite. The Quartette played beautifully, intelligently and forcefully as is their wont, and no blemishes marred their consonancy of spirit and manner, although an odd little disagreement about the length of a suspension in the trio gave a chance for the score readers to look wise and smile.

SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 18, 1894.

The Fifth Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

This was the program of the Symphony concert given under Mr. Paur last evening in Music Hall:

Symphony, E flat.....Mozart
Symphonic poem for flute and orchestra (first time here).....Benoit
Ballet-movement and Entr'acte from "Rosamunde".....Schubert
Heroic march in B minor, No. 3, op. 40.....Schubert-Liszt
Overture, "La Part du Diable".....Auber

Benoit is a composer little known in Boston, and yet there are some that regard him as one of the most prominent of musicians now living. A man of singular sincerity and inexorable will, he has devoted himself to the task of making Flemish music immortal, a task to which the extraction of sunbeams from cucumbers would be a holiday affair. Deeply indebted to the German school, he thinks forsooth that by writing music for Flemish texts and by using Flemish words to indicate the desired pace and expression, he thus contributes to the glory of his race.

Little by him has been given in this city. In New York he has a zealous disciple in Mr. Frank Van der Stucken, who was his pupil. Mr. Van der Stucken has endeavored to repay a debt of gratitude and show his unfeigned admiration by giving works of Benoit for chorus as well as for orchestra. These works excited respect as well as curiosity to know more about this singular musician. "Lucifer," a colossal affair for chorus and orchestra, has been produced in London, and it certainly is worthy of the examination, at least, of the Cecilia. The overture "Charlotte Corday" has a right to a hearing in a symphony concert.

It is not at all likely that the flute concerto, introduced last evening for the purpose of displaying the undoubted talent of Mr. Charles Molé, gives one a just idea of the musical equipment and imagination of the composer. As many virtuoso pieces, it was probably written on account of a friend who was addicted to the flute, and, as a rule, in carrying out such a friendly intention, the composer must keep one eye on the friend and one on the Muse. It must be confessed that the concerto, as a whole, did not leave an impression of strength or beauty.

There were pleasing passages; there were interesting bits of instrumentation; there was a commendable absence of clap-trap, of deliberate appeal to the unthinking; but as a whole, the concerto seemed to be a rather cumbrous machine built to carry the flute-player aloft in a blaze of glory. The blaze, however, is to come from the player, and not from the machine. The first movement, "Will-o' the-wisps," is the most interesting, and it contains considerable picturesque detail. It is my impression that the sky-defying cadenza is not in the original score. The second movement, "Melancholy," recalls irresistibly, but by ironical contrast, the air "Away with Melancholy," once dear to Mr. Swiveller.

There is in this movement a pleasing use of the horn with the flute, and there are striking passages for the 'cellos, but the treatment of the subject "Melancholy" is too realistic, and, as the part for the flute is not particularly grateful, the movement is, perhaps suitably, depressing. The finale "Dance of Will-o'-the-Wisps" is perfunctory music in the main. All this jack-o'-lantern business was better understood by a Frenchman named Berlioz. This may be said, however, in behalf of the concerto—it errs on the side of earnestness rather than frivolity, and when one considers the mass of rubbishy tootle-tootle-too that has been written for the flute, one is inclined to remove the hat to Benoit.

The characteristics of Mr. Molé's playing are well known to the musical public of Paris, Berlin and Boston, and to praise them at length at this late day would almost be an impertinence. An easy and graceful master of all technical difficulties, a musician of taste, skilful in phrasing on account of his remarkable control of breath, he is, indeed, an artist of high rank. At times he is, perhaps, too anxious to obtain enormous tone, and the instrument which he uses does not always respond musically to the demands of his ambition. He was most heartily applauded.

Although it may seem ungracious to say so in view of this player's uncommon skill, the place for the flute in a symphony concert is in the orchestra, as one of many instruments. As for that matter, a symphony concert without a soloist—fiddler, flute player, 'cellist, pianist or singer—is more to be desired, is more thoroughly rounded and complete than when the element of individuality enters so strongly, and in a word dominates.

***

The other numbers of the program do not call for extended comment. The andante in the symphony gained by the fact that it was played as an andante, and not dragged out till it was turned into a yawn-provoking adagio, as is too often the case. The menuette and the finale are still delightful, but the symphony as a whole must be ranked below the imperishable G minor, and some of it now seems hopelessly old-fashioned.

The selections from "Rosamunde" showed to great advantage the body of wood-wind, which has been strengthened by the introduction of the new first bassoonist and first clarinetist. The arrangement of the march by Liszt is undoubtedly clever, but it is not without insincerity, the besetting sin of the Hungarian Monk. In this march the kettle drum man again endeavored by dry thumping to convince the audience that he is obliged to play an inherently unmusical instrument. Other drummers have been heard in this city, and his earnest efforts are, therefore, in vain.

It was a pleasure to hear an overture by Auber, although the master of opera-comique wrote other overtures that would have revealed more fully his piquancy and elegance. They say that Mr. Paur preferred the seldom-used title "Carlo Broschi" because he objected to the presence of his Satanic Majesty in the original title "La Part du Diable." This is a case of remarkable prudery. How, pray, would Mr. Paur change the title of the "Mephisto" waltz? And has he never heard Auber's opera in Germany under the title of "Des Teufel's Antheil?"

Some may have wondered at the appearance of such a light overture on a symphony program. Our public is so accustomed to great and ponderous, deep and massive works that it should be educated up to the enjoyment of that which is light and sparkling. I hope the day will come when Mr. Paur will have the courage to conduct in the sight of the people a foot-inciting, heart-rejoicing, sensuous waltz of Johann Strauss.

PHILIP HALE.

SUNDAY, NOV. 18, 1894.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS.

Echoes from Yesterday's Symphony Concert.

The program provided by director Paur for the fifth Symphony concert was, by comparison with recent offerings, of a light and varied order. There was an uncommon abundance of melody and consequently an unusual amount of applause. No one would presume to insinuate that the symphony concert patrons do not thoroughly comprehend and enjoy the most severe and ponderous compositions of the so-called classical or conservatory character, and yet it is interesting to note the contrast between the dignified patter of applause after the performance of one of those grave works and the enthusiastic expressions of delight which invariably reward the interpretation of any composition that is rich in melody.

Yesterday's program was as follows: Mozart's symphony, No. 39, in E flat major, symphonic poem for flute and orchestra by Peter Benoit, ballet movement and entr' acte from the opera "Rosamunde," heroic march in B minor (scored for orchestra by Franz Liszt) by Schubert, and the overture to Auber's opera "Carlo Broschi."

Mr. Charles Mole was the soloist and very cordial was the greeting given him. Mr Mole has for several years been generally and justly accorded first rank among resident flute soloists, and it is unlikely that he has today a superior in this country. He was heard to great advantage in Benoit's brilliant composition, which gives rare opportunity for the soloist to display his virtuosity. The orchestral accompaniment is also an elaborate writing, rich in harmony and contrasted effects. There are three movements, the first and rather the most interesting has the title of "Will-o'-the-wisps," an apt title for the dainty, flickering effects of the tone painting. The movement ends with a long cadenza which fairly bristles with trying tests of the performer's command of technique. Mr Mole's technique is equal to every requirement, and the brilliancy of his performance last evening moved the audience to demonstrative expressions of approval. The second movement, a slow and rather melancholy work in romanza form, is not notable for either originality or beauty. The last movement (dance of the will-o'-the-wisps) is graceful and sprightly. Mr Mole was recalled several times, and he merited all the favor bestowed upon him.

Mr Paur's reading of the Mozart symphony is to be thoroughly commended. Esepecially delightful was the performance of the minuet. The magnificent composition has never received more intelligent or satisfying interpretation at these concerts. The exquisite ballet music, written by Schubert for his ill-fated opera, "Rosamunde," was charmingly played, and no less pleasing was the performance of the entr'acte music. Liszt's brilliant arrangement of Schubert's "Heroic March" was given with splendid effect, and the "Carlo Broschi" overture was listened to with great pleasure.

The following program is announced for the next concert:

Overture, Sappho .....Goldmark
(First time at these concerts.)
Aria, Ocean, thou mighty monster .....Weber
Symphony, Im Walde .....Raff
Aria from Semele, O sleep, why dost thou leave me? .....Haendel
Symphonic poem, Les Preludes .....Liszt
Soloist, Mrs Elene B. Eaton.

[52]

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, NOV. 18.

The Symphony Concert.

The following is the programme of the fifth Symphony Concert:

Symphony in E flat, — Mozart
Symphonic Poem, flute and orchestra, Peter Benoit
Ballet and Entré Acte, from "Rosamunde," Schubert
March in B-minor, Schubert-Liszt
Overture, "Carlo Broschi," Auber

As will be seen, the programme is an excellent example of Mr. Paur's fine, broad taste and ripe judgment. It may seem strange that it is necessary to defend the admission of Auber's name on the classic concert list; but tradition is still a strong power in the world of music, and there are many estimable people who still confound classicism with dulness, and who draw back in dismay from the heterodoxy branded as "tune." They look upon the word "classic" as they regard the label on their dress coats—it is a mark of their own particular tailor; all else is vulgar. It would be curious to inquire what peculiar traits make Wagner a classic, and, on the other hand, Auber a vulgar composer; why a minuet by Brahms is in itself superior to a waltz by Strauss. If dallying with dances is a musical crime what shall be said of Bach, Handel and the old composers generally? Considering the woeful waste of words that mark our end-of-the-century criticism, it is best to accept all art works on their merits, and to leave discussions on classicism to those with whom art is a conventionality and not a vital growth. Mr. Paur's attempt to give good music of every kind, irrespective of the boundary lines drawn by conceited ignorance, will meet with the heartiest approval of all who are interested in music as an art and not as a hobby. The attempt was useful in another way, those who objected to light music found the Auber overture gave them ample time to put on their wraps, overcoats and overshoes, Auber not demanding the respectful attention that is claimed by approved classic composers.

Certainly no objection could be found with the Mozart symphony, either on the score of matter or interpretation. The reading was noticeable for its perfect taste, for its full comprehension of the composer's meaning, which is not a rare gift, and for its realization of the idea, a less common merit. The finest details were lovingly given without loss of broadness; light and shade were exactly defined and nothing could have been better than the delicate and all sufficient rendering of the andante and allegro movements, the beauty, grace and joy of the one, the passion, always dignified, impetuosity and poetry of the other. The delightful finale was given with fascinating gaiety and spirit, it was fairly dazzling in brilliancy, and what is better, it was always a truthful rendering of the intentions of the composer.

The Schubert-Liszt march appealed to the emotions and the intellect at the same time; we felt with Schubert, and indulged in syllogism to prove, what was needless, that Liszt is never greater than himself. The Auber overture was given with fine dash and vigor, and, by its inherent worth, more than demonstrated its right to a place on the programme. It was hardly touched by age; it was brilliant, and it was true music.

The novelty of the evening was the Symphonic Poem. It may be that it did not reveal its beauties at one hearing, but what it did reveal were brilliancy and artificiality. It was meaningless and patchworky. The work is that of a musician, but it is trivial and is somewhat suggestive of the good old-fashioned themes and variations for the piano, where nimble fingers took the place of ideas, and virtuosity elbowed fine art into the background. The flute says nothing with elaborate brilliancy, and the other instruments utter envious comments and try to show how much better they could say nothing if they were allowed the opportunity.

The flute solo part was most ably interpreted by Mr. Molé; there was abundant evidence of taste and the highest skill. The many difficulties were mastered with graceful ease and the soloist was greeted with the heartiest applause, and was twice called out to bow his thanks.

The programme for the next concert is: Goldmark's overture, "Sappho;" Weber's aria, "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster;" Raff's "Im Walde" symphony; Aria from "Semele," Handel and Liszt's symphonic poem "Les Preludes." Mrs. Elene Eaton is the soloist.

The Kneisel Quartet.

A large audience assembled on Monday evening, to hear Mr. Kneisel and his fellow artists interpret the following programme:

Quartet in D-minor.....Cherubini.
Quartet in E-flat.....Beethoven.
Piano Trio in A-minor.....Rubinstein.

The Cherubini quartet is a fine, large, rich work of great dignity, sweetness and fire, pure and firmly cut in outline and filled to fulness with lofty ideas. The finest art is apparent from opening bar to finish, and if this quartet be a specimen of "pedagogue" music, it is a pity that our present day pedagogues do not give us similar kinds of work. The opening movement is the least satisfactory; the second movement is very beautifully colored with rich imagination and developed with the clearest and most incisive artistic taste. The scherzo is delightful, nothing daintier in conception and in carrying out has been written; its fine simplicity is based on the most consummate knowledge, and its open-air freedom and motion suggestive of the firm hand and delicate imagination of a genius; while the finale is a large and vigorous piece of work, filled with fiery impetuosity and with an imagination held in check by the most refined art. The work was beautifully interpreted; the scherzo especially calling forth the most enthusiastic applause.

The Beethoven quartet was in strong contrast to the Cherubini work; it stood alone in its majestic beauty, a perpetual sign of the unerring skill and power of inspiration. Nothing new can be said of it, and yet one is tempted to utter commonplaces in the enthusiasm of beauty-worship. This noble work received noble treatment; it was interpreted with the most loving devotion and care and with the most conscientious art. The playing of the adagio movement calls for particular commendation, Mr. Kneisel's work being of the very finest quality, of exquisite delicacy and refinement and with faultless taste. No finer playing has been heard on the concert stage, and the audience repaid Mr. Kneisel with well deserved and long continued applause.

The Rubinstein trio is a pleasure and a disappointment at one and the same time. It is a large, dignified and noble work, and yet the sincerity not unfrequently sinks to the level of affectation. The nightingale occasionally loses its full, rich voice, and the owl temporarily takes its place; there is noise that means nothing; difficulties are invented because they are difficulties; there are abrupt contrasts that startle one from their unexpectedness and not from their artistic fitness. The continuity of idea is broken with what seems to be mere wilfulness, all evidence of self restraint is absent, the composer seemingly surrendering himself to a capricious mood that rises and sinks without discoverable reason. The beauties are so marked, and of so fine a quality, that one is doubly irritated by the faults which mar them. Mr. Perabo played the piano part of this work, a part bristling with difficulties, yet which seemed mere child's play under his hands. He played with clearness and with artistic unobtrusiveness, and with a fine sense of color graduation. It was manly, dignified and broad playing, and won for itself hearty and discriminating applause.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, NOV. 18, 1894.

The solo number of Mr. Paur's fifth Symphony programme was a symphonic poem for the flute, written by the Flemish composer, Peter Leonard Leopold Benoit. It is dedicated to two flutists of eminence, Dumon of Brussels and Anthoni of Antwerp. Whether or not one is to understand by this dedication that it took both of those artists to play it on the other side of the Atlantic, it is certain that Mr. Mole was able singly to cope with its difficulties, thread its intricacies and come out triumphant and by no means breathless. Exactly why so large an adjective as "symphonic" should form part of the title, does not appear, although the first and third movements are fully and elaborately developed in the orchestra as well as wrought up to the extreme limit of possible virtuosity in the solo part. The flute being an absolutely passionless instrument and capable at the most of a certain cool pensiveness, its best capacity being for giving light, play and airiness, through and over the general body of instrumental tone, the composer wisely confined it here to the service of such qualities. The first movement, entitled "The Will-o'-the-Wisp" is full of flying, scurrying, evasive, fantastic figures, whose vivacious speed and far ranges test not only the players' swiftness and clearness of execution, but by the most extended compass of his instrument. It is most skillful in design and application, but it is not always altogether pleasant to hear. The rapidity of fingering and the close continuity of the phrases make one worry lest the player be feeling an exertion and fatigue which very likely do not exist for him, while the frequent sudden leaps and skips force into the sharpest contrast the dissimilar tones which lie in the highest and lowest registers of the flute scale. The second movement, "Melancholy," has but little ornament directly applied to the solo part, which depends chiefly therefore upon pure and placid tone, sustained phrasing and grace of style. The last movement, "The Dance of the Will-o'-the-Wisps," returns to the manner of the first movement, but is less long and exacting and more gay and brilliant. Mr. Mole played the whole marvelously well and got great applause—some sympathy, too, from those who, feeling the execution to be so difficult as almost to pass into impossibility, were vicariously weary for him. There were no breaks in the tremendously long running passages, and, although sometimes the phrasing sounded not quite easy, the fact that the player must catch a sup of breath when the compulsive velocity permitted, would account for that. In the romance all went smoothly and sweetly, however, and its intellectual and simple sentimental character was maintained.

The symphony, which was Mozart's No. 39, the great E-flat major one—was placed first, and was generally well read. In the opening there were some love threads which required a little gathering and binding, and the minuet sounded so cunning from under rather too heavy hands, the strings playing as if they had to oppose the full modern wind choir instead of the small group of wood and brass (without trombones) which enter into the score. The andante had an excellent rendering, however, and the final allegro moved in the right spirit under the right touch.

After Mr. Mole's number were placed three Schubert pieces—the favorite ballet andantino and the entr' acte from "Rosamunde," together with the B-minor "Heroic" march (from the four-hand set, opus 40) in Liszt's orchestration, which came a little heavily and dully after the lightsome beauties of the other excerpts.

The last number was Auber's overture to "Carlo Broschi," with its nice little slow introduction, its whirling violin figure—which seems to anticipate the similar idea in "Le Rouet d' Omphale," its gay hunting-horn measures, and its brisk, vigorous finale, so clearly calculated to send up the curtain with a rush upon some scene of activity and bustle. The playing was capital in respect of life and freshness, and in the violin figure the strings came nearer to a real pianissimo than we have yet heard them this season.

The next concert will include for the orchestra Goldmark's "Sappho" overture, new here, Raff's "Wood" symphony and Liszt's "Preludes." Mrs. Elene B. (Kehew) Eaton will make her re-entree and sing Weber's "Ocean, thou mighty Monster," and Handel's "Oh sleep," from "Semele."

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

The week of music began promptly on Monday evening, when the Kneisel Quartette gave in Union Hall their second concert, a gratifyingly large and largely gratified audience being present. The concert began with Cherubini's quartette in D minor, of which the first movement was not encouraging, for its simplicity seemed to be in danger of degenerating into dullness. But it is not the habit of these players to bring forward anything which will not well repay both artist and hearer, and confidence in their judgment was rewarded by the subsequent movements, in which the best qualities of the master appear in turn—his calm purity of melody, his lightness of heart and hand, his solidity of method and his nobility of spirit. The larghetto is broad and sweet, the scherzo delicately gay or gently pensive, and the finale is strong and earnest. Following this came Beethoven's quartette in E-flat major, opus 94, which seemed richer, deeper and fuller by contrast with the less profound although always earnest and honest sentiment of Cherubini, and stirred the audience to its warmest and most responsive feeling. The third work was Rubinstein's pianoforte trio in A minor, a masterly work, and yet one in which inconsistencies and lapses are not infrequent, and which perhaps will always depend for its chief effect upon the ability of the pianist to cope with its enormous difficulties. On this occasion the pianist was Mr. Ernst Perabo, whose performance was preceded a day or two before by an enthusiastic but slightly rhapsodical analysis and laudation published over his signature in an evening paper. His playing was characterized throughout by the nicety of understanding, the eagerness to make the music mean to the listener what it means to him, and the strong and facile technique which in happy union have made him and kept him a favorite. The Quartette played beautifully, intelligently and forcefully as is their wont, and no blemishes marred their consonancy of spirit and manner, although an odd little disagreement about the length of a suspension in the trio gave a chance for the score readers to look wise and smile.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 18, 1894.

The Fifth Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

This was the program of the Symphony concert given under Mr. Paur last evening in Music Hall:

Symphony, E flat.....Mozart
Symphonic poem for flute and orchestra (first time here).....Benoit
Ballet-movement and Entr'acte from "Rosamunde".....Schubert
Heroic march in B minor, No. 3, op. 40.....Schubert-Liszt
Overture, "La Part du Diable".....Auber

Benoit is a composer little known in Boston, and yet there are some that regard him as one of the most prominent of musicians now living. A man of singular sincerity and inexorable will, he has devoted himself to the task of making Flemish music immortal, a task to which the extraction of sunbeams from cucumbers would be a holiday affair. Deeply indebted to the German school, he thinks forsooth that by writing music for Flemish texts and by using Flemish words to indicate the desired pace and expression, he thus contributes to the glory of his race.

Little by him has been given in this city. In New York he has a zealous disciple in Mr. Frank Van der Stucken, who was his pupil. Mr. Van der Stucken has endeavored to repay a debt of gratitude and show his unfeigned admiration by giving works of Benoit for chorus as well as for orchestra. These works excited respect as well as curiosity to know more about this singular musician. "Lucifer," a colossal affair for chorus and orchestra, has been produced in London, and it certainly is worthy of the examination, at least, of the Cecilia. The overture "Charlotte Corday" has a right to a hearing in a symphony concert.

It is not at all likely that the flute concerto, introduced last evening for the purpose of displaying the undoubted talent of Mr. Charles Molé, gives one a just idea of the musical equipment and imagination of the composer. As many virtuoso pieces, it was probably written on account of a friend who was addicted to the flute, and, as a rule, in carrying out such a friendly intention, the composer must keep one eye on the friend and one on the Muse. It must be confessed that the concerto, as a whole, did not leave an impression of strength or beauty.

There were pleasing passages; there were interesting bits of instrumentation; there was a commendable absence of clap-trap, of deliberate appeal to the unthinking; but as a whole, the concerto seemed to be a rather cumbrous machine built to carry the flute-player aloft in a blaze of glory. The blaze, however, is to come from the player, and not from the machine. The first movement, "Will-o' the-wisps," is the most interesting, and it contains considerable picturesque detail. It is my impression that the sky-defying cadenza is not in the original score. The second movement, "Melancholy," recalls irresistibly, but by ironical contrast, the air "Away with Melancholy," once dear to Mr. Swiveller.

There is in this movement a pleasing use of the horn with the flute, and there are striking passages for the 'cellos, but the treatment of the subject "Melancholy" is too realistic, and, as the part for the flute is not particularly grateful, the movement is, perhaps suitably, depressing. The finale "Dance of Will-o'-the-Wisps" is perfunctory music in the main. All this jack-o'-lantern business was better understood by a Frenchman named Berlioz. This may be said, however, in behalf of the concerto—it errs on the side of earnestness rather than frivolity, and when one considers the mass of rubbishy tootle-tootle-too that has been written for the flute, one is inclined to remove the hat to Benoit.

The characteristics of Mr. Molé's playing are well known to the musical public of Paris, Berlin and Boston, and to praise them at length at this late day would almost be an impertinence. An easy and graceful master of all technical difficulties, a musician of taste, skillful in phrasing on account of his remarkable control of breath, he is, indeed, an artist of high rank. At times he is, perhaps, too anxious to obtain enormous tone, and the instrument which he uses does not always respond musically to the demands of his ambition. He was most heartily applauded.

Although it may seem ungracious to say so in view of this player's uncommon skill, the place for the flute in a symphony concert is in the orchestra, as one of many instruments. As for that matter, a symphony concert without a soloist—fiddler, flute player, 'cellist, pianist or singer—is more to be desired, is more thoroughly rounded and complete than when the element of individuality enters so strongly, and in a word dominates.

***

The other numbers of the program do not call for extended comment. The andante in the symphony gained by the fact that it was played as an andante, and not dragged out till it was turned into a yawn-provoking adagio, as is too often the case. The menuetto and the finale are still delightful, but the symphony as a whole must be ranked below the imperishable G minor, and some of it now seems hopelessly old-fashioned.

The selections from "Rosamunde" showed to great advantage the body of wood-wind, which has been strengthened by the introduction of the new first bassoonist and first clarinetist. The arrangement of the march by Liszt is undoubtedly clever, but it is not without insincerity, the besetting sin of the Hungarian Monk. In this march the kettle drum man again endeavored by dry thumping to convince the audience that he is obliged to play an inherently unmusical instrument. Other drummers have been heard in this city, and his earnest efforts are, therefore, in vain.

It was a pleasure to hear an overture by Auber, although the master of opera-comique wrote other overtures that would have revealed more fully his piquancy and elegance. They say that Mr. Paur preferred the seldom-used title "Carlo Broschi" because he objected to the presence of his Satanic Majesty in the original title "La Part du Diable." This is a case of remarkable prudery. How, pray, would Mr. Paur change the title of the "Mephisto" waltz? And has he never heard Auber's opera in Germany under the title of "Des Teufel's Antheil?"

Some may have wondered at the appearance of such a light overture on a symphony program. Our public is so accustomed to great and ponderous, deep and massive works that it should be educated up to the enjoyment of that which is light and sparkling. I hope the day will come when Mr. Paur will have the courage to conduct in the sight of the people a foot-inciting, heart-rejoicing, sensuous waltz of Johann Strauss.

PHILIP HALE

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, NOV. 18, 1894.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS.

Echoes from Yesterday's Symphony Concert.

The program provided by director Paur for the fifth symphony concert was, by comparison with recent offerings, of a light and varied order. There was an uncommon abundance of melody and consequently an unusual amount of applause. No one would presume to insinuate that the symphony concert patrons do not thoroughly comprehend and enjoy the most severe and ponderous compositions of the so-called classical or conservatory character, and yet it is interesting to note the contrast between the dignified patter of applause after the performance of one of those grave works and the enthusiastic expressions of delight which invariably reward the interpretation of any composition that is rich in melody.

Yesterday's program was as follows: Mozart's symphony, No. 39, in E flat major, symphonic poem for flute and orchestra by Peter Benoit, ballet movement and entr' acte from the opera "Rosamunde," heroic march in B minor (scored for orchestra by Franz Liszt) by Schubert, and the overture to Auber's opera "Carlo Broschi."

Mr. Charles Mole was the soloist and very cordial was the greeting given him. Mr Mole has for several years been generally and justly accorded first rank among resident flute soloists, and it is unlikely that he has today a superior in this country. He was heard to great advantage in Benoit's brilliant composition, which gives rare opportunity for the soloist to display his virtuosity. The orchestral accompaniment is also an elaborate writing, rich in harmony and contrasted effects. There are three movements, the first and rather the most interesting has the title of "Will-o'-the-wisps," an apt title for the dainty, flickering effects of the tone painting. The movement ends with a long cadenza which fairly bristles with trying tests of the performer's command of technique. Mr Mole's technique is equal to every requirement, and the brilliancy of his performance last evening moved the audience to demonstrative expressions of approval. The second movement, a slow and rather melancholy work in romanza form, is not notable for either originality or beauty. The last movement (dance of the will-o'-the-wisps) is graceful and sprightly. Mr Mole was recalled several times, and he merited all the favor bestowed upon him.

Mr Paur's reading of the Mozart symphony is to be thoroughly commended. Esepecially delightful was the performance of the minuet. The magnificent composition has never received more intelligent or satisfying interpretation at these concerts. The exquisite ballet music, written by Schubert for his ill-fated opera, "Rosamunde," was charmingly played, and no less pleasing was the performance of the entr'acte music. Liszt's brilliant arrangement of Schubert's "Heroic March" was given with splendid effect, and the "Carlo Broschi" overture was listened to with great pleasure.

The following program is announced for the next concert:

Overture, Sappho .....Goldmark
(First time at these concerts.)
Aria, Ocean, thou mighty monster .....Weber
Symphony, Im Walde .....Raff
Aria from Semele, O sleep, why dost thou leave me? .....Haendel
Symphonic poem, Les Preludes .....Liszt
Soloist, Mrs Elene B. Eaton.

[52]

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
MONDAY MORNING, NOV. 19, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY.

NOTICEABLE SECULARIZATION OF CONCERTS.

The Fifth Programme Contains Numbers by Schubert, Benoit and Mozart, Almost a Wave of Lightness — Mr. Paur's Conducting Again Delightful.

That the programme for symphony concert number five, in Music Hall Saturday evening included but a single work that musicians could unreservedly admire, must be attributed to a popular demand, that has recently been made, for the secularization of these concerts. When a musician so orthodox as Herr Paur reluctantly yields to such a demand, and doubtless in the spirit of stooping to conquer, his artistic morale will not for a moment be questioned; while one recognizes with pleasant surprise a possession of diplomacy on his part, the lack of which last season seemed a constant source of peril to the success of the symphony concerts. So it will not do to carp and cant about the heterodoxical show-piece, or the bright and lively overture, that were performed Saturday evening. If, however, it should become the rule rather than the exception to secularize our symphony concerts then the world w de fame of Mr. Higginson's noble enterprise would necessarily decay. Will the time ever come when this enterprise shall be desecrated by any habitual interpolation of such music as is not above the suspicion of be ng leprously impure? Surely not while Emil Paur is at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. (Undoubtedly Saturday night's programme was an exception.) As well might we ask if the heresy of Payne or Ingersoll will ever be preached at "brimstone corner." Shades of our lamented reverends Lyman Beecher and John S. Dwight forbid.

So without judging from any such standpoint as would enforce that rigid and old-fogy preference that once ruled the Harvard concerts even to their ruin, any liberal minded musician will feel grateful to Herr Paur for such a popular programme as he had to offer on Saturday. Had a set of Strauss waltzes taken the place of the sugary music by Schubert—neither fish, flesh, nor fowl—that was played, the artistic standard of the concert would certainly have been no lower.

A just estimate of Peter-Léonard-Léopold Benoit can hardly be formed from his so-called symphonic poem for flute and orchestra. It is a work full of melody, which is nevertheless interpolated with an all too bulky, too burdensome pading of virtuosic and tawdry ornamental passages to admit of its being dignified with the high-sounding title of Symphonic Poem We should bear in mind that the symphonic poem itself is one those absurd misnomers that have become current in music, and that owe its existence to a somewhat faulty translation of the original French term as ascribed by Franz Liszt namely, "poème Symphonique," which in German afterwards became "Symphonische Dichtung," a term to which our English trans ation is strictly faithful. Benoit's hybrid opus for flute and orchestra would seem to merit about as much serious analysis as would a new kind of kaleidoscope. The entertainment it affords, too, depends quite largely upon the care with which it is handled.

Its performance by Mr. Charles Molé was conspicuous for a technical brilliancy and refinement, that had their sum total in one of the most artistic impressions that virtuosity could convey. Admirable and wonderful playing that that could carry with it its own argument for the very existance of the flute. Speaking of wood-wind instruments calls to mind that Mozart wrote his first forty-six symphonies—there are forty-nine in all—without employing the clarinet and that he first made use of it—save in Figaro (1786) and Don Giovanni (1787)—in the E flat symphony No. 4?, his 543rd work, played Saturday evening. The instrument was invented in 1700, but Bach, Handel, Haydn had been loth to recognize its merits. It is doubtful if any more conspicuous and beautiful clarinet music can be found prior to 1788, and then by Mozart in his jovial minuet of the E flat symphony, where the first clarinet plays the melody while the second has an arpeggio accompaniment—both parts being given with unprecedented charm on Saturday evening. Mr. Paur gave the traditional andante of this symphony. It sounded odd enough, but proved delightfully welcome to hear the movement played at least a half dozen metronomic degrees faster than the hyper-sentimental conductor Nikisch was wont to take it. A few more statistics concerning the E flat symphony may prove acceptable. In the year 1788 Mozart's social popularity in Vienna was at its height. He then outrivalled Handel for rapid and perennial work by composing within two months' time his three greatest symphonies, namely, the one in E flat, completed June 26; the G minor, July 25, and the "Jupiter," noblest of all, and the very last, August 10.

Within two decades Mozart wrote nearly 500 works of enduring merit,—including concertos, symphonies, sonatas, masses, etc.—if what other composer, Schubert perhaps excepted, can a similar record be made?

Herr Paur's reading of the work as a whole was that of a scholarly and reverent conservator. The tempo rubato was conspicuous by its absence, especially when one recalls the Nikisch interpretation of the same work. The noble simplicity of the first allegro and the bright, active dance life of the finale were especially well set forth. A very just value was placed upon the pronounced lyric character of the andante. Not even from Herr Gericke has Mozart's exquisite and inimitable art been more lovingly interpreted here. Would, however, that the symphony for the evening had been either the "Jupiter" or the G minor. As for the orchestra (excepting the unsatisfactory accompaniment that well-nigh failed to accompany Mr. Molé in the selection by Benoit) its unsurpassed standard was creditably maintained at this concert. The programme is assured for next week in which vocal students will be especially interested. Raff's "Im Walde" is the symphony.

C. L. CAPEN.

Daily EVENING News.
FALL RIVER, Mass.
THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 22.

KNIESEL QUARTETTE.

A Delightful Concert at Music Hall.

The unpleasant weather of the earlier part of last evening did not prevent a good attendance for the second number of the Artists' Concert Course at Music Hall. The people in the audience were well repaid for going, for the concert was given by the Kneizel Quartette and Mrs. Ada May Benzing, and better talent never came here.

The Kneisel Quartette is always good, and last evening it was at its best. Mrs. Benzing has a powerful and very pleasing contralto voice, and she was very well received, being given a recall after her second number, though the did not give an encore. In fact, no encores were given, though the audience gave most convincing signs of its desire that two or three selections might be repeated. Mr. Alwin Schroeder's solo number on violincello was the favorite, and he was called out three or four times, but he would not play again. The whole concert was a most delightful one and insures the success of such a course for every season.

The opening number was a quartet in F major, op. 90 (American) Dvorak. This quartet is founded on themes taken from the negro melodies of the South. There was a swing to the music that was most taking, and that brought out the power of all four instruments but in a unison that made them as one. Four movements were given.

Mrs. Benzing next sang two songs by Grieg, "I Love Thee," and "Autumn Storms." She used to the best aduantage her powerful and exceedingly smooth contralto voice, and filled the hall to its farthest corners with sweet rich sounds.

Mr. Kneisel gave as a solo a "Spanish Dance," by Sarasate. He played with great delicacy and fine shading and expression rather than force, and when he finished the audience was roused to enthusiastic applause. Variations from Schubert's quartette in D minor was played by request, and again showed the quartette at its best. Mrs. Benzing's second number was "A Summer Night," Goring Thomas. She did this so well that she was compelled to come out and bow in response to the applause. Mr. James D. H. Comey accompanied Mrs. Benzing most skilfully in both her numbers. In his solos for the violincello Mr. Schroeder first played a very classical selection. Bach's "Praeludium," In it he exhibited his talent and notable ability, but the piece is rather beyond any audience except one of high musical education. His second selection was probably the best of the whole concert. At least it was the most popular. It was a "Spanish Serenade," by Popper, and it may be called the gem of the evening. In it Mr. Schroeder displayed his mastery of his instrument in a wonderful technique which is combined with a most perfect expression. The tones of his instrument always struck upon the ear as natural, never forced. The closing number was Haydn's quartet in G major, given by the quartette. It was another highly classical selection. Four movements were given.

FALL RIVER DAILY HERALD,
NOVEMBER 22, 1894.

The Kneisel Quartet.

The Kneisel quartet entertained a large audience in Music hall last night in the second concert of the artists' course. This organization has been heard in this city, and is always sure of an enthusiastic welcome among the lovers of high class music. With the exception of Alwin Schroeder, the violoncellist, the personnel of the quartet is the same as in other years. Its work, too, was of the high order expected of it and aroused much enthusiasm, particularly the variations from Shubert's quartet in, D minor. Mr. Kneisel's solo was delightful. His rare grace and art have always made him a favorite here. He plays upon a grand instrument grandly.

Mr. Schroeder scored a triumph at once. He is one of the best performers in the world. His number was generously applauded, and the audience tried hard, but in vain, for an encore. The vocalist was Mrs. Ada May Benzing. She has a full contralto voice and sang with much vigor. Her selections were well chosen and were warmly applauded.

THE DAILY GLOBE,
THURSDAY EVENING,
NOVEMBER 22, 1894.

KNEISEL QUARTETTE.

Highly Enjoyable Entertainment in the Artists' Course Last Evening.

Despite the rather unpleasant weather a large audience greeted the Kneisel quartette, in the second entertainment of the Artists' Concert course, in Music hall, last evening.

The programme was divided into seven sections, the opening one of which was Dr. Antonin Dvorak's new American quartette. Their rendition of this difficult and pleasing selection showed the artists to splendid advantage; the results of long and careful training, harmony and precision of movement, were ably exemplified; and the audience exhibited its appreciation and pleasure by the hearty applause which succeeded its termination.

Mrs. Ada May Benzing, contralto, who was engaged on the recommendation of Max Heinrich, followed with "I Love Thee," and "Autumn Storms," both by Grieg. She has a deep, powerful voice with excellent register which could easily have filled an auditorium of triple the dimensions of Music hall. Her efforts were well received and although prolonged applause followed she refused an encore.

Franz Kneizel, who is so well known here as the solo violinist of the Boston Spmphony orchestra, next executed a violin solo, Sarasate's "Spanish Dance." As a soloist, he probably never appeared to better advantage. His technique and expression were perfect, and his instrument, a dearly prized old "Strad," figuratively talked under his guidance. Variations from quartette in D minor, by Schubert, which followed, were played in a masterly manner and in a great degree showed the capabilities of the performers. The rhythm, crescendoes and diminuendoes were incomparable and carried the hearers into ecstacies.

Mrs. Bensing sang two more solos and then came Alvin Schroeder's 'cello solos, "Praeludium" and "Spanish Serenade." Both were performed in a brilliant manner, particularly the latter, which vied in favor with Schubert's varia tions. An enjoyable evening closed with a quartette by Hayden. James D. D. Comey acted as accompanist in a highly creditable manner.

The third and last entertainment of the course will be given Jan. 2, 1895, when Madame Lillian Blauvelt, the soprano who scored such a hit at the Boston Symphony concert in this city in February last, and Miss Adele Aus Der Ohe, pianiste, will be the attractions.

BOSTON POST.
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.
SUNDAY MORNING, NOV. 25, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. Paur last night offered his audience the following programme: Goldmark, overture, "Sappho," first time at these concerts; Weber, recitative and aria, "Ocean thou mighty monster," from "Oberon"; Raff, symphony No. 3, in F major, "Im Walde," part 1, "In the Daytime," part 2, "At Twilight," part 3, "At Night, Daybreak"; Handel, air, "O Sleep, why dost thou leave me?" from "Semele"; Liszt symphonic poem, "Les Preludes."

While Goldmark's "Sappho" has been heard before in this city, it has never received such a masterly rendering. It is the eminent composer's latest orchestral work, and opens with a beautiful movement for the harps of a choral nature. This leads to the first theme which is admirably and beautifully developed. The second theme is a pastoral melody, broadening into a grand climax that calls for the full strength of the orchestra. These two themes, with their elaborate working out, constitute the features of the work. The work of the orchestra was especially good and closely followed the interpretation of the leader.

Raff's symphony was another commendable effort. It is a familiar and always pleasing selection, for its somewhat florid coloring and its contrasted tone pictures. The Revery and the Dance of the Dryads were especially fine, while the Wild Hunt was handled in a masterly manner. Liszt's "Les Preludes" completed the orchestral numbers.

Mrs. Elene B. Eaton was the soloist, making her first Boston appearance in several years. The recitative and aria from "Oberon" was brilliantly given, with the exception of one or two false intonations, and the "O Sleep, Why Dost Thou Leave me?" was sung with exquisite expression.

At the next rehearsal and concert Eugent Yaye, the eminent violinist, will be the soloist, and Goetz's overture, "Spring," will be given here for the first time. The rehearsal and concert on Dec. 14 and 15 will be in memory of Anton Rubinstein, when a special programme will be offered.

Boston Courier.
SUNDAY MORNING, NOV. 25 1894.

THE SYMPHONY.

Mr. Paur's Symphony programmes do run in streaks most assuredly, and the sixth of his present series was as loud and vehement as the preceding one was light and undemonstrative. It was a first-rate programme for deaf people; for, although there were moments of comparative placidity and soothing, the general temper was agitated and exciting.

The first number was Goldmark's "Sappho" overture; which was new to these concerts and is indeed his latest word in orchestral writing up to the present date. The poetical lady whose name the overture bears certainly had a rather variegated career, even if she never sprang two hundred feet into the sea in her fatal despair because of the desertion of her specially adored lover, as the pragmatical historians of these unromantic days deny that she did. She knew the delights of the lyric bard and the griefs of the passionate woman. So she is a suggestive and perhaps even an inspiring subject for a composer, who can avail himself of these two great features of her life as the keys to his own contrasts. And this is what Goldmark apparently has done. His overture begins with a long, broad prelude for the harp. which rises and falls in great rolling chords, upon the top of which poises a gentle and idyllic theme, in opposition to which there appears later one of great excitement and eagerness. In these and their developments the hearer can easily imagine the musical portrayal of the conflict of the two great elements in Sappho's constitution—her love of beauty, song and dreamy joy, and her tempestuous, proud, reckless spirit, the latter of which gradually becomes more dominant until it overwhelms. The overture, very fully scored, reveals at times in this fullness and variety the "Sakuntala," but has of course no tinge of that tone-color which is commonly called "Oriental," because of its jingles and jangles of cymbals, drums and tambourines. The idyllic portions are sweetly and sensitively treated and some of the wood-wind passages are charming in their originality and intrinsically graceful. But the stormy, turbulent and almost violent moods prevail, and the work as a whole makes their impression strongest and most lasting.

The second orchestral number was Raff's romantic and tone picture symphony, "In the Woods," in which it is easy to make a superabundance of forcible and emphatic effect. The first part, "Day Time," begins a little doubtfully and drowsily; but when once the world and the woods are aroused, there are bustle and self-assertion enough, as if when the matin songs of the birds were done, busy, urgent man entered into possession to labor, to demolish and to construct. The second part, divided into a "Twilight Revery" and a "Dance of Dryads," should bring a charming ease with its largo and a lightsome fantasy with its scherzo; but a little too much solidity of tone or formality of phrasing can make both heavy and turgid. The third part, "Night," has but little rest and quiet, for its slumberous mood has hardly been indicated, before the Wild Hunt comes tearing to and fro with outcry of man and hound, the rush of horses, the blare of horns and all the tremendous apparatus of the demon throng, whose chase is only checked and put to flight by the day rising anew in full and sonorous splendor.

The third and last orchestral number was Liszt's "Preludes," which might well be left in the portfolio for some years to come, so hackneyed have become its sickly, sensuous love-ditties and its clangorous, vociferous battle-pieces. It ought to be left to the brass bands and the popular orchestras and not brought out to add pepper to a programme already too much spiced and pungent.

The performance was pretty closely in the same Ercles vein as the programme, only isolated passages being really notable for lightness of touch and elegance of finish. The harp introduction, the wood-wind obbligati and quartette, and the first violin solo bits (Mr. Kneisel) in the overture were beautifully done, and some of the softer parts of the other works were rendered with appropriate suavity and reserve. But the second part of the symphony was touched with a heavy hand, and the dryads must have had on their wooden shoes to be in step with the solid clumping of the scherzo, while a true pianissimo was unheard in all the performances. The "Preludes"—like that "Kaisermarsch" at the first concert—resolved itself pretty nearly into a contest of strength and endurance between the different factions of the orchestra and swelled out into a tumultuous and deafening volume of sound, over which reigned unobscured that awful kettle-drummer, whose noise would be ridiculous if it were not so reprehensibly excessive even in such a harmonic fury as Liszt has provided for in the finale of this construction. It is astonishing that Mr. Paur will not listen to reason and use the drums according to their proper purpose, as emphases and not individualities.

Two airs were contributed by Mrs. E. B. Eaton (formerly Miss Kehew), who was warmly welcomed and appreciatively applauded. These songs were Weber's "Ocean, thou mighty monster," and Handel's "O sleep," from his serenade "Semele." During her absence in England, where she has become a favorite, Mrs. Eaton's voice and style have undergone but slight modification. She retains the noble and powerful upper tones, and the large, but slightly coarse lower ones, which were always so telling and so much admired, with between these the pleasant round middle voice, the volume of which still seems slender in comparison. She has gained in repose, because her singing is now smoothly controlled, and she has also gained in animation and earnestness. She read her music faithfully and with taste, and ought to have had more consideration from the orchestra, who accompanied by far too loud in the allegro portions of the Weber scene and in the whole of the gentle, plaining "Semele" air.

The next programme is noticeable for introducing Goetz's "Spring" overture, and the violinist, Ysaye, who will play Saint-Saens's third concerto. The other numbers are to be Volkmann's first symphony and Svendsen's "Carnival in Paris."

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

[53]

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
MONDAY MORNING, NOV. 19, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY.

NOTICEABLE SECULARIZATION OF CONCERTS.

The Fifth Programme Contains Numbers by Schubert, Benoit and Mozart, Almost a Wave of Lightness — Mr. Paur's Conducting Again Delightful.

That the programme for symphony concert number five, in Music Hall Saturday evening included but a single work that musicians could unreservedly admire, must be attributed to a popular demand, that has recently been made, for the secularization of these concerts. When a musician so orthodox as Herr Paur reluctantly yields to such a demand, and doubtless in the spirit of stooping to conquer, his artistic morale will not for a moment be questioned; while one recognizes with pleasant surprise a possession of diplomacy on his part, the lack of which last season seemed a constant source of peril to the success of the symphony concerts. So it will not do to carp and cant about the heterodoxical show-piece, or the bright and lively overture, that were performed Saturday evening. If, however, it should become the rule rather than the exception to secularize our symphony concerts then the world wide fame of Mr. Higginson's noble enterprise would necessarily decay. Will the time ever come when this enterprise shall be desecrated by any habitual interpolation of such music as is not above the suspicion of being leprously impure? Surely not while Emil Paur is at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. (Undoubtedly Saturday night's programme was an exception.) As well might we ask if the heresy of Payne or Ingersoll will ever be preached at "brimstone corner." Shades of our lamented reverends Lyman Beecher and John S. Dwight forbid.

So without judging from any such standpoint as would enforce that rigid and old-fogy preference that once ruled the Harvard concerts even to their ruin, any liberal minded musician will feel grateful to Herr Paur for such a popular programme as he had to offer on Saturday. Had a set of Strauss waltzes taken the place of the sugary music by Schubert—neither fish, flesh, nor fowl—that was played, the artistic standard of the concert would certainly have been no lower.

A just estimate of Peter-Léonard-Léopold Benoit can hardly be formed from his so-called symphonic poem for flute and orchestra. It is a work full of melody, which is nevertheless interpolated with an all too bulky, too burdensome pading of virtuosic and tawdry ornamental passages to admit of its being dignified with the high-sounding title of Symphonic Poem We should bear in mind that the symphonic poem itself is one those absurd mianomers that have become current in music, and that owe its existence to a somewhat faulty translation of the original French term as ascribed by Franz Liszt namely, "Poème Symphonique," which in German afterwards became "Symphonische Dichtung," a term to which our English translation is strictly faithful. Benoit's hybrid opus for flute and orchestra would seem to merit about as much serious analysis as would a new kind of kaleidoscope. The entertainment it affords, too, depends quite largely upon the care with which it is handled.

Its performance by Mr. Charles Molé was conspicuous for a technical brilliancy and refinement, that had their sum total in one of the most artistic impressions that virtuosity could convey. Admirable and wonderful playing that that could carry with it its own tone—argument for the very existance of the flute. Speaking of wood-wind instruments calls to mind that Mozart wrote his first forty-six symphonies—there are forty-nine in all—without employing the clarinet and that he first made use of it—save in Figaro (1786) and Don Giovanni (1787)—in the E flat symphony No. 4, his 543rd work, played Saturday evening. The instrument was invented in 1700, but Bach, Handel, Haydn had been loth to recognize its merits. It is doubtful if any more conspicuous and beautiful clarinet music can be found prior to 1788, and then by Mozart in his jovial minuet of the E flat symphony, where the first clarinet plays the melody while the second has an arpeggio accompaniment—both parts being given with unprecedented charm on Saturday evening. Mr. Paur gave the traditional andante of this symphony. It sounded odd enough, but proved delightfully welcome to hear the movement played at least a half a dozen metronomic degrees faster than the hyper-sentimental conductor Nikisch was wont to take it. A few more statistics concerning the E flat symphony may prove acceptable. In the year 1788 Mozart's social popularity in Vienna was at its height. He then outrivalled Handel for rapid and perennial work by composing within two months' time his three greatest symphonies, namely, the one in E flat, completed June 26; the G minor, July 25, and the "Jupiter," noblest of all, and the very last, August 10.

Within two decades Mozart wrote nearly 500 works of enduring merit,—including concertos, symphonies, sonatas, masses, etc. Of what other composer, Schubert perhaps excepted, can a similar record be made?

Herr Paur's reading of the work as a whole was that of a scholarly and reverent conservator. The tempo rubato was conspicuous by its absence, especially when one recalls the Nikisch interpretation of the same work. The noble simplicity of the first allegro and the bright, active jocose life of the finale were especially well set forth. A very just value was placed upon the pronounced lyric character of the andante. Not even from Herr Gericke has Mozart's exquisite and inimitable art been so loyally interpreted here. Would, however, that the symphony for the evening been either the "Jupiter" or the G minor. As for the orchestra excepting the unsatisfactory accompaniment that well-nigh failed to accompany Mr. Molé in the selection by Benoit) its unsurpassed standard was capitally maintained at this concert. A fine programme is assured for next week and one in which vocal students will be especially interested. Raff's "Im Walde" will be the symphony.

C. L. CAPEN.

Daily Evening News.
FALL RIVER, Mass.
THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 22.

KNIESEL QUARTETTE.

A Delightful Concert at Music Hall.

The unpleasant weather of the earlier part of last evening did not prevent a good attendance for the second number of the Artists' Concert Course at Music Hall. The people in the audience were well repaid for going, for the concert was given by the Kneizel Quartette and Mrs. Ada May Benzing, and better talent never came here.

The Kneisel Quartette is always good, and last evening it was at its best. Mrs. Benzing has a powerful and very pleasing contralto voice, and she was very well received, being given a recall after her second number, though the did not give an encore. In fact, no encores were given, though the audience gave most convincing signs of its desire that two or three selections might be repeated. Mr. Alwin Schroeder's solo number on violincello was the favorite, and he was called out three or four times, but he would not play again. The whole concert was a most delightful one and insures the success of such a course for every season.

The opening number was a quartet in F major, op. 90 (American) Dvorak. This quartet is founded on themes taken from the negro melodies of the South. There was a swing to the music that was most taking, and that brought out the power of all four instruments but in a unison that made them as one. Four movements were given.

Mrs. Benzing next sang two songs by Grieg, "I Love Thee," and "Autumn Storms." She used to the best aduantage her powerful and exceedingly smooth contralto voice, and filled the hall to its farthest corners with sweet rich sounds.

Mr. Kneisel gave as a solo a "Spanish Dance," by Sarasate. He played with great delicacy and fine shading and expression rather than force, and when he finished the audience was roused to enthusiastic applause. Variations from Schubert's quartette in D minor was played by request, and again showed the quartette at its best. Mrs. Benzing's second number was "A Summer Night," Goring Thomas. She did this so well that she was compelled to come out and bow in response to the applause. Mr. James D. H. Comey accompanied Mrs. Benzing most skilfully in both her numbers. In his solos for the violincello Mr. Schroeder first played a very classical selection. Bach's "Praeludium," In it he exhibited his talent and notable ability, but the piece is rather beyond any audience except one of high musical education. His second selection was probably the best of the whole concert. At least it was the most popular. It was a "Spanish Serenade," by Popper, and it may be called the gem of the evening. In it Mr. Schroeder displayed his mastery of his instrument in a wonderful technique which is combined with a most perfect expression. The tones of his instrument always struck upon the ear as natural, never forced. The closing number was Haydn's quartet in G major, given by the quartette. It was another highly classical selection. Four movements were given.

FALL RIVER DAILY HERALD,
NOVEMBER 22, 1894

The Kneisel Quartet.

The Kneisel quartet entertained a large audience in Music hall last night in the second concert of the artists' course. This organization has been heard in this city, and is always sure of an enthusiastic welcome among the lovers of high class music. With the exception of Alwin Schroeder, the violoncellist, the personnel of the quartet is the same as in other years. Its work, too, was of the high order expected of it and aroused much enthusiasm, particularly the variations from Shubert's quartet in, D minor. Mr. Kneisel's solo was delightful. His rare grace and art have always made him a favorite here. He plays upon a grand instrument grandly.

Mr. Schroeder scored a triumph at once. He is one of the best performers in the world. His number was generously applauded, and the audience tried hard, but in vain, for an encore. The vocalist was Mrs. Ada May Benzing. She has a full contralto voice and sang with much vigor. Her selections were well chosen and were warmly applauded.

FALL RIVER, MASS.,
THE DAILY GLOBE,
THURSDAY EVENING,
NOVEMBER 22, 1894.

KNEISEL QUARTETTE.

Highly Enjoyable Entertainment in the Artists' Course Last Evening.

Despite the rather unpleasant weather a large audience greeted the Kneisel quartette, in the second entertainment of the Artists' Concert course, in Music hall, last evening.

The programme was divided into seven sections, the opening one of which was Dr. Antonin Dvorak's new American quartette. Their rendition of this difficult and pleasing selection showed the artists to splendid advantage; the results of long and careful training, harmony and precision of movement, were ably exemplified; and the audience exhibited its appreciation and pleasure by the hearty applause which succeeded its termination.

Mrs. Ada May Benzing, contralto, who was engaged on the recommendation of Max Heinrich, followed with "I Love Thee," and "Autumn Storms," both by Grieg. She has a deep, powerful voice with excellent register which could easily have filled an auditorium of triple the dimensions of Music hall. Her efforts were well received and although prolonged applause followed she refused an encore.

Franz Kneizel, who is so well known here as the solo violinist of the Boston Spmphony orchestra, next executed a violin solo, Sarasate's "Spanish Dance." As a soloist, he probably never appeared to better advantage. His technique and expression were perfect, and his instrument, a dearly prized old "Strad," figuratively talked under his guidance. Variations from quartette in D minor, by Schubert, which followed, were played in a masterly manner and in a great degree showed the capabilities of the performers. The rhythm, crescendoes and diminuendoes were incomparable and carried the hearers into ecstacies.

Mrs. Bensing sang two more solos and then came Alvin Schroeder's 'cello solos, "Praeludium" and "Spanish Serenade." Both were performed in a brilliant manner, particularly the latter, which vied in favor with Schubert's varia tions. An enjoyable evening closed with a quartette by Hayden. James D. D.Comey acted as accompanist in a highly creditable manner.

The third and last entertainment of the course will be given Jan. 2, 1895, when Madame Lillian Blauvelt, the soprano who scored such a hit at the Boston Symphony concert in this city in February last, and Miss Adele Aus Der Ohe, pianiste, will be the attractions.

BOSTON POST.
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.
SUNDAY MORNING, NOV. 25, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. Paur last night offered his audience the following programme: Goldmark, overture, "Sappho," first time at these concerts; Weber, recitative and aria, "Ocean thou mighty monster," from "Oberon"; Raff, symphony No. 3, in F major, "Im Walde," part 1, "In the Daytime," part 2, "At Twilight," part 3, "At Night, Daybreak"; Handel, air, "O Sleep, why dost thou leave me?" from "Semele"; Liszt symphonic poem, "Les Preludes."

While Goldmark's "Sappho" has been heard before in this city, it has never received such a masterly rendering. It is the eminent composer's latest orchestral work, and opens with a beautiful movement for the harps of a choral nature. This leads to the first theme which is admirably and beautifully developed. The second theme is a pastoral melody, broadening into a grand climax that calls for the full strength of the orchestra. These two themes, with their elaborate working out, constitute the features of the work. The work of the orchestra was especially good and closely followed the interpretation of the leader.

Raff's symphony was another commendable effort. It is a familiar and always pleasing selection, for its somewhat florid coloring and its contrasted tone pictures. The Revery and the Dance of the Dryads were especially fine, while the Wild Hunt was handled in a masterly manner, Liszt's "Les Preludes" completed the orchestral numbers.

Mrs. Elene B. Eaton was the soloist, making her first Boston appearance in several years. The recitative and aria from "Oberon" was brilliantly given, with the exception of one or two false intonations, and the "O Sleep, Why Dost Thou Leave me?" was sung with exquisite expression.

At the next rehearsal and concert Eugent Yaye, the eminent violinist, will be the soloist, and Goetz's overture, "Spring," will be given here for the first time. The rehearsal and concert on Dec. 14 and 15 will be in memory of Anton Rubinstein, when a special programme will be offered.

Boston Courier.
SUNDAY MORNING, NOV. 25 1894.

THE SYMPHONY.

Mr. Paur's Symphony programmes do run in streaks most assuredly, and the sixth of his present series was as loud and vehement as the preceding one was light and undemonstrative. It was a first-rate programme for deaf people; for, although there were moments of comparative placidity and soothing, the general temper was agitated and exciting.

The first number was Goldmark's "Sappho" overture; which was new to these concerts and is indeed his latest word in orchestral writing up to the present date. The poetical lady whose name the overture bears certainly had a rather variegated career, even if she never sprang two hundred feet into the sea in her fatal despair because of the desertion of her specially adored lover, as the pragmatical historians of these unromantic days deny that she did. She knew the delights of the lyric bard and the griefs of the passionate woman. So she is a suggestive and perhaps even an inspiring subject for a composer, who can avail himself of these two great features of her life as the keys to his own contrasts. And this is what Goldmark apparently has done. His overture begins with a long, broad prelude for the harp. which rises and falls in great rolling chords, upon the top of which poises a gentle and idyllic theme, in opposition to which there appears later one of great excitement and eagerness. In these and their developments the hearer can easily imagine the musical portrayal of the conflict of the two great elements in Sappho's constitution—her love of beauty, song and dreamy joy, and her tempestuous, proud, reckless spirit, the latter of which gradually becomes more dominant until it overwhelms. The overture, very fully scored, reveals at times in this fullness and variety the "Sakuntala," but has of course no tinge of that tone-color which is commonly called "Oriental," because of its jingles and jangles of cymbals, drums and tambourines. The idyllic portions are sweetly and sensitively treated and some of the wood-wind passages are charming in their originality and intrinsically graceful. But the stormy, turbulent and almost violent moods prevail, and the work as a whole makes their impression strongest and most lasting.

The second orchestral number was Raff's romantic and tone picture symphony, "In the Woods," in which it is easy to make a superabundance of forcible and emphatic effect. The first part, "Day Time," begins a little doubtfully and drowsily; but when once the world and the woods are aroused, there are bustle and self-assertion enough, as if when the matin songs of the birds were done, busy, urgent man entered into possession to labor, to demolish and to construct. The second part, divided into a "Twilight Revery" and a "Dance of Dryads," should bring a charming ease with its largo and a lightsome fantasy with its scherzo; but a little too much solidity of tone or formality of phrasing can make both heavy and turgid. The third part, "Night," has but little rest and quiet, for its slumberous mood has hardly been indicated, before the Wild Hunt comes tearing to and fro with outcry of man and hound, the rush of horses, the blare of horns and all the tremendous apparatus of the demon throng, whose chase is only checked and put to flight by the day rising anew in full and sonorous splendor.

The third and last orchestral number was Liszt's "Preludes," which might well be left in the portfolio for some years to come, so hackneyed have become its sickly, sensuous love-ditties and its clangorous, vociferous battle-pieces. It ought to be left to the brass bands and the popular orchestras and not brought out to add pepper to a programme already too much spiced and pungent.

The performance was pretty closely in the same Ercles vein as the programme, only isolated passages being really notable for lightness of touch and elegance of finish. The harp introduction, the wood-wind obbligati and quartette, and the first violin solo bits (Mr. Kneisel) in the overture were beautifully done, and some of the softer parts of the other works were rendered with appropriate suavity and reserve. But the second part of the symphony was touched with a heavy hand, and the dryads must have had on their wooden shoes to be in step with the solid clumping of the scherzo, while a true pianissimo was unheard in all the performances. The "Preludes"—like that "Kaisermarsch" at the first concert—resolved itself pretty nearly into a contest of strength and endurance between the different factions of the orchestra and swelled out into a tumultuous and deafening volume of sound, over which reigned unobscured that awful kettle-drummer, whose noise would be ridiculous if it were not so reprehensibly excessive even in such a harmonic fury as Liszt has provided for in the finale of this construction. It is astonishing that Mr. Paur will not listen to reason and use the drums according to their proper purpose, as emphases and not individualities.

Two airs were contributed by Mrs. E. B. Eaton (formerly Miss Kehew), who was warmly welcomed and appreciatively applauded. These songs were Weber's "Ocean, thou mighty monster," and Handel's "O sleep," from his serenade "Semele." During her absence in England, where she has become a favorite, Mrs. Eaton's voice and style have undergone but slight modification. She retains the noble and powerful upper tones, and the large, but slightly coarse lower ones, which were always so telling and so much admired, with between these the pleasant round middle voice, the volume of which still seems slender in comparison. She has gained in repose, because her singing is now smoothly controlled, and she has also gained in animation and earnestness. She read her music faithfully and with taste, and ought to have had more consideration from the orchestra, who accompanied by far too loud in the allegro portions of the Weber scene and in the whole of the gentle, plaining "Semele" air.

The next programme is noticeable for introducing Goetz's "Spring" overture, and the violinist, Ysaye, who will play Saint-Saens's third concerto. The other numbers are to be Volkmann's first symphony and Svendsen's "Carnival in Paris."

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

[53]

[illegible] Nov. 25, 1894.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS.

Sixth in the Course of Symphony Concerts.

Another delightful symphony concert program was offered by conductor Paur last evening. The increased attendance and the unaffected enthusiasm of the audience gave the best of evidence that the public approves of Mr Paur's efforts to make his programs genuinely interesting. The Symphony program have thus far this season been a decided improvement on the offerings of recent years, and if they continue to be of the same character, the conductor and the management will, at the end of the year, have earned the gratitude of a very large proportion of their patrons.

Last evening's program was as follows: Overture to Goldmark's opera "Sappho," first time here; Raff's third symphony, "Im Walde;" Liszt's symphonic poem "Les Preludes," and soprano solos by Mrs Elene B. Eaton, the recitative and aria "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster," from Weber's "Oberon," and the aria "O Sleep, Why Dost Thou Leave Me?" from Handel's "Semele."

Mrs Eaton received a kindly greeting, and her singing made a favorable impression. This was her first appearance in public since returning from England, where she has been for several years studying under some of the best masters and singing with much success in concert and oratorio. When she last sang in Boston she was Miss Kehew and was especially well known as a church singer. She has benefited greatly by her study abroad. Her voice is stronger and richer in tone, and she has gained materially in command of technique.

She sang the exacting recitative and aria with intelligence, expression and generally good effect. The most striking feature of her voice is its great power, and in the fortissimo passages she apparently had no difficulty in meeting the great volume of tone from the large orchestra. Her voice is of great range, and is smooth throughout its register, but it does not seem to be particularly flexible, and yesterday some of her higher notes were hard and dry.

Mrs Eaton is to be complimented upon the clearness of her enunciation, a compliment that can be paid to very few American singers, especially when they sing in their native language. She sang the recitative passages distinctly and with proper emphasis. The selection from "Semele" showed her voice to even better advantage. She was recalled several times by the cordial plaudits of her audience.

The Goldmark "Sappho" overture was the novelty of the concert, and its performance was received with much favor. It is the latest of Goldmark's orchestral works, and its scoring taxes the resources of the largest modern orchestra. Like all works by this composer the overture is notable for rich and elaborate orchestral effects, and it is treated in a broad and vigorous style. There are several exquisite bits of melody and a few dainty passages for solo instruments which are charmingly effective. A splendid performance was given under Mr Paur's direction.

The most enjoyable feature of yesterday's concert was the really brilliant performance of Raff's third symphony. This notable work, probably the most admired production of that marvellously prolific writer, has been several times played to the great delight of symphony audiences, but never more than yesterday. On no occasion has Mr Paur made more evident the fact that the Boston symphony orchestra has been decidedly benefited by his intelligent and masterful direction. A performance such as that of last evening would scarcely have been possible by this band two years ago.

The four movements were all played with splendid expression, precision and finish. The symphony was presented nearly in its entirety, Mr Paur deciding to play the repetition of the "Wild Hunt" in the last movement which is generally omitted. This "Wild Hunt" was played at a terrific tempo and called forth a storm of applause such as is rarely developed at a symphony concert.

The program for the next concert will be as follows: Goetz, overture, "Spring," new; Saint-Saens, third concerto for violin; Volkmann, first symphony; Svendsen, "Carnival in Paris." Mr Eugene Ysaye will be the violinist.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCVI., NO. 146.

SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 25, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Orchestra Gives a Convincing Display of the Perfection of Its Technique.

Last evening's concert in Music Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra had for its programme:

Overture, "Sappho" (first time).....Goldmark
"Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster".....Weber
Symphony, "Im Walde".....Raff
"O, Sleep, Why Dost Thou Leave Me?".Handel
"Les Preludes".....Liszt

Mrs. Elene B. Eaton was the soloist. The concert was the least interesting of the season thus far. Not that it was not brilliantly performed, for the orchestra was at its best, its playing, especially in the symphony, being of the highest quality, and it never gave a more convincing display of the perfection of its technique than in the last movement of this work. The programme was somewhat dull in effect, and seemed to be lacking in happy contrasts. The Goldmark overture, though wholly unlike the "Sakuntala" in character, constantly recalls it, nevertheless, owing to the richness and the sensuousness of its orchestral treatment. The themes are striking, and are worked out with great skill and effectiveness, and the attention is kept constantly on the alert by the rapidly changing moods of the composer. There are many moments of rare beauty, both of theme and of delicate instrumental combinations, though the impression that the work leaves as a whole is one of massive and gorgeous tone color. It is somewhat disjointed in form, but everything is clearly set forth and easily comprehended on a first hearing. It is wholly modern in character, and it is not easy to trace in it any connection between the story told by the music and the title borne by the overture. What is understood as the classic spirit is wholly absent, but it is a masterly and a thoroughly interesting work, and was splendidly read and played.

It is doubtful, however, if it will ever rank in favor with the Sakontala overture. Mrs. Eaton has improved greatly in her art since she was last heard here. Her large, sympathetic and remarkably beautiful voice is as searching as ever, and her style is more finished. She sung the exacting Weber aria with ease, power and brilliacy, and with genuine dramatic fervor; but there was something lacking to make the effort wholly effective, notwithstanding the unquestionable skill and the intelligence the artist brought to bear upon her performance of it. In the Handel air she gave an admirable example of true legato singing, and the purity of her tones and the certainty of her command over her magnificent voice were shown even more decidedly than in her earlier contribution to the concert. She was cordially applauded, and was recalled after each effort.

The programme for the concert is: Overture, "Spring," Goetz (first time); concerto for violin, No. 8, Saint-Saens; symphony, D minor, No. 1, Volkmann; "Carnival in Paris," Svensden. The soloist will be M. Eugene Ysaye.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, NOV. 25.

The Sixth Symphony Concert.

A large audience listened to the sixth symphony, last night, in Music Hall. The following is the programme:

Overture, "Sappho," (first time).....Goldmark
Aria, "Ocean thou mighty monster".....Weber
Symphony, "Im Walde".....Raff
Aria from "Semele".....Handel
Symphonic Poem, "Les Preludes".....Liszt

The Goldmark Overture is a beautiful work, rich in coloring, flowing in melody, warm, occasionally passionate, clear and definite in ideas, and written with a firm, if impulsive hand. It has not the calm, passionless Greek beauty that the title would suggest; with Goldmark, Sappho is a woman of oriental temperament, as in his "Prometheus" overture he has robbed the suffering god of the defiant dignity and self-respect given to him by the great Greek poet. Like all Goldmark's best works, the "Sappho" overture has the hot-house warmth and forced beauty; it is delightful, but it is enervating, yet fortunately, within the limits of an overture it may be safely and pleasantly endured, and its beauty abides in the memory and adds its touch of glowing color to many a day-dream after. The overture was finely read by Mr. Paur and delightfully played by the orchestra.

Time has not robbed the Raff symphony of any of its beauties and one can readily forget or rather readily forgive it for belonging to the pariah caste of "programme" music. The slight programme hints "Daytime, Twilight and Night" are essential and sufficient to set the imagination into activity, and then it is simply a question of temperament whether we shall accept the dance of the wood nymphs and the wild hunt for what they were intended to be or put our own particular and individual interpretation on them. In any case it is difficult to escape from the fascination of the symphony, and however wilful we may be we are finally compelled to bow to the composer's skill and power and yield to the impression intended, even if we refuse to accept the details. Here Raff appeals to the emotions rather than to the intellect; he is the poet and not the scientist; nothing is obscure, nothing so complex as to cause the imagination to pause over it in perplexity and thus to disturb the continuity of a massive emotion for the small satisfaction of solving a technical riddle. The color and warmth are everything, and these properly felt, the end is gained. The symphony received a most adequate interpretation, the color contrast were given with rare beauty; nothing could have been better than the poetic rendering of the second movement, or more delicately dainty than the manner in which the dance of the dryads was played, while the wild hunt was given with a dash, an energy and a weirdness that were thrillingly effective. The applause was enthusiastic, and Mr. Paur was recalled to bow his silent thanks.

Liszt's "Les Preludes" does not wear so well; the metaphysical idea is of much more importance than the music. The work is crowded with brilliancies, but the glitter is artificial, not natural; the inspiration is make-believe, and suggests the enthusiasm of the wise young woman when she dreamed of the potentialities of a mathematical point. The brilliant work was brilliantly played; but the thunder was not that of Jove, but only the rattling of tin pans.

The soloist of the evening was Mrs. Elene B. Eaton who has a voice of wide range, large power and fine quality. She sings with taste and intelligence, and there are few technical faults that can be laid to her charge. The Weber and Handel arias were well sung, intonation, phrasing, voice management were excellent, and there was only missing that combination of qualities hidden under the phrase "personal magnetism," which is another way of saying absence of inspiration. Mrs. Eaton won the heartiest applause, and was recalled again and again by an enthusiastic audience.

The programme for the next concert is; Overture, "Spring," Goetz, first time; Concerto for violin, No. 3, Saint Saëns; Symphony in D-minor, No. 1, Volkmann; "Carnival in Paris," Svensden. The soloist is Mr. Eugene Ysaye.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 25, 1894.

The Sixth Concert of the Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall.

This is the program of last evening's Symphony concert:

Overture, "Sappho" (first time at these concerts).....Goldmark
Recitative and aria, "Ocean, thou mighty monster," from "Oberon".....Weber
Symphony No. 3, F major, "Im Walde," op. 153.....Raff
Air, "O sleep, why dost thou leave me," from "Semele".....Handel
Symphonic Poem No. 3, "Les Preludes".....Liszt

Goldmark's overture to "Sappho" is an interesting composition in spite of its unnecessary length and its patchwork character.

The very simplicity of the opening measures for solo harp—the score calls for two harps, "if possible"—allures and impresses. Sappho played the barbiton in the accompaniment of her song, and as the barbiton had more strings than the cithara or the lyre, it probably in a measure was like unto the harp. Neither the stormy theme that may express her passion nor the violin solo that may sing her appeal or lament is of irresistible strength or, in fact, of marked character. The fanfares may suggest the triumph of the Tenth Muse. The interest of the overture is in its striking harmonic progressions, some of which are of exquisite beauty, and in glowing or gorgeous passages of tonal color. Goldmark does not have in this overture a firm grip of the subject. The work is episodic, not tightly knit together. The passion, whatever there is, does not flow in a torrent; there are little streams that wander and are lost to the sight.

And why the overture to "Sappho?" A composer has the right to name a composition at will. The title should, however, bear some relation to the character of the music.

Now Sappho was the acknowledged mistress of the Systaltic or "Thrilling" style of music. Her story, whether we believe the hideous reproach of Suidas or follow German defenders of her character, is a strange one. Years ago the tale that she killed herself for love of Phaon, who spurned her suit, was declared legendary; for Phaon was a ferryman to whom Venus gave in gratitude a wondrous plant that made all women follow him.

Sappho had been married even in girlish days, and she had a daughter dearer to her than Lesbos itself, the island where the head of Orpheus was buried. And many women loved her and would fain be always near her. According to Greek ideas of beauty, she should have been tall and stately, and with light hair. But she was a little, dark woman, with black hair, and Alceaus says that she had a beautiful smile. Such was the flight of her song that some called her the Tenth Muse. In Lesbian society she was known by a less glorious name.

Listen to her as she sings in the second Sapphic ode, undoubtedly addressed to Atthis, one of her girl disciples:

"And a cold sweat breaks out on me, and a trembling shakes my limbs, and I get as pale as a sheet, and am like to die, and gasp for breath."

Or listen to these o'ermastering lines, imperishable in their simplicity:

"The moon has set and the Pleiades, and the nights are at midst, and the hour is come, and I sleep alone."

Hemember these passionate verses; read of the consuming frenzy of her life; and then you will see why this music of Goldmark is a pale portrayal of "the little dark woman with black hair."

In this overture I do not find the sultry Oriental sensuousness that most fitly distinguishes his overture to "Sakuntala," or fills to cloying his opera "The Queen of Sheba." Nor has he here caught the classic idea, as in his overtures to "Penthesilea" and "Prometheus." Paine saw deeper into the character of his Oedipus, and Massenet knew the wailing, maddish song that burst through the parched lips of the raging Phaedra.

⁂

The other selections do not call for extended comment. Yet one must acknowledge the rare pleasure given by the performance of Raff's beautiful symphony, which is program music that is as delightful as though there were no program of moods to be suggested. Here in music Raff is to the forest what Thomas Hardy is in "The Woodlanders." He knows his trees, his underbrush. He knows the strange music of this sluggish life. Surprised one night, he heard the wild hunt as on some lonely moor in England the belated traveler still hears the unearthly cries of the Gabriel hounds. And, in speaking of the pleasure given by this symphony, it would be most ungracious not to refer to the romantic playing of the first clarinetist. In the poetry of his performance the technical skill displayed was almost forgotten.

⁂

Mrs. Elene B. Eaton did many things well. Her singing of the air by Handel was as a whole more effective and artistic than was her delivery of the well-worn air from "Oberon." Her voice is fresh and agreeable. She showed considerable skill in the management of it. Occasionally in the air from "Oberon" there was a suspicion of falling a trifle below the true pitch, but the air is a trying one, and the finale is unvocal. It is a pleasing duty to note the decided progress made by her in her art since her last appearance in this city.

PHILIP HALE.

---

[54]

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, NOV. 25, 1894.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS.

Sixth in the Course of Symphony Concerts.

Another delightful symphony concert program was offered by conductor Paur last evening. The increased attendance and the unaffected enthusiasm of the audience gave the best of evidence that the public approves of Mr Paur's efforts to make his programs genuinely interesting. The Symphony program have thus far this season been a decided improvement on the offerings of recent years, and if they continue to be of the same character, the conductor and the management will, at the end of the year, have earned the gratitude of a very large proportion of their patrons.

Last evening's program was as follows: Overture to Goldmark's opera "Sappho," first time here; Raff's third symphony, "Im Walde;" Liszt's symphonic poem "Les Preludes," and soprano solos by Mrs Elene B. Eaton, the recitative and aria "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster," from Weber's "Oberon," and the aria "O Sleep, Why Dost Thou Leave Me?" from Handel's "Semele."

Mrs Eaton received a kindly greeting, and her singing made a favorable impression. This was her first appearance in public since returning from England, where she has been for several years studying under some of the best masters and singing with much success in concert and oratorio. When she last sang in Boston she was Miss Kehew and was especially well known as a church singer. She has benefited greatly by her study abroad. Her voice is stronger and richer in tone, and she has gained materially in command of technique.

She sang the exacting recitative and aria with intelligence, expression and generally good effect. The most striking feature of her voice is its great power, and in the fortissimo passages she apparently had no difficulty in meeting the great volume of tone from the large orchestra. Her voice is of great range, and is smooth throughout its register, but it does not seem to be particularly flexible, and yesterday some of her higher notes were hard and dry.

Mrs Eaton is to be complimented upon the clearness of her enunciation, a compliment that can be paid to very few American singers, especially when they sing in their native language. She sang the recitative passages distinctly and with proper emphasis. The selection from "Semele" showed her voice to even better advantage. She was recalled several times by the cordial plaudits of her audience.

The Goldmark "Sappho" overture was the novelty of the concert, and its performance was received with much favor. It is the latest of Goldmark's orchestral works, and its scoring taxes the resources of the largest modern orchestra. Like all works by this composer the overture is notable for rich and elaborate orchestral effects, and it is treated in a broad and vigorous style. There are several exquisite bits of melody and a few dainty passages for solo instruments which are charmingly effective. A splendid performance was given under Mr Paur's direction.

The most enjoyable feature of yesterday's concert was the really brilliant performance of Raff's third symphony. This notable work, probably the most admired production of that marvellously prolific writer, has been several times played to the great delight of symphony audiences, but never more than yesterday. On no occasion has Mr Paur made more evident the fact that the Boston symphony orchestra has been decidedly benefited by his intelligent and masterful direction. A performance such as that of last evening would scarcely have been possible by this band two years ago.

The four movements were all played with splendid expression, precision and finish. The symphony was presented nearly in its entirety, Mr Paur deciding to play the repetition of the "Wild Hunt" in the last movement which is generally omitted. This "Wild Hunt" was played at a terrific tempo and called forth a storm of applause such as is rarely developed at a symphony concert.

The program for the next concert will be as follows: Goetz, overture, "Spring," new; Saint-Saens, third concerto for violin; Volkmann, first symphony; Svendsen, "Carnival in Paris." Mr Eugene Ysaye will be the violinist.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCVI., NO. 146.

SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 25, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Orchestra Gives a Convincing Display of the Perfection of Its Technique.

Last evening's concert in Music Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra had for its programme:

Overture, "Sappho" (first time).....Goldmark
"Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster".....Weber
Symphony, "Im Walde".....Raff
"O, Sleep, Why Dost Thou Leave Me?".Handel
"Les Preludes".....Liszt

Mrs. Elene B. Eaton was the soloist. The concert was the least interesting of the season thus far. Not that it was not brilliantly performed, for the orchestra was at its best, its playing, especially in the symphony, being of the highest quality, and it never gave a more convincing display of the perfection of its technique than in the last movement of this work. The programme was somewhat dull in effect, and seemed to be lacking in happy contrasts. The Goldmark overture, though wholly unlike the "Sakuntala" in character, constantly recalls it, nevertheless, owing to the richness and the sensuousness of its orchestral treatment. The themes are striking, and are worked out with great skill and effectiveness, and the attention is kept constantly on the alert by the rapidly changing moods of the composer. There are many moments of rare beauty, both of theme and of delicate instrumental combinations, though the impression that the work leaves as a whole is one of massive and gorgeous tone color. It is somewhat disjointed in form, but everything is clearly set forth and easily comprehended on a first hearing. It is wholly modern in character, and it is not easy to trace in it any connection between the story told by the music and the title borne by the overture. What is understood as the classic spirit is wholly absent, but it is a masterly and a thoroughly interesting work, and was splendidly read and played.

It is doubtful, however, if it will ever rank in favor with the Sakontala overture. Mrs. Eaton has improved greatly in her art since she was last heard here. Her large, sympathetic and remarkably beautiful voice is as searching as ever, and her style is more finished. She sang the exacting Weber aria with ease, power and brilliacy, and with genuine dramatic fervor; but there was something lacking to make the effort wholly effective, notwithstanding the unquestionable skill and the intelligence the artist brought to bear upon her performance of it. In the Handel air she gave an admirable example of true legato singing, and the purity of her tones and the certainty of her command over her magnificent voice were shown even more decidedly than in her earlier contribution to the concert. She was cordially applauded, and was recalled after each effort.

The programme for the concert is: Overture, "Spring," Goetz (first time); concerto for violin, No. 3, Saint-Saens; symphony, D minor, No. 1, Volkmann; "Carnival in Paris," Svensden. The soloist will be M. Eugene Ysaye.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, NOV. 25.

The Sixth Symphony Concert.

A large audience listened to the sixth symphony, last night, in Music Hall. The following is the programme:

Overture, "Sappho," (first time).....Goldmark
Aria, "Ocean thou mighty monster".....Weber
Symphony, "Im Walde".....Baff
Aria from "Semele".....Handel
Symphonic Poem, "Les Preludes".....Liszt

The Goldmark Overture is a beautiful work, rich in coloring, flowing in melody, warm, occasionally passionate, clear and definite in ideas, and written with a firm, if impulsive hand. It has not the calm, passionless Greek beauty that the title would suggest; with Goldmark, Sappho is a woman of oriental temperament, as in his "Prometheus" overture he has robbed the suffering god of the defiant dignity and self-respect given to him by the great Greek poet. Like all Goldmark's best works, the "Sappho" overture has the hot-house warmth and forced beauty; it is delightful, but it is enervating, yet fortunately, within the limits of an overture it may be safely and pleasantly endured, and its beauty abides in the memory and adds its touch of glowing color to many a day-dream after. The overture was finely read by Mr. Paur and delightfully played by the orchestra.

Time has not robbed the Raff symphony of any of its beauties and one can readily forget or rather readily forgive it for belonging to the pariah caste of "programme" music. The slight programme hints "Daytime, Twilight and Night" are essential and sufficient to set the imagination into activity, and then it is simply a question of temperament whether we shall accept the dance of the wood nymphs and the wild hunt for what they were intended to be or put our own particular and individual interpretation on them. In any case it is difficult to escape from the fascination of the symphony, and however wilful we may be we are finally compelled to bow to the composer's skill and power and yield to the impression intended, even if we refuse to accept the details. Here Raff appeals to the emotions rather than to the intellect; he is the poet and not the scientist; nothing is obscure, nothing so complex as to cause the imagination to pause over it in perplexity and thus to disturb the continuity of a massive emotion for the small satisfaction of solving a technical riddle. The color and warmth are everything, and these properly felt, the end is gained. The symphony received almost adequate interpretation, the color contrast were given with rare beauty; nothing could have been better than the poetic rendering of the second movement, or more delicately dainty than the manner in which the dance of the dryads was played. while the wild hunt was given with a dash. an energy and a weirdness that were thrillingly effective. The applause was enthusiastic, and Mr. Paur was recalled to bow his silent thanks.

Liszt's "Les Preludes" does not wear so well; the metaphysical idea is of much more importance than the music. The work is crowded with brilliancies, but the glitter is artificial, not natural; the inspiration is make-believe, and suggests the enthusiasm of the wise young woman when she dreamed of the potentialities of a mathematical point. The brilliant work was brilliantly played; but the thunder was not that of Jove, but only the rattling of tin pans.

The soloist of the evening was Mrs. Elene B. Eaton who has a voice of wide range, large power and fine quality. She sings with taste and intelligence, and there are few technical faults that can be laid to her charge. The Weber and Handel arias were well sung, intonation, phrasing, voice management were excellent, and there was only missing that combination of qualities hidden under the phrase "personal magnetism," which is another way of saying absence of inspiration. Mrs. Eaton won the heartiest applause, and was recalled again and again by an enthusiastic audience.

The programme for the next concert is; Overture, "Spring," Goetz, first time; Concerto for violin, No. 3, Saint Saëns; Symphony in D-minor, No. 1, Volkmann; "Carnival in Paris," Svensden. The soloist is Mr. Eugene Ysaye.

Boston Journal.
SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 25, 1894.

The Sixth Concert of the Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall.

This is the program of last evening's Symphony concert:

Overture, "Sappho" (first time at these concerts).....Goldmark
Recitative and aria, "Ocean, thou mighty monster," from "Oberon".....Weber
Symphony No. 3, F major, "Im Walde," op. 153.....Raff
Air, "O sleep, why dost thou leave me," from "Semele".....Handel
Symphonic Poem No. 3, "Les Preludes".....Liszt

Goldmark's overture to "Sappho" is an interesting composition in spite of its unnecessary length and its patchwork character.

The very simplicity of the opening measures for solo harp—the score calls for two harps, "if possible"—allures and impresses. Sappho played the barbiton in the accompaniment of her song, and as the barbiton had more strings than the cithara or the lyre, it probably in a measure was like unto the harp. Neither the stormy theme that may express her passion nor the violin solo that may sing her appeal or lament is of irresistible strength or, in fact, of marked character. The fanfares may suggest the triumph of the Tenth Muse. The interest of the overture is in its striking harmonic progressions, some of which are of exquisite beauty, and in glowing or gorgeous passages of tonal color. Goldmark does not have in this overture a firm grip of the subject. The work is episodic, not tightly knit together. The passion, whatever there is, does not flow in a torrent; there are little streams that wander and are lost to the sight.

And why the overture to "Sappho?" A composer has the right to name a composition at will. The title should, however, bear some relation to the character of the music.

Now Sappho was the acknowledged mistress of the Systaltic or "Thrilling" style of music. Her story, whether we believe the hideous reproach of Suidas or follow German defenders of her character, is a strange one. Years ago the tale that she killed herself for love of Phaon, who spurned her suit, was declared legendary; for Phaon was a ferryman to whom Venus gave in gratitude a wondrous plant that made all women follow him.

Sappho had been married even in girlish days, and she had a daughter dearer to her than Lesbos itself, the island where the head of Orpheus was buried. And many women loved her and would fain be always near her. According to Greek ideas of beauty, she should have been tall and stately, and with light hair. But she was a little, dark woman, with black hair, and Alceaus says that she had a beautiful smile. Such was the flight of her song that some called her the Tenth Muse. In Lesbian society she was known by a less glorious name.

Listen to her as she sings in the second Sapphic ode, undoubtedly addressed to Athis, one of her girl disciples:

"And a cold sweat breaks out on me, and a trembling shakes my limbs, and I get as pale as a sheet, and am like to die, and gasp for breath."

Or listen to these o'ermastering lines, imperishable in their simplicity:

"The moon has set and the Pleiades, and the nights are at midst, and the hour is come, and I sleep alone."

Remember these passionate verses; read of the consuming frenzy of her life; and then you will see why this music of Goldmark is a pale portrayal of "the little dark woman with black hair."

In this overture I do not find the sultry Oriental sensuousness that most fitly distinguishes his overture to "Sakuntala," or fills to cloying his opera "The Queen of Sheba." Nor has he here caught the classic idea, as in his overtures to "Penthesilea" and "Prometheus." Paine saw deeper into the character of his Oedipus, and Massenet knew the wailing, maddish song that burst through the parched lips of the raging Phaedra.

***

The other selections do not call for extended comment. Yet one must acknowledge the rare pleasure given by the performance of Raff's beautiful symphony, which is program music that is as delightful as though there were no program of moods to be suggested. Here in music Raff is to the forest what Thomas Hardy is in "The Woodlanders." He knows his trees, his underbrush. He knows the strange music of this sluggish life. Surprised one night, he heard the wild hunt as on some lonely moor in England the belated traveler still hears the unearthly cries of the Gabriel hounds. And, in speaking of the pleasure given by this symphony, it would be most ungracious not to refer to the romantic playing of the first clarinetist. In the poetry of his performance the technical skill displayed was almost forgotten.

***

Mrs. Elene B. Eaton did many things well. Her singing of the air by Handel was as a whole more effective and artistic than was her delivery of the well-worn air from "Oberon." Her voice is fresh and agreeable. She showed considerable skill in the management of it. Occasionally in the air from "Oberon" there was a suspicion of falling a trifle below the true pitch, but the air is a trying one, and the finale is unvocal. It is a pleasing duty to note the decided progress made by her in her art since her last appearance in this city.

PHILIP HALE.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

The Official Paper of the State.

MONDAY MORNING, NOV. 26, 1894.

Sixth Symphony Concert.

The programme for the sixth symphony concert in Music Hall, Saturday evening, while it may not have proven especially interesting to all musicians present was to say the least for it, a very happy choice in calling forth the orchestra's best work.

Goldmark's overture to Sappho was heard here for the first time. As a musical composition it has but little of the wealth and creative power that contributed so largely to the unsurpassed fame of Goldmark's "Sakuntala." It might quite appropriately have been called "Tasso," so true is the tone-picture it presents, not of Sappho, but of the poet's struggles, misfortunes, melancholy, madness, and final triumph and apotheosis. The strongest objection that can be urged against it is that it contains little more than a profoundly musical compound of thematic fragments bearing but the slightest logical relation to each other; and being so unvaryingly stimulated and overcharged that the intelligent listener soon wearies and longs for a fresher, healthier, and more normal atmosphere. Technically the work is an interesting study in orchestral tone color, while on the other hand it is about as magnificent a specimen of the crazy-quilt style of musical composition as has been heard here for some time. Mrs. Elene B. Eaton gave to the Weber aria "Ocean! thou mighty monster" a largeness and beauty of tone that were eminently appropriate for it. While of voice there was plenty, and as its tones were given out with a rare charm of naturalness, it may seem ungracious to complain that the interpretation seemed wholly lacking that psychical intensity and passion which the aria requires. A highly intelligent reading of the great aria it certainly was, but it more clearly seemed an interpretation that had been carefully prepared and intelligently studied, yet not so deeply felt. The aria by Haendel, "O sleep, why dost thou leave me?"—and was ever an aria more quaintly simple, more beautiful?—had given it a very just tonal effect, and was delightfully sung.

Mrs. Eaton, nee Kiehew, has greatly advanced her vocal art by her study abroad. She has now a fine command of technique, as well as an artistic intelligence that she did not formerly possess. Had she temperament, sympathetic feeling and dramatic fervor, she would be a far more interesting singer. She was warmly received, and several times recalled.

The more the Raff "Im Walde" is heard the more clear and masterly does its symphonic contour appear. On the other hand, as an idyllic tone painting it would seem to have its superior only in the sixth symphony of Beethoven. Programme music? Surely we should not berate it on any such score. The tone-art is not yet an adult, is as though 'twere born but yesterday. yet so beautiful has Beethoven, have even Raff and Goetz, made it that it already seems to be regarded as the Pythian Apollo of our age. Even the poems of antiquity sometimes appear to pale before such works as the "Pastoral" or the "Im Walde." And one is easily tempted to the belief that either of these poetic masterpieces is as perfect in its way as though it had been composed by such a born landscape songster as Theocritus or Virgil, or drawn by Michael Angelo. The work was performed with all the justice which that perfect balance of parts, and refined tonal quality for which the best orchestra in the world is noted;—not to mention the high discriminating sense and unimpeachable culture that characterized Conductor Paur's reading. The concert ended with "The Preludes" by Liszt. The work was begun by Liszt in Marseilles in 1845, and was not finished until five years later. It was first performed in Weimar in 1854, while it is not so conspicuous for that wrenching, chaotic weltering and lugubrious tonality characteristic of Franz Liszt's orchestral works, it is nevertheless open to the serious impeachment of being quite as sensational and extravagant a creation for orchestra as can easily be found. At next Saturday evening's Symphony concert the celebrated violinist, Eugene Ysaye, will make his Boston debut with the third concerto for violin by Saint-Saens Volkmann's Symphony in D minor, the "Spring" overture by Goetz and "Carnival in Paris," by Svendsen, will also be given.

C. L. CAPEN.

Philadelphia Abend-Post.

Published every evening, except Sunday, by

The Post Printing and Publishing Co.

Limited.

R. Friedlander.....President

606 NORTH FOURTH STREET.

Served to Subscribers at 10 cents per week, $5 per annum.

Montag, 26. November 1894.

Boston Symphonie Orchester.

Am Montag den 3. Dezember findet das zweite große Konzert des Boston Symphonie Orchesters unter Leitung des Herrn Emil Paur statt. In demselben wirkt der berühmte belgische Violin-Virtuose Ysaye mit, welcher in New York große Erfolge gefeiert hat. Ein Konzert dieser Musterorganisation ist ein musikalisches Kunstereignis ersten Ranges und das bevorstehende wird gegen die früheren nicht zurückstehen. Tickets für dasselbe sind schon jetzt zu haben. Näheres besagt die Anzeige.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 28, 1894.

The program of the sixth concert of the Symphony Orchestra given last evening in Music Hall was as follows:

Overture, "Sappho" (first time at these concerts).....Goldmark
Recitative and aria, "Ocean, thou mighty monster," from "Oberon".....Weber
Symphony No. 3, F major, "Im Walde," op. 153.....Raff
Air, "O Sleep, why dost thou leave me," from "Semele"....Händel
Symphonic Poem No. 3, "Les Preludes".....Liszt

I confess that I was disappointed in the overture to "Sappho." The simplicity of the opening measures for harp is impressive, but the theme of passion is not a thing of beauty or of strength; it is not feverish enough. Nor did the appeal or lament of the first violin move me, although it was finely played by Mr. Kneisel. I do not understand the necessity of the fanfares. The interest of the overture is in the coloring, not in the drawing, not in composition. There are striking harmonic progressions; there are passages of gorgeous tonal color. The work is episodic. It is not firmly bound together. It is unnecessarily long.

Nor do I recognize in this music the "Sappho of Lesbos," the island where the head of Orpheus was buried. Does Goldmark consider her merely as the Tenth Muse? Are the fanfares for poetical triumphs? Is the sadness that which was inspired by Phaon?

And what, pray, have the pastoral passages to do with the story of the Lesbian?

Goldmark, the dreamer of fit music for Balki's Queen of Sheba; Vivien, the ensnarer of Merlin; Penthesilea, the inventor of the battle axe, who came as some say for the love of Hector to the siege of Troy, "with a thousand Ladies," and who, according to Heinrich von Kleist, was in her day Marquise de Sade, and tore with her nails and teeth the body of hound-hunted Achilles loved by her hotly—Goldmark now would fain tell by an overture the passion of Sappho!

And pray what do we know of Sappho? Read the famous article by Bayle founded on the injurious remark of Suidas, or the defense of her by Friedrich Gottlieb Welcher, or the poem by Ovid, or the fragments of her own poetry, or the burning lines of Swinburne's "Anactoria." Do you gain my idea of the personality of the woman?

Let us listen to the story as told by Thomas Heywood 270 years ago; let us respect his curious expression, for he was of the mighty Elizabethan age:

"Elianus affirmes her to be the daughter of Scamandronius; Plato of Ariston; Suidas and other Greeke writers deliver to us that there were two of that name, the one called Erixia, a much celebrated Poetesse * * * the other was called Sapho Mitelaena long after her who was a singer and a strumpet. Shee published many rare and famous Poems amongst the Greekes, and therefore had the honour to bee called the tenth Muse, the reason why she fell in love with Phaon, Pliny attributes to the vertue of an hearbe, but Babtista Egnatius, a later writer and exquisite both in the Greeke and Latin tongues, in transferring this fable from the originall into the Romon tongue, as likewise others of his opinion conclude that Phaon was of the profession of such as get their living by transporting passengers from one side of a river unto another, a plaine Ferrie-man, and that it happened upon a time that Venus coming to the place where he kept his passage, without demanding any hyre he gave her a free transportage, not knowing to whom it was hee did that courtesie, no way suspecting she had beene a goddesse. This, Venus tooke so gratefully, that she thought to requite his freenesse, with a bountie farre transcending the value of his paines. Shee therefore gave him an Alablaster box full of a most pretious vnguent (teaching him how to apply it) with which hee no sooner annoynted his face, but hee instantly became of all mortall creatures the most beautiful, of whom the Lesbian damsels grew inamoured, but especially hee was ardently and most affectionately beloved of Sapho. Phaon having occation to passe from Lesbos into Cicilie, shee was tortured in soule for his absence, intimating that it was done in despight or disgrace of her; first purposed to cast herselfe from Leucate, a high promentorie in Epyre, downe into the Sea, which she after did; yet before she would attempt it, she first in an Epistle thought by all the allurements of a woman's wit to call him backe again into his countrey; which Ovid in her behalfe most feelingly hath exprest. * * * For presposterous and forbidden Luxuries which were imputed unto her, Horace calls her mascula Sapho."

But the German commentators on Horace translate mascula without squinting intent as "Die Männlich Kräftige, Energische."

* * *

Still there is no description of Sappho's personal appearance. Where shall we find it? In the second volume of Rowbotham's "History of Music," of all places in the world!

"And we may picture her sitting in some marble court overlooking the Ægean, among her companions and her loves. And there was Cydno, and Anactorie and Andromeda, and Gyrinna, and Eunice, and Gongyla, and Erinna, who had to leave them all and go back to her spinning again; and Atthis, and Telesippa, and Megara. And these last were the three she loved the most. And she was a little dark woman with black hair, and Alcæus says that she had a beautiful smile. And she had the passions of Semiramis. All the amours of Aphrodite put together would scarcely equal the amours of Sappho. And she panted for that love which seems so strange. * * * And Sappho had been married to a wealthy Andrian of the name of Cercolus, when she was very young. And she had a little daughter named Cleis, and she says somewhere, 'I have a little daughter and she is like golden flowers, and I would not give her for all the wealth of Lydia, or even for my own dear Lesbos.' * * * And she was full of fire and passion, and is the acknowledged mistress of the Systaltic or 'Thrilling' Style of Music."

Remembering the consuming frenzy of her life; remembering her passionate verses, I find the Goldmarkian music a pale and languid portrayal of "the little dark woman with black hair."

Paine saw deeper into the character of his "Œdipus," and Massenet knew the song that burst through the parched and craving lips of raging "Phaedra."

* * *

The symphony by Raff, as ever, gave much pleasure. Mrs. Elene B. Eaton, a soprano of fresh, agreeable voice, showed excellent training. She appeared to better advantage, so far as intonation was concerned, in the air by Händel than in the air from "Oberon."

Mme. Paur's First Appearance in Brooklyn.

FRIDAY evening, December 7, Mme. Emil Paur will appear at Historical Hall, Brooklyn. She is a pianist of whom much is expected. Mme. Paur is the wife of the director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. She will play on the Wissner piano the following program:

MME. EMIL PAUR.

Variations, C minor.....Beethoven
Clavierstück, E flat major.....Schubert
Two scherzi.....Schubert
"Song Without Words," G major.....Mendelssohn
"Spinning Song".....Mendelssohn
"Evenings".....Schumann
"Bird as Prophet".....Schumann
Intermezzo.....Brahms
Nocturne, F sharp major.....Chopin
Valse, E minor.....Chopin
Romanze, F major.....Rubinstein
Passepied.....Rubinstein
Menuet Italien.....Mrs. A. Beach
Intermezzo.....E. Paur
Schilflied.....Rob. Franz-Liszt
Fledermaus (Paraphrase).....Ed. Schuett

[55]

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
MONDAY MORNING, NOV. 26, 1894.

Sixth Symphony Concert.

The programme for the sixth symphony concert in Music Hall, Saturday evening, while it may not have proven especially interesting to all musicians present was to say the least for it, a very happy choice in calling forth the orchestra's best work.

Goldmark's overture to Sappho was heard here for the first time. As a musical composition it has but little of the wealth and creative power that contributed so largely to the unsurpassed fame of Goldmark's "Sakuntala." It might quite appropriately have been called "Tasso," so true is the tone-picture it presents, not of Sappho, but of the poet's struggles, misfortunes, melancholy, madness, and final triumph and apotheosis. The strongest objection that can be urged against it is that it contains little more than a profoundly musical compound of thematic fragments bearing but the slightest logical relation to each other; and being so unvaryingly stimulated and overcharged that the intelligent listener soon wearies and longs for a fresher, healthier, and more normal atmosphere. Technically the work is an interesting study in orchestral tone color, while on the other hand it is about as magnificent a specimen of the crazy-quilt style of musical composition as has been heard here for some time. Mrs. Elene B. Eaton gave to the Weber aria "Ocean! thou mighty monster" a largeness and beauty of tone that were eminently appropriate for it. While of voice there was plenty, and as its tones were given out with a rare charm of naturalness, it may seem ungracious to complain that the interpretation seemed wholly lacking that psychical intensity and passion which the aria requires. A highly intelligent reading of the great aria it certainly was, but it more clearly seemed an interpretation that had been carefully prepared and intelligently studied, yet not so deeply felt. The aria by Haendel, "O sleep, why dost thou leave me?"—and was ever an aria more quaintly simple, more beautiful?—had given it a very just tonal effect, and was delightfully sung.

Mrs. Eaton, nee Kiehew, has greatly advanced her vocal art by her study abroad. She has now a fine command of technique, as well as an artistic intelligence that she did not formerly possess. Had she temperament, sympathetic feeling and dramatic fervor, she would be a far more interesting singer. She was warmly received, and several times recalled.

The more the Raff "Im Walde" is heard the more clear and masterly does its symphonic contour appear. On the other hand, as an idylic tone painting it would seem to have its superior only in the sixth symphony of Beethoven. Programme music? Surely we should not berate it on any such score. The tone-art is not yet an adult, is as though 'twere born but yesterday, yet so beautiful has Beethoven, have even Raff and Goetz, made it that it already seems to be regarded as the Pythian Apollo of our age. Even the poems of antiquity sometimes appear to pale before such works as the "Pastoral" or the "Im Walde." And one is easily tempted to the belief that either of these poetic masterpieces is as perfect in its way as though it had been composed by such a born landscape songster as Theocritus or Virgil, or drawn by Michael Angelo. The work was performed with all the justice which that perfect balance of parts, and refined tonal quality for which the best orchestra in the world is noted;—not to mention the high discriminating sense and unimpeachable culture that characterized Conductor Paur's reading. The concert ended with "The Preludes" by Liszt. The work was begun by Liszt in Marseilles in 1845, and was not finished until five years later. It was first performed in Weimar in 1854, while it is not so conspicuous for that wrenching, chaotic weltering and lugubrious tonality characteristic of Franz Liszt's orchestral works, it is nevertheless open to the serious impeachment of being quite as sensational and extravagant a creation for orchestra as can easily be found. At next Saturday evening's Symphony concert the celebrated violinist, Eugene Ysaye, will make his Boston debut with the third concerto for violin by Saint-Saens Volkmann's Symphony in D minor; the "Spring" overture by Goetz and "Carnival in Paris," by Svendsen, will also be given.

C. L. CAPEN.

Philadelphia Abend-Post.
published every evening, except Sunday, by
The Post
Printing and Publishing Co.
Limited.
R. Friedlander.....President
406 NORTH FOURTH STREET
Served to Subscribers at 10 cents per week,
$5 per annum.

Montag, 26. November 1894.

Boston Symphonie Orchester.

Am Montag den 3. Dezember findet das zweite große Konzert des Boston Symphonie Orchesters unter Leitung des Herrn Emil Paur statt. In demselben wirkt der berühmte belgische Violin-Virtuose Ysaye mit, welcher in New York große Erfolge gehabt hat. Ein Konzert dieser Muster-Organisation ist ein musikalisches Kunst-Ereigniß ersten Ranges und das bevorstehende wird gegen die früheren nicht zurückstehen. Tickets für dasselbe sind schon jetzt zu haben. Näheres besagt die Anzeige.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 28, 1894.

The program of the sixth concert of the Symphony Orchestra given last evening in Music Hall was as follows:

Overture, "Sappho" (first time at these concerts).....Goldmark
Recitative and aria, "Ocean, thou mighty monster," from "Oberon".....Weber
Symphony No. 3, F major, "Im Walde," op. 153.....Raff
Air, "O Sleep, why dost thou leave me," from "Semele"....Händel
Symphonic Poem No. 3, "Les Preludes".....Liszt

I confess that I was disappointed in the overture to "Sappho." The simplicity of the opening measures for harp is impressive, but the theme of passion is not a thing of beauty or of strength; it is not feverish enough. Nor did the appeal or lament of the first violin move me, although it was finely played by Mr. Kneisel. I do not understand the necessity of the fanfares. The interest of the overture is in the coloring, not in the drawing, not in composition. There are striking harmonic progressions; there are passages of gorgeous tonal color. The work is episodic. It is not firmly bound together. It is unnecessarily long.

Nor do I recognize in this music the "Sappho of Lesbos," the island where the head of Orpheus was buried. Does Goldmark consider her merely as the Tenth Muse? Are the fanfares for poetical triumphs? Is the sadness that which was inspired by Phaon?

And what, pray, have the pastoral passages to do with the story of the Lesbian?

Goldmark, the dreamer of fit music for Balki's Queen of Sheba; Vivien, the ensnarer of Merlin; Penthesilea, the inventor of the battle axe, who came as some say for the love of Hector to the siege of Troy, "with a thousand Ladies," and who, according to Heinrich von Kleist, was in her day Marquise de Sade, and tore with her nails and teeth the body of hound-hunted Achilles loved by her hotly—Goldmark now would fain tell by an overture the passion of Sappho!

And pray what do we know of Sappho? Read the famous article by Bayle founded on the injurious remark of Suidas, or the defense of her by Friedrich Gottlieb Welcher, or the poem by Ovid, or the fragments of her own poetry, or the burning lines of Swinburne's "Anactoria." Do you gain my idea of the personality of the woman?

Let us listen to the story as told by Thomas Heywood 270 years ago; let us respect his curious expression, for he was of the mighty Elizabethan age:

"Elianus affirmes her to be the daughter of Scamandronius; Plato of Ariston; Suidas and other Greeke writers deliver to us that there were two of that name, the one called Erixia, a much celebrated Poetesse * * * the other was called Sapho Mitelaena long after her who was a singer and a strumpet. Shee published many rare and famous Poems amongst the Greekes, and therefore had the honour to bee called the tenth Muse, the reason why she fell in love with Phaon, Pliny attributes to the vertue of an hearbe, but Babtista Egnatius, a later writer and exquisite both in the Greeke and Latin tongues, in transferring this fable from the originall into the Romon tongue, as likewise others of his opinion conclude that Phaon was of the profession of such as get their living by transporting passengers from one side of a river unto another, a plaine Ferrie-man, and that it happened upon a time that Venus coming to the place where he kept his passage, without demanding any hyre he gave her a free transportage, not knowing to whom it was hee did that courtesie, no way suspecting she had beene a goddesse. This, Venus tooke so gratefully, that she thought to requite his freenesse, with a bountie farre transcending the value of his paines. Shee therefore gave him an Alablaster box full of a most pretious vnguent (teaching him how to apply it) with which hee no sooner annoynted his face, but hee instantly became of all mortall creatures the most beautiful, of whom the Lesbian damsels grew inamoured, but especially hee was ardently and most affectionately beloved of Sapho. Phaon having occation to passe from Lesbos into Cicilie, shee was tortured in soule for his absence, intimating that it was done in despight or disgrace of her; first purposed to cast herselfe from Leucate, a high promentorie in Epyre, downe into the Sea, which she after did; yet before she would attempt it, she first in an Epistle thought by all the allurements of a woman's wit to call him backe again into his countrey; which Ovid in her behalfe most feelingly hath exprest. * * * For presposterous and forbidden Luxuries which were imputed unto her, Horace calls her mascula Sapho."

But the German commentators on Horace translate mascula without squinting intent as "Die Männlich Kräftige, Energische."

* * *

Still there is no description of Sappho's personal appearance. Where shall we find it? In the second volume of Rowbotham's "History of Music," of all places in the world!

"And we may picture her sitting in some marble court overlooking the Ægean, among her companions and her loves. And there was Cydno, and Anactorie and Andromeda, and Gyrinna, and Eunice, and Gongyla, and Erinna, who had to leave them all and go back to her spinning again; and Atthis, and Telesippa, and Megara. And these last were the three she loved the most. And she was a little dark woman with black hair, and Alcæus says that she had a beautiful smile. And she had the passions of Semiramis. All the amours of Aphrodite put together would scarcely equal the amours of Sappho. And she panted for that love which seems so strange. * * * And Sappho had been married to a wealthy Andrian of the name of Cercolus, when she was very young. And she had a little daughter named Cleis, and she says somewhere, 'I have a little daughter and she is like golden flowers, and I would not give her for all the wealth of Lydia, or even for my own dear Lesbos.' * * * And she was full of fire and passion, and is the acknowledged mistress of the Systaltic or 'Thrilling' Style of Music."

Remembering the consuming frenzy of her life; remembering her passionate verses, I find the Goldmarkian music a pale and languid portrayal of "the little dark woman with black hair."

Paine saw deeper into the character of his "Œdipus," and Massenet knew the song that burst through the parched and craving lips of raging "Phaedra."

* * *

The symphony by Raff, as ever, gave much pleasure. Mrs. Elene B. Eaton, a soprano of fresh, agreeable voice, showed excellent training. She appeared to better advantage, so far as intonation was concerned, in the air by Händel than in the air from "Oberon."

Mme. Paur's First Appearance in Brooklyn.

FRIDAY evening, December 7, Mme. Emil Paur will appear at Historical Hall, Brooklyn. She is a pianist of whom much is expected. Mme. Paur is the wife of the director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. She will play on the Wissner piano the following program:

MME. EMIL PAUR.

Variations, C minor.....Beethoven
Clavierstück, E flat major.....Schubert
Two scherzi.....Schubert
"Song Without Words," G major.....Mendelssohn
"Spinning Song".....Mendelssohn
"Evenings".....Schumann
"Bird as Prophet".....Schumann
Intermezzo.....Brahms
Nocturne, F sharp major.....Chopin
Valse, E minor.....Chopin
Romanze, F major.....Rubinstein
Passepied.....Rubinstein
Menuet Italien.....Mrs. A. Beach
Intermezzo.....E. Paur
Schilflied.....Rob. Franz-Liszt
Fledermaus Paraphrase.....Ed. Schuett

Boston Daily Globe.
FRIDAY, NOV. 30, 1894.

SPEAKS FIVE LANGUAGES.

Violinist Eugene Ysaye is Now in Boston.

Was Made Acquainted With Thanksgiving Day and Fat Turkeys.

He Knows Mr Paur Very Well and is Studying Hard on English.

Eugene Ysaye, the great Belgian violinist, is in town with his manager, Mr R. C. Johnston. They are stopping at the Parker house, where from 11.30 p m on Wednesday till noon yesterday there has been a perfect inpour of distinguished musicians to bid Mr Ysaye welcome to Boston.

In fact, so anxious were the musical raternity to pay homage to the virtuoso that 25 or 30 of them remained at the Parker house all Wednesday night, and the time pased very rapidly in chatting, laughing and smoking.

M Ysaye had played with Emil Paur in Leipsic and in Manheim, and the renewing of his acquaintance with that gentleman in this city was a pleasure which both appreciated.

EUGENE YSAYE.

M Ysaye plays with the symphony orchestra this week, and these will be the only opportunities for the Boston public to listen to him and to judge if he be indeed what it is claimed he is—"an inspired genius."

At Music hall yesterday morning there was a private rehearsal, and the artists of the orchestra were very enthusiastic over the playing of the young man. Indeed, so delighted were they with his performance that they came very near bearing him in their arms off the stage.

At noon M Ysaye was seen for a little while in the parlor of the Parker house, prior to his being borne away to some out-of-town home with Mr Paur to a Thanksgiving repast. His manager had explained to him the significance that Thanksgiving day and the fattest turkey have for the people of New England.

M Ysaye speaks five languages, Italian, French, Spanish, Russian and German, but as yet he has been unable to master the English tongue. It is, however, his ambition to do so, and while travelling upon the trains he applies himself assiduously to French and English grammars.

When he came to this country less than a month ago he could not speak one word of English. The advance he has made in this respect is praiseworthy. He has in this short time picked up somewhat of a vocabulary. He makes his greetings in very good English, and when he grows interested and lapses into German or Russian his face and gestures are so expressive that it is no very difficult matter to glean the meaning of what he is saying.

"The Boston symphony orchestra is a magnificent one," he said, after rehearsal yesterday. "There is none better. It is a charm to play with such splendidly trained musicians."

M Ysaye is a striking looking man, tall and with an easy carriage. His hair, which is dark and straight, he wears long, after the fashion of other foreign artists who have come to this country.

The pronunciation of his name has furnished no end of comment and amusement among English speaking people who have gullelessly pronounced it in every possible way but the right way. It is pronounced as if it were "Easy"—with a long "y"—as his manager remarks facetiously, "dead easy," when you know how.

A little over 30 years ago the violinist was born in Liege, Belgium. Many famous artists have been graduated from the conservatory of Liege from time to time, but among them all Ysaye is the most celebrated.

He received his first lessons from his father, Nicolas Ysaye, who was an author and also a composer of some repute.

When but yet a youth he played in a concert at Antwerp. In the audience was Vieuxtemps, and so affected was this great man by the boy's playing that he leaped upon the stage and with tears streaming down his cheeks, embraced the young artist, called him "my son," and told him that the mantle of greatness had fallen upon him.

After this concert he made one triumph after another, and through the influence of Vieuxtemps Ysaye was sent by the Belgian government to study in Paris.

He made a series of tours through Europe, chelting by his talents the patronage of the nobility. Three years ago he was appointed to the Royal direction of Fetis in Brussels, who said that he saw in his young contemporary the "master of masters." In September, 1886, at the suggestion of M Javaert, he was appointed high professor at the Royal conservatory at Brussels.

Although M Ysaye has composed a great deal, he has had very little published. Of the great works he has completed may be mentioned his concerto No. 6, a series of scenes, sentimental, and some variations on a theme of Paganini.

A large grand repertoire, consisting of 243 classical selections, has been sent by him to this country for use during his engagements here.

He is possessed of two of the best violins in existence. One of them is a "Gagliano," which is reported to have cost him $4000. The other is a "Guarnerius," and is worth from a monetary point of view $5000, but its owner values it above gold.

M Ysaye leaves for New York immediately after his performance at the symphony concert, Saturday evening.

The violinists of New York are to give him a public dinner, Dec 20, at Delmonico's. Vice Pres Stevenson will be present at the dinner, if his daughter's health will permit, as well as many other well-known and distinguished people.

BOSTON POST.
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.
SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 2, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme offered by Mr. Paur was as follows: Volkmann, symphony No. 1 in D minor, op. 44; Saint-Saens, concerto for violin No. 3, in B minor, op. 61; Monsigny, Chaconne and Rigodon from suite "Aline Reine de Golconde"; Ernst, fantasia for violin on airs from Rossini's "Otello"; Svendsen, Carnaval a Paris, op. 9.

The soloist was Engene Ysaye and the interest of the evening naturally centred in his work. He is a large man, somewhat heavy in his movements, and has thick, long black hair which bobs up and down when its owner becomes excited with his playing.

On his first entrance, Mr. Ysaye was evidently a little nervous, but this disappeared directly he began his number, and wore away entirely as the evening advanced. It is many a day since Boston has heard such work on the violin, in point of phrasing, execution and purity of tone. Saint-Saens's concerto No. 3 is familiar to the Symphony patrons, but it is doubtful if they were fully prepared for what followed. The control the soloist had over his instrument was marvellous; every note fell from his bow clear, true and distinct, while his conception of the music, as indicated by his phrasing, was a delight and something of a revelation.

The second movement, with its Sicilian melody, was exquisitely done, and the artificial harmonics with which the movement ended displayed rare skill. The third movement, too, was handled in a masterly manner, the intricate passages being given brilliantly and with marked accuracy.

Mr. Ysaye's second number, Ernst's fantasy from "Otello," was perhaps better appreciated, for the different airs from the opera, in a most beautiful arrangement, were given. Here the soloist's phrasing found full expression, and it was exquisite. The notes were clear and pure as a bell, and even in pianissimo could be distinctly heard all over the hall. The audience grew quite enthusiastic and called the soloist back again and again.

In Volkmann's symphony and the two other numbers, the orchestra is deserving praise for excellent work. Mr. Paur, as an accompanist to Mr. Ysaye, was also highly commendable. There will be no rehearsal or concert this week, but on the week following there will be a memorial programme to Anton Rubinstein. Mrs. Ernest Lent will be the soloist.

Boston Herald.
SUNDAY, DECEMBER 2, 1894.

The Appearance of Ysaye at the Seventh Symphony Concert.

The program of the seventh Symphony concert, given last evening in Music Hall, Mr. Paur, conductor, was as follows:

Symphony No. 1, D minor, op. 44.....Volkmann
Concerto for violin, No. 3, in B minor, op. 61 .....Saint-Saens
Chanconne and Rigaudon from "Aline Reine de Golconde" .....Monsigny
Fantasia for violin on airs from Rossini's "Otello" .....Ernst
The Paris Carnival, op. 9.....Svendsen

Will the time ever come when a conductor is not ashamed to give only portions of a symphony, or afraid lest the people, fetich worshipers, arise and stone him? Here is this symphony by Volkmann, with its strong and noble first movement, charming andante, delightful trio in the scherzo. And then comes the dull and labored finale. Why is it necessary in such cases to play the symphony as a whole?

***

Beautiful and strong as are so many passages of the symphony, it served last evening chiefly as a preparation to the performance of Ysaye. Again there was a triumph of individuality. Again there was the display of a temperament.

Now in these days it is taken for granted that a great violinist, a man whose reputation crossed the Atlantic long before he stood on the stage of Music Hall, has a remarkable technique. To speak at length of Ysaye's technique would then be almost impertinent, and it would be a reflection on the intelligence of the reader. Let it be sufficient to say that his technique is highly developed; that he conquers difficulties with apparent ease, yet without fatuous display. His pose is that of the man who knows that he is master of his instrument, who has faced many audiences; yet there is never a trace of the poseur. A stalwart figure; a massive, leonine head; a face that shows kindliness, shrewdness, and general intelligence. That he does not play to the crowd goes without saying; for it is hard to imagine a pupil whom Vieuxtemps loved and respected so degrading his talent.

The charm of Ysaye, the fiddler—do not shrink at the sound of this word; does not fiddle give you the idea of the strings better than the word violin?—the charm of this fiddler is the peculiar and beautiful quality of the tone. For tone is what moves and thrills. Pyrotechnics simply startle, excite wonder. This tone is never exaggerated. There is no sawing on the G string as though the player must needs saw on the human heart. The body and the head are not used to accentuate the tone by playing to the eye. This tone is gained legitimately; it is the child of Nature and Art, and it is used legitimately. The superficial nature of many a violinist who has delighted by his bravura is detected the moment he sings a passionate melody, for he tears the passion to tatters in his endeavor to make an effect. In such a man as Ysaye, what he does not do is almost as remarkable as what he does. For self-control, when one realizes his power and his mastery over an audience, is the hardest of tasks.

Perhaps the most pleasant recollection of last evening is the fact that there was nothing in his performance that you wished otherwise. You said to yourself, "Now, if I played the violin, I should play that passage as Ysaye is playing it." This would not be said in any spirit of foolish conceit, but because the performance was so pure and noble that it would be hard for you to imagine it as perfect if the music had been played in another manner. To speak in detail of Ysaye's performance would be to indulge constantly in superlatives, and superlatives, even when they are so richly deserved, are wearisome, and the reader who did not hear begins to be suspicious. Did the execution of the most difficult passages excite unbounded enthusiasm? So did the beautiful tone, the carressing of the strings by the bow, the unaffected and truly artistic phrasing that was inspired by the heart and controlled by the musical reason.

Comparisons are inevitable, perhaps, but let us avoid them. I have spoken in another column of the Journal of the vice of comparison, which so often detracts from full enjoyment. We have heard many famous fiddlers in this city. It is doubtful if any one of them has given greater and purer pleasure than that given last night by Eugene Ysaye.

One word more about his tone. There are violinists whose song is so sensuous that it excites the thought of the Evil One, to whom the fiddle, as the superstitious of past centuries believed, was a favorite instrument of corruption. Such a song was that which came from the three-stringed violin with the belly covered with skin of bluish serpent played by Muzio in the wild tale by the great Russian; and Muzio heard the tune in Ceylon, and it was called "The Song of Triumphant Love." Now this love was lust. The song of Ysaye, whether in the singing passages of the fine concerto of Saint-Saens, or the melody of Desdemona, is human, intensely human, yet it is free from earthly dross. In the finale of the concerto his tones soared above the unearthly music of the accompanying violins like unto the song of a disembodied spirit.

Recalled again and again, Ysaye after the "Otello" fantasia gave an exquisite performance of the sarabande and gigue from Bach's third sonata, if I am not mistaken.

***

There were moments in the accompaniment to the "Otello" fantasia when there was a lack of precision, but the performance of the orchestra, as a whole, was one of great merit. The symphony was finely read and strongly played. The little danses were interesting chiefly as a specimen of the music to which famous men and women once danced when the ballet was one of the fine arts, and not an exhibition of unmeaning kicks and acrobatic, ungraceful feats.

***

The compiler of the Program Book makes the following statement in speaking of Monsigny (page 270):

"In 1761 his le Cadi dupé so delighted the poet Sedaine that he offered Monsigny to supply him with libretti in future. The success of this collaboration was such that the Comédie-Italienne succeeded in having the rival Opéra-Comique de la Foire Saint-Laurent closed, for fear that its rising reputation might injure their own theatre; and from that time Monsigny wrote only for the Comédie-Italienne (the forerunner of the present Opéra-Comique in Paris)."

This statement is incorrect.

"Aline, Reine de Golconde," the very "ballet héroique," from which the dances that were played last night are taken, was written for the Paris Opéra, and produced on that famous stage April 15, 1766. The words were by Sedaine. Neither the score nor the libretto bears the name of Monsigny, who did not sign his early works, because he was then steward to the Duke of Orleans. Sophie Arnould was the original Aline. When the work was revived in 1772 and 1779 Guimard, the demure wanton, was the chief female dancer.

The piece was sumptuously mounted, indeed the expense of putting it on the stage was 33,750 livres, an enormous sum in those days.

PHILIP HALE.

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, DEC. 2, 1894.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS.

Symphony Patrons Applaud Ysaye, Violinist.

Eugene Ysaye has conquered musical Boston; yesterday's symphony concert audience surrendered unconditionally and declared him great.

Rarely has a foreign musician been received with as much enthusiasm on his first appearance in Boston. Although lavish praises from the New York critics had heralded his coming, the superb playing of the Belgian violinist proved a welcome surprise.

Ysaye is truly a great artist. Whether he is as great as Paganini, Wieniawski, Joachim, Wilhelmj or Ole Bull need not be speculated upon after a single hearing. He is unquestionably great in himself, however he may compare with other great violinists.

The selections he chose for first performance here were Saint-Saens' concerto for violin and orchestra in B minor and Ernest's fantasy for violin on airs from Rossini's "Otello." They were good selections offering opportunity for showing his standing, both as an artist and a virtuoso.

After he had played the first move- of Saint-Saens' B minor concerto at the Friday afternoon rehearsal there was no longer doubt of his greatness. There was a burst of spontaneous applause such as is seldom seen from the conservative rehearsal audiences. After the final movement there was still greater enthusiasm and actually a few cheers. The gathering at last night's concert was even more demonstrative in expressing approval.

When Ysaye gives his promised recitals here he will surely play to a multitude.

A sketch of Mr Ysaye's brilliant career has already been printed in these columns, together with a reproduction of his photograph. The portrait was a faithful likeness. He is a big man, with broad shoulders and massive chest. His head is enormous, almost lion like, with its great mass of thick, lank, black hair, which becomes animated when its owner plays, seemingly partaking of the musician's enthusiasm. His face is strong and intellectual, the features are always in repose, even when he plays with the most passion, but there is a look from the dark, bright eyes which seem to mirror the shifting moods of the music.

There is no suggestion of affectation in Ysaye's appearance or style of playing. In this respect he is unique among the great violinists. His bearing is graceful, and he plays with the ease and freedom which comes from conscious power. He is plainly romantic, even sentimental, in temperament. So sensitive does he appear, and so daintily and affectionately does he handle his violin, that his playing is constantly characterized by a suggestiveness that is distinctly feminine.

Ysaye does not appear to possess great personal magnetism. He makes you feel the surpassing excellence of his playing, but he does not stimulate you with that exhilarating feeling which come from listening to Sarasate and a few other violinists. Possibly this is because of the repose which is such a characteristic feature of his playing. He makes no effort to dazzle his audience by the brilliancy of his technique, nor does he ever resort to any of the many showy tricks so frequently made use of by violinists.

While listening to him you feel that you are listening to music which fairly comes from the soul of the player. You are conscious that he interprets the music exactly as he feels it, and you give no thought to the perfectness of his technique. Mastery of technique is so common in these days that it has come to be accepted as a matter of course.

His tone is not especially notable for power, but it is exceptionally pure and rich, and possesses a certain ringing quality which gives exquisite pleasure to the hearers.

Ysaye may be said to be more an artist than a virtuoso, an interpreter rather than an executionist. Every tone produced is exact and given with a desire for artistic rather than showy effect, and his phrasing is especially good.

He played the Saint-Saens' concerto superbly and gave rare artistic finish to the interpretation. Especially brilliant was his performance of the final movement. The Ernst fantasy also afforded him admirable opportunities for displaying his wonderful art.

Director Paur's selections for the orchestra were: Robert Volkmann's symphony No. 1 in D minor, the Chaconne and Rigodon from the suit, "Aline, Reine de Golconde," by Monsigny, and "The Paris Carnival," by Johan Severn Svendsen.

The symphony was given intelligent and artistic interpretation, and, in spite of the fact that there is much in Volkmann's voluminous work that possesses slumber inspiring qualities, the audience gave evidence of enjoying the work. The selections from Monsigny's suit were acceptably played, and Svendsen's elaborate and brilliant writing was given a spirited performance.

There will be no concert by the symphony orchestra this week. The eighth concert, Dec 14 and 15, will be in memory of Anton Rubinstein, and the program as follows: Funeral march from the heroic smyphony of Beethoven, Rubinstein's pianoforte concerto in D minor, Mrs Ernst Lent pianist; the Ocean symphony of Rubinstein, complete.

Boston Daily Globe.
FRIDAY, NOV. 30, 1894.

SPEAKS FIVE LANGUAGES.

Violinist Eugene Ysaye is Now in Boston.

Was Made Acquainted With Thanksgiving Day and Fat Turkeys.

He Knows Mr Paur Very Well and is Studying Hard on English.

Eugene Ysaye, the great Belgian violinist, is in town with his manager, Mr R. C. Johnston. They are stopping at the Parker house, where from 11.30 p m on Wednesday till noon yesterday there has been a perfect inpour of distinguished musicians to bid Mr Ysaye welcome to Boston.

In fact, so anxious were the musical raternity to pay homage to the virtuoso that 25 or 30 of them remained at the Parker house all Wednesday night, and the time pased very rapidly in chatting, laughing and smoking.

M Ysaye had played with Emil Paur in Leipsic and in Manheim, and the renewing of his acquaintance with that gentleman in this city was a pleasure which both appreciated.

EUGENE YSAYE.

M Ysaye plays with the symphony orchestra this week, and these will be the only opportunities for the Boston public to listen to him and to judge if he be indeed what it is claimed he is—"an inspired genius."

At Music hall yesterday morning there was a private rehearsal, and the artists of the orchestra were very enthusiastic over the playing of the young man. Indeed, so delighted were they with his performance that they came very near bearing him in their arms off the stage.

At noon M Ysaye was seen for a little while in the parlor of the Parker house, prior to his being borne away to some out-of-town home with Mr Paur to a Thanksgiving repast. His manager had explained to him the significance that Thanksgiving day and the fattest turkey have for the people of New England.

M Ysaye speaks five languages, Italian, French, Spanish, Russian and German, but as yet he has been unable to master the English tongue. It is, however, his ambition to do so, and while travelling upon the trains he applies himself assiduously to French and English grammars.

When he came to this country less than a month ago he could not speak one word of English. The advance he has made in this respect is praiseworthy. He has in this short time picked up somewhat of a vocabulary. He makes his greetings in very good English, and when he grows interested and lapses into German or Russian his face and gestures are so expressive that it is no very difficult matter to glean the meaning of what he is saying.

"The Boston symphony orchestra is a magnificent one," he said, after rehearsal yesterday. "There is none better. It is a charm to play with such splendidly trained musicians."

M Ysaye is a striking looking man, tall and with an easy carriage. His hair, which is dark and straight, he wears long, after the fashion of other foreign artists who have come to this country.

The pronunciation of his name has furnished no end of comment and amusement among English speaking people who have gullelessly pronounced it in every possible way but the right way. It is pronounced as if it were "Easy"—with a long "y"—as his manager remarks facetiously, "dead easy," when you know how.

A little over 30 years ago the violinist was born in Liege, Belgium. Many famous artists have been graduated from the conservatory of Liege from time to time, but among them all Ysaye is the most celebrated.

He received his first lessons from his father, Nicolas Ysaye, who was an author and also a composer of some repute.

When but yet a youth he played in a concert at Antwerp. In the audience was Vieuxtemps, and so affected was this great man by the boy's playing that he leaped upon the stage and with tears streaming down his cheeks, embraced the young artist, called him "my son," and told him that the mantle of greatness had fallen upon him.

After this concert he made one triumph after another, and through the influence of Vieuxtemps Ysaye was sent by the Belgian government to study in Paris.

He made a series of tours through Europe, eliciting by his talents the patronage of the nobility. Three years ago he was nominated to the Royal festival in honor of [illegible], before the Russian imperial society, under the direction of the great Rubinstein, who said that he saw in his young contemporary the "master of masters." In September, 1886, at the suggestion of M Javaert, he was appointed high professor at the Royal conservatory at Brussels.

Although M Ysaye has composed a great deal, he has had very little published. Of the great works he has completed may be mentioned his concerto No. 4, a series of scenes, sentimental, and some variations on a theme of Paganini.

A large grand repertoire, consisting of 243 classical selections, has been sent by him to this country for use during his engagements here.

He is possessed of two of the best violins in existence. One of them is a "Gagliano," which is reported to have cost him $4000. The other is a "Guarnerius," and is worth from a monetary point of view $5000, but its owner values it above gold.

M Ysaye leaves for New York immediately after his performance at the symphony concert, Saturday evening.

The violinists of New York are to give him a public dinner, Dec 20, at Delmonico's. Vice Pres Stevenson will be present at the dinner, if his daughter's health will permit, as well as many other well-known and distinguished people.

BOSTON POST.
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.
SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 2, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme offered by Mr. Paur was as follows: Volkmann, symphony No. 1 in D minor, op. 44; Saint-Saens, concerto for violin No. 3, in B minor, op. 61; Monsigny, Chaconne and Rigodon from suite "Aline Reine de Golconde"; Ernst, fantasia for violin on airs from Rossini's "Otello"; Svendsen, Carnaval a Paris, op. 9.

The soloist was Engene Ysaye and the interest of the evening naturally centred in his work. He is a large man, somewhat heavy in his movements, and has thick, long black hair which bobs up and down when its owner becomes excited with his playing.

On his first entrance, Mr. Ysaye was evidently a little nervous, but this disappeared directly he began his number, and wore away entirely as the evening advanced. It is many a day since Boston has heard such work on the violin, in point of phrasing, execution and purity of tone. Saint-Saens's concerto No. 3 is familiar to the Symphony patrons, but it is doubtful if they were fully prepared for what followed. The control the soloist had over his instrument was marvellous; every note fell from his bow clear, true and distinct, while his conception of the music, as indicated by his phrasing, was a delight and something of a revelation.

The second movement, with its Sicilian melody, was exquisitely done, and the artificial harmonics with which the movement ended displayed rare skill. The third movement, too, was handled in a masterly manner, the intricate passages being given brilliantly and with marked accuracy.

Mr. Ysaye's second numoer, Ernst's fantasy from "Otello," was perhaps better appreciated, for the different airs from the opera, in a most beautiful arrangement, were given. Here the soloist's phrasing found full expression, and it was exquisite. The notes were clear and pure as a bell, and even in pianissimo could be distinctly heard all over the hall. The audience grew quite enthusiastic and called the soloist back again and again.

In Volkmann's symphony and the two other numbers, the orchestra is deserving praise for excellent work. Mr. Paur, as an accompanist to Mr. Ysaye, was also highly commendable. There will be no rehearsal or concert this week, but on the week following there will be a memorial programme to Anton Rubinstein. Mrs. Ernest Lent will be the soloist.

Boston Journal.
SUNDAY, DECEMBER 2, 1894.

The Appearance of Ysaye at the Seventh Symphony Concert.

The program of the seventh Symphony concert, given last evening in Music Hall, Mr. Paur, conductor, was as follows:

Symphony No. 1, D minor, op. 44.....Volkmann
Concerto for violin, No. 3, in B minor, op. 61 .....Saint-Saens
Chanconne and Rigaudon from "Aline Reine de Golconde" .....Monsigny
Fantasia for violin on airs from Rossini's "Otello" .....Ernst
The Paris Carnival, op. 9.....Svendsen

Will the time ever come when a conductor is not ashamed to give only portions of a symphony, or afraid lest the people, fetich worshipers, arise and stone him? Here is this symphony by Volkmann, with its strong and noble first movement, charming andante, delightful trio in the scherzo. And then comes the dull and labored finale. Why is it necessary in such cases to play the symphony as a whole?

***

Beautiful and strong as are so many passages of the symphony, it served last evening chiefly as a preparation to the performance of Ysaye. Again there was a triumph of individuality. Again there was the display of a temperament.

Now in these days it is taken for granted that a great violinist, a man whose reputation crossed the Atlantic long before he stood on the stage of Music Hall, has a remarkable technique. To speak at length of Ysaye's technique would then be almost impertinent, and it would be a reflection on the intelligence of the reader. Let it be sufficient to say that his technique is highly developed; that he conquers difficulties with apparent ease, yet without fatuous display. His pose is that of the man who knows that he is master of his instrument, who has faced many audiences; yet there is never a trace of the poseur. A stalwart figure; a massive, leonine head; a face that shows kindliness, shrewdness, and general intelligence. That he does not play to the crowd goes without saying; for it is hard to imagine a pupil whom Vieuxtemps loved and respected so degrading his talent.

The charm of Ysaye, the fiddler—do not shrink at the sound of this word; does not fiddle give you the idea of the strings better than the word violin?—the charm of this fiddler is the peculiar and beautiful quality of the tone. For tone is what moves and thrills. Pyrotechnics simply startle, excite wonder. This tone is never exaggerated. There is no sawing on the G string as though the player must needs saw on the human heart. The body and the head are not used to accentuate the tone by playing to the eye. This tone is gained legitimately; it is the child of Nature and Art, and it is used legitimately. The superficial nature of many a violinist who has delighted by his bravura is detected the moment he sings a passionate melody, for he tears the passion to tatters in his endeavor to make an effect. In such a man as Ysaye, what he does not do is almost as remarkable as what he does. For self-control, when one realizes his power and his mastery over an audience, is the hardest of tasks.

Perhaps the most pleasant recollection of last evening is the fact that there was nothing in his performance that you wished otherwise. You said to yourself, "Now, if I played the violin, I should play that passage as Ysaye is playing it." This would not be said in any spirit of foolish conceit, but because the performance was so pure and noble that it would be hard for you to imagine it as perfect if the music had been played in another manner. To speak in detail of Ysaye's performance would be to indulge constantly in superlatives, and superlatives, even when they are so richly deserved, are wearisome, and the reader who did not hear begins to be suspicious. Did the execution of the most difficult passages excite unbounded enthusiasm? So did the beautiful tone, the carressing of the strings by the bow, the unaffected and truly artistic phrasing that was inspired by the heart and controlled by the musical reason.

Comparisons are inevitable, perhaps, but let us avoid them. I have spoken in another column of the Journal of the vice of comparison, which so often detracts from full enjoyment. We have heard many famous fiddlers in this city. It is doubtful if any one of them has given greater and purer pleasure than that given last night by Eugene Ysaye.

One word more about his tone. There are violinists whose song is so sensuous that it excites the thought of the Evil One, to whom the fiddle, as the superstitious of past centuries believed, was a favorite instrument of corruption. Such a song was that which came from the three-stringed violin with the belly covered with skin of bluish serpent played by Muzio in the wild tale by the great Russian; and Muzio heard the tune in Ceylon, and it was called "The Song of Triumphant Love." Now this love was lust. The song of Ysaye, whether in the singing passages of the fine concerto of Saint-Saens, or the melody of Desdemona, is human, intensely human, yet it is free from earthly dross. In the finale of the concerto his tones soared above the unearthly music of the accompanying violins like unto the song of a disembodied spirit.

Recalled again and again, Ysaye after the "Otello" fantasia gave an exquisite performance of the sarabande and gigue from Bach's third sonata, if I am not mistaken.

***

There were moments in the accompaniment to the "Otello" fantasia when there was a lack of precision, but the performance of the orchestra, as a whole, was one of great merit. The symphony was finely read and strongly played. The little danses were interesting chiefly as a specimen of the music to which famous men and women once danced when the ballet was one of the fine arts, and not an exhibition of unmeaning kicks and acrobatic, ungraceful feats.

***

The compiler of the Program Book makes the following statement in speaking of Monsigny (page 270):

"In 1761 his le Cadi dupé so delighted the poet Sedaine that he offered Monsigny to supply him with libretti in future. The success of this collaboration was such that the Comédie-Italienne succeeded in having the rival Opéra-Comique de la Foire Saint-Laurent closed, for fear that its rising reputation might injure their own theatre; and from that time Monsigny wrote only for the Comédie-Italienne (the forerunner of the present Opéra-Comique in Paris)."

This statement is incorrect.

"Aline, Reine de Golconde," the very "ballet héroique," from which the dances that were played last night are taken, was written for the Paris Opéra, and produced on that famous stage April 15, 1766. The words were by Sedaine. Neither the score nor the libretto bears the name of Monsigny, who did not sign his early works, because he was then steward to the Duke of Orleans. Sophie Arnould was the original Aline. When the work was revived in 1772 and 1779 Guimard, the demure wanton, was the chief female dancer.

The piece was sumptuously mounted, indeed the expense of putting it on the stage was 33,750 livres, an enormous sum in those days.

PHILIP HALE.

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, DEC. 2, 1894.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS.

Symphony Patrons Applaud Ysaye, Violinist.

Eugene Ysaye has conquered musical Boston; yesterday's symphony concert audience surrendered unconditionally and declared him great.

Rarely has a foreign musician been received with as much enthusiasm on his first appearance in Boston. Although lavish praises from the New York critics had heralded his coming, the superb playing of the Belgian violinist proved a welcome surprise.

Ysaye is truly a great artist. Whether he is as great as Paganini, Wieniawski, Joachim, Wilhelmj or Ole Bull need not be speculated upon after a single hearing. He is unquestionably great in himself, however he may compare with other great violinists.

The selections he chose for first performance here were Saint-Saens' concerto for violin and orchestra in B minor and Ernest's fantasy for violin on airs from Rossini's "Otello." They were good selections offering opportunity for showing his standing, both as an artist and a virtuoso.

After he had played the first move- of Saint-Saens' B minor concerto at the Friday afternoon rehearsal there was no longer doubt of his greatness. There was a burst of spontaneous applause such as is seldom seen from the conservative rehearsal audiences. After the final movement there was still greater enthusiasm and actually a few cheers. The gathering at last night's concert was even more demonstrative in expressing approval.

When Ysaye gives his promised recitals here he will surely play to a multitude.

A sketch of Mr Ysaye's brilliant career has already been printed in these columns, together with a reproduction of his photograph. The portrait was a faithful likeness. He is a big man, with broad shoulders and massive chest. His head is enormous, almost lion like, with its great mass of thick, lank, black hair, which becomes animated when its owner plays, seemingly partaking of the musician's enthusiasm. His face is strong and intellectual, the features are always in repose, even when he plays with the most passion, but there is a look from the dark, bright eyes which seem to mirror the shifting moods of the music.

There is no suggestion of affectation in Ysaye's appearance or style of playing. In this respect he is unique among the great violinists. His bearing is graceful, and he plays with the ease and freedom which comes from conscious power. He is plainly romantic, even sentimental, in temperament. So sensitive does he appear, and so daintily and affectionately does he handle his violin, that his playing is constantly characterized by a suggestiveness that is distinctly feminine.

Ysaye does not appear to possess great personal magnetism. He makes you feel the surpassing excellence of his playing, but he does not stimulate you with that exhilarating feeling which come from listening to Sarasate and a few other violinists. Possibly this is because of the repose which is such a characteristic feature of his playing. He makes no effort to dazzle his audience by the brilliancy of his technique, nor does he ever resort to any of the many showy tricks so frequently made use of by violinists.

While listening to him you feel that you are listening to music which fairly comes from the soul of the player. You are conscious that he interprets the music exactly as he feels it, and you give no thought to the perfectness of his technique. Mastery of technique is so common in these days that it has come to be accepted as a matter of course.

His tone is not especially notable for power, but it is exceptionally pure and rich, and possesses a certain ringing quality which gives exquisite pleasure to the hearers.

Ysaye may be said to be more an artist than a virtuoso, an interpreter rather than an executionist. Every tone produced is exact and given with a desire for artistic rather than showy effect, and his phrasing is especially good.

He played the Saint-Saens' concerto superbly and gave rare artistic finish to the interpretation. Especially brilliant was his performance of the final movement. The Ernst fantasy also afforded him admirable opportunities for displaying his wonderful art.

Director Paur's selections for the orchestra were: Robert Volkmann's symphony No. 1 in D minor, the Chaconne and Rigodon from the suit, "Aline, Reine de Golconde," by Monsigny, and "The Paris Carnival," by Johan Severn Svendsen.

The symphony was given intelligent and artistic interpretation, and, in spite of the fact that there is much in Volkmann's voluminous work that possesses slumber inspiring qualities, the audience gave evidence of enjoying the work. The selections from Monsigny's suit were acceptably played, and Svendsen's elaborate and brilliant writing was given a spirited performance.

There will be no concert by the symphony orchestra this week. The eighth concert, Dec 14 and 15, will be in memory of Anton Rubinstein, and the program as follows: Funeral march from the heroic smyphony of Beethoven, Rubinstein's piaraforte concerto in D minor, Mrs Ernst Lent pianist; the Ocean symphony of Rubinstein, complete.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCVI., NO. 155.

SUNDAY, DECEMBER 2, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

M. Ysaye, the Violinist, Scores an Overwhelming Success.

An Artist of the Finest Powers—The Great Audience Fascinated and Carried Away with Enthusiasm—Fine Volkmann Symphony Splendidly Played by the Orchestra.

The programme for last night's concert in Music Hall by the Boston Symphony orchestra was:

Symphony No. 1, D minor.....Volkmann
Concerto for violin, No. 3.....Saint-Saens
Chaconne and Rigadon, from suite "Aline Reine de Golconde".....Monsigny
Fantasia for violin, "Otello".....Ernst
"Carnival in Paris".....Svensden
Soloist, M. Eugene Ysaye.

M. EUGENE YSAYE.

There was an enormous audience, the hall being literally packed. The interest, of course, centred in M. Ysaye, of whom so much has been said in the way of superlatives, and who is reputed, and justly, one of the greatest of living violinists. His appearance physically is very impressive. His figure is tall and massive, with massive square shoulders and a broad chest. His face would be effeminate were it not for the strong chin, the square jaw and the firm and finely cut mouth. His eyes are large, deep set and wonderfully expressive, and he would be taken at once for a sensitive and intelligent artist, without the mass of dark long hair that is swept back from his brow. In many ways his appearance recalls that of Rubinstein. There is the same leonine head, the same suggestion of resolute vigor and of innate power. It is an altogether interesting and attractive presence and one pleasing to look upon. His manner is dignified and self-possessed, and, from the very outset, one feels that here is a born artist. If any doubt could linger on that point, it vanishes with the very first note that he brings from his instrument, with the very moment that his bow is drawn across the strings.

The Saint-Saens concerto was admirably adapted to show all the finer qualities of his playing. It must be taken for granted that his technique is of the most perfect. He has an astounding left hand. Difficulties are unknown to it, and it is phenomenal in its easy agility and in its certainty; but technique, after all, is a means rather than an end, and if an artist is to be judged only by that, there are many who would deserve to be called great. It is not in finger work that M. Ysaye alone merits distinction. His tone is large and pure, his intonation is faultless, and his style is warm, manly and convincing. Even in his bravura playing he is never trivial, and such is the sincerity of his art that he dignifies even show passages, so perfectly does he cause his instrument to sing them and so fascinatingly and clearly does he phrase them. His bowing is peculiarly his own in its freedom and firmness, and he uses the bow with such a broad and bold sweep that often it seems scarcely half its usual length. The effect produced by him in the beautiful second theme of the opening movement of the concerto was magical. Nothing more indescribably chaste and warm can be imagined; but it was in the andante that the finish and refinement of his style was first shown in its perfection. The more piano passages were a soft as eiderdown, and yet as firm as velvet. On the fourth string his tone had almost the depth of the 'cello, and his harmonies never failed, but came out as clear as crystal, and his double-stopping, his octaves and tenths were flawless.

Where all is so perfect one can only describe. Criticism is out of the question where only superlatives can be used. The whole concerto was played in a purely classic spirit, and the artist never degenerated into the mere virtuoso, never descended to display or indulge in affectation for the sake of producing an effect. He appealed always to the intelligence and never to the eye. At the end of the concerto the enthusiasm was tremendous in its stormy demonstration, and was not appeased until the artist came forward three times to bow his acknowledgments. If he had responded with the promptness with which soloists accept such calls, the recalls would have been more in number, but with the modesty of a true artist he did not reappear until it would have been discourteous to refrain longer.

The Ernst fantasia has become very [illegible] since it was last heard here, and it is almost to be regretted that he played it with its conventional variations and its profusion of unmeaning show passages; but the charm and beauty of his performance were so great, and the piece afforded such ample opportunities for the exhibition of his surpassing skill, that he imparted a decided interest to the work. Here again the precision and the authority of his playing, the exquisite grace and feeling that [illegible] his cantabile, together with extraordinary command over all the [illegible] bow and fingers in bravura [illegible] fascinated his hearers and aroused [illegible] tempest of enthusiasm, to [illegible] he responded, to the general delight [illegible] breaking through the rule of [illegible] and played the "Sara[illegible]" [illegible] from Bach's third [illegible] violin.

[illegible] more of the eveness of [illegible] the beauty of phrasing, the classical spirit and the broad and noble style that marked his performance, both as an interpreter and a player.

There was no drying in this Bach playing, and it is doubtful if those in the audience who never before found anything in Bach to delight them did not depart with a more genial appreciation of the master. The success of the artist was beyond all question. Mr. Paur and the orchestra accompanied him throughout in the most sympathetic and most satisfactory manner, the artist manifesting his pleasure at the assistance afforded him by giving Mr. Paur a hearty and manifestly grateful grasp of the hand at the end of the concerts.

The fine Volkman symphony was splendidly read and played, and a delightful interest was imparted to the andante by M. Pourteau's beautiful performance of the clarinet theme. The selections from the Monsigny Suite are very charming in their piquancy and old-fashioned grace. They were read in a keenly appreciative spirit by Mr. Paur and played in the orchestra's most finished manner.

The next concert, which is to take place Dec. 15, is to be in memory of Rubinstein, and the programme is: Funeral march from the "Eroica" symphony, Beethoven; concerto for pianoforte, No. 4, in D minor, Rubinstein, and the same composer's "Ocean" symphony, which is to be given complete. The soloist is to be Mrs. Ernst Lent.

Philadelphia Abend-Post.

Dienstag, 27. November 1894.

Boston Symphonie Orchester.

Am Montag den 3. Dezember findet das zweite große Konzert des Boston Symphonie Orchesters unter Leitung des Herrn Emil Paur statt. In demselben wirkt der berühmte belgische Violin-Virtuose Ysaye mit, welcher in New York große Erfolge gehabt hat. Ein Konzert dieser Muster-Organisation ist ein musikalisches Kunst-Ereigniß ersten Ranges und das bevorstehende wird gegen die früheren nicht zurückstehen. Tickets für dasselbe sind schon jetzt zu haben. Näheres besagt die Anzeige.

Philadelphia Abend-Post.

Freitag, 30. November 1894.

Boston Symphonie Orchester.

Am Montag den 3. Dezember findet das zweite große Konzert des Boston Symphonie Orchesters unter Leitung des Herrn Emil Paur statt. In demselben wirkt der berühmte belgische Violin-Virtuose Ysaye mit, welcher in New York große Erfolge gehabt hat. Ein Konzert dieser Muster-Organisation ist ein musikalisches Kunst-Ereigniß ersten Ranges und das bevorstehende wird gegen die früheren nicht zurückstehen. Tickets für dasselbe sind schon jetzt zu haben. Näheres besagt die Anzeige.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 2.

The Symphony Concert.

The seventh concert of the Symphony orchestra was given last night with the following programme:

Symphony No. 11. D-minor.....Volkman.
Concerto for Violin, No. 3.....Saint Saëns.
Chaconne & Rigadon.....Monsigny.
Fantasia for violin "Otello".....Ernst.
Carnival in Paris.....Svendsen.

The Volkmann symphony is a delightful work, but like a large amount of modern music it is not fated to win an immortality. It is individual and in a sense original, but it has grown older than its years warrant. It is the work of an accomplished musician, a bright but unfortunate satellite that is lost in the greater glories of the planet, called genius, about which it is forced to revolve. In the musical firmanent it is only the planets that attract the attention of posterity. The light of a Beethoven overcast the glory of a host of perfect but lesser luminaries; and when posterity gazes in the direction where Volkmann should be, it will see only Beethoven and Schumann. Fortunately we are closer and the angle is wider, and to us Volkmann is an interesting figure although he has no message of special value even for our ears. The symphony was most excellently interpreted.

The two little dances, by Monsigny, were pleasant whispers from the past, when dallying with this species of work was not considered a crime either in composers or in conductors; Mr. Krehbiel not being born and New York not having yet raised the æsthetic standard. The little works were delightfully interpreted, the coloring was perfect and the finish of the finest and most artistic quality.

The soloist of the evening was Mr. Eugene Ysaye, and the large audience assembled enjoyed the luxury of hearing a great artist—an artist born, and not manufactured. What strikes one first, in listening to Mr. Ysaye, is the absolute sincerity of the man, the man lovingly absorbed in his art, and unconscious of everything but his art. In his hands the violin speaks from its soul, and not from its strings alone; speaks in a full, rich volume of tone, which in delicacy seems beyond the normal compass of the instrument, and is suggestive of witchery. The tone is not only broad and full, but it is of the finest quality and of the finest color, and these it never loses. Mr. Ysaye also phrases like an artist; his work is clean-cut, clear, of the highest finish, and yet always broad and masterful. Technically, his work approaches in a very high degree absolute perfection, difficulties are subdued with ease and grace, without display, with an admirable self-confidence and self-absorption. The rare skill of his fingers, the rare magic of his bow are simply integral portions of the sum total, and have no existence apart as tricks or affectations.

It is as the interpreter and not as the violinist skilled in technics that we listen to Mr. Ysaye, or rather are compelled to listen to him, and it is only with an effort that we can escape from artist to study the mechanician; from the entrancing sounds to study how the sounds are produced. Mr. Ysaye reaches the soul of his violin and the soul of those who hearken to him. The thing alone is all sufficing, and is it worth while to seek how the thing is done; look for the chisel marks of the statuary on the Venus of Melos? The chisel work, the technique, are all essential, but back of these, guiding and transforming, is that something called talent or genius, and it is to this that the final appeal is to be made. It is not the master of technique that interests us, or we should admire thousands of now mediocre artists and musicians, and it is not Mr. Ysaye with the wonderful bow arm and magic fingers that claims our admiration; but the artist, the interpreter who arouses an enthusiasm that is deeper, more lasting and more improving than curious wonder. Nor have we to deal with the simple interpreter only, else all translators of Homer would be the equal of Chapman. The true interpreter must be a poet like Coleridge, a musician like Rubinstein; he must see with his master's eyes, feel with his master's heart, build fancies with his master's imagination, and yet tinge all with his own individuality. The wider is this power, the greater is the artist; and this power, or double power, Mr. Ysaye possesses in a very high degree. His interpretations are all faithful to the intentions of the composers interpreted, while they are tinged with the the large individuality of the artist. It is this faultless taste, fine insight, wide sympathy, always, of course, including the technical excellencies, that are Mr. Ysaye's supreme merit. He is not simply a master of the violin, but an artist of the rarest talent, perhaps of genius. The tones that he brings forth are beautiful beyond expression, and irresistibly stir one into an enthusiasm from which there is no escape, which thrills in the memory and warm what was intended for cold criticism into hot praise. In the Saint- Saëns concerto as in the less meritorious "Otello" Fantasia, the wonderful tone color, the grace, the exquisite delicacy the warmth the perfection withdrew the attention from the wonderful phrasing, the wonderful techincal skill, the perfect adaptation of means to end. Mr. Ysaye has more than demonstrated his skill and genius, and the wild enthusiasm with which he was received must have proved to him that he was appreciated by the audience, whom he held in thrall. He was recalled again and again in hurricanes of applause, that came from the heart and tingled the fingers.

The programme for the next concert is in memory of Anton Rubinstein, and consists of Funeral March from Symphony No. 3; Beethoven concerto for pianoforte, No. 4, D-minor, Rubinstein; symphony in C, No. 2 (Ocean), with three additional movements, Rubinstein. The soloist is Mrs. Ernst Lent.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.

MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 3, 1894.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

YSAYE HOLDS BOSTON CAPTIVE.

He Unites the Emotional With the Technical as Seldom Heard—The Concert as a Whole Had Too Much Miscellaneous Flavor, Although It Began Classically.

It was a case of the tail wagging the dog, on Saturday, for there was far more of soloist than of orchestra in the programme, and there was (because of an injudicious selection on the part of the soloist) more of the "miscellaneous" than the symphonic flavor to the concert. Nevertheless the evening began classically enough with Volkmann's D minor symphony. The first movement of this showed a tendency to overforce the brasses, but aside from this fault was perfectly played. The second movement showed us what a treasure we have acquired in M. Pourtan, the clarinetist; the solo for clarinetts, which constituted the chief part of the movement was magnificently performed, with a degree of shading and a purity of tone that calls for superlatives in the description. The trio of the Scherzo was another delightful part of the work and received full justice at the hands of the orchestra, the cello here deserving especial mention. The finale was again a trifle too loud, but its subtle points were well brought out and the symphony gained sufficient applause. It is a worthy work, and seems to be making its way into the standard repertoire; it is logical and healthy music, not relying on the outre effects which so many moderns have introduced into their scores, but presenting clean-cut themes and musicianly development, and it has also the merit of not being too prolix.

After this there came the soloist, and the manner in which he was welcomed must have proved to him that he was the chief attraction of the occasion. Of Eugene Isaye it is impossible to speak to much praise; he has the sweetness of a Sarasate combined with the breadth of a Wieniawski; he combines the emotional with the technical in a perfect union. That he is a musician as well as a virtuoso was apparent in his surety in the St. Saens Violin Concerto in B minor which is not the least intricate composition of its class. His instrument too, a Guarnerius, is of singularly sweet tone, and came the nearest to being satisfactory in Music Hall of any that has been played there for some time, for it must be borne in mind that this hall is too large for the perfect audition of such an instrument.

From the moment that he began with the broad passages on the G string which usher in the first movement of this concerto, M. Isaye held the audience captive. It is scarcely necessary to tell the reader that in double-stopping (this came in chiefly in a later work), in rapidity, in bold skips, in combination of pizzicato and bowing, the artist is impeccable. In his birdlike harmonics he especially reminds of Wieniawski. But the concerto was more than the display of the capabilities of a great soloist, it was good music too, and fitting for such a symphony concert. It was by no means wholly solo work with accompaniment, but gave ample opportunities for the orchestral players to show what stuff they were made of, and when it came to the last movement the first violins played as if they were inspired by the presence of a great confrere to especial excellence. M. Isaye has recognized the strength of this department of our orchestra and is loud in its praise. "Other orchestras have one or two artists in the first violins, but you have a whole body of soloists," was his remark recently, after a rehearsal with the men. The applause which followed the conclusion of the work was indescribably enthusiastic, and half a dozen recalls scarcely seemed to satiate the public. It was deserved applause, too, which is more than can be said of that which followed the "Otello Fantasie" by Ernst, which M. Isaye injudiciously chose for his second number. That he played the set of fireworks which compose this fantasie very brilliantly is a matter of course, but it was a number far beneath the dignity of these concerts, and it was pitiable to see the orchestra which had done such noble work in the St. Saens concerto strumming away at the watery and meaningless accompaniment of this pyrotechnical exhibit. The applause, one is glad to add, was not quite so hearty as that which greeted the first number, but M. Isaye, as if desirous of taking away the sickly taste left by the fantasie, broke through the custom of the concerts and gave an encore, a selection from Bach's third violin-sonata. This he played with such a pure and musicianly style, so broadly and so clearly in even the most intricate passages, that one could not but pardon the bad taste of the presentation of the preceeding number.

Monsigny's Chaconne and Rigaudon were played by the orchestra with daintiness and grace. The Chaconne partook of the ancient and true character of this dance; originally the Chaconne was slow and sedate, being somewhat akin to the Sarabande in manner, but after the French ballet composers used it as a finale to their works the tempo became quicker and the style less characteristic. The Rigaudon ("Rigodon" is after all but a misspelling of the word) may be described as rollicking, and it was this spirit which Mr. Paur imparted to it.

The concert ended with Svendsen's "Carnaval de Paris," beside which all Roman and Viennese carnival scenes become as milk and water. It brings the heavy artillery into action at once, and piccolo, pizzicato violin effects, cymbals, and all other weirdness and clatter are present from the beginning. It is a combination of Berlioz and the Bal Bullier. After a series of musical earthquakes, which may mean Parisian jollity, it presents a sombre and thoughtful episode, which may picture subsequent headache, and it ends with a Chinese clatter that may typify delirium tremens. Such music is a good study of orchestration, and it shows how much noise may be compressed into a written score, but whether scoring such a racket is worth while is another matter.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCVI., NO. 155.

SUNDAY, DECEMBER 2, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

M. Ysaye, the Violinist, Scores an Overwhelming Success.

An Artist of the Finest Powers—The Great Audience Fascinated and Carried Away with Enthusiasm—Fine Volkmann Symphony Splendidly Played by the Orchestra.

The programme for last night's concert in Music Hall by the Boston Symphony orchestra was:

Symphony No. 1, D minor.....Volkmann
Concerto for violin, No. 3.....Saint-Saens
Chaconne and Rigodon, from suite "Aline Reine de Golconde".....Monsigny
Fantasia for violin, "Otello".....Ernst
"Carnival in Paris".....Svensden
Soloist, M. Eugene Ysaye.

M. EUGENE YSAYE.

There was an enormous audience, the hall being literally packed. The interest, of course, centred in M. Ysaye, of whom so much has been said in the way of superlatives, and who is reputed, and justly, one of the greatest of living violinists. His appearance physically is very impressive. His figure is tall and massive, with massive square shoulders and a broad chest. His face would be effeminate were it not for the strong chin, the square jaw and the firm and finely cut mouth. His eyes are large, deep set and wonderfully expressive, and he would be taken at once for a sensitive and intelligent artist, without the mass of dark long hair that is swept back from his brow. In many ways his appearance recalls that of Rubinstein. There is the same leonine head, the same suggestion of resolute vigor and of innate power. It is an altogether interesting and attractive presence and one pleasing to look upon. His manner is dignified and self-possessed, and, from the very outset, one feels that here is a born artist. If any doubt could linger on that point, it vanishes with the very first note that he brings from his instrument, with the very moment that his bow is drawn across the strings.

The Saint-Saens concerto was admirably adapted to show all the finer qualities of his playing. It must be taken for granted that his technique is of the most perfect. He has an astounding left hand. Difficulties are unknown to it, and it is phenomenal in its easy agility and in its certainty; but technique, after all, is a means rather than an end, and if an artist is to be judged only by that, there are many who would deserve to be called great. It is not in finger work that M. Ysaye alone merits distinction. His tone is large and pure, his intonation is faultless, and his style is warm, manly and convincing. Even in his bravura playing he is never trivial, and such is the sincerity of his art that he dignifies even show passages, so perfectly does he cause his instrument to sing them and so fascinatingly and clearly does he phrase them. His bowing is peculiarly his own in its freedom and firmness, and he uses the bow with such a broad and bold sweep that often it seems scarcely half its usual length. The effect produced by him in the beautiful second theme of the opening movement of the concerto was magical. Nothing more indescribably chaste and warm can be imagined; but it was in the andante that the finish and refinement of his style was first shown in its perfection. The more piano passages were a soft as eiderdown, and yet as firm as velvet. On the fourth string his tone had almost the depth of the 'cello, and his harmonics never failed, but came out as clear as crystal, and his double-stopping, his octaves and tenths were flawless.

Where all is so perfect one can only describe. Criticism is out of the question where only superlatives can be used. The whole concerto was played in a purely classic spirit, and the artist never degenerated into the mere virtuoso, never descended to display or indulge in affectation for the sake of producing an effect. He appealed always to the intelligence and never to the eye. At the end of the concerto the enthusiasm was tremendous in its stormy demonstration, and was not appeased until the artist came forward three times to bow his acknowledgments. If he had responded with the promptness with which soloists accept such calls, the recalls would have been more in number, but with the modesty of a true artist he did not reappear until it would have been discourteous to refrain longer.

The Ernst fantasie has become very aged since it was last heard here, and it is almost to be regretted that he played it with its conventional variations and its profusion of unmeaning show passages; but the charm and beauty of his performance were so great, and the piece afforded such ample opportunities for the exhibition of his surpassing skill, that he imparted a decided interest to the work. Here again the precision and the authority of his playing, the exquisite grace and feeling that characterize his cantabile, together with his extraordinary command over all the tricks of bow and fingers in bravura work, fascinated his hearers and aroused another tempest of enthusiasm, to which he responded, to the general delight, by breaking through the rule of these concerts, and played the "Sarabande and Gigue" from Bach's third [illegible] violin. This was per-kept the finest spirit of the evening in the purity of taste, the beauty of phrasing, the classical spirit and the broad and noble style that marked his performance, both as an interpreter and a player.

There was no drying in this Bach playing, and it is doubtful if those in the audience who never before found anything in Bach to delight them did not depart with a more genial appreciation of the master. The success of the artist was beyond all question. Mr. Paur and the orchestra accompanied him throughout in the most sympathetic and most satisfactory manner, the artist manifesting his pleasure at the assistance afforded him by giving Mr. Paur a hearty and manifestly grateful grasp of the hand at the end of the concerts.

The fine Volkman symphony was splendidly read and played, and a delightful interest was imparted to the andante by M. Pourteau's beautiful performance of the clarinet theme. The selections from the Monsigny Suite are very charming in their piquancy and old-fashioned grace. They were read in a keenly appreciative spirit by Mr. Paur and played in the orchestra's most finished manner.

The next concert, which is to take place Dec. 15, is to be in memory of Rubinstein, and the programme is: Funeral march from the "Eroica" symphony, Beethoven; concerto for pianoforte, No. 4, in D minor, Rubinstein, and the same composer's "Ocean" symphony, which is to be given complete. The soloist is to be Mrs. Ernst Lent.

Philadelphia Abend-Post.

Dienstag, 27. November 1894.

Boston Symphonie Orchester.

Am Montag den 3. Dezember findet das zweite große Konzert des Boston Symphonie Orchesters unter Leitung des Herrn Emil Paur statt. In demselben wirkt der berühmte belgische Violin-Virtuose Ysaye mit, welcher in New York große Erfolge gehabt hat. Ein Konzert dieser Muster-Organisation ist ein musikalisches Kunst-Ereigniß ersten Ranges und das bevorstehende wird gegen die früheren nicht zurückstehen. Tickets für dasselbe sind schon jetzt zu haben. Näheres besagt die Anzeige.

Philadelphia Abend-Post.

Freitag, 30. November 1894.

Boston Symphonie Orchester.

Am Montag den 3. Dezember findet das zweite große Konzert des Boston Symphonie Orchesters unter Leitung des Herrn Emil Paur statt. In demselben wirkt der berühmte belgische Violin-Virtuose Ysaye mit, welcher in New York große Erfolge gehabt hat. Ein Konzert dieser Muster-Organisation ist ein musikalisches Kunst-Ereigniß ersten Ranges und das bevorstehende wird gegen die früheren nicht zurückstehen. Tickets für dasselbe sind schon jetzt zu haben. Näheres besagt die Anzeige.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 2.

The Symphony Concert.

The seventh concert of the Symphony orchhstra wag given last night with the following programme:

Symphony No. 11. D-minor.....Volkman.
Concerto for Violin, No. 3.....Saint-Saëns.
Chaconne & Kigadon.....Monsigny.
Fantasia for violin "Otello".....Ernst.
Carnival in Paris.....Svendsen.

The Volkmann symphony is a delightful work, but like a large amount of modern music it is not fated to win an immortality. It is individual and in a sense original, but it has grown older than its years warrant. It is the work of an accomplished musician, a bright but unfortunate satellite that is lost in the greater glories of the planet, called genius, about which it is forced to revolve. In the musical firmanent it is only the planets that attract the attention of posterity. The light of a Beethoven overcast the glory of a host of perfect but lesser luminaries; and when posterity gazes in the direction where Volkmann should be, it will see only Beethoven and Schumann. Fortunately we are closer and the angle is wider, and to us Volkmann is an interesting figure although he has no message of special value even for our ears. The symphony was most excellently interpreted.

The two little dances, by Monsigny, were pleasant whispers from the past, when dallying with this species of work was not considered a crime either in composers or in conductors; Mr. Krehbiel not being born and New York not having yet raised the æsthetic standard. The little works were delightfully interpreted, the coloring was perfect and the finish of the finest and most artistic quality.

The soloist of the evening was Mr. Eugene Ysaye, and the large audience assembled enjoyed the luxury of hearing a great artist—an artist born, and not manufactured. What strikes one first, in listening to Mr. Ysaye, is the absolute sincerity of the man, the man lovingly absorbed in his art, and unconscious of everything but his art. In his hands the violin speaks from its soul, and not from its strings alone; speaks in a full, rich volume of tone, which in delicacy seems beyond the normal compass of the instrument, and is suggestive of witchery. The tone is not only broad and full, but it is of the finest quality and of the finest color, and these it never loses. Mr. Ysaye also phrases like an artist; his work is clean-cut, clear, of the highest finish, and yet always broad and masterful. Technically, his work approaches in a very high degree absolute perfection, difficulties are subdued with ease and grace, without display, with an admirable self-confidence and self-absorption. The rare skill of his fingers, the rare magic of his bow are simply integral portions of the sum total, and have no existence apart as tricks or affectations.

It is as the interpreter and not as the violinist skilled in technics that we listen to Mr. Ysaye, or rather are compelled to listen to him, and it is only with an effort that we can escape from artist to study the mechanician; from the entrancing sounds to study how the sounds are produced. Mr. Ysaye reaches the soul of his violin and the soul of those who hearken to him. The thing alone is all sufficing, and is it worth while to seek how the thing is done; look for the chisel marks of the statuary on the Venus of Melos? The chisel work, the technique, are all essential, but back of these, guiding and transforming, is that something called talent or genius, and it is to this that the final appeal is to be made. It is not the master of technique that interests us, or we should admire thousands of now mediocre artists and musicians, and it is not Mr. Ysaye with the wonderful bow arm and magic fingers that claims our admiration; but the artist, the interpreter who arouses an enthusiasm that is deeper, more lasting and more improving than curious wonder. Nor have we to deal with the simple interpreter only, else all translators of Homer would be the equal of Chapman. The true interpreter must be a poet like Coleridge, a musician like Rubinstein; he must see with his master's eyes, feel with his master's heart, build fancies with his master's imagination, and yet tinge all with his own individuality. The wider is this power, the greater is the artist; and this power, or double power, Mr. Ysaye possesses in a very high degree. His interpretations are all faithful to the intentions of the composers interpreted, while they are tinged with the the large individuality of the artist. It is this faultless taste, fine insight, wide sympathy, always, of course, including the technical excellencies, that are Mr. Ysaye's supreme merit. He is not simply a master of the violin, but an artist of the rarest talent, perhaps of genius. The tones that he brings forth are beautiful beyond expression, and irresistibly stir one into an enthusiasm from which there is no escape, which thrills in the memory and warm what was intended for cold criticism into hot praise. In the Saint-Saëns concerto as in the less meritorious "Otello" Fantasia, the wonderful tone color, the grace, the exquisite delicacy the warmth the perfection withdrew the attention from the wonderful phrasing, the wonderful techincal skill, the perfect adaptation of means to end. Mr. Ysaye has more than demonstrated his skill and genius, and the wild enthusiasm with which he was received must have proved to him that he was appreciated by the audience, whom he held in thrall. He was recalled again and again in hurricanes of applause, that came from the heart and tingled the fingers.

The programme for the next concert is in memory of Anton Rubinstein, and consists of Funeral March from Symphony No. 3; Beethoven concerto for pianoforte, No. 4, D-minor, Rubinstein; symphony in C, No. 2 (Ocean), with three additional movements, Rubinstein. The soloist is Mrs. Ernst Lent.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.

MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 3, 1894.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

YSAYE HOLDS BOSTON CAPTIVE.

He Unites the Emotional With the Technical as Seldom Heard—The Concert as a Whole Had Too Much Miscellaneous Flavor, Although It Began Classically.

It was a case of the tail wagging the dog, on Saturday, for there was far more of soloist than of orchestra in the programme, and there was (because of an injudicious selection on the part of the soloist) more of the "miscellaneous" than the symphonic flavor to the concert. Nevertheless the evening began classically enough with Volkmann's D minor symphony. The first movement of this showed a tendency to overforce the brasses, but aside from this fault was perfectly played. The second movement showed us what a treasure we have acquired in M. Pourtan, the clarinettist; the solo for clarinetta, which constituted the chief part of the movement was magnificently performed, with a degree of shading and a purity of tone that calls for superlatives in the description. The trio of the Scherzo was another delightful part of the work and received full justice at the hands of the orchestra, the cello here deserving especial mention. The finale was again a trifle too loud, but its subtle points were well brought out and the symphony gained sufficient applause. It is a worthy work, and seems to be making its way into the standard repertoire; it is logical and healthy music, not relying on the outre effects which so many moderns have introduced into their scores, but presenting clean-cut themes and musicianly development, and it has also the merit of not being too prolix.

After this there came the soloist, and the manner in which he was welcomed must have proved to him that he was the chief attraction of the occasion. Of Eugene Isaye it is impossible to speak to much praise; he has the sweetness of a Sarasate combined with the breadth of a Wieniawski; he combines the emotional with the technical in a perfect union. That he is a musician as well as a virtuoso was apparent in his surety in the St. Saens Violin Concerto in B minor which is not the least intricate composition of its class. His instrument too, a Guarnerius, is of singularly sweet tone, and came the nearest to being satisfactory in Music Hall of any that has been played there for some time, for it must be borne in mind that this hall is too large for the perfect audition of such an instrument.

From the moment that he began with the broad passages on the G string which usher in the first movement of this concerto, M. Isaye held the audience captive. It is scarcely necessary to tell the reader that in double-stopping (this came in chiefly in a later work), in rapidity, in bold skips, in combination of pizzicato and bowing, the artist is impeccable. In his birdlike harmonics he especially reminds of Wieniawski. But the concerto was more than the display of the capabilities of a great soloist, it was good music too, and fitting for such a symphony concert. It was by no means wholly solo work with accompaniment, but gave ample opportunities for the orchestral players to show what stuff they were made of, and when it came to the last movement the first violins played as if they were inspired by the presence of a great confrere to especial excellence. M. Isaye has recognized the strength of this department of our orchestra and is loud in its praise. "Other orchestras have one or two artists in the first violins, but you have a whole body of soloists," was his remark recently, after a rehearsal with the men. The applause which followed the conclusion of the work was indescribably enthusiastic, and half a dozen recalls scarcely seemed to satiate the public. It was deserved applause, too, which is more than can be said of that which followed the "Otello Fantasie" by Ernst, which M. Isaye injudiciously chose for his second number. That he played the set of fireworks which compose this fantasie very brilliantly is a matter of course, but it was a number far beneath the dignity of these concerts, and it was pitiable to see the orchestra which had done such noble work in the St. Saens concerto strumming away at the watery and meaningless accompaniment of this pyrotechnical exhibit. The applause, one is glad to add, was not quite so hearty as that which greeted the first number, but M. Isaye, as if desirous of taking away the sickly taste left by the fantasie, broke through the custom of the concerts and gave an encore, a selection from Bach's third violin-sonata. This he played with such a pure and musicianly style, so broadly and so clearly in even the most intricate passages, that one could not but pardon the bad taste of the presentation of the preceeding number.

Monsigny's Chaconne and Rigaudon were played by the orchestra with daintiness and grace. The Chaconne partook of the ancient and true character of this dance; originally the Chaconne was slow and sedate, being somewhat akin to the Sarabande in manner, but after the French ballet composers used it as a finale to their works the tempo became quicker and the style less characteristic. The Rigaudon ("Rigodon" is after all but a misspelling of the word) may be described as rollicking, and it was this spirit which Mr. Paur imparted to it.

The concert ended with Svendsen's "Carnaval de Paris," beside which all Roman and Viennese carnival scenes become as milk and water. It brings the heavy artillery into action at once, and piccolo, pizzicato violin effects, cymbals, and all other weirdness and clatter are present from the beginning. It is a combination of Berlioz and the Bal Bullier. After a series of musical earthquakes, which may mean Parisian jollity, it presents a sombre and thoughtful episode, which may picture subsequent headache, and it ends with a Chinese clatter that may typify delirium tremens. Such music is a good study of orchestration, and it shows how much noise may be compressed into a written score, but whether scoring such a racket is worth while is another matter.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 2, 1894.

A WHOLE BATCH OF CONCERTS, CHORAL, SYMPHONY, ETC.

The whole seventh Symphony concert was characterised by energy and vivacity, but its chief stir and sensation were derived from the violin playing of Mr. Eugene Ysaye, who made then his Boston debut, exciting an unusual enthusiam of response, which took the form of recalls upon recalls and of an earnestness and honesty of applause from the orchestra, anything approaching which we have never known bestowed upon an artist not a German. M. Ysaye's selections were Saint-Saens's third violin concerto (in B minor, opus 61) and Ernst's fantasia on themes from Rossini's "Otello," of which the first only had been promised and the second being admitted by a change in the programme. In both composers we find a complete knowledge and command of the technical resources of the instruments, so that in each work the player has ample opportunity to show his virtuosity alike in sustained song, voluble iteration of figure, brilliant adornment, power, grace and versatility, although the latter belongs rather to the category of passing show-pieces, while the former ranks with works of art and permanence. M. Ysaye is indubitably a player of the first order, who gives—certainly upon a first hearing—adverse criticism nothing upon which to take a grasp. He is a large man of gentle and grave but still pleasant face and manner, and those who judge by the eye rather than the ear might perhaps wonder at his reputation and domination, because of his tranquil, unostentatious bearing and fashion of playing. An expert in jewels once said that he did not believe it possible to compare two diamonds unless they were side by side, and can it be easier to compare tones fairly? So far as memory can be depended upon, it seems to be evident that only Wilhelmj has produced so voluminous a tone as Ysaye, and that even his was less equable and beautiful. For the great power, charm and individuality of this man's playing are in his right hand and arm rather than his left. His fingering is notably fine, clear-cut, distinct and true, and his double-stopping even when most rapid is smooth, sharp and perfectly balanced. But it is by the quantity and quality—what might almost be called the body and soul—of his tone that he entitles himself to be called a wizard of the bow. Herein he becomes phenomenal, while his admirable left hand has been equalled by other violinists in address, speed and elasticity. There have been heard also men who drew from the fourth string a vast and affecting tone; but we remember none who could evoke from the whole instrument such a sonorous, sturdy sound without one rough or strident note, could maintain it in rapid execution, could fill it with a communicative personal feeling, and extend its upward range to harmonics of absolutely pellucid purity and persuasive persistency of reach. There seems to pass into the successive phrases not any romantiasm, like Ole Bull's, not the eager heat and fantasy of Sarasate, nor the declamatory urgency of Wilhelmj, but a wholesome earnestness of nature and purpose which obtain respect while arousing enthusiasm, and make the violin seem to speak for the artist and the composer at once, as the great actor's equipment speaks for himself while yet moulded to fit the requirements of the dramatist. Ysaye is, therefore, to be accepted as an artist of a peculiar power, whose prestige rests upon a foundation where he stands alone, maintaining an honorable, dignified and worthy attitude. The concerto was played with just respect and reserve, and the effects were all legitimate and only eminent for their ease and elegance, while in the fantasia, freer in form and lighter in motive, more evident displays of virtuosity were made, and here and there a passage was announced or ended with that swift and incisive vigor which always appeals with a sudden thrill to the nerves of even the most critical.

The rest of the programme stood thus: Volkmann's first symphony; the chaconne and rigodon from Monsigny's suite, "Aline, Reine de Golconde," and Svendsen's "Paris Carnival." This was a group which fell into line with Mr. Paur's best successes—strong energy, large vitality, free sweep, sharp discrimination, excellent sense, approved taste and not too much sensibility being the qualities most needed in their rendering. The nervous protesting force of the first movement of the symphony was markedly fine, and the change to the lingering spirit of the andante was excellently made, the playing by M. Pourtau of the long clarinet theme being a delight for the ear. The quaint old-fashioned French music had a deal of new flesh and blood cast about its almost forgotten bones and the two phases of the Svendsen had becoming distinction and a plenty of vociferation, the band actually playing up to the standard of the kettle-drums in the finale.

This week there will be no concert. Next week Rubinstein's memory will be honored in this programme. The funeral march from Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony; Rubinstein's fourth pianoforte concerto, Mrs. Ernst Lent of Washington being the soloist; and Rubinstein's "Ocean" symphony, with all the movements.

Transcript

MONDAY, DECEMBER 3, 1894.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the seventh symphony concert, given in the Music Hall on Saturday evening, was—

Volkmann: Symphony No. 1, in D minor, opus 44.
Saint-Saëns: Concerto for Violin, No. 3, in B minor, opus 61.
Monsigny: Chaconne and Rigodon, from "Aline, Reine de Golconde."
Ernst: Fantasia for violin on themes from Rossini's "Otello."
Svendsen: Le Carnaval à Paris, opus 9.
Mr. Eugène Ysaye was the violinist.

It is highly probable that Volkmann's D minor symphony has been given here before; but we cannot remember it. It is a very different work from his more familiar second symphony, in B-flat major, and made an impression last Saturday evening unlike that produced by anything else of his we know. We suspect that works like this D minor symphony were more common fifty or seventy-five years ago than they are now. To be sure, compositions that are, in a sense, museums of impressions got from several composers are no great rarity at any time; but they seldom have as much life and vigor as this symphony has. One can hardly escape finding this work of Volkmann's full to the brim of suggestions of Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, and the whole classic school; but, for once, Volkmann seems to have borrowed his ideas red hot from the furnace, and they retain something of the glow of genius. Then the workmanship is excellent to a supreme degree; we doubt if any symphonic composer since Schumann, with the single exception of Brahms, can show a more stoutly, interestingly and excitingly worked-out second part than the free fantasia of the first movement of this symphony. And, curiously enough, the general plan of the work, especially of the first movement, is singularly formal, almost stiff; the first theme is almost academic in its rigidity. And here we come upon an interesting point, one that shows the difference between great creative genius and clever savoir faire. The character of the opening figure of the strings in this symphony is not far removed from that of the famous "Ta-ta-ta-TA!" of Beethoven's C minor. Not that there is any melodic similarity between them, but that both are equally a "knocking at the portal." Both are simple figures, rather than themes. But note how Beethoven, by a complex series of free contrapuntal imitations, immediately so develops his figure that the four-part web of voices strikes the ear as the continuous development of an actual melody; he starts with a simple figure, but from his treatment of it a full-grown theme blossoms forth. Volkmann has no such happy inspiration; he seems to feel that he cannot develop a real theme out of his initial figure, and so does not try to. But he does something else, and with such vigor and sureness of grasp that the result is by no means lacking in strong effectiveness. All that first section of the movement which is usually devoted to the statement and development of the first theme here becomes something very like recitative, a "recitativo stromentato," which the basses keep insisting upon their obstinate figure, the wind instruments keep answering with more or less expressive phrases, and the rest of the orchestra works up a climax of passage-work in the most exciting way imaginable. The whole passage shows dramatic force rather than musical invention. The slow movement charms one by its evident sincerity of feeling, albeit its rather bald simplicity and artlessness savors a little of the salon style. The Scherzo is admirable throughout. Only the Finale seems a little dry at times, though it works up to a very effective climax at the end,—the last few measures of which have, however, a somewhat stagy flavor, as the final "hurrah!" of an Auber overture. But the symphony, mostly "de reflet et de réverbère" though it be, as the old Friend of Men would say, is to us by far the most enjoyable and exciting thing we have yet heard from Volkmann's laboratory. The performance was simply superb!

The two movements from the suite collated by Gevaert from dance-pieces in Monsigny's "Aline, Reine de Golconde" are fascinating as may be, and were very daintily played. Svendsen's "Carnaval à Paris" is a wonderfully brilliant and daring piece of orchestration, but we are not sure that it is, in other respects, much more than "a tale * * * full of sound and fury, signifying nothing." Only toward the end, where the composer's madness rises to the pitch of genius, does the thing become really good fun. The performance left nothing to be desired.

Saint-Saëns's B minor violin concerto may take very high rank among concertos of the second class; the composer shows some inventiveness, infinite fertility of resource, and much charm and fascination. The music is sufficiently strongly knit together,—only that the second theme in the first movement seems rather vague and characterless, so that you have some difficulty in recognizing it on its return,—and the whole thing is full of life and go. It is amply fine enough a work for a great violinist to make his first bow with. Mr. Ysaye's playing took everyone by storm; since Paderewski, no artist has had such a glowing reception here. From the first minute his bow touched the string he held his whole audience spell-bound. It was time that we should hear him! We are all more or less liable to get into certain ruts in listening to music: and it is good for us to have an occasional fillip from the outside to wake us up and bring us to a consciousness that our horizon will bear extending. In pianoforte playing we have had not a few such eye-openers of late, but we have been less favored by great violinists. Mr. Ysaye suddenly opens our eyes to the difference between consummate virtuosity and something not quite so masterful. There is an old story of the elephant driver of one of the grand moguls showing his diamond-studded whip-lash to some curious foreigners; they took the rich thing in their hands, examined it with mute curiosity, stone by stone, and marvelled among themselves at the prodigality that could waste such precious jewels on a mere whip-lash! But the driver said, "You don't look at the thing right; what do we care about the cutting of each separate stone, or its fine water? All the Mogul's jewels are of fine water and cut to perfection! But, if you want to know the real glory of this whip-lash you must see me swing it over the elephant's head and see it flash in the sunlight; that's what the lash is for!" Well, we have all got too used to having brilliant violin-passages shown us "stone by stone:" now comes Mr. Ysaye and swings them jauntily in the sunlight, and we can see them flash! It makes all the difference in the world! Sarasate, to be grand seigneur that he is, plays on his virtuoso throne, that his playing has carried little conviction with it; you were dazzled by his virtuosity, but not much more. Ysaye, on the other hand, shows you his astounding virtuosity by its musical side; the whip-lash not only flashes in the sun, but it hits the elephant and makes him go. His tone is singularly smooth and sweet—in the G-string so smooth, indeed, that it sounds perhaps a little dull and wanting in edge—and, we should say, remarkable more for energy and brilliancy than for great breadth and volume; it is the Wieniawski tone, raised to a higher potency, rather than the Wilhelmj tone. It dominates over the orchestra more by its incisiveness and vigor of accent than by its largeness. Of his technique nothing need be said; we are well past making inventories of what may be taken for granted. But the fire and artistic measure of his playing are wonderful indeed; he so well subordinates details to the total impression! For the first three or four pages of the concerto, we were struck more than anything else by the apparent simplicity of his style; the main outlines of the music were so broadly and frankly drawn that all the cunning of the minor details stood somewhat in the background. But soon one saw that the highest perfection of detail was eminently there; especially in his playing of cantilena did one find him full of cunning—"malice," as the French say—but so much a master of all the arts and sophistries of effectiveness that his playing sounded like pure, unadulterated nature. Of communicative warmth of feeling and expression he shows a great deal; of the depth of his feeling the composition gave one no opportunity of judging; we should like to hear him in the Beethoven and Brahms concertos before trying to estimate him in this direction. Enough that we say that his playing of this concerto of Saint-Saëns's was as wondrously fine as the imagination could paint—finer probably than most of our imaginations could have painted before hearing it.

In playing Ernst's fantasia on themes from "Otello," Mr. Ysaye did a thing he should not have done at a symphony concert, and one which Mr. Paur—as director of the concerts—should not have allowed. It is entirely Mr. Ysaye's business what light he wishes to present himself to us in; only we do not care to have him, nor anyone else, show himself in the Ernst-Otello light at our symphony concerts. How he played the thing is of no importance. But it is of importance that it brought him an encore—for which he gave two solo pieces by Bach, disguising them under some, to say the least, remarkable playing, and that made matters worse than ever. Both the Music Hall and the Howard Athenæum have their high tides on Saturday evening, but it is well to keep the two elements apart. "The desert is large enough for both," as the Comanches say, and it were best for neither to encroach upon the domain of the other.

There will be no concert this week, the next one coming on Dec. 15. The next programme is: "In Memoriam Anton Rubinstein." Beethoven, Marcia Funebre from the "Eroica" symphony; Rubinstein, concerto for pianoforte, No. 4, in D minor, opus 70; Rubinstein, symphony No. 2, in C major, "Océan," opus 42 (entire). Mrs. Ernst Lent will be the pianist.

THE MORNING NEWS.

MONDAY, DECEMBER 3

HYPERION THEATER.

Saturday Evening, Dec. 8, at 8

Under the Auspices of the Music Department, Yale University.

FIRST GRAND CONCERT BY THE

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

(His first appearance in New Haven.)

Accompanied by the Renowned Belgian Violinist,

MR. CESAR THOMSON,

(His first appearance in New Haven.)

PROGRAM.

Passacaglia .....Back
Symphony in E minor, No. 4.....Brahms
Solo for violin—
(a) Adagio from Concerto in G minor .....Bruch
(b) Concerto in D.....Paganni
Mr. Thompson.
Suite L' Arlesienne, No. 1.....Bizet
Overture, "Carneval Romain".....Berlioz

Tickets with reserved seats, $1.50, $1.00 and 75c. Sale opens at the Box Office, Hyperion Theater, tomorrow (Tuesday) morning.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, whose performances come very near representing perfection in musical art, will give its only concert at the Hyperion next Saturday evening. The attractiveness of a brilliant program will be increased by the initial appearance in this city of Cesar Thomson, the famous Belgian violinist, who is to be the soloist of the evening. Mr. Thomson came to America with the prestige of great and continuous success in European capitals and added to his laurels on the occasion of his first appearance in this country at a recent concert of the Philharmonic society of New York. He ranks with the greatest of violinists and in his absolute mastery of violin tecnique he probably has no equal. His New Haven debut is likely to prove one of the most interesting features of the present season. He will play with the orchestra the Adagio from the Bruch Concerto for violin, and the concerto by Paganini, a work of amazing difficulty in which his remarkable qualities will be shown to the best advantage. The orchestral numbers to be played include Passacaglia, Bach; Symphony in E minor, No. 4, Brahms; Suite, "L'Arlesienne," No. 1, Bizet; and the overture "Carneval Romain," Berlioz. The sale of seats will open tomorrow (Tuesday) morning, at the box office, Hyperion.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 5, 1894.

This was the program of the seventh Symphony Concert:

Symphony No. 1, in D minor.....Volkmann
Concerto for violin, No. 3, in B minor.....Saint-Saëns
"Chaconne and Rigodon," from "Aline Reine de Golconde".....Monsigny
Fantasia for violin on airs from Rossini's "Otello".....Ernst
"Carnaval à Paris".....Svendsen

In the accompaniment to the Ernst fantasia there was a lack of precision, but the work of the orchestra was otherwise excellent. The dance music by Monsigny is without marked interest, except that it is taken from the "ballet héroique" written for the Opéra. Sophie Arnould was the first "Aline" and the Guimard danced in revivals of this forgotten work. And such an association of ideas did not lend the music a foreign beauty.

Some day—may it come soon—conductors will not feel obliged to give the whole of a symphony. How much better, how much more impressive the D minor symphony of Volkmann would be, if the finale were not. The strength of the first movement with its austerity that is not displeasing, the beauty of the andante (by the way, Mr. Pourtau, the first clarinetist, distinguished himself therein), the grace of the trio to the scherzo—these are all nearly forgotten, crushed out by the brutal dullness of the finale.

Great was the triumph of Ysaye, and it was a triumph richly deserved. In these days when technic runs in the streets, even unusual perfection of mechanism is applauded without a loss of reason and consequent hysteria. What Ysaye did not do, or rather refrained from doing, was to my mind as admirable as what he did. Only the man of virtuoso blood knows fully the temptation to play with an audience that hangs on a fiddle stick. And how nobly did Ysaye refrain last evening from exaggeration of every kind!

His tone is of rare beauty. There is a sensuousness of tone that suggests corruption and dealers in corruption. Then is the fiddle the instrument of the Devil, as the men of the eighteenth century often believed. The tone of Ysaye is free from morbid sweetness, such as came from Muzio's violin, the fiddle of three strings. Do you know the story of "The Song of Triumphant Love"? If you do not, I'll tell it to you in the next number of THE MUSICAL COURIER.

When Ysaye stands on the stage you realize the presence of the virtuoso—I use the word in its original sense before it knew perversion. This man has stood before thousands. Yet is there never a suspicion of the poseur. Never did he play last evening the eye. Never was there a doubt of his sincerity.

And again is there thought of the exquisite tone, of the gentle caressing of the strings, of the modest ease with which a huge difficulty was overcome.

Of course there are comparisons. It was Plutarch who established the fashion of thus setting one man against another. Let us enjoy Ysaye without wondering how another plays or whether another would interpret a phrase in another way. What is the use of blunting enjoyment by adjusting constantly the scales? Let us be thankful for the characteristics that distinguish Sarasate, or Ysaye, or Thomson. Each man in this world, if he is of any worth, has something to say in his own peculiar manner.

The Symphony concert of the 15th will be in memory of Anton Rubinstein. The program will be as follows: Funeral march from "Eroica" symphony, Beethoven; concerto No. 4, D minor, for piano, Rubinstein; symphony in C, No. 2 ("Ocean"), Rubinstein. The pianist will be Mrs. Ernst Lent.

There will be no Symphony concert here the 8th.

PHILIP HALE.

Philadelphia Abend-Post.

Dienstag, 4. Dezember 1894.

Das Boston Symphonie Orchester gab gestern Abend in der Academy of Music ein klassisches Konzert, welchem ein überaus zahlreiches und musikverständiges Publikum beiwohnte. Diese Organisation ist anerkannt als eine der vollkommensten in der Welt und hat dies gestern Abend wieder durch den meisterhaften Vortrag der verschiedenen Nummern bethätigt. Das waren in der That Meisterleistungen, wie sie nirgends besser gehört werden können. Als Solist trat der berühmte belgische Violinist Eugene Ysaye auf, der sich als Virtuose ersten Ranges einführte. Er verbindet mit einer wunderbaren Technik einen großen Ton und ein seelenvolles Spiel. Er ist ein Meister auf seinem Instrument und ein Virtuose ersten Ranges.

[58]

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 2, 1894.

A WHOLE BATCH OF CONCERTS, CHORAL, SYMPHONY, ETC.

The whole seventh Symphony concert was characterized by energy and vivacity, but its chief stir and sensation were derived from the violin playing of Mr. Eugene Ysaye, who made then his Boston debut, exciting an unusual enthusiam of response, which took the form of recalls upon recalls and of an earnestness and honesty of applause from the orchestra, anything approaching which we have never known bestowed upon an artist not a German. M. Ysaye's selections were Saint-Saens's third violin concerto (in B minor, opus 61) and Ernst's fantasia on themes from Rossini's "Otello," of which the first only had been promised and the second being admitted by a change in the programme. In both composers we find a complete knowledge and command of the technical resources of the instruments, so that in each work the player has ample opportunity to show his virtuosity alike in sustained song, voluble iteration of figure, brilliant adornment, power, grace and versatility, although the latter belongs rather to the category of passing show-pieces, while the former ranks with works of art and permanence. M. Ysaye is indubitably a player of the first order, who gives—certainly upon a first hearing—adverse criticism nothing upon which to take a grasp. He is a large man of gentle and grave but still pleasant face and manner, and those who judge by the eye rather than the ear might perhaps wonder at his reputation and domination, because of his tranquil, unostentatious bearing and fashion of playing. An expert in jewels once said that he did not believe it possible to compare two diamonds unless they were side by side, and can it be easier to compare tones fairly? So far as memory can be depended upon, it seems to be evident that only Wilhelmj has produced so voluminous a tone as Ysaye, and that even his was less equable and beautiful. For the great power, charm and individuality of this man's playing are in his right hand and arm rather than his left. His fingering is notably fine, clear-cut, distinct and true, and his double-stopping even when most rapid is smooth, sharp and perfectly balanced. But it is by the quantity and quality—what might almost be called the body and soul—of his tone that he entitles himself to be called a wizard of the bow. Herein he becomes phenomenal, while his admirable left hand has been equalled by other violinists in address, speed and elasticity. There have been heard also men who drew from the fourth string a vast and affecting tone; but we remember none who could evoke from the whole instrument such a sonorous, sturdy sound without one rough or strident note, could maintain it in rapid execution, could fill it with a communicative personal feeling, and extend its upward range to harmonics of absolutely pellucid purity and persuasive persistency of reach. There seems to pass into the successive phrases not any romantiasm, like Ole Bull's, not the eager heat and fantasy of Sarasate, nor the declamatory urgency of Wilhelmj, but a wholesome earnestness of nature and purpose which obtain respect while arousing enthusiasm, and make the violin seem to speak for the artist and the composer at once, as the great actor's equipment speaks for himself while yet moulded to fit the requirements of the dramatist. Ysaye is, therefore, to be accepted as an artist of a peculiar power, whose prestige rests upon a foundation where he stands alone, maintaining an honorable, dignified and worthy attitude. The concerto was played with just respect and reserve, and the effects were all legitimate and only eminent for their ease and elegance, while in the fantasia, freer in form and lighter in motive, more evident displays of virtuosity were made, and here and there a passage was announced or ended with that swift and incisive vigor which always appeals with a sudden thrill to the nerves of even the most critical.

The rest of the programme stood thus: Volkmann's first symphony; the chaconne and rigodon from Monsigny's suite, "Aline, Reine de Golconde," and Svendsen's "Paris Carnival." This was a group which fell into line with Mr. Paur's best successes—strong energy, large vitality, free sweep, sharp discrimination, excellent sense, approved taste and not too much sensibility being the qualities most needed in their rendering. The nervous protesting force of the first movement of the symphony was markedly fine, and the change to the lingering spirit of the andante was excellently made, the playing by M. Pourtau of the long clarinet theme being a delight for the ear. The quaint old-fashioned French music had a deal of new flesh and blood cast about its almost forgotten bones and the two phases of the Svendsen had becoming distinction and a plenty of vociferation, the band actually playing up to the standard of the kettle-drums in the finale.

This week there will be no concert. Next week Rubinstein's memory will be honored in this programme. The funeral march from Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony; Rubinstein's fourth pianoforte concerto, Mrs. Ernst Lent of Washington being the soloist; and Rubinstein's "Ocean" symphony, with all the movements.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, DECEMBER 3, 1894.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the seventh symphony concert, given in the Music Hall on Saturday evening, was—

Volkmann: Symphony No. 1, in D minor, opus 44.
Saint-Saëns: Concerto for Violin, No. 3, in B minor, opus 61.
Monsigny: Chaconne and Rigodon, from "Aline, Reine de Golconde."
Ernst: Fantasia for violin on themes from Rossini's "Otello."
Svendsen: Le Carnaval à Paris, opus 9.
Mr. Eugène Ysaye was the violinist.

It is highly probable that Volkmann's D minor symphony has been given here before; but we cannot remember it. It is a very different work from his more familiar second symphony, in B-flat major, and made an impression last Saturday evening unlike that produced by anything else of his we know. We suspect that works like this D minor symphony were more common fifty or seventy-five years ago than they are now. To be sure, compositions that are, in a sense, museums of impressions got from several composers are no great rarity at any time; but they seldom have as much life and vigor as this symphony has. One can hardly escape finding this work of Volkmann's full to the brim of suggestions of Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, and the whole classic school; but, for once, Volkmann seems to have borrowed his ideas red hot from the furnace, and they retain something of the glow of genius. Then the workmanship is excellent to a supreme degree; we doubt if any symphonic composer since Schumann, with the single exception of Brahms, can show a more stoutly, interestingly and excitingly worked-out second part than the free fantasia of the first movement of this symphony. And, curiously enough, the general plan of the work, especially of the first movement, is singularly formal, almost stiff; the first theme is almost academic in its rigidity. And here we come upon an interesting point, one that shows the difference between great creative genius and clever savoir faire. The character of the opening figure of the strings in this symphony is not far removed from that of the famous "Ta-ta-ta-TA!" of Beethoven's C minor. Not that there is any melodic similarity between them, but that both are equally a "knocking at the portal." Both are simple figures, rather than themes. But note how Beethoven, by a complex series of free contrapuntal imitations, immediately so develops his figure that the four-part web of voices strikes the ear as the continuous development of an actual melody; he starts with a simple figure, but from his treatment of it a full-grown theme blossoms forth. Volkmann has no such happy inspiration; he seems to feel that he cannot develop a real theme out of his initial figure, and so does not try to. But he does something else, and with such vigor and sureness of grasp that the result is by no means lacking in strong effectiveness. All that first section of the movement which is usually devoted to the statement and development of the first theme here becomes something very like recitative, a "recitativo stromentato," which the basses keep insisting upon their obstinate figure, the wind instruments keep answering with more or less expressive phrases, and the rest of the orchestra works up a climax of passage-work in the most exciting way imaginable. The whole passage shows dramatic force rather than musical invention. The slow movement charms one by its evident sincerity of feeling, albeit its rather bald simplicity and artlessness savors a little of the salon style. The Scherzo is admirable throughout. Only the Finale seems a little dry at times, though it works up to a very effective climax at the end,—the last few measures of which have, however, a somewhat stagy flavor, as the final "hurrah!" of an Auber overture. But the symphony, mostly "de reflet et de réverbère" though it be, as the old Friend of Men would say, is to us by far the most enjoyable and exciting thing we have yet heard from Volkmann's laboratory. The performance was simply superb!

The two movements from the suite collated by Gevaert from dance-pieces in Monsigny's "Aline, Reine de Golconde" are fascinating as may be, and were very daintily played. Svendsen's "Carnaval à Paris" is a wonderfully brilliant and daring piece of orchestration, but we are not sure that it is, in other respects, much more than "a tale * * * full of sound and fury, signifying nothing." Only toward the end, where the composer's madness rises to the pitch of genius, does the thing become really good fun. The performance left nothing to be desired.

Saint-Saëns's B minor violin concerto may take very high rank among concertos of the second class; the composer shows some inventiveness, infinite fertility of resource, and much charm and fascination. The music is sufficiently strongly knit together,—only that the second theme in the first movement seems rather vague and characterless, so that you have some difficulty in recognizing it on its return,—and the whole thing is full of life and go. It is amply fine enough a work for a great violinist to make his first bow with. Mr. Ysaye's playing took everyone by storm; since Paderewski, no artist has had such a glowing reception here. From the first minute his bow touched the string he held his whole audience spell-bound. It was time that we should hear him! We are all more or less liable to get into certain ruts in listening to music: and it is good for us to have an occasional fillip from the outside to wake us up and bring us to a consciousness that our horizon will bear extending. In pianoforte playing we have had not a few such eye-openers of late, but we have been less favored by great violinists. Mr. Ysaye suddenly opens our eyes to the difference between consummate virtuosity and something not quite so masterful. There is an old story of the elephant driver of one of the grand moguls showing his diamond-studded whip-lash to some curious foreigners; they took the rich thing in their hands, examined it with mute curiosity, stone by stone, and marvelled among themselves at the prodigality that could waste such precious jewels on a mere whip-lash! But the driver said, "You don't look at the thing right; what do we care about the cutting of each separate stone, or its fine water? All the Mogul's jewels are of fine water and cut to perfection! But, if you want to know the real glory of this whip-lash you must see me swing it over the elephant's head and see it flash in the sunlight; that's what the lash is for!" Well, we have all got too used to having brilliant violin-passages shown us "stone by stone;" now comes Mr. Ysaye and swings them jauntily in the sunlight, and we can see them flash! It makes all the difference in the world! Sarasate, to be sure, has shown us much the same thing; but Sarasate, of late years, has played so much en grand seigneur, has lolled so lazily on his virtuoso throne, that his playing has carried little conviction with it; you were dazzled by his virtuosity, but not much more. Ysaye, on the other hand, shows you his astounding virtuosity by its musical side; the whip-lash not only flashes in the sun, but it hits the elephant and makes him go. His tone is singularly smooth and sweet—in the G-string so smooth, indeed, that it sounds perhaps a little dull and wanting in edge—and, we should say, remarkable more for energy and brilliancy than for great breadth and volume; it is the Wieniawski tone, raised to a higher potency, rather than the Wilhelmj tone. It dominates over the orchestra more by its incisiveness and vigor of accent than by its largeness. Of his technique nothing need be said; we are well past making inventories of what may be taken for granted. But the fire and artistic measure of his playing are wonderful indeed; he so well subordinates details to the total impression! For the first three or four pages of the concerto, we were struck more than anything else by the apparent simplicity of his style; the main outlines of the music were so broadly and frankly drawn that all the cunning of the minor details stood somewhat in the background. But soon one saw that the highest perfection of detail was eminently there; especially in his playing of cantilena did one find him full of cunning—"malice," as the French say—but so much a master of all the arts and sophistries of effectiveness that his playing sounded like pure, unadulterated nature. Of communicative warmth of feeling and expression he shows a great deal; of the depth of his feeling the composition gave one no opportunity of judging; we should like to hear him in the Beethoven and Brahms concertos before trying to estimate him in this direction. Enough that we say that his playing of this concerto of Saint-Saëns's was as wondrously fine as the imagination could paint—finer probably than most of our imaginations could have painted before hearing it.

In playing Ernst's fantasia on themes from "Otello," Mr. Ysaye did a thing he should not have done at a symphony concert, and one which Mr. Paur—as director of the concerts—should not have allowed. It is entirely Mr. Ysaye's business what light he wishes to present himself to us in; only we do not care to have him, nor anyone else, show himself in the Ernst-Otello light at our symphony concerts. How he played the thing is of no importance. But it is of importance that it brought him an encore—for which he gave two solo pieces by Bach, disguising them under some, to say the least, remarkable playing, and that made matters worse than ever. Both the Music Hall and the Howard Athenæum have their high tides on Saturday evening, but it is well to keep the two elements apart. "The desert is large enough for both," as the Comanches say, and it were best for neither to encroach upon the domain of the other.

There will be no concert this week, the next one coming on Dec. 15. The next programme is: "In Memoriam Anton Rubinstein." Beethoven, Marcia Funebre from the "Eroica" symphony; Rubinstein, concerto for pianoforte, No. 4, in D minor, opus 70; Rubinstein, symphony No. 2, in C major, "Océan," opus 42 (entire). Mrs. Ernst Lent will be the pianist.

THE MORNING NEWS.

MONDAY, DECEMBER 3

HYPERION THEATER.

Saturday Evening, Dec. 8, at 8

Under the Auspices of the Music Department, Yale University.

FIRST GRAND CONCERT BY THE

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

(His first appearance in New Haven.)

Accompanied by the Renowned Belgian Violinist,

MR. CESAR THOMSON,

(His first appearance in New Haven.)

PROGRAM.

Passacaglia ..... Bach
Symphony in E minor, No. 4..... Brahms
Solo for violin—
(a) Adagio from Concerto in G minor ..... Bruch
(b) Concerto in D..... Paganni
Mr. Thompson.
Suite L' Arlesienne, No. 1..... Bizet
Overture, "Carneval Romain"..... Berlioz

Tickets with reserved seats, $1.50, $1.00 and 75c. Sale opens at the Box Office, Hyperion Theater, tomorrow (Tuesday) morning.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, whose performances come very near representing perfection in musical art, will give its only concert at the Hyperion next Saturday evening. The attractiveness of a brilliant program will be increased by the initial appearance in this city of Cesar Thomson, the famous Belgian violinist, who is to be the soloist of the evening. Mr. Thomson came to America with the prestige of great and continuous success in European capitals and added to his laurels on the occasion of his first appearance in this country at a recent concert of the Philharmonic society of New York. He ranks with the greatest of violinists and in his absolute mastery of violin tecnique he probably has no equal. His New Haven debut is likely to prove one of the most interesting features of the present season. He will play with the orchestra the Adagio from the Bruch Concerto for violin, and the concerto by Paganini, a work of amazing difficulty in which his remarkable qualities will be shown to the best advantage. The orchestral numbers to be played include Passacaglia, Bach; Symphony in E minor, No. 4, Brahms; Suite, "L'Arlesienne," No. 1, Bizet; and the overture "Carneval Romain," Berlioz. The sale of seats will open tomorrow (Tuesday) morning, at the box office, Hyperion.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 5, 1894.

This was the program of the seventh Symphony Concert:

Symphony No. 1, in D minor..... Volkmann
Concerto for violin, No. 3, in B minor..... Saint-Saëns
"Chaconne and Rigodon," from "Aline Reine de Golconde"..... Monsigny
Fantasia for violin on airs from Rossini's "Otello"..... Ernst
"Carnaval à Paris"..... Svendsen

In the accompaniment to the Ernst fantasia there was a lack of precision, but the work of the orchestra was otherwise excellent. The dance music by Monsigny is without marked interest, except that it is taken from the "ballet héroique" written for the Opéra. Sophie Arnould was the first "Aline" and the Guimard danced in revivals of this forgotten work. And such an association of ideas did not lend the music a foreign beauty.

Some day—may it come soon—conductors will not feel obliged to give the whole of a symphony. How much better, how much more impressive the D minor symphony of Volkmann would be, if the finale were not. The strength of the first movement with its austerity that is not displeasing, the beauty of the andante (by the way, Mr. Pourtau, the first clarinetist, distinguished himself therein), the grace of the trio to the scherzo—these are all nearly forgotten, crushed out by the brutal dullness of the finale.

Great was the triumph of Ysaye, and it was a triumph richly deserved. In these days when technic runs in the streets, even unusual perfection of mechanism is applauded without a loss of reason and consequent hysteria. What Ysaye did not do, or rather refrained from doing, was to my mind as admirable as what he did. Only the man of virtuoso blood knows fully the temptation to play with an audience that hangs on a fiddle stick. And how nobly did Ysaye refrain last evening from exaggeration of every kind!

His tone is of rare beauty. There is a sensuousness of tone that suggests corruption and dealers in corruption. Then is the fiddle the instrument of the Devil, as the men of the eighteenth century often believed. The tone of Ysaye is free from morbid sweetness, such as came from Muzio's violin, the fiddle of three strings. Do you know the story of "The Song of Triumphant Love"? If you do not, I'll tell it to you in the next number of THE MUSICAL COURIER.

When Ysaye stands on the stage you realize the presence of the virtuoso—I use the word in its original sense before it knew perversion. This man has stood before thousands. Yet is there never a suspicion of the poseur. Never did he play last evening the eye. Never was there a doubt of his sincerity.

And again is there thought of the exquisite tone, of the gentle caressing of the strings, of the modest ease with which a huge difficulty was overcome.

Of course there are comparisons. It was Plutarch who established the fashion of thus setting one man against another. Let us enjoy Ysaye without wondering how another plays or whether another would interpret a phrase in another way. What is the use of blunting enjoyment by adjusting constantly the scales? Let us be thankful for the characteristics that distinguish Sarasate, or Ysaye, or Thomson. Each man in this world, if he is of any worth, has something to say in his own peculiar manner.

The Symphony concert of the 15th will be in memory of Anton Rubinstein. The program will be as follows: Funeral march from "Eroica" symphony, Beethoven; concerto No. 4, D minor, for piano, Rubinstein; symphony in C, No. 2 ("Ocean"), Rubinstein. The pianist will be Mrs. Ernst Lent.

There will be no Symphony concert here the 8th.

PHILIP HALE.

Philadelphia Abend-Post.

Dienstag, 4. Dezember 1894.

Das Boston Symphonie Orchester gab gestern Abend in der Academy of Music ein klassisches Konzert, welchem ein überaus zahlreiches und musikverständiges Publikum beiwohnte. Diese Organisation ist anerkannt als eine der vollkommensten in der Welt und hat dies gestern Abend wieder durch den meisterhaften Vortrag der verschiedenen Nummern bethätigt. Das waren in der That Meisterleistungen, wie sie nirgends besser gehört werden können. Als Solist trat der berühmte belgische Violinist Eugene Ysaye auf, der sich als Virtuose ersten Ranges einführte. Er verbindet mit einer wunderbaren Technik einen großen Ton und ein seelenvolles Spiel. Er ist ein Meister auf seinem Instrument und ein Virtuose ersten Ranges.

[58]

The Philadelphia ...

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 4, 1894.

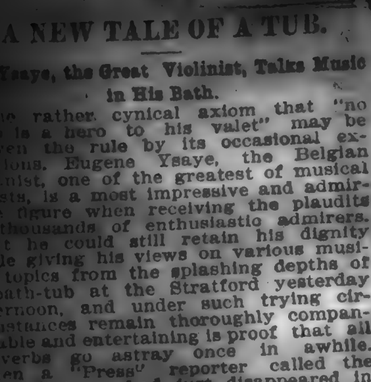
A NEW TALE OF A TUB.

Ysaye, the Great Violinist, Talks Music in His Bath.

The rather cynical axiom that "no man is a hero to his valet" may be given the rule by its occasional exceptions. Eugene Ysaye, the Belgian violinist, one of the greatest of musical artists, is a most impressive and admirable figure when receiving the plaudits of thousands of enthusiastic admirers. That he could still retain his dignity while giving his views on various musical topics from the splashing depths of a bath-tub at the Stratford yesterday afternoon, and under such trying circumstances remain thoroughly companionable and entertaining is proof that all proverbs go astray once in awhile. When a "Press" reporter called the great Virtuoso had just disappeared in his bath room, and from behind closed doors there came the noise of prodigious splashing and blowing, as though an aquarium had gone utterly mad and the biggest fish of all was the storm center of disturbance.

"I wish to ask some questions of M. Ysaye," said the reporter to his manager, who held the fort. A hail through a crack in the door and a deep voice gurgled noisily, "Come in." The door was opened and M. Ysaye was revealed, as only a massive head and sturdy shoulders towering from a small but turbulent sea. His mane of black hair glistened with wetness and was tumbled about his eyes in a way that would have astonished one of his great audiences or any of the numerous "crowned heads" before whom he has appeared.

"There! you have caught me," he exclaimed with a great jolly laugh. "But



Eugene Ysaye.

I am very glad to come to Philadelphia, even if I am seen by the first person I meet in most undignified pose. Do you know that your Academy of Music is said to have the finest acoustics of any—what do you call it—auditorium?—in the world. I heard this in Europe. Sarasate told me that your Academy was the most perfect hall to play in anywhere. Paderewski said the same. Perhaps it was a happy accident. I don't know."

Just as his impression of American audiences was asked, M. Ysaye went completely under for a final plunge, and the interviewer retired to the sitting room, where the violinist presently joined him wrapped in a dressing gown of gorgeous hues.

"Ah, the public, you say? The New York audiences made a charming impression on me. There was about the people such an air of intelligence. There was no lack of close attention, there was no talking, and no applause until the end of the movements. Now such a lovely work as Dvorak's symphony would have been interrupted a dozen times in France with a handclap, or a stupid "Bravo," or someone saying, "Que c'est beau," or something or other all the time. My New York and Boston audiences not only exhibited a strong love for music itself, but equal admiration for the composer. You cannot understand how quickly you feel that the public is en rapport with you. You feel in the course of your solo that your intuition, your idea, your emotion, has been felt and understood and you are buoyantly happy. I have followed with great interest the musical progress which Americans have achieved in recent years. What I know of their efforts in that direction bids me to believe that they are already far ahead of Englishmen, who seem to remain in statu quo. Why? Wagnerian lectures originated in this country, and there are hardly more accomplished musical critics in the world than are to be found in America."

M. Ysaye recalls Rubinstein in appearance in many ways. There is the same leonine head, the same suggestion of resolute vigor, and of innate power. His figure is tall and massive, with square, stalwart shoulders and a broad chest. The chin is strong, the jaw square, and the mouth firm and finely cut. His eyes are large, deep set, and wonderfully expressive, and he could be taken at once for the intelligent and sensitive artist without the mass of long dark hair that sweeps back from his brow.

YSAYE AT THE ACADEMY.

Second Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—Large Audience Present.

In the second Boston Symphony concert last evening at the Academy of Music, Philadelphia, had its first opportunity of hearing one of the greatest living violinists, M. Eugene Ysaye, who, it is needless to say, fulfilled all expectations that anticipatory eulogies had raised as to the man and his art. The programme was also about one of the best digested bits that Director Pau has given us and will serve to increase his hold on his audiences here, which has not been that of his predecessors. The programme ran as follows:—

Symphony No. 4 in E. minor, Op. 98, ... Brahms
Concerts for the violin..... Saint-Saens
Ballet movement and Entr'Acte from "Rosamunde"..... Schubert
Scotch Fantaise for the violin.... Bruch
Carnival in Paris..... Svendsen

The Academy was crowded and while the beauty of the Brahms symphony seemed to be fully appreciated, it was evident that the interest was in the artist. On first appearance, such is his physical qualities it does not seem possible that such a ponderous personage could have the extreme lightness, delicacy and grace which are his, almost suggesting the maiden, combined with a perfect purity of tone and backed by a technique which has no tricks in it. The manner and the way in which he made it evident, though [illegible] affectation, that he and the [illegible] one, showed an artist [illegible] quality and art were evenly [illegible] each occupying its proper [illegible] of Brahms, [illegible] which the concert opened, is in construction the most masterly of Brahms' symphonies, and, although the austere and almost ascetic quality of the work renders popular appreciation slow, it was well received last night, and the audience was certainly moved by its finer passages. The second movement (andante moderato) is one of the most romantic and original creations. It is like Schubert, but more powerfully wrought, and the whole symphony attains a high intellectual level. In the third and fourth movements it contains wide departures from the classic symphony from and opens a wide trail for modern composers to follow. Director Pau's rendering was not a first-class performance for his orchestra. In the first movement the bass was at times blurred. The second movement was, however, most thoughtfully and beautifully rendered. It is very lovely and brought out much applause. In the fourth movement the bass was a little harsh, and the total effect seemed wanting in full life. Such performances, however, will prove to the public that Brahms, as is the fact, is the greatest symphonist since Beethoven.

In the concerts for the violin Ysaye had full opportunity to exploit his genius and whether it was his bowing, or his sureness of tone, or his exceeding grace of touch, or a combination of all those qualities that go to make up the great artist, the result was a profound impression on everyone. The second movement, however, was unquestionably the favorite. And as the violinist finished on a high note of exquisite purity, that, as he slowly drew his bow with perfect power, seemed to get thinner and purer and purer and thinner, growing beautifully less, the effect was wonderful. It was as sweet and lovely as some soaring lark drawing away into the distant blue. Not only did Ysaye receive much applause on his entrance, but he was called out again and again by the delighted audience, and to the plaudits he bowed gravely unruffled. The "Rosamunde" selection was perfectly played by the orchestra, especially the andantino. After this again came Ysaye, and the expectation raised by his first performance was fully maintained in the five parts of the Scotch fantasie. The adagio showed his sympathetic qualities in the highest degree and in the scherzo the same birdlike qualities of tone again sounded and sang themselves, while the power of his deeper notes, like the cello's, was shown in the andante. The warlike finale was very spirited, and as the great soloist of the evening left the stage the applause showed the triumph of his art. The concert concluded with the showy hit, Svendsen's "Carnival of Paris," which was well rendered by the orchestra. Ysaye is unquestionably a most attractive artist, albeit he is not passionate, not Byronic, perhaps, but rather subtle and Wordsworthian.

Philadelphia Inquirer

TWELVE PAGES.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 4, 1894.

YSAYE A GREAT ARTIST.

First Appearance of the Belgian Violinist in This City Last Night.

The second concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last night was made memorable by the first appearance of Mr. Eugene Ysaye, the Belgian violinist, of whom much has been heard abroad of recent years, but who is almost a stranger in the Western world. His few appearances elsewhere have evoked the highest praise and it must be admitted that none of these statements were extravagant. Mr. Ysaye is a great artist—one of the greatest violinists of the age. He belongs to that highest circle of artists who are preferred one above the other merely according to one's taste. Ysaye has that indispensable medium of an artist—a perfect technique. Nothing is difficult to him. The most complex fingering gives him not the slightest trouble.

In technique alone he is beyond criticism, but that alone does not make an artist. He has more. A look at the man is some slight indication of his work. He is a large, heavy man, with a smooth face, a heavy jaw and long black hair. The upper part of his face is not impressive, but his whole manner is. From the first one can see that he is a serious artist, with perfect command of his instrument, poetic in sentiment, modest in demeanor and utterly undemonstrative in his methods. There is not the slightest attempt to display himself. He is solely wrapped up in his art.

When he has played but a few bars one sees that here is a master. There is not the least slurring. His tone is large, his intonation is magnificent, and in every way he marks the full stature of the great artist. No one in this generation has given such a singing quality to violin music. He reminds one in this respect of Paderewski at the piano. There is warmth and feeling in every note, and in every note he shows his individuality. One is constantly impressed with his seriousness. His art is to him no idle thing. It is to be revered. It is above the place of earthly things and is to him the language of a higher existence. Certainly a more poetic violinist has not been heard here. He played Saint Saens' concerto admirably. The orchestration was delightful, just filling in a background for the artist.

In his piano passages, although the tones were barely audible, they were clean cut but soft as snowflakes. He played afterwards Bruch's Scotch fantasie, which was simply a delirium of delight. The audience was one of the largest ever at a symphony concert in this city, and was wildly enthusiastic. We shall want to hear more from this new artist.

The orchestra played Brahms' symphony in E minor No. 4; Schubert's ballet and entr'act from "Rosamunde," and Svendsen's Carnival in Paris—all most acceptably.

The North American

PHILADELPHIA, PA.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 4, 1894.

MUSIC AT THE ACADEMY.

Second Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Last Evening.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Emil Paur, gave its second concert for the season at the Academy of Music last evening, in the presence of the crowded and brilliant audience which its appearance never fails to attract. It was heard in Brahm's complicated symphony No. 4, in E minor, op. 98, in the delicious ballet and entracte music of Schubert's "Rosamunde," and in a wild, wierd and wearisome composition by Johan Svendsen, entitled "Carnival in Paris," in all of which numbers it played with its wonted brilliancy, delicacy and impeccability, and with something more than its usual breadth and vigor. The audience enjoyed its performance greatly, and applauded it with well-merited warmth; but after all, the feature of the occasion was the first appearance in Philadelphia of Eugene Ysaye, the distinguished Belgian violinist, the cordiality of whose reception bespoke the eager and agreeable anticipations with which his playing was awaited. Mr. Ysaye is a tall, massively built man, of dark complexion, with long, coal black hair, and a leonine cast of countenance. His demeanor, though entirely unassuming, is suggestive of confidence, and his whole presence conveys, in an indescribable but unmistakable manner a sense of power. There was a moment or two of delay as he tuned his instrument, affected by the temperature of the auditorium, and then the orchestra began to play the tremolando opening bars of Saint-Saen's Concerto No. 3 in B minor, op. 61, and presently the solo violin was heard announcing in its lowest register the theme of the allegro movement. From that moment until the close of the concerto M. Ysaye was listened to with rapt attention, only suspended when opportunity offered by oubtursts of applause, and at the conclusion of the number he was called repeatedly before the curtain, and urged by people whose pleasure had rendered them inconsiderate to play something more. This he very properly, in view of the exacting and exhausting character of the composition which he had just finished, declined to do, but he was heard later on in Max Bruch's beautiful and imaginative, but immensely difficult "Scotch Fantasy" and by his performance thereof deepened and confirmed the first impression. There can be no question of M. Ysaye's standing. He is an artist of the first rank, and one of the three or four very great violinists of the day. From players of his importance brilliant technique is expected as a matter of course, and M. Ysaye has it to perfection. His intonation is faultless, the purity of his tone is quite extraordinary, while his mastery over the mysteries of staccato bowing, double stopping, etc., appears to be absolute. Yet it is not by his technique that he makes his impression. It is by the poetry, by the delicacy, by the beauty, by the irresistible emotional eloquence of his playing. With his violin he speaks to the heart with an utterance so full of power, of passion and of charm that sometimes fascinating, sometimes melting, sometimes inspiriting, it is always convincing and impressive. It was a great pleasure to hear him; it will be a still greater pleasure to hear him again.

Bizet's "Carmen" will be sung at the Academy to-night by the company of the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, and with a cast comprising Rastinano Ancona, Lucille Hill and Zelie de Lussan. The Pennsylvania Railroad Company announces that it will hold suburban trains until fifteen minutes after the performance.

THE RECORD.

Philadelphia, December 4, 1894.

Ysaye and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the second concert of the season last evening at the Academy of Music. Mr. Emil Paur again wielded the baton, and the more this skilled and talented leader is studied the higher is the appreciation that is awakened by his methods. The special feature of the programme last evening was undoubtedly the brilliant violin playing of the Belgian soloist, Eugene Ysaye, who more than realized the enthusiastic reports that had preceded him. He is certainly a master of the violin. His technical equipment is marked by an accuracy that is almost perfection, while he infuses into his work an expressive feeling and emotional action peculiarly his own. His tonal strength is, perhaps, not so conspicuous as that of other great violinists heard here, but none has excelled him in true delicacy of expression and in exquisite modulations. He carried the house by storm last night. He was really magnificent in the well-known Saint-Saens concerto, while in the three movements of Bruch's "Scotch Fantasie" his versatility and sustained certainty of touch were admirably displayed. Ysaye's memory is a remarkable one, and at no time did he betray the slightest need of guiding notes. The orchestra itself was heard at its best in Brahm's Symphony No. 4, and in the ballet movement and entr' acte from Schubert's "Rosamunde." Conductor Paur had his players completely in sympathy with the intentions of the composers, and rarely have these two works been accorded a finer interpretation.

PUBLIC [illegible]

Philadelphia, Tuesday, December [illegible]

Academy of Music—Boston Symphony Orchestra and a Great Soloist.

The Boston Orchestra last night, at the Academy of Music, had a packed house, which thinned out quite perceptibly before the close, not through satiety with the abundant musical treat prepared by Conductor Emil Paur, but because of the inexorable requirements of railroad time-tables. The Orchestra was never in better form at any local concert, and the programme proved an exceptionally attractive one. As read by Mr. Paur, Brahms loses much of the heavy and, seemingly, obscure, purposeless and labored characteristics that have come to be associated with his symphonies in the minds of many concert attendants. His fourth (E minor) symphony, which headed the programme last night, contains a great deal of music which, in either tonal or formal beauty (though he has taken many liberties with the canonical forms), will compare favorably with any of the modern productions of its class. It was splendidly played throughout, and, if it aroused little enthusiasm at any point, there was seldom lack of interest. The symphony was followed by the No. 3 (B minor) violin concerto of Saint Saens, which presented for the first time here Eugene Ysaye, the Belgian violinist, as soloist, and served at once to verify the extremely flattering praises that had preceded him. For superb bowing, exquisite phasing, beauty of tone and a technique that is simply perfect he has had few equals here and still fewer superiors. At the close of the concerto, between whose divisions he had been enthusiastically applauded, Ysaye was called out four or five times, Mr. Paur and his first violinists leading in the demonstrations. He also played Max Bruch's Scotch fantasi ewith the same easy mastery, combined with sensibility and grace. There were some passages in the finale where he lacked freedom of bowing to an extent that suggested fatigue on his part, but this impression was speedily dissipated by the brilliant way in which he gave the telling strokes at the end. One word, though often misapplied, best sums up Mr. Ysaye—he is great; a musician as well as a virtuoso.

Besides the orchestral work in the two violin works the orchestra was heard in the ballet and entr'act music from Schubert's "Rosamunde," given with delightful delicacy and finish, and the "Paris Carnival" of Svensden, which brought the most enjoyable concert to a close.

The Times

TWELVE PAGES

PHILADELPHIA, DECEMBER 4, 1894.

Academy of Music.

To say that the playing of Eugene Ysaye, who was the soloist at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert at the Academy of Music, came as one of the greatest artistic surprises Philadelphia has ever had would be to use mild terms. The man is one of the great musicians; one of the great men. There can be no question of this. Such a violinist is scarcely within the recollection of anyone living. This may sound like exaggeration, but it is not. To attempt to criticise his art would be impertinence. It has the comprehensiveness of genius. It has strength, tenderness, poetry, romance, fire, sympathy, everything, down to the physical ability to play magical tricks with the instrument which is so often a concomitant of great poetic mastery over it. And he is to the sight what he is to the ear—no one could better typify the calm strength of genius. He looks like Beethoven. It is difficult to speak of his first appearance last night with moderation—most difficult. There can be only one regret, that he was not heard at all in classical music, his selections being both modern, the Saint-Saens concerto and a Scotch fantasie by Bruch. Space is only left to mention the always admirable playing of the orchestra, the chief selection being a new Brahms symphony, No. 4, E minor. The house was crowded and greatly stirred by enthusiasm.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCVI., NO. 160.

FRIDAY, DEC. 7, 1894.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Its Second Concert of the Season at the New York Metropolitan Opera House.

(Special Dispatch to the Boston Herald.)

NEW YORK, Dec. 6, 1894. At the Metropolitan Opera House the Boston Symphony orchestra this evening gave its second concert of the season.

Beethoven's seventh symphony, the adagio from Bruch's D minor (not C minor concerto, as the handbill stated), and a movement from Paganini's D major concerto, the overture to "The Bartered Bride," the first "Arlesienne" suite by Bizet, and Liszt's "Les Preludes" were the compositions that made up the programme.

The most notable feature of the evening was the exquisite overture by the Bohemian composer, and the phenomenal performance, technically, of the Paganini music by Caesar Thomson. The artist impressed the laymen quite as much as he did the connoisseurs, and a scene of genuine enthusiasm rewarded him for his truly masterly work.

Herr Paur succeeded in catching the spirit of the music. It was played, moreover, with prodigious velocity, and yet with perfect clearness. Here, if anywhere, lay the strength of the orchestral portion of the evening's entertainment.

[59]

The Philadelphia Press

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 4, 1894.

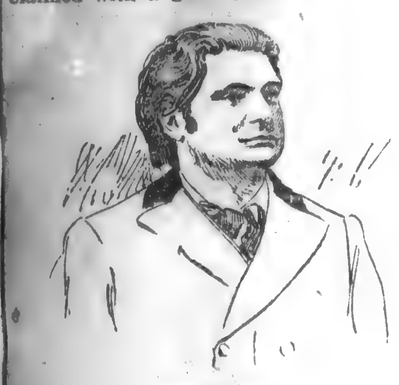
A NEW TALE OF A TUB.

M. Ysaye, the Great Violinist, Talks Music in His Bath.

The rather cynical axiom that "no man is a hero to his valet" may be proven the rule by its occasional exceptions. Eugene Ysaye, the Belgian violinist, one of the greatest of musical artists, is a most impressive and admirable figure when receiving the plaudits of thousands of enthusiastic admirers. That he could still retain his dignity while giving his views on various musical topics from the splashing depths of a bath-tub at the Stratford yesterday afternoon, and under such trying circumstances remain thoroughly companionable and entertaining is proof that all proverbs go astray once in awhile. When a "Press" reporter called the great Virtuoso had just disappeared in his bath room, and from behind closed doors there came the noise of prodigious splashing and blowing, as though an aquarium had gone utterly mad and the biggest fish of all was the storm center of disturbance.

"I wish to ask some questions of M. Ysaye," said the reporter to his manager, who held the fort. A hail through a crack in the door and a deep voice gurgled noisily, "Come in." The door was opened and M. Ysaye was revealed, as only a massive head and sturdy shoulders towering from a small but turbulent sea. His mane of black hair glistened with wetness and was tumbled about his eyes in a way that would have astonished one of his great audiences or any of the numerous "crowned heads" before whom he has appeared.

"There! you have caught me," he exclaimed with a great jolly laugh. "But



Eugene Ysaye.

I am very glad to come to Philadelphia, even if I am seen by the first person I meet in most undignified pose. Do you know that your Academy of Music is said to have the finest acoustics of any—what do you call it—auditorium?—in the world. I heard this in Europe. Sarasate told me that your Academy was the most perfect hall to play in anywhere. Paderewski said the same. Perhaps it was a happy accident. I don't know."

Just as his impression of American audiences was asked, M. Ysaye went completely under for a final plunge, and the interviewer retired to the sitting room, where the violinist presently joined him wrapped in a dressing gown of gorgeous hues.

"Ah, the public, you say? The New York audiences made a charming impression on me. There was about the people such an air of intelligence. There was no lack of close attention, there was no talking, and no applause until the end of the movements. Now such a lovely work as Dvorak's symphony would have been interrupted a dozen times in France with a handclap, or a stupid "Bravo," or someone saying, "Que c'est beau," or something or other all the time. My New York and Boston audiences not only exhibited a strong love for music itself, but equal admiration for the composer. You cannot understand how quickly you feel that the public is en rapport with you. You feel in the course of your solo that your intuition, your idea, your emotion, has been felt and understood and you are buoyantly happy. I have followed with great interest the musical progress which Americans have achieved in recent years. What I know of their efforts in that direction bids me to believe that they are already far ahead of Englishmen, who seem to remain in statu quo. Why? Wagnerian lectures originated in this country, and there are hardly more accomplished musical critics in the world than are to be found in America."

M. Ysaye recalls Rubinstein in appearance in many ways. There is the same leonine head, the same suggestion of resolute vigor, and of innate power. His figure is tall and massive, with square, stalwart shoulders and a broad chest. The chin is strong, the jaw square, and the mouth firm and finely cut. His eyes are large, deep set, and wonderfully expressive, and he could be taken at once for the intelligent and sensitive artist without the mass of long dark hair that sweeps back from his brow.

YSAYE AT THE ACADEMY.

Second Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—Large Audience Present.

In the second Boston Symphony concert last evening at the Academy of Music, Philadelphia, had its first opportunity of hearing one of the greatest living violinists, M. Eugene Ysaye, who, it is needless to say, fulfilled all expectations that anticipatory eulogies had raised as to the man and his art. The programme was also about one of the best digested bits that Director Pau has given us and will serve to increase his hold on his audiences here, which has not been that of his predecessors. The programme ran as follows:—

Symphony No. 4 in E. minor, Op. 98, ... Brahms
Concerts for the violin..... Saint-Saens
Ballet movement and Entr'Acte from "Rosamunde"..... Schubert
Scotch Fantaise for the violin.... Bruch
Carnival in Paris..... Svendsen

The Academy was crowded and while the beauty of the Brahms symphony seemed to be fully appreciated, it was evident that the interest was in the artist. On first appearance, such is his physical qualities it does not seem possible that such a ponderous personage could have the extreme lightness, delicacy and grace which are his, almost suggesting the maiden, combined with a perfect purity of tone and backed by a technique which has no tricks in it. His calmness of manner and the way in which he made it evident, though without affectation, that he and the violin were one and one, showed an artist whose personality and art were evenly balanced, each occupying its proper the fourth symphony of Brahms, with which the concert opened, is in construction the most masterly of Brahms' symphonies, and, although the austere and almost ascetic quality of the work renders popular appreciation slow, it was well received last night, and the audience was certainly moved by its finer passages. The second movement (andante moderato) is one of the most romantic and original creations. It is like Schubert, but more powerfully wrought, and the whole symphony attains a high intellectual level. In the third and fourth movements it contains wide departures from the classic symphony from and opens a wide trail for modern composers to follow. Director Pau's rendering was not a first-class performance for his orchestra. In the first movement the bass was at times blurred. The second movement was, however, most thoughtfully and beautifully rendered. It is very lovely and brought out much applause. In the fourth movement the bass was a little harsh, and the total effect seemed wanting in full life. Such performances, however, will prove to the public that Brahms, as is the fact, is the greatest symphonist since Beethoven.

In the concerts for the violin Ysaye had full opportunity to exploit his genius and whether it was his bowing, or his sureness of tone, or his exceeding grace of touch, or a combination of all those qualities that go to make up the great artist, the result was a profound impression on everyone. The second movement, however, was unquestionably the favorite. And as the violinist finished on a high note of exquisite purity, that, as he slowly drew his bow with perfect power, seemed to get thinner and purer and purer and thinner, growing beautifully less, the effect was wonderful. It was as sweet and lovely as some soaring lark drawing away into the distant blue. Not only did Ysaye receive much applause on his entrance, but he was called out again and again by the delighted audience, and to the plaudits he bowed gravely unruffled. The "Rosamunde" selection was perfectly played by the orchestra, especially the andantino. After this again came Ysaye, and the expectation raised by his first performance was fully maintained in the five parts of the Scotch fantasie. The adagio showed his sympathetic qualities in the highest degree and in the scherzo the same birdlike qualities of tone again sounded and sang themselves, while the power of his deeper notes, like the cello's, was shown in the andante. The warlike finale was very spirited, and as the great soloist of the evening left the stage the applause showed the triumph of his art. The concert concluded with the showy hit, Svendsen's "Carnival of Paris," which was well rendered by the orchestra. Ysaye is unquestionably a most attractive artist, albeit he is not passionate, not Byronic, perhaps, but rather subtle and Wordsworthian.

Philadelphia Inquirer

TWELVE PAGES.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 4, 1894.

YSAYE A GREAT ARTIST.

First Appearance of the Belgian Violinist in This City Last Night.

The second concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last night was made memorable by the first appearance of Mr. Eugene Ysaye, the Belgian violinist, of whom much has been heard abroad of recent years, but who is almost a stranger in the Western world. His few appearances elsewhere have evoked the highest praise and it must be admitted that none of these statements were extravagant. Mr. Ysaye is a great artist—one of the greatest violinists of the age. He belongs to that highest circle of artists who are preferred one above the other merely according to one's taste. Ysaye has that indispensable medium of an artist—a perfect technique. Nothing is difficult to him. The most complex fingering gives him not the slightest trouble.

In technique alone he is beyond criticism, but that alone does not make an artist. He has more. A look at the man is some slight indication of his work. He is a large, heavy man, with a smooth face, a heavy jaw and long black hair. The upper part of his face is not impressive, but his whole manner is. From the first one can see that he is a serious artist, with perfect command of his instrument, poetic in sentiment, modest in demeanor and utterly undemonstrative in his methods. There is not the slightest attempt to display himself. He is solely wrapped up in his art.

When he has played but a few bars one sees that here is a master. There is not the least slurring. His tone is large, his intonation is magnificent, and in every way he marks the full stature of the great artist. No one in this generation has given such a singing quality to violin music. He reminds one in this respect of Paderewski at the piano. There is warmth and feeling in every note, and in every note he shows his individuality. One is constantly impressed with his seriousness. His art is to him no idle thing. It is to be revered. It is above the place of earthly things and is to him the language of a higher existence. Certainly a more poetic violinist has not been heard here. He played Saint Saens' concerto admirably. The orchestration was delightful, just filling in a background for the artist.

In his piano passages, although the tones were barely audible, they were clean cut but soft as snowflakes. He played afterwards Bruch's Scotch fantasie, which was simply a delirium of delight. The audience was one of the largest ever at a symphony concert in this city, and was wildly enthusiastic. We shall want to hear more from this new artist.

The orchestra played Brahms' symphony in E minor No. 4; Schubert's ballet and entr'act from "Rosamunde," and Svendsen's Carnival in Paris—all most acceptably.

The North American

PHILADELPHIA, PA.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 4, 1894.

MUSIC AT THE ACADEMY.

Second Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Last Evening.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Emil Paur, gave its second concert for the season at the Academy of Music last evening, in the presence of the crowded and brilliant audience which its appearance never fails to attract. It was heard in Brahm's complicated symphony No. 4, in E minor, op. 98, in the delicious ballet and entracte music of Schubert's "Rosamunde," and in a wild, wierd and wearisome composition by Johan Svendsen, entitled "Carnival in Paris," in all of which numbers it played with its wonted brilliancy, delicacy and impeccability, and with something more than its usual breadth and vigor. The audience enjoyed its performance greatly, and applauded it with well-merited warmth; but after all, the feature of the occasion was the first appearance in Philadelphia of Eugene Ysaye, the distinguished Belgian violinist, the cordiality of whose reception bespoke the eager and agreeable anticipations with which his playing was awaited. Mr. Ysaye is a tall, massively built man, of dark complexion, with long, coal black hair, and a leonine cast of countenance. His demeanor, though entirely unassuming, is suggestive of confidence, and his whole presence conveys, in an indescribable but unmistakable manner a sense of power. There was a moment or two of delay as he tuned his instrument, affected by the temperature of the auditorium, and then the orchestra began to play the tremolando opening bars of Saint-Saen's Concerto No. 3 in B minor, op. 61, and presently the solo violin was heard announcing in its lowest register the theme of the allegro movement. From that moment until the close of the concerto M. Ysaye was listened to with rapt attention, only suspended when opportunity offered by outbursts of applause, and at the conclusion of the number he was called repeatedly before the curtain, and urged by people whose pleasure had rendered them inconsiderate to play something more. This he very properly, in view of the exacting and exhausting character of the composition which he had just finished, declined to do, but he was heard later on in Max Bruch's beautiful and imaginative, but immensely difficult "Scotch Fantasy" and by his performance thereof deepened and confirmed the first impression. There can be no question of M. Ysaye's standing. He is an artist of the first rank, and one of the three or four very great violinists of the day. From players of his importance brilliant technique is expected as a matter of course, and M. Ysaye has it to perfection. His intonation is faultless, the purity of his tone is quite extraordinary, while his mastery over the mysteries of staccato bowing, double stopping, etc., appears to be absolute. Yet it is not by his technique that he makes his impression. It is by the poetry, by the delicacy, by the beauty, by the irresistible emotional eloquence of his playing. With his violin he speaks to the heart with an utterance so full of power, of passion and of charm that sometimes fascinating, sometimes melting, sometimes inspiriting, it is always convincing and impressive. It was a great pleasure to hear him; it will be a still greater pleasure to hear him again.

Bizet's "Carmen" will be sung at the Academy to-night by the company of the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, and with a cast comprising Rastinano Ancona, Lucille Hill and Zelie de Lussan. The Pennsylvania Railroad Company announces that it will hold suburban trains until fifteen minutes after the performance.

THE RECORD.

Philadelphia, December 4, 1894.

Ysaye and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the second concert of the season last evening at the Academy of Music. Mr. Emil Paur again wielded the baton, and the more this skilled and talented leader is studied the higher is the appreciation that is awakened by his methods. The special feature of the programme last evening was undoubtedly the brilliant violin playing of the Belgian soloist, Eugene Ysaye, who more than realized the enthusiastic reports that had preceded him. He is certainly a master of the violin. His technical equipment is marked by an accuracy that is almost perfection, while he infuses into his work an expressive feeling and emotional action peculiarly his own. His tonal strength is, perhaps, not so conspicuous as that of other great violinists heard here, but none has excelled him in true delicacy of expression and in exquisite modulations. He carried the house by storm last night. He was really magnificent in the well-known Saint-Saens concerto, while in the three movements of Bruch's "Scotch Fantasie" his versatility and sustained certainty of touch were admirably displayed. Ysaye's memory is a remarkable one, and at no time did he betray the slightest need of guiding notes. The orchestra itself was heard at its best in Brahm's Symphony No. 4, and in the ballet movement and entr' acte from Schubert's "Rosamunde." Conductor Paur had his players completely in sympathy with the intentions of the composers, and rarely have these two works been accorded a finer interpretation.

PUBLIC LEDGER

Philadelphia, Tuesday, December 4, 1894.

Academy of Music—Boston Symphony Orchestra and a Great Soloist.

The Boston Orchestra last night, at the Academy of Music, had a packed house, which thinned out quite perceptibly before the close, not through satiety with the abundant musical treat prepared by Conductor Emil Paur, but because of the inexorable requirements of railroad time-tables. The Orchestra was never in better form at any local concert, and the programme proved an exceptionally attractive one. As read by Mr. Paur, Brahms loses much of the heavy and, seemingly, obscure, purposeless and labored characteristics that have come to be associated with his symphonies in the minds of many concert attendants. His fourth (E minor) symphony, which headed the programme last night, contains a great deal of music which, in either tonal or formal beauty (though he has taken many liberties with the canonical forms), will compare favorably with any of the modern productions of its class. It was splendidly played throughout, and, if it aroused little enthusiasm at any point, there was seldom lack of interest. The symphony was followed by the No. 3 (B minor) violin concerto of Saint Saens, which presented for the first time here Eugene Ysaye, the Belgian violinist, as soloist, and served at once to verify the extremely flattering praises that had preceded him. For superb bowing, exquisite phasing, beauty of tone and a technique that is simply perfect he has had few equals here and still fewer superiors. At the close of the concerto, between whose divisions he had been enthusiastically applauded, Ysaye was called out four or five times, Mr. Paur and his first violinists leading in the demonstrations. He also played Max Bruch's Scotch fantasi ewith the same easy mastery, combined with sensibility and grace. There were some passages in the finale where he lacked freedom of bowing to an extent that suggested fatigue on his part, but this impression was speedily dissipated by the brilliant way in which he gave the telling strokes at the end. One word, though often misapplied, best sums up Mr. Ysaye—he is great; a musician as well as a virtuoso.

Besides the orchestral work in the two violin works the orchestra was heard in the ballet and entr'act music from Schubert's "Rosamunde," given with delightful delicacy and finish, and the "Paris Carnival" of Svensden, which brought the most enjoyable concert to a close.

The Times

TWELVE PAGES

PHILADELPHIA, DECEMBER 4, 1894.

Academy of Music.

To say that the playing of Eugene Ysaye, who was the soloist at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert at the Academy of Music, came as one of the greatest artistic surprises Philadelphia has ever had would be to use mild terms. The man is one of the great musicians; one of the great men. There can be no question of this. Such a violinist is scarcely within the recollection of anyone living. This may sound like exaggeration, but it is not. To attempt to criticise his art would be impertinence. It has the comprehensiveness of genius. It has strength, tenderness, poetry, romance, fire, sympathy, everything, down to the physical ability to play magical tricks with the instrument which is so often a concomitant of great poetic mastery over it. And he is to the sight what he is to the ear—no one could better typify the calm strength of genius. He looks like Beethoven. It is difficult to speak of his first appearance last night with moderation—most difficult. There can be only one regret, that he was not heard at all in classical music, his selections being both modern, the Saint-Saens concerto and a Scotch fantasie by Bruch. Space is only left to mention the always admirable playing of the orchestra, the chief selection being a new Brahms symphony, No. 4, E minor. The house was crowded and greatly stirred by enthusiasm.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCVI., NO. 160.

FRIDAY, DEC. 7, 1894.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Its Second Concert of the Season at the New York Metropolitan Opera House.

(Special Dispatch to the Boston Herald.)

NEW YORK, Dec. 6, 1894. At the Metropolitan Opera House the Boston Symphony orchestra this evening gave its second concert of the season.

Beethoven's seventh symphony, the adagio from Bruch's D minor (not C minor concerto, as the handbill stated), and a movement from Paganini's D major concerto, the overture to "The Bartered Bride," the first "Arlesienne" suite by Bizet, and Liszt's "Les Preludes" were the compositions that made up the programme.

The most notable feature of the evening was the exquisite overture by the Bohemian composer, and the phenomenal performance, tecnnically, of the Paganini music by Caesar Thomson. The artist impressed the laymen quite as much as he did the connoisseurs, and a scene of genuine enthusiasm rewarded him for his truly masterly work.

Herr Paur succeeded in catching the spirit of the music. It was played, moreover, with prodigious velocity, and yet with perfect clearness. Here, if anywhere, lay the strength of the orchestral portion of the evening's entertainment.

[59]

The Washington Post

Wednesday, December 5, 1894.

PLEASED A LARGE AUDIENCE.

Second Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Metzerott's.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra drew the customary large and appreciative audience to Metzerott Music Hall last evening. Other attractions come and go and prosper or fail to pay expenses, as the case may be, but Conductor Paur has at his beck and call the best musical taste of Washington always.

The programme last evening was complete and well balanced, beginning with the rather heavy Brahms' concerto No. 4 in E minor, and concluding with Svendsen's spirited "Carnival in Paris," which sent the listeners away with ears ringing and blood tingling. Between these two extremes were Franz Schubert's dainty ballet movement and entr'acte from "Rosamunde," and "L'Arlesienne" orchestral suite, No. 1, of Georges Bizet. The latter was probably the popular favorite of the orchestral programme.

While not so well known, and possibly not so well liked as the second suite of the same name, this No. 1 is a masterpiece worthy of the composer of "Carmen." In it he proves his complete mastery, not only of the wild Spanish melodies, but of all the resources of the orchestra. Some of its effects are almost bizarre; the prelude combines the strings, horns, and lower wood instruments in an excellent imitation of trumpets, which introduce a sprightly march movement. The minuetto is a most graceful movement, and the adagietto is charming, but the closing carillon—in which horns imitate perfectly the chime of bells—is splendid.

The soloist of the evening was Cesar Thompson, the Belgian violinist. As one lady listener remarked, he looks like du Maurier's portrait of Svengali in "Trilby," and plays like an angel. While he cannot be accounted a truly great violinist, being deficient in those qualities, which go to make up the antithesis of angelic music, he is a master of tone, and his playing is uniformly smooth and finished to a fault. Accordingly, he appeared to better advantage in Bruch's Adagio, where tones and smooth playing tell, than in Paginini's D major Concerto, which, in spite of his finish, was rather tame in passages, which should have been fiery. Nevertheless, he won an encore, in response to which he gave an exhibition of double-stop playing, which was pretty nearly perfect.

Baltimore American

AND COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER

ONE HUNDRED AND TWENTY YEARS OLD, AND THE OLDEST DAILY NEWSPAPER IN AMERICA.

"WE BUILD."

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 6, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Fine Performance at the New Music Hall—The Violinist.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the second concert of its series at the new Music Hall last evening, with M. Cesar Thomson, the Belgian violinist, as soloist. The audience was very large and brilliant, although not a repetition of the first, the inaugural one. It was, however, a very enthusiastic and fashionable assemblage, for these concerts have come to be regarded as great society events, and the social, as well as the musical, world turn out in large numbers. The size of the audiences shows what a blessing to concert-goers the new Music Hall is. For the past few seasons the management of this orchestra has been compelled, for lack of a concert hall, to give their concerts in one of the theaters in the afternoon, naturally thereby depriving many who were engaged during the day of these musical treats.

The program was very well arranged, being a great improvement on their first concert in this respect, and comprised the seventh symphony, the Pastoral in A major of Beethoven, the Adagio from the first Bruch concerto in G minor, and the Paganini concerto in D major for violin solo, the overture to the "Verkaufte Braut" of Smetana, a novelty to Baltimore, "L'Arlisienne" orchestral suite of Bizet, and the symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," of Liszt.

The symphony was given with an immense amount of vigor and spirit, especially in the last movement, and showed the precision and attention in detail which characterize Mr. Paur as a leader. The orchestra was in fine form, and during the entire program fully sustained its deserved reputation as one of the great orchestras of the world.

The Smetana overture, which is a novelty of the season to the public, was written in 1866, and now, ten years after its composer's death, the opera is beginning to claim the recognition due to its freshness and beauty, of which the overture contains no small share. The Bizet suite is familiar, and was charming in its graceful tunefulness. "The Preludes," the symphonic poem, with which the concert closed, showed Liszt in one of his finest moods as a composer, and full justice was done to the beautiful composition.

M. Cesar Thomson, who is acknowledged to be one of the greatest living violinists, and esteemed worthy to rank with the great virtuosi of the kingly instrument, was born at Liege, the birthplace of so many famous violinists, in 1857. He studied at the conservatory at Liege, and received the gold medal there when only eleven. Afterwards he studied with such renowned masters as Vieuxtemps, Wieniawski, Leonard and Massart. His early tours through Italy and Spain were crowned with phenomenal success, comparable only to the greatest masters. His appearance at Vienna, Berlin, Paris and London created a furor equal to that of Paganini. So dazzling is his technique, so fascinating his delicious tone, that many have likened M. Thomson to the great wizard of the violin, Paganini. With natural gifts of the highest, schooled and developed under the most exacting masters and before the most critical audiences in the world, and dominated by an exalted conception, M. Thomson's playing charms both critic and amateur. Coming, as he does, in the full glory of his powers, his success in this country has been most convincing. Whether he plays Paganini, Ernst or compositions of the modern school, he is incomparable, and in such works as the Beethoven concerts he is colossal. Such breadth, such nobility, such power! All these leave the critic without an opportunity to criticize, and compel him to join the applauding throng. M. Cesar Thomson has nobly striven for and nobly won a high place in our esteem. His two numbers last night were magnificently played, and although recalled eight times, he persisted in his refusal to grant an encore.

THE BALTIMORE NEWS.

PUBLISHED BY THE EVENING NEWS PUBLISHING COMPANY OF BALTIMORE CITY. Office, No. 201 East Baltimore Street.

CHAS. H. GRASTY, President. DOUGLAS H. GORDON, Secretary-Treasurer.

WEDNESDAY EVENING, DEC. 5, 1894.

CESAR THOMSON HERE.

THE GREAT VIOLINIST TO APPEAR AT MUSIC HALL.

He Will Be the Soloist at the Second Concert of the Boston Symphony Company's Orchestra to Be Given This Evening—Plays With Two Violins, Likes Yachting and Is Free From Mannerisms—What Ysaye Thinks of Him.

The Caesars were a noted family and Cesar Thomson keeps up the family reputation even if his name is not spelled quite the same. He is the great violinist, who will appear at Music Hall tonight as the soloist with the Boston Symphony Company's orchestra, in the second of the series of concerts it is to give in Baltimore this winter. The first will be remembered as the magnificent success of the formal opening of Music Hall.

Cesar Thomson is at the Rennert in Room 16, where he entertained his friends

Cesar Thomson, Violinist.

this morning. Some of them were the distinguished foreign artists in the Symphony Company's orchestra with the unpronounceable names. Herr C. M. Loeffler wanted to see the great violinist, and Herr Loeffler was admitted to an audience, for he is one of Cesar Thomson's best friends. Then there were the Adamowskis, who also craved the companionship of the celebrated artist, and sent in all of their name that would indicate our first parents stepped out of the Garden of Eden into Hungary, and started a generation of musicians.

Cesar Thomson is a most interesting artist. He has as supreme a way of conquering audiences as old Julius Caesar had of conquering nations. In Italy, when Cesar Thomson played, the audiences stood up, waved their hats and shouted. They did more. After the performance they carried Cesar Thomson out on their shoulders to his carriage and then pulled the carriage to his residence. This has been done so many times it is something of a chestnut with Cesar Thomson and he speaks of it lightly, as if it were just a little thing to be admired so much and hardly a matter worth mentioning.

His Two Violins.

The violinist is in his best form today. His fingers are as supple as can be and his violins are of exquisite tone. When Cesar Thomson achieves his great triumphs he uses two violins. The first piece he will play tonight will be an adagio, by Max Bruch, from Concerto No. 1, in G minor, op. 26. This number has made good its place in the foremost rank of modern violin concertos. The second movement is a beautiful romanza, in which the solo violin occupies the foreground almost throughout. Its second phrase has become especially famous.

Cesar Thomson will play it with a Stradivarius violin, which is his finest instrument. A Stradivarius violin is valued at anywhere from $5000 to $10,000, and Cesar Thomson's is one of the best of its kind.

In the second number a concerto in D major from Paganini, Cesar Thomson will lay aside his Stradivarius and take up his Seraphini, also an instrument of great value. When he draws a bow across it the Seraphini rivals the seraphs.

Third Finger of the Left Hand.

The musicians regard Cesar Thomson highly. Ysaye, the great violinist, who will soon appear at Music Hall, recently said of Thomson:

"He is to me as the third finger of my left hand."

Now, it is well known that to a violinist nothing can be more precious than the third finger of the left hand, without which it would be impossible to give great performances on the violin. It is a sort of apple-of-the-eye with violinists, and when Ysaye gave utterance to the words it was his queer Belgian way of telling how much he thought of Cesar Thomson.

Mr. Thompson's appearance betokens the artist. A high forehead, deep, soulful eyes; thin, nervous hands, all characteristics of a man who lives a life in which aestheticism plays an important part. He is free from mannerisms and affectations.

Referring to the comparative appreciation of European audiences Mr. Thompson said that he had found those of Vienna particularly responsive. He plays a great deal in Germany and Austria and in London. His visits to Paris have been frequent. He agrees with most virtuosi that solo artists, whose work is more of a subjective quality, do not there receive a full measure of approval.

Mr. Thompson is an enthusiast on yachting. He devours all that is written on the subject, and in his home, in Liege, he has gathered a collection of models which in its completeness illustrates the history of yachting.

Orchestra and Programme.

The Symphony Company's orchestra is in excellent condition. All the men feel well and the instruments are in good tone. Conductor Emil Paur is at his best. The orchestra is making the trip under the management of Mr. Frederick Comee, the regular assistant manager, who takes the place of Manager C. A. Ellis, unavoidably absent. Manager Comee spent this morning with Manager Nolan of Music Hall and perfected all the details for tonight's performance.

The orchestra arrived in Baltimore yesterday morning. It held a rehearsal at Music Hall at noon. In the evening it went over to Washington and gave a concert in Metzerott's Music Hall. After the concert it returned to Baltimore, arriving here at 11.30 o'clock. Its headquarters are at the Carrollton Hotel.

The full number of 87 pieces will appear on the stage tonight. The following programme will be given:

Ludwig van Beethoven.....
....Symphony No. 7, in A major, Op. 92
Soli for Violin (a.) Bruch. Adagio from Concerto No. 1, in G minor, Op. 26 (b.) Paganini.....Concerto in D major Bedrich Smetana.....
.....Overture, "Die Verkaufte Braut"
Georges Bizet.....
.."L'Arlesienne," Orchestral Suite No. 1
Franz Liszt.....
.....Symphonic Poem, "Les Preludes"

THE SUN.

BALTIMORE, THURSDAY, DEC. 6, 1894.

A MASTER OF THE VIOLIN.

Cesar Thompson, the Belgian, Scores a Great Triumph.

HIS PERFORMANCE AT MUSIC HALL.

Recalled Again and Again by the Audience—A Notable Concert Given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra—Gossip of Music and Musicians.

A great violinist is Cesar Thompson, the Belgian.

His success at Music Hall last night with the Boston Symphony Orchestra was won by pure merit and not by any tricky methods or popular reputation.

Until the present season this violinist was comparatively unknown in America, though he has long been accounted a great virtuoso in the European musical world. His coming, a few weeks ago, was heralded by complications with managers and impressarios, in which a lawsuit was threatened. Notwithstanding this uncomfortable entry Thompson soon made his own personality so strongly felt that his short stay in this country has already taken on the character of a musical triumph and a significant artistic event.

The influx of foreign violin virtuosi has been sufficiently large in recent years to enable Americans to hear nearly all the notable players of the time, and of these Thompson may easily be accounted one of the foremost. He has been called a second Paganini, but this does not seem an apt comparison, for Thompson belongs to a totally different school from that of Paganini, according to the idea that the present generation has formed by hearsay of the most remarkable of violinists.

While in point of technique the Paganini comparison may be apt, in general methods Thompson belongs not in the ranks of the eccentric violinists, but to that pure and classic school in which the instrument is used as a medium for the music and not the music as a medium for showing off the player's command of the resources of the instrument and for exciting astonishment in the hearer. This does not imply that Thompson is not a virtuoso in his technical mastery of the violin, but that in him the virtuoso does not seem uppermost. There is in his playing as well as his manner something that suggests the humility of genius, and almost from the first the auditor instinctively realizes that here is a man whose reverence for music in the abstract is greater than his love of popular plaudits.

In all that Thompson did last night there was evidence of mind. The simplicity of style, the refinement of phrasing, the variety of tone, all bespeak the scholar.

In detail his style may be briefly characterized as follows: A broad, large and sympathetic tone, as pure and clear in long-sustained passage as in crisp staccato; a technique in which little seems left to conquer; marvelous octave and double stopping; the most exquisitely fluent scales and arpeggios, and, withal, nothing overdone and no apparent effort, but perfect repose and dignity.

Thompson's numbers included the adagio, from Bruch's first concerto, in G minor, and Paganini's concerto, in D major.

At the close the large audience recalled the violinist again and again to the stage, but without success in eliciting an encore.

The concert was by long odds the best of the two given here thus far this season by the Boston Orchestra. While the first concert, which marked also the opening of Baltimore's new music hall was suitable to the occasion, and probably of greater popular interest than the second, it lacked the artistic unity of last night's programme.

Emil Paur was unusually strong in his work. The man himself may be lacking in magnetism of manner, but he is musically far from unimpressive. It is true that his gestures, while leading, are uncompromisingly awkward and ungainly, and his jerky motions prove really detrimental to the enjoyment of many of his auditors, but if the music be listened to for itself and without thought of the baton, then the thorough methods of the leader, his care in attending to the details and his general strength become patent.

Paur got splendid work out of his orchestra in the Beethoven A major symphony, that great creation of the master which holds the mind and heart in rapt enjoyment of the delights of noble melody and harmony and of entrancing rhythm.

An overture, "Die Ver Kaufte Brant," introduced to the audience the interesting dramatic work of the Slavonic composer, Bedrich Smetana.

In the orchestral suite, "L'Arlesienne," some charming music by Bizet was heard.

Liszt's massive "Les Preludes" made a vigorous finale to the programme, and was given with powerful breadth of tone.

THE MORNING [illegible]

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 6.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The New Belgian Violin Virtuoso Thomsen Makes His Bow.

Heralded as one of the greatest violinists of the age, Cesar Thomsen, the Belgian virtuoso, made his bow to a Baltimore audience in the new Music Hall last night, the soloist of the second Boston Symphony Orchestra concert of the season.

Few foreign artists have been more extensively advertised. Thomsen, on his advent to these shores, had the good fortune to be made the subject of a controversy between two American managers, and this has brought him much to the notice of the music world. His coming to this city has been eagerly looked forward to, but it must be said that after his performance last night there remains a certain feeling of disappointment.

With his jet black hair and beard and ever evident composure, Thomsen has hardly the appearance of a great artist, yet before the evening was over he showed himself to be a master of the instrument. He has neither the warmth of Sarasate nor the breadth of a Wilcez, but in technique and clear conception he is the peer of either. He could not have made a better selection for an exhibition of facility of fingering than the Paganini concerto in D major. The only thing to mar the successful performance of this number was an occasional thinness of tone and perceptible soldiering in bravura passages.

It is in the delicacy of touch and thorough control of organ effects that Thomsen attracts the most. Every tone is brought forth in exact rhythm, and with a precision that is as clear as a bell. He does not unnecessarily resort to harmonic effects when the extreme up perpositions are reached, while in the double-stop movements each string is made to sing out independently and in true tone. The only faulty work was in several rapid runs, when notes were either too lightly touched or skipped altogether.

To a brilliant climax, however, was the concert brought in the rendition of the concluding cadenza. It was this movement probably that earned for the composer his title of "Devil" and gave to Terschuk the idea of embodying the theme in his somnambula transcription as the "Teufel's Cadenza." The virtuoso more than did justice to the extreme difficulties of this movement, overcoming them all with apparent ease and splendid finish.

His first number was the Adagio from Concerto No. 1, in G minor, by Max. Bruch, and only the lack of the proper warmth prevented this from being a master effort. Thomsen has plenty of technique, but not enough depth of soul, and this marred the trill effects to a great degree. The virtuoso was enthusiastically recalled at the conclusion of his performance.

The orchestral numbers rendered were far superior to those given at the first concert, and, with the exception of the Beethoven symphony, were rendered in that brilliant manner for which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is noted. When Director Pauer signaled for the opening number, Beethoven's A major symphony No. 7, the orchestra seemed to respond in a listless manner. The tone coloring in the first movement was blunted by the ineffectual efforts of the oboe to reach the high notes, and the instrumentalists did not seem to awake until the boisterous finale was reached.

Far different was the performance of Smetana's overture "The Sold Bride." This novelty was highly appreciated by the splendid audience. Those present who heard Seidl's Orchestra produce Dvorak's symphony "From the New World" were anxious to hear something from the pen of the man who was his teacher. The work is distinctively Slavish and hardly justifies the assertion that the man who wrote it made an attempt to Germanize Czech music. The only evidence of his admiration for Wagner was in the motif that reached for heavy harmony. The other orchestral numbers were the "L'Arlesienne," an orchestral suite by Bizet, and Liszt's symphonic poem "Les Preludes." The latter was well rendered with the spirit and fire to make it effective.

NEW YORK HERALD.

NEW YORK, FRIDAY, DECEMBER 7, 1894.

SECOND BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

At the Metropolitan Opera House the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening gave its second concert of the season.

Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, the adagio from Bruch's D minor (not G minor concerto, as the handbill stated) and a movement from Paganini's D major concerto, the overture to Smetana's "The Bartered Bride," the first "Arlesienne" suite, by Bizet, and Liszt's "Les Preludes," were the compositions that made up the programme.

Even if the orchestra had displayed its very best form, which it did not, such a programme would have been found wanting in taste. Contrast in such matters is not everything.

The most notable features of the evening were the exquisite overture by the Bohemian composer, and the phenomenal performance, technically, of the Paganini music by Cesar Thomson. Though you would think that the amazingly easy manner in which he played thirds and sixths in the cadenza could be appreciated by professional violinists, only the fact remains that the artist impressed the layman quite as much as he did the connoisseurs, and a scene of genuine enthusiasm rewarded him for his truly masterly work.

The Seventh Symphony of Beethoven has been called the apotheosis of the dance. The finale has suggested to some the dance of the corybantes around Jupiter's cradle, while more prosaic people have looked upon it simply as a peasants' dance. Whether it be the one or the other it was much too coarsely played. And "L'Arlesienne," too, lacked both grace and charm.

Herr Paur succeeded, however, in catching the spirit of the Smetana music. It was played, moreover, with prodigious velocity, and yet with perfect clearness. Here, if anywhere, lay the strength of the orchestral portion of last evening's entertainment.

[60]

New-York Daily Tribune.

FOUNDED BY HORACE GREELEY.

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 7, 1894.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Boston Orchestra has seldom offered its friends in New-York a more interesting programme than that of its second concert, given last evening in the Metropolitan Opera House. Nor has the band itself played for a long time here with so much fire or brilliancy. There was a notable gain in the finish and precision of the performance, from a technical point of view, over that of a month ago, and the difference in sonority and body of tone was striking. Perhaps it was the mood of the hour; perhaps Mr. Paur had gauged the difficulties that beset a body of musicians in filling from the stage the great auditorium of the opera house; or perhaps another month of the season's practice accounts for it all. In any event, the concert was one of the most brilliant the winter has yet brought forth in New-York, and gave much evident pleasure to the large audience that heard it. Mr. Paur's reading of the seventh symphony of Beethoven was disclosed as one of the most excellent achievements he has yet put to his credit in this city—virile, yet not without many refinements of feeling, even moments of poetic insight; and, especially in the last movement, of genuine power and authority. It made a deep impression upon the audience, which signified its appreciation in an unmistakable manner. In Smetana's charming comic overture to "The Bartered Bride" the strings displayed their old-time virtuososhIp in a fashion that has not latterly been quite so frequent with the Boston Orchestra as in former years. The other orchestral numbers were the first suite arranged from Bizet's exquisite music to "L'Arlésienne" and Liszt's "Les Préludes," the former of which, especially, was played with charming refinement and color.

Mr. César Thomson, who was the solo performer, has not appeared to greater advantage in New-York. He could not increase the respect that he has hitherto commanded for his technical accomplishments; but he did materially increase that felt for the purely artistic side of his playing by the breadth, dignity and nobility of his performance of the adagio from Bruch's G minor concerto. He also played Paganini's concerto in D major with an astonishing mastery of its difficulties.

The World.

Published by the Press Publishing Company, 53 to 63 PARK ROW, New York.

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 7, 1894.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Cesar Thomson, the Violinist, Creates a Sensation by His Marvellous Display of Virtuosity.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second concert for the present season at the Metropolitan Opera-House last evening. The visits of this superior organization of musicians are among the most important events of the winter to all genuine lovers of music.

The audience was large, and, as usual, one essentially intelligent, discriminating and appreciative. These Boston artists may flatter themselves that they possess a clientele representing the very top of the basket of the local dilletanti.

The opening number, Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, which has earned the title of "apotheosis of the dance," was admirably played with agreeable departures from the pedantic and purely conventional interpretation, which to us is the weak side of Mr. Paur's efficiency as a conductor. The composition, which is one more of rhythm than of themes, a glorification and an idealization, poetical and fanciful, of the forms of music, which set the feet of all races to tripping, was given a reading which fully expressed its evident significance. The second movement, with its stately tempo, evoking as it does suggestions of the classic dances of antiquity, was played with a high degree of dignity.

The soloist was Cesar Thomson, the eminent violinist. He played in a manner to completely silence criticism. In the adagio from Max Bruck's first concerto he inverted the beautiful romanza with a grandeur of sentiment that surprised those who had determined that he was merely a master of technique.

His execution in the Paganini concerto created a sensation. Such a display of absolute command of every technical possibility of the instrument has not been listened to in New York in a generation. He turned out scales, trills, glissandos, chromatic and octave runs, passages in thirds and what not with vertiginous rapidity and with such ease and repose of manner that one fairly gasped with surprise. His triumph was a great one and fully deserved.

The New York Recorder.

BY GEORGE W. TURNER.

FRIDAY, December 7, 1894

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

A Beautiful Performance in the Metropolitan Opera House Before a Large Audience of Music Lovers.

The musical men from Boston, with Emil Paur at their head, held forth at length in the Metropolitan Opera House last night, and a large audience thoroughly appreciated their beautiful performance. The Boston Symphony Orchestra's visit is, even in the music-clogged atmosphere of New York, an event to be reverently chronicled.

The programme at the second concert last night was a trifle long, nor was it well made. Beethoven's Seventh Symphony opened the evening, and Liszt's highly colored "Les Preludes" followed. The Bizet suite from Daudet's "L'Arlesienne" seemed hardly to fit in the general scheme, charming music as it is. The Symphony was read in a conservative manner, smoothly and with all due respect to tradition.

Cesar Thomson played an adagio from a Bruch concerto in D minor, and the Paganini concerto in D. He played with marvelous effect and got five or six recalls. He was a living picture of George du Maurier's "Svengali." The suite was delightfully given, the minuetto and its dainty passages for woodwind calls for especial mention. Sinebana's lively and humorous overture, "The Bartered Bride," was played with a finish that can defy competition.

The work of the strings was something to remember. A Mozartean atmosphere enveloped this clever comedy-overture. Mr. Paur did not give us a very brilliant, nor yet sonorous, performance of Liszt's symphonic poem, but it served to close an evening filled with music.

The Hartford Telegram.

HARTFORD, SATURDAY, DEC. 8, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Virtuoso Cesar Thomson Was Warmly Appreciated.

The Boston Symphony orchestra played last evening before a large audience in Foot Guard armory, an audience highly appreciative of the superb performances of this famous organization. In the highest form of music this splendid company of artists easily ranks first. For technique, shading and finish the musicians could not ask more. Beethoven's seventh symphony, a wonderful apotheosis of the dance and one of the most popular of the great master's works, was given a most delicate and masterly rendering, its varied movements calling forth all phases of the orchestra's power. Georges Bizet's first orchestral suite from "L'Arlesienne," Daudet's drama, with its more rollicking style and less severe effect contains some uniquely poetic and beautiful passages.

Cesar Thompson, the virtuoso, one of the finest masters of the violin, exhibited in his two numbers, the adagio, from Bruch's minor concerto and Paganini's D major concerto, many wonderful technical effects together with exquisite purity and accurateness of intonation. His most brilliant passages were played without apparent effort with the highest artistic finish. He was repeatedly encored but would only bow his acknowledgements. Conductor Emil Paur was obliged after each number of the concert to recognize the warm applause given the company. Auber's overture, "Carlo Broschi" closed the program.

The Hartford Times.

Saturday, December 8, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A great audience waited at the armory last night, an audience representing the leading circles of our city. And the occasion fully invited the interest and expectation visible on every face. A Beethoven symphony by one of the choice—if not the choicest—orchestras of the country, and a violinist whose fame is loud in Europe and has been as loudly re-echoed in the metropolis, were to be heard.

A little after 8 the musicians came upon the stage, Mr. Kneisel, the concert master, being loudly applauded as he entered. So was Emil Paur, the director. He mustered his clan with a rapid glance, lifted the baton, and presently the full blast of all the instruments with a high-keyed piano cadence in woods opened the symphony. This is one of the most popular and frequently rendered of Beethoven's works. Thomas has played it repeatedly in this city, but one never hears it without being seized by the power, the dignity, the noble beauty and serious intent of the music. How wonderful is the song of the wood-winds in the opening part, and how irresistibly does the entire orchestra, by gradual advances, possess itself of the theme and carry it storm-like to the most impressive fortissimos! And, once there, how strongly does it resist all attempts to subdue, to calm it down, to dissipate its might in ornamental diversions and lead it to a peaceful finale! And, throughout, what inward joyousness, what gladness of the spirit sings in all these strains, laughs in the interruptions, is handed about from bass to strings, and fills the hearer with a delight pure, intense, and elevating. How the orchestra played it! With shading and modulation, and a pointed attention to nice detail, which almost handicapped the melodious rush of the mighty composition. And yet, with what expression, with what a gain of new lights, with what skillful and manifold change of tempo, and novel manner of phrasing! The leader has evidently his own interpretation of this first part, in many regards different from the conventional, and adding greatly to the poetic glamor, the grand expression, and the joyous spirit of the work. It filled the hall with light.

The second part, the allegretto, with its short and broken song-like melody, which gradually turns into a mournful chant of all the instruments, was exquisitely rendered in very slow time, and with the utmost development of all details, the display of tone-color and modulation of every accessory and a dreamlike repose and leisurely unfolding of beauties that fascinated, and, like a spell, lay on the audience. This is a favorite number at all concerts. The firm and marked rhythm to which the theme is bound, its tender and sorrowful sentiment, its exquisitely fanciful treatment, the deeply pathetic air of the violins with the hushed brass accompaniment, the lovely finale that seems to expire in air—they give the sensation of walking on the edge of high woods, deep in the shade, with the broad and mystic moonlight far-spread outside.

And upon this follows the scherzo that makes one dance in spirit. Is there anything more exuberant, more full of abundant joy, more bounding in grace than this lightly draped musical figure that skips, and laughs, and swings, and waves? And the D major air which, in trio, twice interrupts, this gleaming, rosy, laughing measure is of such beauty that one longs to seize and hold it, until again spirited away by the lightfooted presto theme.

The finale is a storm of gladness. The orchestra is at its height, in its entire swing and strength and power, boisterous, exuberant, full of glad cry and noisy acclaim, and, with a dance rhythm pulsating through all the whirl of strings, the call of brasses, the rich sound of the wood winds. And the most sudden turns diversify this whirlwind of happy sounds, prettinesses of instrumentation strains of strange melodiousness, runs, tenderly shaded, that climb from bass upward to the highest notes in deftest pianissimo—in short, an apotheosis of glad sounds—which leaves one breathless, delighted, only conscious of the entire satisfaction that fills the soul.

No rendition could be more perfect, more full of poetic fragrance and genuine living expression—as if the music were their own—than that of last night. The orchestra was one with the score. They were playing what was within them. It was the great inspiration of a great work struggling for liberty and expression.

THE VIOLINIST.

Cesar Thomson is impressive in his appearance, with a serious, leonine head, broad shoulders, and of large make. He played the adagio of the Bruch concerto, and the D major concerto by Paganini. The latter is rarely played nowadays because of the tremendously difficult finale with its flageolet notes in thirds, that is beyond the skill of so many of the best violinists. But, it is just the selection which exhibited Thomson in his special excellence. This consists of a technical virtuosity that has not been equaled in the last decade. He surmounts the greatest, most-appalling difficulties with such ease and absence of effort that they seem but play to him. Hence in music that requires an emotional expression, while he renders the score superbly, he is not at his best, and his adagios fail to touch. One only admires the vituosity, the magic skill of his tremendous transitions, and, above all, the acute correctness of his intonation. Never a hair's breadth above or below, never the shade of a thought aside, no matter whether it is a bewildering run in octaves or tenths or a jump from end to end of the gamut, every note distinctly, clearly, roundly sounded, and perfectly, acurately intoned! Every note at its full value, polished, incisive, far carrying! A wonderful technique, but hardly any poetry, or emotion! Hence, when we reach Paganini, Thomson steps into his full mastery. And the concerto last night, with its raised pitch which rendered the tone more brilliant, exhibited the artist in the full glory of his accomplishment. It needed a knowledge of the instrument to appreciate the marvels he did, it needed an acute musical ear to take the values of his unequaled evenness and the values of his unequaled evenness notes in impossible passages were given as fully, musically, and easily as the most ordinary middle register tones. To those with such knowledge and such ear on stretch the effect was bewildering. It left one dizzy, and as exhausted as after a Wagner opera. When Thomson finished one wanted to hear no more concert, he had kept the senses at such strain that there was no desire left. This great virtuoso's tone is not broad and sonorous, it is not even brilliant in the ordinary sense. But it is of the utmost polish and with a single quality is of insinuating refinement and delicate but incisive strength, like a Florentine rapier, and is even, rounded and of full value at every point.

THE REST.

The Bizet suite was very pretty, full of odd conceits and novel orchestral groupings, a descriptive thing with charming effects, light, brilliant, fetching. Everybody rested agreeably through it, and the orchestra, after exhibiting composers, now distinctly exhibited itself in the rendition. It was admirable and the audience applauded with a will. To finish came Auber's nice overture to "Part du Diable," a pretty specimen of the French style in the forties and fifties. But Auber has a staying quality on the stage, and he is really never commonplace or quite out of date. His overture was pleasant and very deftly played.

There has rarely been a concert more enjoyed than last night's. It was a strong day for music in Hartford.

The Hartford Courant.

SATURDAY MORNING, DEC. 8, 1894.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Paur's Orchestra and Cesar Thompson, Violinist, Last Night.

There was a large and appreciative audience at Foot Guard Hall last evening to hear Paur and his orchestra. It is to be regretted, however, that the house was not full, for the Boston Symphony deserves the most generous support and it is not likely that it will venture here again this season, if ever, in view of last night's attendance. A finer symphony concert was rarely, perhaps never given in Hartford. Herr Paur was cordially received on this his initial appearance and showed himself to be a conductor thorough en raport with his men and the music he renders, and getting superb ensemble effects from his orchestra. He is not so fascinating to watch as a man like Seidl, for example, but his influence and methods speak volumes for his scholarship and enthusiasm.

The program was one of variety and charm. The noble Beethoven Seventh Symphony received a deeply satisfying reading, virile, broad and dignified, yet full of the most delicate phrasing and subtle expression. The favorite movements, as usual, were the allegretto with its stately march theme and the scherzo, with a trio in its way as lovely as anything the master ever wrote. But notable too for rendition was the country dance of the finale played with great sparkle and spirit and never allowed to drag or be jerky, as happens with this movement not infrequently. The auditors plainly showed their appreciation of so strong and beautiful a playing of a great symphony, containing many technical difficulties. The orchestra in its strings and wood wind especially calls for superlatives of praise; one of the finest things about its ensemble playing is the proper subordination of the brass in fortissimo passages. Bizet's suite from "L'Arlesienne" gave brightness and beauty to the program; the composer of "Carmen" could be nothing but melodious, and this suite is a winning composition, with cunning transitions and modulations and bewitchment of tunefulness; particularly taking in its graceful lightness was the minuetto. And then, for those who like a touch of Italian opera music, Auber's overture to "Carlo Broschi" was played with vigor and finish, to conclude the evening.

The soloist, M. Cesar Thomson, proved himself one of the world's masters as a virtuoso. He played the Bruch Adagio with great broadness of manner, emphasizing the genuine loveliness of the composition, while his tone was splendid for its rich singing quality, maintained on the highest notes. And in his second selection, the Paganini concerto, his marvellous technical acquirements were bewilderingly demonstrated; bowing and stopping, were a study which the violinists on the stage followed as eagerly as the audience, harmonies were tossed off as if they were plain notes. M. Thomson had to bow to four recalls after this brilliant performance. Yet it must be said that he is colder, less emotional than a player like Isaye, the intellectual predominating over the feelings in his work, to judge by that of last night, at least.

Altogether it was a concert long to remember, and it is to be hoped that Paul will give Hartford another chance, now that he is personally known here. The Boston Symphony Orchestra is easily first among American organizations.

[61]

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XXVI., NO. 162.

SUNDAY, DECEMBER 9, 1894.

The Symphony Concert Programme Books.

Compiler Taken to Task—Sunday Concerts—Notable Event at the Boston Theatre Tonight—"A Gaiety Girl" a Success—"The Princess Bonnie"—Handel and Hayden—Kneisel.

A REMONSTRANCE.

The compiler of the programme book for the Symphony concerts has, of late, taken on himself the important duties of a mentor for the audiences at these entertainments, and manifests toward them a paternal care, from a highly superior standpoint. With a zeal all the more admirable and self-sacrificing because it is not called for, he deals with them as if they were lacking in knowledge of the very fundamental principles of musical art, and he were the heaven-appointed and omniscient pedagogue to lift them, tenderly if possible, violently if necessary, out of the slough of ignorance in which he imagines them to be sunk up to the under jaw. Hence, it is that the book in question has set forth, among other things, instruction more or less edifying on such familiar themes as the sonata form, and other subjects about which he artlessly conceives that his readers know nothing.

One of these exhausting intellectual efforts anent "Phrasing" appeared in the latest issue of the programme, and it is so full of novel information that it may not prove wholly uninteresting to discuss it. In the first place, we are told the important truth that "the art of phrasing consists, in the end, in a right distribution of accents and a proper binding together of the several notes that form a melodic phrase." It needed no ghost to come from the grave to tell us this. Still, it would have been made much clearer if the learned pundit had stated that a musical phrase is analagous to a sentence in a literary composition, and that, just as the intelligent reading of such a composition depends chiefly on accentuation and punctuation, so does musical phrasing depend on the relative strength of the sounds and on their connection with or separation from each other. But to return to our pundit, who attempts to become explanatory in the following lucid manner: "The 'apex,' or culminating note of a phrase is reached as by a conscious exertion of energy, and subsided from as by a gradual relaxation of this energy. And the whole path, from beginning to 'apex,' and from 'apex' to close, is strown with minor accents, the relative force of which must depend largely on circumstances, but must not equal that of the 'apex' itself." This irresistibly calls to mind the observation made by a listener to an argument urging that man is a complex creation, and who retorted with a sincerity that carried conviction with it: "So is a hen!"

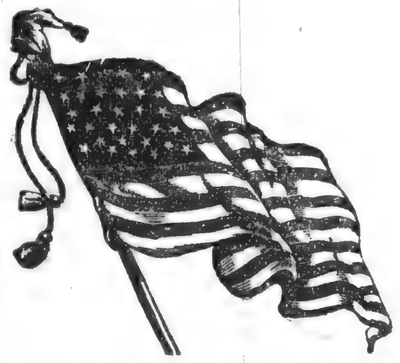
Further on the theory is advanced that "the generally and rightly accepted model in phrasing is the completely fine singer." Unfortunately this is not true. The "completely fine singer" is no more an accepted model than is the completely fine violinist. The average violinist is more apt to phrase artistically than is the singer. The latter is often hampered by the words to which the music is set, and his or her phrasing is frequently, especially in long phrases, marred by the necessity of breathing. The violinist is under no such disadvantage with his bow, and as a matter of fact it is the violinist who is the generally accepted model of the intelligent singer in both legato and in phrasing. Completely fine singers will do all that lies in their power to make their breathing and their phrasing coincide; but if anything must give way, it is the phrasing, for without breath no note can be emitted. Hence it is that a phrase is often cut in twain in order that the singer may take breath. If the programme writer wishes to discuss such matters he should make himself acquainted with the facts, and then he will not mislead his readers. Now and then he drops easily and gracefully into the methods of Mr. Jack Bunsby, as when he says: "Every melody, whether written for the voice or for an instrument, ought to be rightly phrased by the performer, or its character is destroyed." As well enunciate the thrilling truth that if a mutton chop is broiled until it is burnt, it is spoiled for eating.

Another brilliant bit of carefully evolved nonsense is the statement: "It has often been a cause for wonder that instrumental performers so seldom succeed in reproducing the natural, graceful, and significant phrasing of a fine singer. But there are often technical difficulties that stand in the way of a perfect performance of this apparently simple task; difficulties the nature and extent of which the average listener—not to mention many performers—is far enough from appreciating." It would be interesting to learn who and how many have wondered that instrumental performers so seldom phrase as well as does a fine singer. If there is any wonder to be felt in such a connection it is that the singer should not phrase as well as the fine violinist; but reflection will show that, for the reasons already given, the singer is at a disadvantage that the violinist does not experience.

The programme pundit, however, will have none of the violinist. According to him, wind instrument players phrase better than violinists. And why? Because "the oboist, flutist or clarinetist, has like a singer, a natural guide to his own length of breath. The violinist or 'cellist has only the length of his bow!" And yet the violinist can cause this length of bow, in one drawing across a string, to produce a longer-sustained tone and play more notes than can the singer or the wind instrument player gifted with the most phenomenal power of lung in holding out a single breath. The genius who presides over the literature of the Symphony programme appears to be as ignorant about the skilful use of the violin bow as he is about the art of the singer. He brings against the violin bow that its length is entirely an arbitrary standard. So is the length of a violin string. And the whole art and science of music is purely arbitrary. The sonata form is arbitrary. So is every other established musical form. If a violin bow were a yard longer than it is, no player could use it. If it were half the length that it is, it would be equally useless. When Tourte revolutionized the bow, the dimensions he accorded it were accepted, and no improvement on them has been attempted or suggested.

illness as this?—"The pianoforte keyboard is, after all, a neutral thing; all the pianist has to look out for is the exact amount of force with which he strikes the key; but the swing of the bow arm or the 'kick' of the wrist may at times be a positive impediment in the way of the violinist doing what he wants to do, and he may have to resort to all sorts of expedients to steer around the snag." Why may not the pianist fail to strike the key with the exact force desired, as well as the violinist be baffled in his attempt to avoid the "kick" of the wrist, whatever that may mean? Such callow recklessness in statement, such ignorant misrepresentation, set forth with such an air of profoundly owlish wisdom, should not appear in a book prepared for an intelligent audience to read. If subjects of this nature are to be discussed in it, it should be by a writer of authority, and not by one who, to all appearances, sets down the first idea entering his head, and then, with all the assurance of one who has not discovered how dangerous a thing is a little knowledge, proceeds gratuitously and fatuously to base on it a theory that is remarkable equally for its "cockiness" and its absurdity.

Morning Advertiser.



Published Every Day in the Year at No. 29 Park Row, New York City.

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 7, 1894.

THE SECOND CONCERT.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. Cesar Thomson, Soloist, and "Die Verkaufte Braut" the Principal Features in the Programme.

There are, notably in this country, certain factors of musical expression which, like certain other factors in the expression of art or literature, have passed beyond the necessity of mere criticism and require simply discrimination in degree of praise. Such a factor is the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which gave its second concert of the season last evening at the Metropolitan Opera House. This concert had really more interest than the first one, as it not only gave us what was, for a certainty, admirable selections admirably rendered, but also a bit of new music, which has been much discussed and praised lately in Europe. This was the overture from "Die Herkaufte Braut," in which the prime donne have lately scored such remarkable triumphs. This was perhaps more important than the introduction of Mr. Cesar Thomson, honest and praiseworthy artist as he is.

The first part of the programme was the rendition by the orchestra of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, with its glorious blending of tempi and interchange of majors and minors. Of course it was beautifully rendered, and as it is, in spite of its classic majesty, of the nature to be essentially popular, it was received with genuine enthusiasm.

Mr. Cesar Thomson repeated the triumph of first appearance, and added to the high estimation he holds, both with the critical and merely music loving people of this city. Mr. Thomson is not a fad. He deserves his position. He is really an artist of power and fine taste, and moreover a thoroughly honest musician, who knows his instrument and disdains affectation. His bowing is true and firm and delicate—intricate, indeed, to the point of the marvelous, but absolutely free from anything like the detestable mechanical trickery of too many good violinists. He is sympathetic and strong, and knows how to tell what he means. He deserves his place. Then came what was, according to the opinions of most, the event of the evening, the overture from "Die Verkaufte Braut" of Bedrich Smetana. It is a wonderfully personal kind of music, instinct with a charm which shows individuality. It is not a mosaic polyglot, but an entity, and impresses, with what a writer would call style, in a fashion difficult to describe. A lady, the justice of whose general criticism proved that she knew music and loved it, bent to a gentleman in front of her and whispered, "It sounds as though it might have been written by a glorified Sullivan." She was wrong, as the music is not only much too good and high to be mentioned in such a connection, but the suggestion was evidently caused by the almost lilting character of the tuneful melody that sweeps through and under it. The remaining features of the programme consisted of L'Arlesienne, Orchestral Suite No. 1 from Georges Bizet, and the symphonic poem Les Preludes, from Liszt. Emil Paur conducted, to the taste of the present writer, too ostentatiously, but that is a mere opinion, and the personal equation has no weight in the mathematics of criticism.

The Sun.

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 7, 1894.

Sa NEW YORK, Paid.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave last night at the Metropolitan Opera House the second concert of its series with a programme generally interesting. The vast auditorium is not adapted to orchestral concerts, for, despite the fact that the marble vastness of the Capulet mansion, which has become familiar through its invariable appearance on Sunday evenings was reduced to one-half the usual size, the body of tone seemed still lost in the great building. Beethoven's Seventh Symphony was given with general adherence to tradition, Mr. Paur departing from it most notably in the trio of the third movement, which was taken more slowly than usual. The last movement was played with splendid spirit, but it was lacking in precision and refinement. The orchestra overcame admirably the technical difficulties of Smetana's overture to the "Bartered Bride," but the work is a disappointment in view of the reports which have come to this country in regard to the opera's beauty. The selection given last night is spirited and not deficient in color, but it scarcely leaves one anxious to hear the complete work.

Bizet's first suite from "L'Arlésienne," a work which never loses its charm, was played with delightful delicacy and virtuosity, and the orchestra is especially to be commended for restoring the saxophone to its place in the music's interpretation which the score demands. Parts of Liszt's "Les Preludes" were marked by the quality which Mr. Paur brings to most of his readings in modern music—intelligence rather than sympathy.

César Thomson was the soloist, and it is a tribute to his powers that he accomplished the effects he did with the works he performed. It seems the penalty of such brilliant virtuosity that it must often interpret compositions so intrinsically uninteresting. In the Paganini number the audience was doubtless alternately bored and dazzled by the astounding brilliancy of the performer in playing such commonplace music. Nobody cares now to hear even so great a singer as Mme. Melba in "Lucrezia Borgia" or "Crispino e Comare," and works of such a class are no more interesting from a violinist, whatever his skill may be.

The Hartford Post.

DECEMBER 8, 1894.

"BOSTON SYMPHONY."

Herr Paur's Great Organization and Cesar Thomson, Violinist.

A concert such as was given at Foot Guard hall last evening recalls the debt that American admirers of the best music owe to Banker Higginson of Boston to whose patronage is due the existence of the Boston Symphony orchestra. The orchestra last evening again proved its right to be placed first in a classification of American musical organizations, and only the comparatively small attendance evidencing the indifference, ignorance of the importance of the event or impecuniosity of Hartford's musical public prevented complete satisfaction and pleasure. Mr. Paur conducted and established himself as a favorite by his personality, while his control over the orchestra and his intellectual ability was clearly evident and inspired the warmest appreciation and admiration, as the full value of each composition was brought out under his direction The Beethoven Seventh symphony, is aptly called the "apotheosis of the dance" was given with, may it be called, "original" effect—at least it was not conventional. The various themes, if the several forms of rhythm comprising the work may be so termed, were given a reading very expressive of the ideas of the composer

Bizet's Arlesienne suite were given a trifle too broad treament, they were not played delicately enough, but Amber's overture to "Carlo Broschi" was rendered to perfection.

The volinist, Cæsar Thomson made a veritable sensation. He gave the Paganism concerto brilliantly, and while the layman could not appreciate the extent of his genius and ability, it was still very plain that he was a complete master of the most difficult passages. Again he astonished in the adagio from Bruch's first concerto with his phenomenal technique and sentiment was never wanting in the slightest degree.

THE REGISTER.

Established 1812.

86, 88 and 90 Crown St., New Haven.

Advertisements are not received after 2 p.m. for the Daily edition, or after 9 p.m. Saturday for the Sunday edition.

All communications to the Editor should be accompanied by the author's name as a guarantee of good faith. We cannot promise to return unaccepted manuscript.

SUNDAY, DECEMBER 9, 1894.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Magnificent Rendering of Classical Music, But Only Fair Sized Audience Present.

Emil Paur is not an ideal program maker or he had built his musical scheme on a smaller scale; nevertheless the performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night at the Hyperion under his baton was most interesting. When last here, this organization (which all cavilling to the contrary is still the best permanent orchestra in the country) was under the control of a wonderfully attractive individuality in the person of Mr. Nikisch, a gentleman whose memory will not be effaced by Mr. Paur with his angular beat, his non-magnetic personality and cut-and-dried conception, and it is doubtful whether the loud applause bestowed was a genuine expression of thorough enjoyment in the evening's program.

The Bach Passacaglia in C minor served (if for no other purpose) to show what a thorough disciplinarian Mr. Paur is; how marvellously clear the phrasing was; how accurate the attack, above all things what a wealth of nuance in the shading, This latter was exceptionally noticeable in the fugue at the end; because as a rule we are apt to hear fugues played at a steady tempo and with an evenness of dynamic force.

But Mr. Paur shaded the figure down at times to the most exquisite pianissimo, never once losing.

But in the symphony, every one seemed at sea. Johannes Brahms, the great Viennese master, is a tremendous puzzle to the most ardent disciple who kneels to wash his master's feet.

There is in his works at times a power that must be recognized though not understood, and frequently a crabbedness that makes one pause. When last April in Boston this symphony was given by this orchestra, Philip Hale, the eminent critic, compared the performance to a prize fight between Mr. Paur and Mr. Brahms, the audience by its applause evidently giving a decision in favor of Mr. Paur. Last night Mr. Brahms won by long odds, simply because no one understood his tactics. The second movement is the most melodious and was most enjoyed. Brahmism is a cult, but people (the mass) love melody whenever or wherever they find it and do not care for bizarre orchestral or queer rhythmical effects.

The orchestra was at its best in the suite by Bizet; nothing but praise can be said of it. With a dash and fire unexpected the first theme was announced, the minuett was given with bewitching grace and the adagietto for united strings was delicious.

As instrumental soloist, appeared Cesar Thomson, the famous Belgian violinist, who was heard first in the Adagio from the G minor concerto of Max Bruch and then in the Paganini Concerto in D major. A great deal has been said and written of this virtuoso and the impression he created only served to endorse the universal opinion. The ease with which he tossed off from his bow the harmonies, the double thirds and sixths and octaves, the evenness of his trill, all this and more can only be really appreciated by violinists, but we can all admire the beauty and purity of tone, the never failing accuracy of his intonation and the keen musical intelligence manifested in every phrase. Truly Cesar Thomson is one of the world's greatest artists.

The house was small which is a scandal to the musical intelligence of a town of this size. There should not have been one vacant seat, but alas! people are in music as in religion, fair weather enthusiasts—and the damp evening will furnish many an excuse.

[62]

[illegible]

TUESDAY, DEC. 11, 1894.

VOL. XXVI., NO. 164.

TUESDAY, DEC. 11, 1894.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET

The third concert in this season's series by the Kneisel Quartet, was given in Union Hall last evening, before a very large and brilliant audience. Mr. Carl Baermann and Mr. L. Pourtau assisting. The programme was:

Quartet D, op. 44, No. 1, Mendelssohn.
Piano trio, B flat, op. 97, Beethoven.
Quintet for clarinet and strings, op. 115, Brahms.

To dwell on the performances of the organization would be only to repeat the encomiums that have, of necessity, become almost conventional. That it is the finest body of its kind in America is universally conceded, and that its playing never falls below the high standard it has established is to be taken for granted. The Mendelssohn quartet is not the most interesting of the composer's works in its class, and is, on the whole, lacking in the element of his best inspiration. Moreover, it has become somewhat old fashioned. Not so the splendid Beethoven trio, which retains all its original freshness and holds the attention from the first bar to the last. It was beautifully read and played, Mr. Baermann, who was welcomed with a hearty outburst of applause, acquitting himself of his share in the performance in a specially noteworthy manner, and sustaining to the full his reputationl as a mode Beethoven interpreter. The piano never obtruded itself, but was kept in its due place in the general balance of effect, and nothing was wanting in spirit, taste, color and style to make the effort flawless. It was the perfection of ensemble playing. It has been rare indeed that the scherzo, in particular, has been given here with such delicacy, crispness, precision and graceful charm of emphasis. There was great enthusiasm at the close of the performance and the artists were recalled.

The Brahms quintet was finely given, but it must be confessed that it is, on the whole, a dreary work despite its polished scholarsnip and its rich color. Its presentation on this occasion was made interesting by the first appearance here of M. Poutau in a chamber concert. His playing of the clarinet part was masterly. He has an exquisite tone, his technique is no less facile than graceful, his pianissimo is wonderfully pure and delicate, he never forces his instrument, and his style is impressively chaste and warm. His skul and artistic feeling met with an instant recognition. There was much enthusiasm over the playing of the quintet generally. In fact, through the whole entertainment the applause was frequent, cordial and appreciative. The next concert will take place Monday, Dec. 31.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

The Official Paper of the State.

TUESDAY MORNING, DEC. 11, 1894.

The Kneisel Quartette at Union Hall.

The unusually strong programme offered by the Kneisel quartette for their third appearance this season could not have failed to attract a large audience. Union Hall was well filled last night. The quartette and assisting artists meeting with a right worthy reception.

Mendelssohn's quartette in D major, op. 44, tuneful and bright, was an acceptable prelude to the heavier numbers by Beethoven and Brahms. The piano trio in B flat by the former, was surely the piece de résistance of the evening. Mr. Carl Baermann and Messrs. Kneisel & Schroeder gave the great work a most thorough interpretation. The andante movement, the very essence of Beethovinism, is especially beautiful, and leaves an impression which is tinged by the brilliant finale, a tempo di polka, with surprise at the contrast.

All three played faultlessly, the delicacy and power of the pianist's touch being very noticeable.

Brahms' quintette in B minor, for clarinet and strings, introduced M. Pourtau of the Symphony Orchestra. The work presents the great modern master in a romantic rather than intellectual mood, and abounds in grace and melody, the adagio movement conspicuously so. Its originality and theme development are masterful; therein is evident the superlative genius of this man who on the threshold of the 20th century, with a world of music literature behind him, can yet almost, if not entirely, hold his own with his illustrious predecessors, Bach, Beethoven et alis. It is needless to say that the quintette received a remarkable rendering. M. Pourtau's tone, once heard, can hardly be forgotten, so mellifluous and flute-like, and absolutely pure is its quality.

The fourth concert of the series will be given on the 31st Dec.

BOSTON POST.

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

TUESDAY MORNING, DEC. 11, 1894.

THE KNEISEL CONCERT.

M. Pourtau, clarinetist, and Mr. Carl Baermann, pianist, were the soloists at the third concert by the Kneisel Quartet at Union Hall last evening. The first number on the programme was a quartet by Mendelssohn, Op. 44, every number given with a snap and precision that delighted the audience. A Beethoven trio for piano, violin and 'cello was the second number, Mr. Baermann's artistic work being rewarded with round after round of applause. M. Pourtau's wonderful clarinet playing was the feature of the third number, a quintet by Brahms. The pure quality and strength of his tones, especially in the higher register, is rarely equalled, and the selection was a whole musical treat in itself. The next concert will be given Dec. 31.

[illegible]

TUESDAY, DEC. 11, 1894.

Kneisel Quartet.

The third concert in the Kneisel series of the season at Union hall last evening drew forth a very large audience. The magnificent playing of this quartet has long been a subject for favorable comment, not only in Boston but in many large cities in this country, and Mr Kneisel's little band of artists are universally recognized as the foremost quartet in America.

The work last evening was seemingly flawless, the assisting artists, Mr Carl Baermann, pianist, and Mr Leon Pourtau, the new clarinetist of the symphony orchestra, dividing honors with the regular members of the organization.

Mendelssohn's quartet in D major, for strings, was given with grand effect, the difficult finale, Presto con brio, being performed with notable precision and breadth of expression.

The Beethoven trio by Messrs Kneisel violin, Schroeder cello and Baermann piano, was the crowning triumph of the evening, the brillancy of scherzo and the sonority of the finale arousing most hearty tributes of applause.

Mr Pourtau played with the quartet in the Brahms quintet for strings and clarinet. The new artist has a delightful, sweet and resonant tone, almost flute like, and his execution of difficult passages is smooth, true and of even quality. His extended notes were given without deflecting from the pitch, and in every way he proved a fit associate to the quartet of which Bostonians justly feel so proud.

The next concert will be given in Union hall, Dec 31.

Boston Transcript

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 11, 1894.

Union Hall: The Kneisel Quartet.

The Kneisel Quartet, assisted by Mr. Carl Baermann and Mr. L. Pourtau, gave its third concert in Union Hall last evening, the programme being as follows:

Quartet in D major, opus 44, No. 1.....Mendelssohn
Pianoforte Trio in B-flat major, opus 97....Beethoven
Quintet with Clarinet, in B minor, opus 115....Brahms

The Mendelssohn Quartet seems to be nearing the end of its day. It takes two things to make a composition live—high inspiration and complete mastery; neither of these alone is enough. Complete mastery of form and style Mendelssohn always had; but his inspiration was not always of the eternal sort, and in this particular composition one finds it belonging very much to his time. In its day it could easily stand in the first rank; but now the soul of it is old and weary, all that is left of it is its perfect form, and form without the vital soul seems purely formal and uninspiring. It is not one of the works to make the composer regretted today. It was admirably played.

Beethoven's great B-flat trio, on the other hand, is young and fresh as ever. Here we have greatness of the fullest, richest and most universal sort; such music cannot die. The performance was exceedingly fine; Mr. Baermann was fairly at his best, playing with all his wonted warmth and fire, and with far more than his ordinary self-command; Mr. Schroeder's playing of the 'cello cantilena near the end of the slow movement was a revelation of poignant and elevated sentiment.

The Brahms quintet has been heard here before, and shows Brahms in one of his finest aspects. We are not yet quite reconciled to the plan of the work: as regards the combination of instruments, the "Clarinet quintet" seems to us to belong properly to the by-gone forms of chamber-music; the wind instrument can be, and is, used to produce effects of entrancing beauty, but it palls on one after a time, and four movements make you rather tired of it. No matter how skilfully the composer combines it with the strings, the welding is never complete, and it cannot but soon impress you as a solo instrument after all. Mr. Pourtau's exquisite playing did much, to be sure, to make it welcome; such clarinet playing—in tone, technique, and the higher and highest musical respects—is rare anywhere, and surely unheard before in this city. The whole performance was splendid, and showed the depth and beauty of the work in the truest light.

Boston Journal.

TEN PAGES.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 11, 1894.

The Third Concert of the Kneisel Quartet in Union Hall.

The Kneisel Quartet gave a concert last evening in Union Hall. The members were assisted by Mr. Carl Baermann, pianist, and Mr. Leon Pourtau, clarionetist. The program was as follows:

Quartet in D major, op. 44, No. 1....Mendelssohn
Piano trio in B flat major, op. 97.....Beethoven
Quintet for clarinet, two violins, viola and violoncello, in B minor, op. 115.....Brahms

Mr. Pourtau displayed a beautiful tone technical skill and abundant proofs of a truly artistic spirit. Mr. Baermann played the piano part of the trio with much understanding. In the scherzo he was particularly happy, for his performance was crisp and elegant throughout.

The quartet by Mendelssohn is pretty poor stuff. There is the habitual feigned passion of the man in the first movement; and there is his habitual sentimentalism in the andante. The menuetto is not distinguished, and the finale is perfunctory. So, too, the finale of the great—and long trio by Beethoven does not appeal strongly to the imagination; but how crowded with beauties and Beethovenisms are the other movements. As for the Brahms quintet, it served to cement friendship with Mr. Pourtau, and thus it had a useful mission. Much of the work seemes tedious, and the dullness is not that which rests and soothes and makes the hearer forget that there is anybody on the stage; it is of the aggressive, exasperating species.

On many occasions the Journal has praised without stint the superb performance of the Kneisel Quartet, and to speak in detail of the performance of last night would be to repeat what has so often been said. It is to be regretted, however, that the programs are so long. The generosity is mistaken. A chamber concert should never exceed one hour and a half. "But what would you have? Three quartets eat time. Would you play for a second number a fragment of a chamber composition?" Yes, by all means; or play only two complete works. The Adamowski Quartet concerts are almost always of reasonable length, and no one has complained seriously because they are too short. Quality in music is of greater importance than quantity. He is an unwise host who sets before his guests too many courses, however delicious they may be. Neither the stomach nor the ear brooks overloading.

PHILIP HALE

Boston Commonwealth.

Published Saturday at No. 120 Tremont St.,

DECEMBER 15, 1894

ATTENDANTS at the Symphonies and other entertainments in Music Hall have become familiar with the face of Mr. Fred R. Comee, who was quietly married at the Brunswick on Wednesday at noon to Miss Clara Gallupe, daughter of Deputy United States Marshal Frederick D. Gallupe. The ceremony was performed by the Rev. Leighton Parks in the Venetian Room, the bride being given in marriage by her father. Mr. Comee was attended by his best man, Mr. C. A. Ellis, manager of Music Hall. Miss Alice Dunbar of Pittsfield, gowned in brown trimmed with otter, carrying a superb bouquet of Catherine Mermet roses tied with pink ribbons, was maid of honor. The bride was attired in her travelling gown of blue scotch goods, trimmed with martin fur and jet. She carried bride roses tied with white satin ribbons. Both the ladies wore large hats. Following the ceremony a wedding breakfast was partaken of in the Banquet Hall. About thirty guests were seated, including Mr. and Mrs. Frederick Gallupe, parents of the bride, Mrs. W. P. Comee, and Mr. W. P. Comee, mother and brother of the groom; Mrs. Frederick Gallupe, Sr.; Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Robinson; Mr. and Mrs. John Lilly of Lambertville, N. J.; Mr. and Mrs. Charles E. Smith; Mr. and Mrs. A. F. Fessenden; Mr. and Mrs. and Miss Hopkins of Charlestown; Mr. and Mrs. Frank Cooper; Miss Gertrude Bent; Mr. Brown; Miss Morris and Miss Jennie Bird. Immediately after the breakfast, the bride and groom started for New York on a brief wedding trip. On their return they will occupy their new apartments at 179 Huntington avenue and will hold a reception on the evening of Jan. 23, from 8.30 to 10.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 12, 1894.

THERE were two orchestral concerts of interest during the past week. The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second concert of the season in the Metropolitan Opera House last Thursday evening and the New York Symphony Society gave its second afternoon concert Friday in Carnegie Hall, and its evening concert last Saturday.

Here is what Mr. Paur's organization presented in the way of a program, rather a melange:

Symphony No. 7, in A major, op. 92.....Ludwig van Beethoven
Soli for violin—
Adagio from Concerto No. 1, in G minor, op. 26.....Bruch
Concerto in D major.....Paganini
Mr. César Thomson.
Overture, "Die Verkaufte Braut".....Bedrich Smetana
"L'Arlésienne," orchestral suite No. 1.....Georges Bizet
Symphonic poem, "Les Préludes".....Franz Liszt

This scheme was not adhered to, as Mr. Thomson, without any previous notification, substituted the first movement of Bruch's second concerto (D minor) for the more familiar slow movement in E flat from the first concerto.

Mr. Paur was in a burly mood. He read the symphony in a reckless, even noisy manner, taking the allegros too fast and the poco sostenuto to the opening movement too slow. The scherzo was well played, however, while the last allegro was not only con brio, but with rudeness. Over-accentuation seemed to be the particular humor of the conductor, and Beethoven was served up with the most lurid tintings.

The symphony was not nearly so satisfactorily played as the C minor last season. The Bizet numbers are out of place on a classical program, being al fresco in manner and savoring of the vaudeville. Mr. Paur is as unhappy as Mr. Seidl when he attempts works of the French school. He is not a versatile man, and his touch lacks delicacy, his temperament vivacity. Mr. Paur is bourgeois, honest and simple in his notions of things musical, and when he is not rough he is respectable and middle class in sentiment.

The orchestra made a fine thing of Smetana's "Bartered Bride," which is no novelty here. The strings were excellent, although dense in tone at times, but the overture was played with dash. The wood wind distinguished itself in the Bizet minuet, and the trumpet in the allegretto of the symphony was off. This was accounted for by illness of the player, who is suffering from rheumatism. Liszt's preludes lacked brilliancy, color, precision, and oddly enough the string orchestra seemed to suffer in the matter of resonance. As a program it was entirely too long and illogically constructed.

Mr. Thomson played marvelously well. Always objective, he stands apart from his work, which is the supreme exemplification of art for art. The adagio was played in sculptural style, without the intimate warmth in its rather banal measures which Ysaye infused at the later concert. The Paganini concerto was a miracle of virtuosity and a run of octaves in rapid tempo at the close set the audience wild with enthusiasm. Comparisons between Thomson and Ysaye may be invidious, but seem to be inevitable this season. We can say, with Goethe of himself and Schiller: We are both a couple of big fellows. The next concert of the Boston Band will take place January 10, 1895.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 16.

The Symphony Concert.

On account of the holiday season and our over crowded space, our notice of the Symphony concert must be deferred to next week.

The Kneisel Quartet.

The Kneisel Quartet, assisted by Mr. Carl Baermann and Mr. L. Pourtan, gave its third concert at Union Hall, on Monday evening. The programme was:

Quartet in D, op. 44, No. 1.....Mendelssohn.
Piano Trio in B flat, op. 97.....Beethoven.
Quintet for Clarinet and Strings.....Brahms.

The Mendelssohn quartet is time-eaten and dull, and we listen to it with a respect that is due to tradition only. It is not a large work, it is not a sincere work, and it is irritating in its mock sentiment and affectations. It could have been left off the programme with no loss to art and with positive benefit to sensitive nerves.

The magnificent Beethoven trio came as a welcome relief. It was beautifully played throughout, Mr. Baermann again showing himself in his happiest mood; his playing was noticeable for its fine finish, for its grace and elegance; it was faithful to the canons of the highest art, for there was no obtrusiveness, no attempt made to prevert the intention of composer by forcing the piano into undue prominence; there was the finest taste shown in the tone coloring; there were massive broadness of style, brilliancy, delicacy and artistic conscientiousness down to the very finest detail. Mr. Baermann again demonstrated his unrivalled skill as a Beethoven interpreter, and he was greeted with the most enthusiastic applause.

The Brahms quintet is undoubtedly a most scholarly work, but coming after the Beethoven inspiration, it seemed dull, or, at least, produced a feeling of dulness on the hearer. It appealed to the ear and not to the soul, and suggested a problem in quadratic equations which the hearer was too weary to solve. It had the merit, however, of bringing forward Mr. Pourtan, who demonstrated that he is a master of the clarinent. The tone he produces is exquisite in quality, his artistic taste is of the finest, and his technical skill that of a master. He plays without effort, difficulties are so easily conquered that they pass almost unnoticed, and his pianissimo playing is of the rarest delicacy.

As usual, the playing of the Kneisel Quartet was of the finest quality. It was intelligent and it was artistic, and it was a perpetual delight. The work of the organization was particularly fine in the Beethoven trio, while in the Brahms quintet its technical excellencies were shown at their best. The next concert takes place on Monday evening, December 31.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCVI., NO. 164.

TUESDAY, DEC. 11, 1894.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET

The third concert in this season's series by the Kneisel Quartet, was given in Union Hall last evening, before a very large and brilliant audience. Mr. Carl Baermann and Mr. L. Pourtau assisting. The programme was:

Quartet D, op. 44, No. 1, Mendelssohn.
Piano trio, B flat, op. 97, Beethoven.
Quintet for clarinet and strings, op. 115, Brahms.

To dwell on the performances of the organization would be only to repeat the encomiums that have, of necessity, become almost conventional. That it is the finest body of its kind in America is universally conceded, and that its playing never falls below the high standard it has established is to be taken for granted. The Mendelssohn quartet is not the most interesting of the composer's works in its class, and is, on the whole, lacking in the element of his best inspiration. Moreover, it has become somewhat old fashioned. Not so the splendid Beethoven trio, which retains all its original freshness and holds the attention from the first bar to the last. It was beautifully read and played, Mr. Baermann, who was welcomed with a hearty outburst of applause, acquitting himself of his share in the performance in a specially noteworthy manner, and sustaining to the full his reputation as a mode Beethoven interpreter. The piano never obtruded itself, but was kept in its due place in the general balance of effect, and nothing was wanting in spirit, taste, color and style to make the effort flawless. It was the perfection of ensemble playing. It has been rare indeed that the scherzo, in particular, has been given here with such delicacy, crispness, precision and graceful charm of emphasis. There was great enthusiasm at the close of the performance and the artists were recalled.

The Brahms quintet was finely given, but it must be confessed that it is, on the whole, a dreary work despite its polished scholarship and its rich color. Its presentation on this occasion was made interesting by the first appearance here of M. Poutau in a chamber concert. His playing of the clarinet part was masterly. He has an exquisite tone, his technique is no less facile than graceful, his pianissimo is wonderfully pure and delicate, he never forces his instrument, and his style is impressively chaste and warm. His skul and artistic feeling met with an instant recognition. There was much enthusiasm over the playing of the quintet generally. In fact, through the whole entertainment the applause was frequent, cordial and appreciative. The next concert will take place Monday, Dec. 31.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.

TUESDAY MORNING, DEC. 11, 1894.

The Kneisel Quartette at Union Hall.

The unusually strong programme offered by the Kneisel quartette for their third appearance this season could not have failed to attract a large audience. Union Hall was well filled last night. The quartette and assisting artists meeting with a right worthy reception.

Mendelssohn's quartette in D major, op. 44, tuneful and bright, was an acceptable prelude to the heavier numbers by Beethoven and Brahms. The piano trio in B flat by the former, was surely the piece de résistance of the evening. Mr. Carl Baermann and Messrs. Kneisel & Schroeder gave the great work a most thorough interpretation. The andante movement, the very essence of Beethovinism, is especially beautiful, and leaves an impression which is tinged by the brilliant finale, a tempo di polka, with surprise at the contrast.

All three played faultlessly, the delicacy and power of the pianist's touch being very noticeable.

Brahms' quintette in B minor, for clarinet and strings, introduced M. Pourtau of the Symphony Orchestra. The work presents the great modern master in a romantic rather than intellectual mood, and abounds in grace and melody, the adagio movement conspicuously so. Its originality and theme development are masterful; therein is evident the superlative genius of this man who on the threshold of the 20th century, with a world of music literature behind him, can yet almost, if not entirely, hold his own with his illustrious predecessors, Bach, Beethoven et alis. It is needless to say that the quintette received a remarkable rendering. M. Pourtau's tone, once heard, can hardly be forgotten, so mellifluous and flute-like, and absolutely pure is its quality.

The fourth concert of the series will be given on the 31st Dec.

BOSTON POST.

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

TUESDAY MORNING, DEC. 11, 1894.

THE KNEISEL CONCERT.

M. Pourtau, clarinetist, and Mr. Carl Baermann, pianist, were the soloists at the third concert by the Kneisel Quartet at Union Hall last evening. The first number on the programme was a quartet by Mendelssohn, Op. 44, every number given with a snap and precision that delighted the audience. A Beethoven trio for piano, violin and 'cello was the second number, Mr. Baermann's artistic work being rewarded with round after round of applause. M. Pourtau's wonderful clarinet playing was the feature of the third number, a quintet by Brahms. The pure quality and strength of his tones, especially in the higher register, is rarely equalled, and the selection was a whole musical treat in itself. The next concert will be given Dec. 31.

Boston Daily Globe.

TUESDAY, DEC. 11, 1894.

Kneisel Quartet.

The third concert in the Kneisel series of the season at Union hall last evening drew forth a very large audience. The magnificent playing of this quartet has long been a subject for favorable comment, not only in Boston but in many large cities in this country, and Mr Kneisel's little band of artists are universally recognized as the foremost quartet in America.

The work last evening was seemingly flawless, the assisting artists, Mr Carl Baermann, pianist, and Mr Leon Pourtau, the new clarinetist of the symphony orchestra, dividing honors with the regular members of the organization.

Mendelssohn's quartet in D major, for strings, was given with grand effect, the difficult finale, Presto con brio, being performed with notable precision and breadth of expression.

The Beethoven trio by Messrs Kneisel violin, Schroeder cello and Baermann piano, was the crowning triumph of the evening, the brillancy of scherzo and the sonority of the finale arousing most hearty tributes of applause.

Mr Pourtau played with the quartet in the Brahms quintet for strings and clarinet. The new artist has a delightful, sweet and resonant tone, almost flute like, and his execution of difficult passages is smooth, true and of even quality. His extended notes were given without deflecting from the pitch, and in every way he proved a fit associate to the quartet of which Bostonians justly feel so proud.

The next concert will be given in Union hall, Dec 31.

Boston Transcript

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 11, 1894.

Union Hall: The Kneisel Quartet.

The Kneisel Quartet, assisted by Mr. Carl Baermann and Mr. L. Pourtau, gave its third concert in Union Hall last evening, the programme being as follows:

Quartet in D major, opus 44, No. 1.....Mendelssohn
Pianoforte Trio in B-flat major, opus 97....Beethoven
Quintet with Clarinet, in B minor, opus 115....Brahms

The Mendelssohn Quartet seems to be nearing the end of its day. It takes two things to make a composition live—high inspiration and complete mastery; neither of these alone is enough. Complete mastery of form and style Mendelssohn always had; but his inspiration was not always of the eternal sort, and in this particular composition one finds it belonging very much to his time. In its day it could easily stand in the first rank; but now the soul of it is old and weary, all that is left of it is its perfect form, and form without the vital soul seems purely formal and uninspiring. It is not one of the works to make the composer regretted today. It was admirably played.

Beethoven's great B-flat trio, on the other hand, is young and fresh as ever. Here we have greatness of the fullest, richest and most universal sort; such music cannot die. The performance was exceedingly fine; Mr. Baermann was fairly at his best, playing with all his wonted warmth and fire, and with far more than his ordinary self-command; Mr. Schroeder's playing of the 'cello cantilena near the end of the slow movement was a revelation of poignant and elevated sentiment.

The Brahms quintet has been heard here before, and shows Brahms in one of his finest aspects. We are not yet quite reconciled to the plan of the work: as regards the combination of instruments, the "Clarinet quintet" seems to us to belong properly to the by-gone forms of chamber-music; the wind instrument can be, and is, used to produce effects of entrancing beauty, but it palls on one after a time, and four movements make you rather tired of it. No matter how skilfully the composer combines it with the strings, the welding is never complete, and it cannot but soon impress you as a solo instrument after all. Mr. Pourtau's exquisite playing did much, to be sure, to make it welcome; such clarinet playing—in tone, technique, and the higher and highest musical respects—is rare anywhere, and surely unheard before in this city. The whole performance was splendid, and showed the depth and beauty of the work in the truest light.

Boston Journal.

TEN PAGES.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 11, 1894.

The Third Concert of the Kneisel Quartet in Union Hal'.

The Kneisel Quartet gave a concert last evening in Union Hall. The members were assisted by Mr. Carl Baermann, pianist, and Mr. Leon Pourtau, clarionetist. The program was as follows:

Quartet in D major, op. 44, No. 1....Mendelssohn
Piano trio in B flat major, op. 97.....Beethoven
Quintet for clarinet, two violins, viola and violoncello, in B minor, op. 115.....Brahms

Mr. Pourtau displayed a beautiful tone technical skill and abundant proofs of a truly artistic spirit. Mr. Baermann played the piano part of the trio with much understanding. In the scherzo he was particularly happy, for his performance was crisp and elegant throughout.

The quartet by Mendelssohn is pretty poor stuff. There is the habitual feigned passion of the man in the first movement; and there is his habitual sentimentalism in the andante. The menuetto is not distinguished, and the finale is perfunctory. So, too, the finale of the great—and long trio by Beethoven does not appeal strongly to the imagination; but how crowded with beauties and Beethovenisms are the other movements. As for the Brahms quintet, it served to cement friendship with Mr. Pourtau, and thus it had a useful mission. Much of the work seemes tedious, and the dullness is not that which rests and soothes and makes the hearer forget that there is anybody on the stage; it is of the aggressive, exasperating species.

On many occasions the Journal has praised without stint the superb performance of the Kneisel Quartet, and to speak in detail of the performance of last night would be to repeat what has so often been said. It is to be regretted, however, that the programs are so long. The generosity is mistaken. A chamber concert should never exceed one hour and a half. "But what would you have? Three quartets eat time. Would you play for a second number a fragment of a chamber composition?" Yes, by all means; or play only two complete works. The Adamowski Quartet concerts are almost always of reasonable length, and no one has complained seriously because they are too short. Quality in music is of greater importance than quantity. He is an unwise host who sets before his guests too many courses, however delicious they may be. Neither the stomach nor the ear brooks overloading.

PHILIP HALE.

Boston Commonwealth.

Published Saturday at No. 120 Tremont St.,

DECEMBER 15, 1894

ATTENDANTS at the Symphonies and other entertainments in Music Hall have become familiar with the face of Mr. Fred R. Comee, who was quietly married at the Brunswick on Wednesday at noon to Miss Clara Gallupe, daughter of Deputy United States Marshal Frederick D. Gallupe. The ceremony was performed by the Rev. Leighton Parks in the Venetian Room, the bride being given in marriage by her father. Mr. Comee was attended by his best man, Mr. C. A. Ellis, manager of Music Hall. Miss Alice Dunbar of Pittsfield, gowned in brown trimmed with otter, carrying a superb bouquet of Catherine Mermet roses tied with pink ribbons, was maid of honor. The bride was attired in her travelling gown of blue scotch goods, trimmed with martin fur and jet. She carried bride roses tied with white satin ribbons. Both the ladies wore large hats. Following the ceremony a wedding breakfast was partaken of in the Banquet Hall. About thirty guests were seated, including Mr. and Mrs. Frederick Gallupe, parents of the bride, Mrs. W. P. Comee, and Mr. W. P. Comee, mother and brother of the groom; Mrs. Frederick Gallupe, Sr.; Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Robinson; Mr. and Mrs. John Lilly of Lambertville, N. J.; Mr. and Mrs. Charles E. Smith; Mr. and Mrs. A. F. Fessenden; Mr. and Mrs. and Miss Hopkins of Charlestown; Mr. and Mrs. Frank Cooper; Miss Gertrude Bent; Mr. Brown; Miss Morris and Miss Jennie Bird. Immediately after the breakfast, the bride and groom started for New York on a brief wedding trip. On their return they will occupy their new apartments at 179 Huntington avenue and will hold a reception on the evening of Jan. 23, from 8.30 to 10.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 12, 1894.

THERE were two orchestral concerts of interest during the past week. The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second concert of the season in the Metropolitan Opera House last Thursday evening and the New York Symphony Society gave its second afternoon concert Friday in Carnegie Hall, and its evening concert last Saturday.

Here is what Mr. Paur's organization presented in the way of a program, rather a melange:

Symphony No. 7, in A major, op. 92.....Ludwig van Beethoven
Soli for violin—
Adagio from Concerto No. 1, in G minor, op. 26.....Bruch
Concerto in D major.....Paganini
Mr. César Thomson.
Overture, "Die Verkaufte Braut".....Bedrich Smetana
"L'Arlésienne," orchestral suite No. 1.....Georges Bizet
Symphonic poem, "Les Préludes".....Franz Liszt

This scheme was not adhered to, as Mr. Thomson, without any previous notification, substituted the first movement of Bruch's second concerto (D minor) for the more familiar slow movement in E flat from the first concerto.

Mr. Paur was in a burly mood. He read the symphony in a reckless, even noisy manner, taking the allegros too fast and the poco sostenuto to the opening movement too slow. The scherzo was well played, however, while the last allegro was not only con brio, but with rudeness. Over-accentuation seemed to be the particular humor of the conductor, and Beethoven was served up with the most lurid tintings.

The symphony was not nearly so satisfactorily played as the C minor last season. The Bizet numbers are out of place on a classical program, being al fresco in manner and savoring of the vaudeville. Mr. Paur is as unhappy as Mr. Seidl when he attempts works of the French school. He is not a versatile man, and his touch lacks delicacy, his temperament vivacity. Mr. Paur is bourgeois, honest and simple in his notions of things musical, and when he is not rough he is respectable and middle class in sentiment.

The orchestra made a fine thing of Smetana's "Bartered Bride," which is no novelty here. The strings were excellent, although dense in tone at times, but the overture was played with dash. The wood wind distinguished itself in the Bizet minuet, and the trumpet in the allegretto of the symphony was off. This was accounted for by illness of the player, who is suffering from rheumatism. Liszt's preludes lacked brilliancy, color, precision, and oddly enough the string orchestra seemed to suffer in the matter of resonance. As a program it was entirely too long and illogically constructed.

Mr. Thomson played marvelously well. Always objective, he stands apart from his work, which is the supreme exemplification of art for art. The adagio was played in sculptural style, without the intimate warmth in its rather banal measures which Ysaye infused at the later concert. The Paganini concerto was a miracle of virtuosity and a run of octaves in rapid tempo at the close set the audience wild with enthusiasm. Comparisons between Thomson and Ysaye may be invidious, but seem to be inevitable this season. We can say, with Goethe of himself and Schiller: We are both a couple of big fellows. The next concert of the Boston Band will take place January 10, 1895.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 16.

The Symphony Concert.

On account of the holiday season and our over crowded space, our notice of the Symphony concert must be deferred to next week.

The Kneisel Quartet.

The Kneisel Quartet, assisted by Mr. Carl Baermann and Mr. L Pourtan, gave its third concert at Union Hall, on Monday evening. The programme was:

Quartet in D, op. 44, No. 1.....Mendelssohn.
Piano Trio in B flat, op. 97.....Beethoven.
Quintet for Clarinet and Strings.....Brahms.

The Mendelssohn quartet is time-eaten and dull, and we listen to it with a respect that is due to tradition only. It is not a large work, it is not a sincere work, and it is irritating in its mock sentiment and affectations. It could have been left off the programme with no loss to art and with positive benefit to sensitive nerves.

The magnificent Beethoven trio came as a welcome relief. It was beautifully played throughout, Mr. Baermann again showing himself in his happiest mood; his playing was noticeable for its fine finish, for its grace and elegance; it was faithful to the canons of the highest art, for there was no obtrusiveness, no attempt made to prevert the intention of composer by forcing the piano into undue prominence; there was the finest taste shown in the tone coloring; there were massive broadness of style, brilliancy, delicacy and artistic conscientiousness down to the very finest detail. Mr. Baermann again demonstrated his unrivalled skill as a Beethoven interpreter, and he was greeted with the most enthusiastic applause.

The Brahms quintet is undoubtedly a most scholarly work, but coming after the Beethoven inspiration, it seemed dull, or, at least, produced a feeling of dulness on the hearer. It appealed to the ear and not to the soul, and suggested a problem in quadratic equations which the hearer was too weary to solve. It had the merit, however, of bringing forward Mr. Pourtan, who demonstrated that he is a master of the clarinet. The tone he produces is exquisite in quality, his artistic taste is of the finest, and his technical skill that of a master. He plays without effort, difficulties are so easily conquered that they pass almost unnoticed, and his pianissimo playing is of the rarest delicacy.

As usual, the playing of the Kneisel Quartet was of the finest quality. It was intelligent and it was artistic, and it was a perpetual delight. The work of the organization was particularly fine in the Beethoven trio, while in the Brahms quintet its technical excellencies were shown at their best. The next concert takes place on Monday evening, December 31.

American Art Journal.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, DEC. 15, 1894.

Rubinstein's Ocean Symphony and Bruch's Second Concerto.

By the Symphony Society and Ysaye.

By the time the audience had assembled on Saturday evening last to attend the second concert of the Symphony Society at Carnegie Music Hall, it was quite prepared to listen sympathetically to Rubinstein's "Ocean" Symphony, which was given as a tribute to the memory of the illustrious dead, for it was one of the "wettest" nights on record. "True Damrosch weather," growled in the foyer a storm-beaten musico-maniac, who would as soon think of sacrificing his artistically flowing locks upon the altar of fashion as to dream of missing a symphony concert, especially when Ysaye played.

Not that Ysaye had anything to do with the Ocean Symphony, but the orchestra did, and notwithstanding the dampness which always takes a certain amount of resonance away from the strings, the Damrosch forces played so remarkably well that due credit should be allowed them for their work. Mr. Damrosch was in a goodly vein, and conducted with unusual carefulness, and was alert for effective nuances. Rubinstein's melodious and flowing phrases are very grateful and well repay a little attention of this kind, while the musicians were thoroughly en rapport with the music, the result being an unusually finished and sympathetic performance.

Rubinstein had a certain weakness for the rich tones of the 'cello, and some of his best music has been given to that instrument. This is especially the case in this Ocean symphony, where the 'cellos have those broad and irresistible themes which characterize it as the greatest of all his orchestral compositions, and it is conceded that the Symphony Society has an admirable force of 'cellists. The movements of the symphony given upon this occasion were: 1. Allegro Moderato; 2. Allegro; 3. Adagio; 4. Scherzo; 5. Adagio, Allegro con fuoco. There was much applause following each movement, for this work is a favorite with our musical public.

M. Ysaye, who has thoroughly ingratiated himself with our concert goers, was heard in Max Bruch's second violin concerto and played better than he had yet done here. Great musicians, like all artists, have their moments of inspiration, and those who were fortunate enough to hear Ysaye play upon this occasion will not soon forget the suberb waiving of individuality, the complete abandonment to the musical meaning, the large tone, rich, full and throbbing with vitality and that dominating sense of the realization of power and magnetism. The glowing warmth of Ysay's tone, whether in those delicious mezzo tints, which he delights in and which are so tremendously effective, or in the broad phrases of a fortissimo passage, must always be admired. How crisp and clean was the execution of the finale of the concerto! The phrases were given as though cut out with a knife from the orchestral background.

Bruch's second concerto, while not as familiar as the first, has much that is admirable about it. Ysaye invested it with an interest that made one listen breathlessly to every note. The recalls at its close were too numerous to count.

If the concert could have ended right here, with the memory of the Ocean Symphony and the Bruch Concerto ringing in one's ears, the impression would have been perfect. But there was still the entire second part of the program to come, and it led to the reflection that after all people are too fond of being heard and seen to lightly relinquish any opportunity that comes along.

Not that the public were willing to let Ysaye go even after the new Theme and Variations by Joachim had been waded through, exhibiting an immense display of technique and virtuosity, the music—or rather lack of music—affording no other possibilities. Like a true artist Ysaye chose for his encore the other extreme, giving us the exquisite but grand simplicity of Bach, which somewhat smoothed our ruffled spirits. The remaining orchestral numbers were the "Tristan and Isolde," "Liebesnacht" scene, arranged for orchestra by Mr. Damrosch, which failed to prove very impressive or as rapturous as one would expect, although beautifully scored; and for a closing number a genuine novelty, by the new musical sensation Humperdinck, whose fairy opera, "Hansel und Gretel," has made an unprecedented success in Germany. It was the prelude to this opera which was heard, and exceedingly musical and refreshing it was, with some catchy tone colors and striking effects which would delight an audience at any other time. But too much music dulls the senses of even a symphony audience, and this musical fairy tale must await another hearing to be properly appreciated.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR

VOL. XCVI., NO. 169.

SUNDAY, DECEMBER 16, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Performance in Honor of the Late Anton Rubinstein.

The concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall last night was in memory of Anton Rubinstein. The programme was.

Funeral march from the "Eroica" symphony, Beethoven

Concerto for pianoforte, No. 4, D minor, Rubinstein

"Ocean" symphony.....Rubinstein
(With the additional movements.)

The soloist was Mrs. Ernest Lent. The occasion was further emphasized by a bust of the late composer placed on the front of the stage and surrounded by evergreens. There was a very large audience. The symphony was presented in its completeness for the first time here. It is said that Rubinstein cherished a desire to hear it played in its entirety at one concert, but that his wish was never gratified. It is strange that with his well-known horror of the ocean he should have dedicated a symphony to it, but perhaps his distaste for it came after he had finished his stupendous tribute to it. The work is a noble one, full of poetry, fire and passion; wonderfully picturesque at times, often rising to true sublimity, and never lacking in dignity and earnestness. On the whole, it may be justly considered his masterpiece, the most thorough and most vigorous expression of his genius, and showing his extraordinary fertility of invention, his inexhaustible store of melody and his command over all the resources of his art in their fullest and most impressive forms. And yet, to listen to a symphony in seven movements makes a demand on the attention that cannot well be filled without something of mental and emotional exhaustion, no heed how masterly and how stirring the work may be, and it must be confessed that the composer in depicting his subject has not been quite able to avoid repetition, if not in his themes and their treatment, at least in the sentiment that pervades. It may be, perhaps, overdaring to suggest that he has said all that it was possible to say in tone language, in the opening movements; but whether this be so or not, this portion of the work is the most brilliant, most steadily interesting and most satisfying.

The storm movement, which on this occasion had its first performance here, is a wonderful triumph of instrumentation, and is stirringly dramatic in effect, but the fatal fluency that often swayed Rubinstein has its full swing here, and interest in the movement palls long before the last bar is reached. The symphony was magnificently read and played. Mr. Paur has done nothing finer, more clean-cut and more brilliant with his orchestra this season than he achieved in the two movements named.

Mrs. Lent, who was received with cordial friendliness, gave a thoughtful and intelligent interpretation of the concerto. She has a technique of the highest finish, a beautiful touch, faultless precision and marked musical instinct. Her style is refined, and her playing showed throughout every evidence of careful training and sincere study; and yet, despite the polish, the fluency and the clearness of her performance, the purity of taste she brought to bear on it and her decided artistic feeling, her effort was, in the main, inexplicably unsatisfying. She was at her best in the opening movement which she attacked with a masculine vigor which she maintained spiritedly to its close; but from this moment she became less interesting. The slow movement was read in a somewhat dry and perfunctory manner, and the finale was lacking in force and spirit. It would appear that she had taken the opening allegro at too furious a pace and had exhausted her physical power then and there. Still there was so much of excellence in her playing and so much that made a strong and pleasing impression as to excite a desire to hear her again in a less exacting work. She was rewarded with hearty applause and twice recalled.

The programme for the next concert is: Symphony in D, Ph. E. Bach; Aria, "Sweet Bird," Handel; "Hirtenmusik," J. S. Bach; symphony in G, Haydn; Aria from "Taming of the Shrew," Goetz; overture, "Fidelio," Beethoven. The soloist is to be Miss Gertrude Franklin.

Mr. Frederic R. Comee was married on Wednesday last at the Brunswick to Miss Galloupe, daughter of the United States deputy marshal. He has been for the past few years associated with Mr. Ellis as one of the Boston symphony orchestra, and has made hosts of friends not only in Boston but in all the cities in which the orchestra plays by his unfailing tact and courtesy. Mr. Comee is a graduate of Harvard of the class of '74, and not only his classmates but all with whom he is associated will wish for him and his bride a long, bright and happy future.

The second week of "A Gaiety Girl" at the Hollis has attracted some of the best people in the Boston social world to that cosy little play house during the past week. Among those noticed in

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, DECEMBER 16, 1894.

The Symphony Concert in Memory of Anton Rubinstein.

The eighth Symphony concert, given last evening in Music Hall under Mr. Paur, was in memory of Anton Rubinstein. The program was as follows:

Funeral March, from Symphony No. 3, in E flat Major "Eroica".....Beethoven

Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 4, in D minor.....Rubinstein

Symphony No. 2, in C major. "Ocean."....Rubinstein

I. Moderato assai.
II. Lento assai.—Con moto moderato.
III. Andante.
IV. Allegro.
V. Andante.
VI. Scherzo; Allegro. Trio: Moderato assai.
VII. Andante. Allegro con fuoco.

There was a peculiar fitness in giving the D minor concerto at a concert in memory of the great Russian, for the concerto is the most sustained, the noblest of his compositions of long breath. Here is no decrescendo of interest, as there is in so many of his other works. Indeed, this concerto for beauty of themes and ingeniousness of treatment stands among the great pieces for piano and orchestra. It is a heroic concerto and it demands a heroic performance. Mrs. Ernest Lent, the pianist of last evening, has a clean, well developed technique, an agreeable touch, and much taste. Her playing was marked also by sincerity. The first movement was attacked in heroic vein, and in this movement she was at her best. In the slow movement, although her clearness and her phrasing were generally admirable, there was a lack of sensuous beauty as well as of romantic spirit. In the finale there was little of the demoniac fire that should blaze from the smoking keys. It seemed as though the pianist was exhausted, and where there should have been triumphant strength there was comparative weakness. The performance as a whole excited genuine admiration. It did not move. It did not thrill.

The first movement of the "Ocean" symphony is majestic and glorious, an honor to any composer who thought in symphonic form. The other movements will not send the name of Rubinstein ringing down the ages. As a whole, it is not as characteristic a work as the "Dramatic" symphony which was played last season. There are fine descriptive effects in the "Storm," the allegro in G major is not without interest, but there is much that is merely sentimental or operatic, or just plain, simple padding in the last six movements. To give the symphony in all its tedious length seemed like doubtful reverence to the mighty dead. It is said that Mr. Paur decided to give the seven movements because Rubinstein never heard them all in consecutive order during his life time. Probably Mr. Paur thought that if Rubinstein could hear them now, he would be particularly pleased to hear the strains in Boston.

And yet a group of Rubinstein's songs—"The Asra," "Gold rolls here beneath me," "When thy gentle voice I hear"—would have more fully displayed the genius of the Russian than did this symphonic mixture of the blatant and the trivial. Nor is it too much to say that the ballet music from "Feramors" or "The Demon" is a more finished, exquisite piece of art than is the "Ocean" symphony as a whole.

The orchestra played with care and with a wealth of tone. Each movement of the symphony after the first was a signal for the departure of a portion of the audience. The bust of Rubinstein reminded many of the leonine pianist who in his great moments knew no equal. Truly, a remarkable musician of unusual versatility. The memorial occasion was not one of sorrow as when a composer of great promise dies. For Rubinstein had lived a full and honored life. He had said his say to the world.

His apotheosis was not posthumous. Before he died he knew that his was a shining name in the roll of musicians of the 19th century. And this honor was worn modestly, for the composer and pianist was a simple, generous, lovable, heroic man.

PHILIP HALE.

The marriage of Miss Clara E. Gallupe, daughter of United States Deputy Marshal Frederick Gallupe, to Mr. Frederick R. Comee, took place at the Brunswick Wednesday noon. The ceremony was performed by Rev. Leighton Parks, and Mr. Charles A. Ellis acted as best man.

The bride, who was married in her traveling suit, was attended by Miss Alice Dunbar as maid of honor, while Mr. Norman Woodward of Worcester and Mr. Walter I. Swasey acted as ushers.

A wedding breakfast followed, to which about 30 sat down, among them being: Mrs. M. W. Comee, mother of the groom, Mr. W. P. Comee of New York, his brother, Mr. and Mrs. Charles G. Smith, Mr. Harry Taylor of Baltimore, Mr. and Mrs. John Lilly of New Jersey, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Robinson, Mr. William Gallupe, Sr., Mr. and Mrs. Frederick D. Gallupe, Mr. and Mrs. Frank Cooper, Miss Gertrude Bent, Mr. James P. Brown, Mr. and Mrs. C. H. Hopkins, Miss Hopkins, Mrs. Norris, Miss Norris, Mr. James P. Brown.

Mr. Comee is a Harvard '76 man, and is well known to the smart set through his association with Music Hall and the Symphony Orchestra. On their return to town Mr. and Mrs. Comee will reside at 170 Huntington Avenue, where they will receive Wednesday evening, Jan. 23.

Echoes from Last Night's Symphony Concert.

The Symphony concert last night was a memorial to Anton Rubinstein and a bust of the dead pianist and composer, decorated with wreaths of laurel, was placed at the front of the Music hall platform. The program was as follows:

Funeral march from symphony No. 3, in E flat, Ludwig van Beethoven; major, "Eroica,"; concerto for pianoforte, No. 4, in D minor, Anton Rubinstein; symphony No. 2, in C major, "Ocean," Anton Rubinstein.

In consequence of the announcement that the concert would be a memorial, the audience was one of the largest, if not the very largest of the season. Every seat was filled and hundreds of listeners stood in the side aisles.

Although there were only three numbers on the program, it was one of the longest Mr. Paur has given us this year, and his concerts have not been noted for the shortness of their duration. The "Ocean" symphony, the whole of which has never before been performed in Boston, lasted for over an hour, and by that time many of the audience had left the hall.

It was a poorly-arranged program, too; the Beethoven funeral march was certainly the lightest and most popular number, and should have been reserved until the last. Instead, it began the program.

Mrs Lent played the concerto well, and was cordially applauded by the audience, but Boston has many pianists, who could give a much better performance. Her execution and technique were good, but she lacked power, and much of the time the piano part was hidden by the orchestra. She was awkward in every movement.

As has ben said, the "Ocean" symphony has never before in its entirety been played in Boston, and it is safe to say that most of the people who heard it yesterday hope that some of the seven movements will be omitted at the next performance.

The second movement, known as "The Storm," was on account of the peculiar musical effects, the most interesting. Effects of the storm were imitated in every possible way. The wind could be heard howling through the rigging, the sails flapped and strained, the thunder reverberated and the masts went by the board.

All this was in the music. But it took so much noise to convey the impressions that the listeners had at times to put their hands to their ears, and almost every one in the hall, players and auditors alike, was on the broad grin. The work of the orchestra was satisfactory.

The program for next Friday and Saturday will be:

Symphony in D major.....Ph E Bach
Sweet Bird (Air de Rossignol de L'Allegro et il Penseroso).....Handel
Hirtenmusik.....J S Bach
Symphony in G major.....Haydn
Aria from Taming of the Shrew.....Goetz
Overture, Fidelio.....Beethoven
Soloist, Miss Gertrude Franklin.

BOSTON POST.

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 16, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY.

A Programme in Memoriam of Anton Rubinstein.

The concert of the Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall last evening was devoted to a programme in memoriam of Anton Rubinstein, when the following selections were given:

Beethoven—Funeral march, from Symphony No. 3, in E flat major, "Eroica." Op. 55.

Rubinstein—Concerto for pianoforte, No. 4, in D minor. Op. 70.

Rubinstein—Symphony No. 2, in C major, "Ocean." Op. 42.

The soloist was Mrs. Ernest Lent.

The programme was unusually long, but thoroughly delightful, and Mr. Paur received great praise, not only for the arrangement, but for the artistic manner in which the music was rendered. Beethoven's funeral march from "Eroica" is a grandly impressive movement. It is sufficiently familiar to make it doubly interesting, and its able rendering added to the beauty of the music.

Rubinstein's "Ocean" symphony has never before been given in Boston in its entirety, the second movement, known as "the storm," being the new feature. It is a masterly work throughout its seven movements, and even its great length did not detract from its attractiveness.

The "storm" movement was marvellously well handled, the intricate and difficult orchestration being most skilfully and artistically rendered. The fourth movement, with its merry melody, especially delighted the audience.

Mrs. Lent, the soloist of the concerto, is a Washington lady and is comparatively little known here. She made a favorable impression, but the heavy work was something of a tax upon her. She has a clear touch and a brilliant execution, but was a little overweighted.

Miss Gertrude Franklin will be the soloist at the rehearsal and concert of the present week.

Last evening a large bust of Rubinstein was placed upon the platform, surrounded by a halo of palm leaves.

[64]

American Art Journal.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, DEC. 15, 1894.

Rubinstein's Ocean Symphony and Bruch's Second Concerto.

By the Symphony Society and Ysaye.

By the time the audience had assembled on Saturday evening last to attend the second concert of the Symphony Society at Carnegie Music Hall, it was quite prepared to listen sympathetically to Rubinstein's "Ocean" Symphony, which was given as a tribute to the memory of the illustrious dead, for it was one of the "wettest" nights on record. "True Damrosch weather," growled in the foyer a storm-beaten musico-maniac, who would as soon think of sacrificing his artistically flowing locks upon the altar of fashion as to dream of missing a symphony concert, especially when Ysaye played.

Not that Ysaye had anything to do with the Ocean Symphony, but the orchestra did, and notwithstanding the dampness which always takes a certain amount of resonance away from the strings, the Damrosch forces played so remarkably well that due credit should be allowed them for their work. Mr. Damrosch was in a goodly vein, and conducted with unusual carefulness, and was alert for effective nuances. Rubinstein's melodious and flowing phrases are very grateful and well repay a little attention of this kind, while the musicians were thoroughly en rapport with the music, the result being an unusually finished and sympathetic performance.

Rubinstein had a certain weakness for the rich tones of the 'cello, and some of his best music has been given to that instrument. This is especially the case in this Ocean symphony, where the 'cellos have those broad and irresistible themes which characterize it as the greatest of all his orchestral compositions, and it is conceded that the Symphony Society has an admirable force of 'cellists. The movements of the symphony given upon this occasion were: 1. Allegro Moderato; 2. Allegro; 3. Adagio; 4. Scherzo; 5. Adagio. Allegro con fuoco. There was much applause following each movement, for this work is a favorite with our musical public.

M. Ysaye, who has thoroughly ingratiated himself with our concert goers, was heard in Max Bruch's second violin concerto and played better than he had yet done here. Great musicians, like all artists, have their moments of inspiration, and those who were fortunate enough to hear Ysaye play upon this occasion will not soon forget the suberb waiving of individuality, the complete abandonment to the musical meaning, the large tone, rich, full and throbbing with vitality and that dominating sense of the realization of power and magnetism. The glowing warmth of Ysay's tone, whether in those delicious mezzo tints, which he delights in and which are so tremendously effective, or in the broad phrases of a fortissimo passage, must always be admired. How crisp and clean was the execution of the finale of the concerto! The phrases were given as though cut out with a knife from the orchestral background.

Bruch's second concerto, while not as familiar as the first, has much that is admirable about it. Ysaye invested it with an interest that made one listen breathlessly to every note. The recalls at its close were too numerous to count.

If the concert could have ended right here, with the memory of the Ocean Symphony and the Bruch Concerto ringing in one's ears, the impression would have been perfect. But there was still the entire second part of the program to come, and it led to the reflection that after all people are too fond of being heard and seen to lightly relinquish any opportunity that comes along.

Not that the public were willing to let Ysaye go even after the new Theme and Variations by Joachim had been waded through, exhibiting an immense display of technique and virtuosity, the music—or rather lack of music—affording no other possibilities. Like a true artist Ysaye chose for his encore the other extreme, giving us the exquisite but grand simplicity of Bach, which somewhat smoothed our ruffled spirits. The remaining orchestral numbers were the "Tristan and Isolde," "Liebesnacht" scene, arranged for orchestra by Mr. Damrosch, which failed to prove very impressive or as rapturous as one would expect, although beautifully scored; and for a closing number a genuine novelty, by the new musical sensation Humperdinck, whose fairy opera, "Hansel und Gretel," has made an unprecedented success in Germany It was the prelude to this opera which was heard, and exceedingly musical and refreshing it was, with some catchy tone colors and striking effects which would delight an audience at any other time. But too much music dulls the senses of even a symphony audience, and this musical fairy tale must await another hearing to be properly appreciated.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR

VOL. XCVI., NO. 169.

SUNDAY, DECEMBER 16, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Performance in Honor of the Late Anton Rubinstein.

The concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall last night was in memory of Anton Rubinstein. The programme was.

Funeral march from the "Eroica" symphony, Beethoven

Concerto for pianoforte, No. 4, D minor, Rubinstein

"Ocean" symphony.....Rubinstein
(With the additional movements.)

The soloist was Mrs. Ernest Lent. The occasion was further emphasized by a bust of the late composer placed on the front of the stage and surrounded by evergreens. There was a very large audience. The symphony was presented in its completeness for the first time here. It is said that Rubinstein cherished a desire to hear it played in its entirety at one concert, but that his wish was never gratified. It is strange that with his well-known horror of the ocean he should have dedicated a symphony to it, but perhaps his distaste for it came after he had finished his stupendous tribute to it. The work is a noble one, full of poetry, fire and passion; wonderfully picturesque at times, often rising to true sublimity, and never lacking in dignity and earnestness. On the whole, it may be justly considered his masterpiece, the most thorough and most vigorous expression of his genius, and showing his extraordinary fertility of invention, his inexhaustible store of melody and his command over all the resources of his art in their fullest and most impressive forms. And yet, to listen to a symphony in seven movements makes a demand on the attention that cannot well be filled without something of mental and emotional exhaustion, no heed how masterly and how stirring the work may be, and it must be confessed that the composer in depicting his subject has not been quite able to avoid repetition, if not in his themes and their treatment, at least in the sentiment that pervades. It may be, perhaps, overdaring to suggest that he has said all that it was possible to say in tone language, in the opening movements; but whether this be so or not, this portion of the work is the most brilliant, most steadily interesting and most satisfying.

The storm movement, which on this occasion had its first performance here, is a wonderful triumph of instrumentation, and is stirringly dramatic in effect, but the fatal fluency that often swayed Rubinstein has its full swing here, and interest in the movement palls long before the last bar is reached. The symphony was magnificently read and played. Mr. Paur has done nothing finer, more clean-cut and more brilliant with his orchestra this season than he achieved in the two movements named.

Mrs. Lent, who was received with cordial friendliness, gave a thoughtful and intelligent interpretation of the concerto. She has a technique of the highest finish, a beautiful touch, faultless precision and marked musical instinct. Her style is refined, and her playing showed throughout every evidence of careful training and sincere study; and yet, despite the polish, the fluency and the clearness of her performance, the purity of taste she brought to bear on it and her decided artistic feeling, her effort was, in the main, inexplicably unsatisfying. She was at her best in the opening movement which she attacked with a masculine vigor which she maintained spiritedly to its close; but from this moment she became less interesting. The slow movement was read in a somewhat dry and perfunctory manner, and the finale was lacking in force and spirit. It would appear that she had taken the opening allegro at too furious a pace and had exhausted her physical power then and there. Still there was so much of excellence in her playing and so much that made a strong and pleasing impression as to excite a desire to hear her again in a less exacting work. She was rewarded with hearty applause and twice recalled.

The programme for the next concert is: Symphony in D, Ph. E. Bach; Aria, "Sweet Bird," Handel; "Hirtenmusik," J. S. Bach; symphony in G, Haydn; Aria from "Taming of the Shrew," Goetz; overture, "Fidelio," Beethoven. The soloist is to be Miss Gertrude Franklin.

Mr. Frederic R. Comee was married on Wednesday last at the Brunswick to Miss Galloupe, daughter of the United States deputy marshal. He has been for the past few years associated with Mr. Ellis as one of the Boston symphony orchestra, and has made hosts of friends not only in Boston but in all the cities in which the orchestra plays by his unfailing tact and courtesy. Mr. Comee is a graduate of Harvard of the class of '74, and not only his classmates but all with whom he is associated will wish for him and his bride a long, bright and happy future.

The second week of "A Gaiety Girl" at the Hollis has attracted some of the best people in the Boston social world to that cosy little play house during the past week. Among those noticed in

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, DECEMBER 16, 1894.

The Symphony Concert in Memory of Anton Rubinstein.

The eighth Symphony concert, given last evening in Music Hall under Mr. Paur, was in memory of Anton Rubinstein. The program was as follows:

Funeral March, from Symphony No. 3, in E flat Major "Eroica".....Beethoven

Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 4, in D minor..... Rubinstein

Symphony No. 2, in C major. "Ocean."..... Rubinstein

I. Moderato assai.
II. Lento assai.—Con moto moderato.
III. Andante.
IV. Allegro.
V. Andante.
VI. Scherzo: Allegro. Trio: Moderato assai.
VII. Andante. Allegro con fuoco.

There was a peculiar fitness in giving the D minor concerto at a concert in memory of the great Russian, for the concerto is the most sustained, the noblest of his compositions of long breath. Here is no decrescendo of interest, as there is in so many of his other works. Indeed, this concerto for beauty of themes and ingeniousness of treatment stands among the great pieces for piano and orchestra. It is a heroic concerto and it demands a heroic performance. Mrs. Ernest Lent, the pianist of last evening, has a clean, well developed technique, an agreeable touch, and much taste. Her playing was marked also by sincerity. The first movement was attacked in heroic vein, and in this movement she was at her best. In the slow movement, although her clearness and her phrasing were generally admirable, there was a lack of sensuous beauty as well as of romantic spirit. In the finale there was little of the demoniac fire that should blaze from the smoking keys. It seemed as though the pianist was exhausted, and where there should have been triumphant strength there was comparative weakness. The performance as a whole excited genuine admiration. It did not move. It did not thrill.

The first movement of the "Ocean" symphony is majestic and glorious, an honor to any composer who thought in symphonic form. The other movements will not send the name of Rubinstein ringing down the ages. As a whole, it is not as characteristic a work as the "Dramatic" symphony which was played last season. There are fine descriptive effects in the "Storm," the allegro in G major is not without interest, but there is much that is merely sentimental or operatic, or just plain, simple padding in the last six movements. To give the symphony in all its tedious length seemed like doubtful reverence to the mighty dead. It is said that Mr. Paur decided to give the seven movements because Rubinstein never heard them all in consecutive order during his life time. Probably Mr. Paur thought that if Rubinstein could hear them now, he would be particularly pleased to hear the strains in Boston.

And yet a group of Rubinstein's songs—"The Asra," "Gold rolls here beneath me," "When thy gentle voice I hear"—would have more fully displayed the genius of the Russian than did this symphonic mixture of the blatant and the trivial. Nor is it too much to say that the ballet music from "Feramors" or "The Demon" is a more finished, exquisite piece of art than is the "Ocean" symphony as a whole.

The orchestra played with care and with a wealth of tone. Each movement of the symphony after the first was a signal for the departure of a portion of the audience. The bust of Rubinstein reminded many of the leonine pianist who in his great moments knew no equal. Truly, a remarkable musician of unusual versatility. The memorial occasion was not one of sorrow as when a composer of great promise dies. For Rubinstein had lived a full and honored life. He had said his say to the world.

His apotheosis was not posthumous. Before he died he knew that his was a shining name in the roll of musicians of the 19th century. And this honor was worn modestly, for the composer and pianist was a simple, generous, lovable, heroic man.

PHILIP HALE.

The marriage of Miss Clara E. Gallupe, daughter of United States Deputy Marshal Frederick Gallupe, to Mr. Frederick R. Comee, took place at the Brunswick Wednesday noon. The ceremony was performed by Rev. Leighton Parks, and Mr. Charles A. Ellis acted as best man.

The bride, who was married in her traveling suit, was attended by Miss Alice Dunbar as maid of honor, while Mr. Norman Woodward of Worcester and Mr. Walter I. Swasey acted as ushers.

A wedding breakfast followed, to which about 30 sat down, among them being: Mrs. M. W. Comee, mother of the groom, Mr. W. P. Comee of New York, his brother, Mr. and Mrs. Charles G. Smith, Mr. Harry Taylor of Baltimore, Mr. and Mrs. John Lilly of New Jersey, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Robinson, Mr. William Gallupe, Sr., Mr. and Mrs. Frederick D. Gallupe, Mr. and Mrs. Frank Cooper, Miss Gertrude Bent, Mr. James P. Brown, Mr. and Mrs. C. H. Hopkins, Miss Hopkins, Mrs. Norris, Miss Norris, Mr. James P. Brown.

Mr. Comee is a Harvard '76 man, and is well known to the smart set through his association with Music Hall and the Symphony Orchestra. On their return to town Mr. and Mrs. Comee will reside at 170 Huntington Avenue, where they will receive Wednesday evening, Jan. 23.

SUNDAY

Echoes from Last Night's Symphony Concert.

The Symphony concert last night was a memorial to Anton Rubinstein and a bust of the dead pianist and composer, decorated with wreaths of laurel, was placed at the front of the Music hall platform. The program was as follows:

Funeral march from symphony No. 3, in E flat, Ludwig van Beethoven; major, "Eroica,"; concerto for pianoforte, No. 4, in D minor, Anton Rubinstein; symphony No. 2, in C major, "Ocean," Anton Rubinstein.

In consequence of the announcement that the concert would be a memorial, the audience was one of the largest, if not the very largest of the season. Every seat was filled and hundreds of listeners stood in the side aisles.

Although there were only three numbers on the program, it was one of the longest Mr. Paur has given us this year, and his concerts have not been noted for the shortness of their duration. The "Ocean" symphony, the whole of which has never before been performed in Boston, lasted for over an hour, and by that time many of the audience had left the hall.

It was a poorly-arranged program, too; the Beethoven funeral march was certainly the lightest and most popular number, and should have been reserved until the last. Instead, it began the program.

Mrs Lent played the concerto well, and was cordially applauded by the audience, but Boston has many pianists who could give a much better performance. Her execution and technique were good, but she lacked power, and much of the time the piano part was hidden by the orchestra. She was awkward in every movement.

As has ben said, the "Ocean" symphony has never before in its entirety been played in Boston, and it is safe to say that most of the people who heard it yesterday hope that some of the seven movements will be omitted at the next performance.

The second movement, known as "The Storm," was on account of the peculiar musical effects, the most interesting. Effects of the storm were imitated in every possible way. The wind could be heard howling through the rigging, the sails flapped and strained, the thunder reverberated and the masts went by the board.

All this was in the music. But it took so much noise to convey the impressions that the listeners had at times to put their hands to their ears, and almost every one in the hall, players and auditors alike, was on the broad grin. The work of the orchestra was satisfactory.

The program for next Friday and Saturday will be:

Symphony in D major .....Ph E Bach
Sweet Bird (Air de Rossignol de L'Allegro et il Penseroso) .....Handel
Hirtenmusik .....J S Bach
Symphony in G major .....Haydn
Aria from Taming of the Shrew .....Goetz
Overture, Fidelio .....Beethoven
Soloist, Miss Gertrude Franklin.

BOSTON POST.

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 16, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY.

A Programme in Memoriam of Anton Rubinstein.

The concert of the Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall last evening was devoted to a programme in memoriam of Anton Rubinstein, when the following selections were given:

Beethoven—Funeral march, from Symphony No. 3, in E flat major, "Eroica." Op. 55.

Rubinstein—Concerto for pianoforte, No. 4, in D minor. Op. 70.

Rubinstein—Symphony No. 2, in C major, "Ocean." Op. 42.

The soloist was Mrs. Ernest Lent.

The programme was unusually long, but thoroughly delightful, and Mr. Paur received great praise, not only for the arrangement, but for the artistic manner in which the music was rendered. Beethoven's funeral march from "Eroica" is a grandly impressive movement. It is sufficiently familiar to make it doubly interesting, and its able rendering added to the beauty of the music.

Rubinstein's "Ocean" symphony has never before been given in Boston in its entirety, the second movement, known as "the storm," being the new feature. It is a masterly work throughout its seven movements, and even its great length did not detract from its attractiveness.

The "storm" movement was marvellously well handled, the intricate and difficult orchestration being most skilfully and artistically rendered. The fourth movement, with its merry melody, especially delighted the audience.

Mrs. Lent, the soloist of the concerto, is a Washington lady and is comparatively little known here. She made a favorable impression, but the heavy work was something of a tax upon her. She has a clear touch and a brilliant execution, but was a little overweighted.

Miss Gertrude Franklin will be the soloist at the rehearsal and concert of the present week.

Last evening a large bust of Rubinstein was placed upon the platform, surrounded by a halo of palm leaves.

[64]

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 16, 1894.

MUSIC

CONCERTS OF THE PAST WEEK.

The amusement week, so far as music is concerned, began on Monday evening with the third concert of the Kneisel Quartette, when these compositions were played: Mendelssohn's D major quartette, opus 44, No. 1; Beethoven's pianoforte trio in B-flat major, opus 97; Brahms' clarinet quintette in B minor, opus 115. The concert had the not unusual fault of its fellows—it was too long; for even the connoisseur and the dilettante cannot fully absorb, much less enjoy, two hours of such music, sitting on small, hard, slippery chairs in an ill-ventilated, overwarm hall. The nearest approach to possible pleasure would be won only when all the music should be delightful in itself and perfect in its performance with all external conditions favorable. On this occasion the first condition was not fulfilled. The Mendelssohn quartette is well enough written, but the peculiar and distinctive qualities of its author for which he is most welcomed and appreciated are too often absent from it, so that the movements drag along with little freshness of spirit or lightness of foot. So too the Brahms quintette has a deal of dull ponderousness in the learned labor of its first movement and the protracted evolutions of its third, for bearing up against which one hardly feels repaid by the great beauty and pleasantness of the romance-like adagio and the agreeable animation of the short finale. But the Beethoven is perennially sweet, noble and enlivening. Of course, however, the performance was perfect—how could it be else? For the Quartette—the only possible modification of whose now flawless playing would come from their associating with themselves some artist not exactly in sympathy and touch with themselves—had the co-operation of Mr. Baermann and Mr. Pourtan. The former, complete and catholic musician and player that he is, is always especially felicitous in his renderings of Beethoven, and his share in the trio was masterly at all points. Indeed it seemed his highest and most beautiful achievement in ensemble playing—always ready, ample, warm and full, but never dominant, and enlightened the scherzo with rare elegance and sparkle. M. Pourtau was fully equal to his task and showed that to the solidity and certainty of his orchestral style he added the fineness and the polish necessary for chamber music. The beauty and equality of his tone—never rough in the lower register nor strident in the upper—and the nicety and grace of his phrasing were especially remarked.

The presence upon the Music Hall platform of a marble bust of Rubinstein, mounted upon a laurelled and vine-wreathed pedestal, would have implied to any attendant upon the Eighth Symphony concert that the programme might be expected to commemorate the master so lately dead, even if no announcement of that tenor had been previously made. There were but three numbers on that programme and these, extending a little over two hours, had the natural effect of emptying many seats long before the evening was over, although there was enough of interest and consequence in the concert to justify its unusual length and to repay the majority who remained faithful to the end.

The first selection was the funeral march from Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, which we do not remember to have ever heard quite so satisfactorily played—certainly never when we enjoyed it so greatly and felt at once so much uplifted and so much made pensive and subdued. Being marked "adagio assai," conductors are apt to take it so slowly that it drags on a weary length, instead of marching with slow and solemn step, or else, fearing this dreary sluggishness of movement, they quicken it beyond that measure of gravity which is necessary to impress the spirit deeply. Mr. Paur took a markedly slow tempo, but he made his men give elasticity and pulsation to their march and allowed just the slightest enhancement of its progression in the lighter and tenderer phases. The effect was beautiful, pathetic and yet commanding.

Then followed Rubinstein's fourth pianoforte concerto—that in D minor, his opus 70. The pianist was Mrs. Ernest Lent, of Washington, an interesting, intelligent and able player, whose simplicity of manner, indicating that she is not too much accustomed to great concert audiences, was quite charming. She appears to be—allowance made for some differences in their personal equations—a player of similar caste and calibre to Mrs. Paur. Her execution is apt, clear, ready and sufficient; she reads cantabile passages with a well sustained phrasing, strikes out octaves and double octaves freely and vibrantly and gives brightness and lightness to bravura and ornament, being also regardful of the proper attitude of the piano to the full score. Her style appeared incomplete in the narrowness of its range of gradations of color and volume. Contrast indeed there was, but rather as between softness and loudness than as between the interior qualities of rendering. And again in long developments she was inclined to reach the maximum of her power before the true climax of the music had been attained. But she played with understanding, confidence and a sure grasp upon the form and the general purport of each movement and won particular approbation for the broad sweep of the first and the calm vocality of the second, the extended romance-like theme of which was delightfully delivered and no less delightfully produced by Mr. Pourtan's clarinet.

Then came the whole of Rubinstein's "Ocean" symphony, which nobody has had the courage heretofore to give in its entirety here in Boston, if memory serves me rightly. So long indeed is it, that it might as reasonably be called the "Equator," since its seven movements might almost belt about the whole globe of music, while its famous storm might quite as well represent a tropical tempest as a gale at sea. Yet, somehow—was it in Mr. Paur's vital, inspiriting and earnest direction or was it in the true chiar' oscuro and emotional antithesis gained by the full performance?——his complete sequence seemed less heavy and exacting than the customary group of four which most attendants upon orchestral concerts have heard.

The reader probably understands that this is not a descriptive composition, if we except the first mentioned second movement, which is an amazingly picturesque, faithful and powerful portrayal of storm and gale. It is in suggestion chiefly if not entirely and in moods and correspondences that the truth of the title must be sought, and since there comes no word from the composer to say what he, who stood so much in awe and dread as well as in admiration, of the great world of waters meant each movement to signify, every listener must define for himself according to his experiences or his fancies. The opening moderato, with its progress from cool flute notes and shivering chords to the full notes of the orchestra, perhaps implies that power which underlies even the daintiest foam-crest, and reveals to us those lines of Tennyson.

"A wild wave in the wide North-sea,
Green-glimmering toward the summit, bears with all
Its stormy crests that smoke against the skies,
Down on a bank, and overbears the bark,
And him that helms it."

The second is the great and wonderful storm scene, with "the piping of the gale and thunder in the clouds," the whistle and roar, the dash and crash, the sudden suspense and the instant vehemence, the apparently invincible fury and the slow exhaustion of a whirlwind. The third, an andante, hints at the glad but grave ascriptions of pious gratitude in returning calm, while the fourth, an allegro, has a loud, strong, hearty character which brings to mind the rough gayety of under spirits, as if a great crew were allowed their own festivity, where the more dignified rejoicings were over. Then comes a fifth movement, an almost plaintive andante, as if writing its all-embracing circuit the sea included sorrow, loss and mourning, while the natural return to mirth and carelessness is perhaps alluded to in the scherzo, which is the one movement of all most like in temper anent what one expects from a symphony. The finale, beginning with a slow introduction, passes soon into a fiery allegro which unites itself through the sense of power and domination in the first movement, but passes beyond it in the chorale-like passages which, borne up on the full resonance of the brass choir, rises like a glorification of the power which is beyond all powers. Through almost all the movements there runs a restless, swaying undertone (so to call it) of figures which rise and fall, weave and break harmonies and give thus a certain unity of feeling to the whole composition and recall the nominal subject when this might not seem relevant to the more obvious upper currents of the sea of sound.

Mr. Paur conducted the symphony with eminent ability and the orchestra performed it wonderfully well in all respects. The concerto work was not praiseworthy, for in the last movement there were hesitancies and uncertainties and the accents of soloist and band were not always synchronous.

A programme of six numbers is announced for the next concert. It is thus disposed: For the orchestra, symphony in D major, by Ph. E. Bach; the "Hirtenmusik" of J. S. Bach; Haydn's G-major symphony, and Beethoven's "Fidelio" overture. For Miss Gertrude Franklin, the "Sweet Bird" song of Handel and an air from Goetz's "Taming of the Shrew."

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.

MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 17, 1894.

OF RUBINSTEIN

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT WAS MEMORIAL.

The "Funeral March in Purple" Led the Programme—Then a Piano Concerto in D Minor—The Great "Ocean" Symphony Closed the Evening.

The concert of Saturday was dedicated to the memory of Rubinstein. Under ordinary circumstances a memorial service would not be proper matter for musical criticism, but as the occasion formed one of the regular symphonic series the usual comments may be admissible. It was very appropriate to begin with the Funeral March from the Heroic Symphony, even though we are likely to hear it again this season in connection with its proper cycle of movements. This movement remains the noblest elegy in the musical repertoire. Well did Coleridge call it "a funeral march in purple;" it is distinctively a masculine work, yet the feminine element is not lacking, for if ever a weeping woman was pictured in tones it is in the oboe passages of the first part; but this femininity never becomes effeminate; it is rather a perfect example of Schiller's statement:—

"Wo Starkes sich und Mildes parrten
Da gibt es einen guten Klang."

In the finest funeral march ever written for piano (Chopin's) the trio which might have been a similar picture of stricken womanhood (the so-called "Song at the Grave") becomes mere weakness, dangerously near to bathos, a fault that is never found in Beethoven's pictures of sorrow. The march did not become in the least degree mawkish in Mr. Paur's hands, in fact the first part went to the other extreme and could have borne a slightly slower tempo; but it was a lofty and dignified performance, altogether.

Now came a Rubinstein piano concerto, the one in D minor, although its predecessor, the concerto in G major would have been more appropriate, being more characteristic and containing an elegiac vein in its slow movement. The pianist was Mrs. Ernest Lent. Rubinstein's fault in his piano concertos is generally the making of the solo part too prominent; the piano dominates the orchestra. It did not do so on this occasion, for it was seldom powerful enough to hold its own against the instrumental forces. Mrs. Lent played with intelligence and conscientious effort, but the task evidently strained her physical powers to the utmost; there was spasmodic exertion rather than sustained breadth. The first movement was the most satisfactory, and here there was a musicianly grasp of the subject evident. The slow movement was clearly enunciated, but scarcely gave the full poetry and freedom of interpretation demanded by the composer. In the last movement physical effort was too plainly apparent, and the triumph and leonine force of the finale was only suggested. Mrs. Lent was recalled twice, and made a sufficiently good impression to have one desire to hear her in a less exacting work and in a smaller hall.

Now came the "Ocean Symphony," and the whole of it. This was the best possible tribute to Rubinstein's memory, for it has never been given in Boston, and seldom anywhere in the world, in its complete state. A few years ago Rubinstein expressed his regret to Mr. Paur that the work was never given with all of its movements; "they all belong together, and it is the only way to do justice to it," said he. However much one may disagree with this dictum of the composer, it certainly was in the best possible taste to choose the seven movements of this prolix symphony as a memorial of Rubinstein, and the audience seemed to appreciate it, for with the exception of a few suburbans with whom railroad time tables must necessarily take the place of orchestral finales, almost the entire audience stayed to the very end.

The symphony in its extended state (it was originally four movements, and three were added at intervals after its completion) is a perfect example of the merits and defects of the composer. He is the most unequal of the great tone-poets; at one moment he is storming the gates of heaven and at another he is exerting himself to combine the oboe with the bass tuba, and doing other feats of musical jugglery. The first movement is as great as some of Beethoven's orchestral achievements. Its performance was a triumph for Mr. Paur and his orchestra. That wonderful stationary tone (G) on the trumpet, the brilliant flute-work and the ensemble of the strings call for especial mention. The second movement has never been heard here, although Mr. Gericke has given all the other six movements. There are many tempests in the musical repertoire; Handel in "The Seasons," St. Saens in "Le Deluge," Beethoven in the "Pastoral Symphony," Wagner in "Die Walkuere," Rossini in "Wm. Tell" overture, and a host of others have given more or less bad weather, but there has never been such a downright northeaster as this symphonic movement; it is such a furious storm that one ought to direct it with an umbrella. It is cacophonous all through, or nearly so, it gives allopathic doses of piccolo and bass drum, and it is far too long. The vulgar may delight in the squeaking of the stringed instruments played with the bow on the bridge, (sull' Ponticello) in the shrieks of the piccolo which obviously are flashes of lightning, and in the thumpings of the bass drum which are the musician's thunder, but the musical analyst finds such programme music far lower than the so-called "Pure" music which does not attempt a definite picture, which is subjective instead of objective. As regards this movement one may thrust aside the old saying—"de Mortuis nil nisi Bonum," and substitute the Shakesperian apothegm—"The evil that men do lives after them." Yet the performance of the very difficult movement calls for emphatic praise. It was a wonderful exhibition of the technique of the orchestra.

The great beauty of the third (an added) movement made an admirable foil to this amount of noise, and its direct melody was grateful to the ears that longed for tune. Harp and oboe made some delightful combinations in this movement which was almost a song without words. The fourth movement was full of sailors' jollity, and the orchestra played with commendable unity in the catchy syncopations, but the added Scherzo which came as the sixth movement is fully as jovial and less forced in its style. One would gladly see this Scherzo replace the original one, or else have it added permanently to the regular movements. The slow movement which came fifth in the succession of the expanded symphony, is Oriental in its brooding. The proverb says: "Scratch a Russian and you will find a Tartar," but when one scrapes the veneer from Rubinstein one finds a Semite, and there is a racial characteristic to be discerned in much of his work, particularly in the solemn and expressive movements.

The finale is not the strongest part of the symphony; its recitativelike introduction is prolix, and even its chorale climax is not very original, while the hideous tones of the stopped horns (the ugliest tone-color that can be drawn from the orchestra, Wagner used it frequently to picture crime or evil) seem to come in without any purpose whatever. The kettle-drum gave its final strokes in a manner that threatened to burst the calfskin, and the symphony was done. One is quite ready to return to the original four movements however, possibly adding the dainty Scherzo which here came as the sixth movement.

The auditors who remained to the very end may hereafter boast of having heard the longest symphony in existence.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

BOSTON EVENING RECORD.
DECEMBER 17, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY.

The concert of Saturday was dedicated to the memory of Rubinstein. Under ordinary circumstances a memorial service would not be proper matter for musical criticism, but as the occasion formed one of the regular symphonic series the usual comments may be admissible. It was very appropriate to begin with the Funeral March from the Heroic Symphony, even though we are likely to hear it again this season in connection with its proper cycle of movements. This movement remains the noblest elegy in the musical repertoire. Well did Coleridge call it "a funeral march in purple;" it is distinctively a masculine work, yet the feminine element is not lacking, for if ever a weeping woman was pictured in tones it is in the oboe passages of the first part; but this femininity never becomes effeminate; it is rather a perfect example of Schiller's statement:—

"Wo Starkes sich und Mildes parrten
Da gibt es einen guten Klang."

In the finest funeral march ever written for piano (Chopin's) the trio which might have been a similar picture of stricken womanhood (the so-called "Song at the Grave") becomes mere weakness, dangerously near to bathos, a fault that is never found in Beethoven's pictures of sorrow. The march did not become in the least degree mawkish in Mr. Paur's hands, in fact the first part went to the other extreme and could have borne a slightly slower tempo; but it was a lofty and dignified performance, altogether.

Now came a Rubinstein piano concerto, the one in D minor, although its predecessor, the concerto in G major would have been more appropriate, being more characteristic and containing an elegiac vein in its slow movement. The pianist was Mrs. Ernest Lent. Rubinstein's fault in his piano concertos is generally the making of the solo part too prominent; the piano dominates the orchestra. It did not do so on this occasion, for it was seldom powerful enough to hold its own against the instrumental forces. Mrs. Lent played with intelligence and conscientious effort, but the task evidently strained her physical powers to the utmost; there was spasmodic exertion rather than sustained breadth. The first movement was the most satisfactory, and here there was a musicianly grasp of the subject evident. The slow movement was clearly enunciated, but scarcely gave the full poetry and freedom of interpretation demanded by the composer. In the last movement physical effort was too plainly apparent, and the triumph and leonine force of the finale was only suggested. Mrs. Lent was recalled twice, and made a sufficiently good impression to have one desire to hear her in a less exacting work and in a smaller hall.

Now came the "Ocean Symphony," and the whole of it. This was the best possible tribute to Rubinstein's memory, for it has never been given in Boston, and seldom anywhere in the world, in its complete state. A few years ago Rubinstein expressed his regret to Mr. Paur that the work was never given with all of its movements; "they all belong together, and it is the only way to do justice to it," said he. However much one may disagree with this dictum of the composer, it certainly was in the best possible taste to choose the seven movements of this prolix symphony as a memorial of Rubinstein, and the audience seemed to appreciate it, for with the exception of a few suburbans with whom railroad time tables must necessarily take the place of orchestral finales, almost the entire audience stayed to the very end.

The symphony in its extended state (it was originally four movements, and three were added at intervals after its completion) is a perfect example of the merits and defects of the composer. He is the most unequal of the great tone-poets; at one moment he is storming the gates of heaven and at another he is exerting himself to combine the oboe with the bass tuba, and doing other feats of musical jugglery. The first movement is as great as some of Beethoven's orchestral achievements. Its performance was a triumph for Mr. Paur and his orchestra. That wonderful stationary tone (G) on the trumpet, the brilliant flute-work and the ensemble of the strings call for especial mention. The second movement has never been heard here, although Mr. Gericke has given all the other six movements. There are many tempests in the musical repertoire; Handel in "The Seasons," St. Saens in "Le Deluge," Beethoven in the "Pastoral Symphony," Wagner in "Die Walkuere," Rossini in "Wm. Tell" overture, and a host of others have given more or less bad weather, but there has never been such a downright northeaster as this symphonic movement; it is such a furious storm that one ought to direct it with an umbrella. It is cacophonous all through, or nearly so, it gives allopathic doses of piccolo and bass drum, and it is far too long. The vulgar may delight in the squeaking of the stringed instruments played with the bow on the bridge, (sull' Ponticello) in the shrieks of the piccolo which obviously are flashes of lightning, and in the thumpings of the bass drum which are the musician's thunder, but the musical analyst finds such programme music far lower than the so-called "Pure" music which does not attempt a definite picture, which is subjective instead of objective. As regards this movement one may thrust aside the old saying—"de Mortuis nil nisi Bonum," and substitute the Shakesperian apothegm—"The evil that men do lives after them." Yet the performance of the very difficult movement calls for emphatic praise. It was a wonderful exhibition of the technique of the orchestra.

[65]

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 16, 1894.

MUSIC

CONCERTS OF THE PAST WEEK.

The amusement week, so far as music is concerned, began on Monday evening with the third concert of the Kneisel Quartette, when these compositions were played: Mendelssohn's D major quartette, opus 44, No.1; Beethoven's pianoforte trio in B-flat major, opus 97; Brahms' clarinet quintette in B minor, opus 115. The concert had the not unusual fault of its fellows—it was too long; for even the connoisseur and the dilettante cannot fully absorb, much less enjoy, two hours of such music, sitting on small, hard, slippery chairs in an ill-ventilated, overwarm hall. The nearest approach to possible pleasure would be won only when all the music should be delightful in itself and perfect in its performance with all external conditions favorable. On this occasion the first condition was not fulfilled. The Mendelssohn quartette is well enough written, but the peculiar and distinctive qualities of its author for which he is most welcomed and appreciated are too often absent from it, so that the movements drag along with little freshness of spirit or lightness of foot. So too the Brahms quintette has a deal of dull ponderousness in the learned labor of its first movement and the protracted evolutions of its third, for bearing up against which one hardly feels repaid by the great beauty and pleasantness of the romance-like adagio and the agreeable animation of the short finale. But the Beethoven is perennially sweet, noble and enlivening. Of course, however, the performance was perfect—how could it be else? For the Quartette—the only possible modification of whose now flawless playing would come from their associating with themselves some artist not exactly in sympathy and touch with themselves—had the co-operation of Mr. Baermann and Mr. Pourtan. The former, complete and catholic musician and player that he is, is always especially felicitous in his renderings of Beethoven, and his share in the trio was masterly at all points. Indeed it seemed his highest and most beautiful achievement in ensemble playing—always ready, ample, warm and full, but never dominant, and enlightened the scherzo with rare elegance and sparkle. M. Pourtau was fully equal to his task and showed that to the solidity and certainty of his orchestral style he added the fineness and the polish necessary for chamber music. The beauty and equality of his tone—never rough in the lower register nor strident in the upper—and the nicety and grace of his phrasing were especially remarked.

The presence upon the Music Hall platform of a marble bust of Rubinstein, mounted upon a laurelled and vine-wreathed pedestal, would have implied to any attendant upon the Eighth Symphony concert that the programme might be expected to commemorate the master so lately dead, even if no announcement of that tenor had been previously made. There were but three numbers on that programme and these, extending a little over two hours, had the natural effect of emptying many seats long before the evening was over, although there was enough of interest and consequence in the concert to justify its unusual length and to repay the majority who remained faithful to the end.

The first selection was the funeral march from Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, which we do not remember to have ever heard quite so satisfactorily played—certainly never when we enjoyed it so greatly and felt at once so much uplifted and so much made pensive and subdued. Being marked "adagio assai," conductors are apt to take it so slowly that it drags on a weary length, instead of marching with slow and solemn step, or else, fearing this dreary sluggishness of movement, they quicken it beyond that measure of gravity which is necessary to impress the spirit deeply. Mr. Paur took a markedly slow tempo, but he made his men give elasticity and pulsation to their march and allowed just the slightest enhancement of its progression in the lighter and tenderer phases. The effect was beautiful, pathetic and yet commanding.

Then followed Rubinstein's fourth pianoforte concerto—that in D minor, his opus 70. The pianist was Mrs. Ernest Lent, of Washington, an interesting, intelligent and able player, whose simplicity of manner, indicating that she is not too much accustomed to great concert audiences, was quite charming. She appears to be—allowance made for some differences in their personal equations—a player of similar caste and calibre to Mrs. Paur. Her execution is apt, clear, ready and sufficient; she reads cantabile passages with a well sustained phrasing, strikes out octaves and double octaves freely and vibrantly and gives brightness and lightness to bravura and ornament, being also regardful of the proper attitude of the piano to the full score. Her style appeared incomplete in the narrowness of its range of gradations of color and volume. Contrast indeed there was, but rather as between softness and loudness than as between the interior qualities of rendering. And again in long developments she was inclined to reach the maximum of her power before the true climax of the music had been attained. But she played with understanding, confidence and a sure grasp upon the form and the general purport of each movement and won particular approbation for the broad sweep of the first and the calm vocality of the second, the extended romance-like theme of which was delightfully delivered and no less delightfully produced by Mr. Pourtan's clarinet.

Then came the whole of Rubinstein's "Ocean" symphony, which nobody has had the courage heretofore to give in its entirety here in Boston, if memory serves me rightly. So long indeed is it, that it might as reasonably be called the "Equator," since its seven movements might almost belt about the whole globe of music, while its famous storm might quite as well represent a tropical tempest as a gale at sea. Yet, somehow—was it in Mr. Paur's vital, inspiriting and earnest direction or was it in the true chiar' oscuro and emotional antithesis gained by the full performance?——his complete sequence seemed less heavy and exacting than the customary group of four which most attendants upon orchestral concerts have heard.

The reader probably understands that this is not a descriptive composition, if we except the first mentioned second movement, which is an amazingly picturesque, faithful and powerful portrayal of storm and gale. It is in suggestion chiefly if not entirely and in moods and correspondences that the truth of the title must be sought, and since there comes no word from the composer to say what he, who stood so much in awe and dread as well as in admiration, of the great world of waters meant each movement to signify, every listener must define for himself according to his experiences or his fancies. The opening moderato, with its progress from cool flute notes and shivering chords to the full notes of the orchestra, perhaps implies that power which underlies even the daintiest foam-crest, and reveals to us those lines of Tennyson.

"A wild wave in the wide North-sea,
Green-glimmering toward the summit, bears with all
Its stormy crests that smoke against the skies,
Down on a bank, and overbears the bark,
And him that helms it."

The second is the great and wonderful storm scene, with "the piping of the gale and thunder in the clouds," the whistle and roar, the dash and crash, the sudden suspense and the instant vehemence, the apparently invincible fury and the slow exhaustion of a whirlwind. The third, an andante, hints at the glad but grave ascriptions of pious gratitude in returning calm, while the fourth, an allegro, has a loud, strong, hearty character which brings to mind the rough gayety of under spirits, as if a great crew were allowed their own festivity, where the more dignified rejoicings were over. Then comes a fifth movement, an almost plaintive andante, as if writing its all-embracing circuit the sea included sorrow, loss and mourning, while the natural return to mirth and carelessness is perhaps alluded to in the scherzo, which is the one movement of all most like in temper anent what one expects from a symphony. The finale, beginning with a slow introduction, passes soon into a fiery allegro which unites itself through the sense of power and domination in the first movement, but passes beyond it in the chorale-like passages which, borne up on the full resonance of the brass choir, rises like a glorification of the power which is beyond all powers. Through almost all the movements there runs a restless, swaying undertone (so to call it) of figures which rise and fall, weave and break harmonies and give thus a certain unity of feeling to the whole composition and recall the nominal subject when this might not seem relevant to the more obvious upper currents of the sea of sound.

Mr. Paur conducted the symphony with eminent ability and the orchestra performed it wonderfully well in all respects. The concerto work was not praiseworthy, for in the last movement there were hesitancies and uncertainties and the accents of soloist and band were not always synchronous.

A programme of six numbers is announced for the next concert. It is thus disposed: For the orchestra, symphony in D major, by Ph. E. Bach; the "Hirtenmusik" of J. S. Bach; Haydn's G-major symphony, and Beethoven's "Fidelio" overture. For Miss Gertrude Franklin, the "Sweet Bird" song of Handel and an air from Goetz's "Taming of the Shrew."

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 17, 1894.

OF RUBINSTEIN

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT WAS MEMORIAL.

The "Funeral March in Purple" Led the Programme—Then a Piano Concerto in D Minor—The Great "Ocean" Symphony Closed the Evening.

The concert of Saturday was dedicated to the memory of Rubinstein. Under ordinary circumstances a memorial service would not be proper matter for musical criticism, but as the occasion formed one of the regular symphonic series the usual comments may be admissible. It was very appropriate to begin with the Funeral March from the Heroic Symphony, even though we are likely to hear it again this season in connection with its proper cycle of movements. This movement remains the noblest elegy in the musical repertoire. Well did Coleridge call it "a funeral march in purple;" it is distinctively a masculine work, yet the feminine element is not lacking, for if ever a weeping woman was pictured in tones it is in the oboe passages of the first part; but this femininity never becomes effeminate; it is rather a perfect example of Schiller's statement:—

"Wo Starkes sich und Mildes parrten
Da gibt es einen guten Klang."

In the finest funeral march ever written for piano (Chopin's) the trio which might have been a similar picture of stricken womanhood (the so-called "Song at the Grave") becomes mere weakness, dangerously near to bathos, a fault that is never found in Beethoven's pictures of sorrow. The march did not become in the least degree mawkish in Mr. Paur's hands, in fact the first part went to the other extreme and could have borne a slightly slower tempo; but it was a lofty and dignified performance, altogether.

Now came a Rubinstein piano concerto, the one in D minor, although its predecessor, the concerto in G major would have been more appropriate, being more characteristic and containing an elegiac vein in its slow movement. The pianist was Mrs. Ernest Lent. Rubinstein's fault in his piano concertos is generally the making of the solo part too prominent; the piano dominates the orchestra. It did not do so on this occasion, for it was seldom powerful enough to hold its own against the instrumental forces. Mrs. Lent played with intelligence and conscientious effort, but the task evidently strained her physical powers to the utmost; there was spasmodic exertion rather than sustained breadth. The first movement was the most satisfactory, and here there was a musicianly grasp of the subject evident. The slow movement was clearly enunciated, but scarcely gave the full poetry and freedom of interpretation demanded by the composer. In the last movement physical effort was too plainly apparent, and the triumph and leonine force of the finale was only suggested. Mrs. Lent was recalled twice, and made a sufficiently good impression to have one desire to hear her in a less exacting work and in a smaller hall.

Now came the "Ocean Symphony," and the whole of it. This was the best possible tribute to Rubinstein's memory, for it has never been given in Boston, and seldom anywhere in the world, in its complete state. A few years ago Rubinstein expressed his regret to Mr. Paur that the work was never given with all of its movements; "they all belong together, and it is the only way to do justice to it," said he. However much one may disagree with this dictum of the composer, it certainly was in the best possible taste to choose the seven movements of this prolix symphony as a memorial of Rubinstein, and the audience seemed to appreciate it, for with the exception of a few suburbans with whom railroad time tables must necessarily take the place of orchestral finales, almost the entire audience stayed to the very end.

The symphony in its extended state (it was originally four movements, and three were added at intervals after its completion) is a perfect example of the merits and defects of the composer. He is the most unequal of the great tone-poets; at one moment he is storming the gates of heaven and at another he is exerting himself to combine the oboe with the bass tuba, and doing other feats of musical jugglery. The first movement is as great as some of Beethoven's orchestral achievements. Its performance was a triumph for Mr. Paur and his orchestra. That wonderful stationary tone (G) on the trumpet, the brilliant flute-work and the ensemble of the strings call for especial mention. The second movement has never been heard here, although Mr. Gericke has given all the other six movements. There are many tempests in the musical repertoire; Handel in "The Seasons," St. Saens in "Le Deluge," Beethoven in the "Pastoral Symphony," Wagner in "Die Walkuere," Rossini in "Wm. Tell" overture, and a host of others have given more or less bad weather, but there has never been such a downright northeaster as this symphonic movement; it is such a furious storm that one ought to direct it with an umbrella. It is cacophonous all through, or nearly so, it gives allopathic doses of piccolo and bass drum, and it is far too long. The vulgar may delight in the squeaking of the stringed instruments played with the bow on the bridge, (sull' Ponticello) in the shrieks of the piccolo which obviously are flashes of lightning, and in the thumpings of the bass drum which are the musician's thunder, but the musical analyst finds such programme music far lower than the so-called "Pure" music which does not attempt a definite picture, which is subjective instead of objective. As regards this movement one may thrust aside the old saying—"de Mortuis nil nisi Bonum," and substitute the Shakesperian apothegm—"The evil that men do lives after them." Yet the performance of the very difficult movement calls for emphatic praise. It was a wonderful exhibition of the technique of the orchestra.

The great beauty of the third (an added) movement made an admirable foil to this amount of noise, and its direct melody was grateful to the ears that longed for tune. Harp and oboe made some delightful combinations in this movement which was almost a song without words. The fourth movement was full of sailors' jollity, and the orchestra played with commendable unity in the catchy syncopations, but the added Scherzo which came as the sixth movement is fully as jovial and less forced in its style. One would gladly see this Scherzo replace the original one, or else have it added permanently to the regular movements. The slow movement which came fifth in the succession of the expanded symphony, is Oriental in its brooding. The proverb says: "Scratch a Russian and you will find a Tartar," but when one scrapes the veneer from Rubinstein one finds a Semite, and there is a racial characteristic to be discerned in much of his work, particularly in the solemn and expressive movements.

The finale is not the strongest part of the symphony; its recitativelike introduction is prolix, and even its chorale climax is not very original, while the hideous tones of the stopped horns (the ugliest tone-color that can be drawn from the orchestra, Wagner used it frequently to picture crime or evil) seem to come in without any purpose whatever. The kettle-drum gave its final strokes in a manner that threatened to burst the calfskin, and the symphony was done. One is quite ready to return to the original four movements however, possibly adding the dainty Scherzo which here came as the sixth movement.

The auditors who remained to the very end may hereafter boast of having heard the longest symphony in existence.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

BOSTON EVENING RECORD.
DECEMBER 17, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY.

The concert of Saturday was dedicated to the memory of Rubinstein. Under ordinary circumstances a memorial service would not be proper matter for musical criticism, but as the occasion formed one of the regular symphonic series the usual comments may be admissible. It was very appropriate to begin with the Funeral March from the Heroic Symphony, even though we are likely to hear it again this season in connection with its proper cycle of movements. This movement remains the noblest elegy in the musical repertoire. Well did Coleridge call it "a funeral march in purple;" it is distinctively a masculine work, yet the feminine element is not lacking, for if ever a weeping woman was pictured in tones it is in the oboe passages of the first part; but this femininity never becomes effeminate; it is rather a perfect example of Schiller's statement:—

"Wo Starkes sich und Mildes parrten
Da gibt es einen guten Klang."

In the finest funeral march ever written for piano (Chopin's) the trio which might have been a similar picture of stricken womanhood (the so-called "Song at the Grave") becomes mere weakness, dangerously near to bathos, a fault that is never found in Beethoven's pictures of sorrow. The march did not become in the least degree mawkish in Mr. Paur's hands, in fact the first part went to the other extreme and could have borne a slightly slower tempo; but it was a lofty and dignified performance, altogether.

Now came a Rubinstein piano concerto, the one in D minor, although its predecessor, the concerto in G major would have been more appropriate, being more characteristic and containing an elegiac vein in its slow movement. The pianist was Mrs. Ernest Lent. Rubinstein's fault in his piano concertos is generally the making of the solo part too prominent; the piano dominates the orchestra. It did not do so on this occasion, for it was seldom powerful enough to hold its own against the instrumental forces. Mrs. Lent played with intelligence and conscientious effort, but the task evidently strained her physical powers to the utmost; there was spasmodic exertion rather than sustained breadth. The first movement was the most satisfactory, and here there was a musicianly grasp of the subject evident. The slow movement was clearly enunciated, but scarcely gave the full poetry and freedom of interpretation demanded by the composer. In the last movement physical effort was too plainly apparent, and the triumph and leonine force of the finale was only suggested. Mrs. Lent was recalled twice, and made a sufficiently good impression to have one desire to hear her in a less exacting work and in a smaller hall.

Now came the "Ocean Symphony," and the whole of it. This was the best possible tribute to Rubinstein's memory, for it has never been given in Boston, and seldom anywhere in the world, in its complete state. A few years ago Rubinstein expressed his regret to Mr. Paur that the work was never given with all of its movements; "they all belong together, and it is the only way to do justice to it," said he. However much one may disagree with this dictum of the composer, it certainly was in the best possible taste to choose the seven movements of this prolix symphony as a memorial of Rubinstein, and the audience seemed to appreciate it, for with the exception of a few suburbans with whom railroad time tables must necessarily take the place of orchestral finales, almost the entire audience stayed to the very end.

The symphony in its extended state (it was originally four movements, and three were added at intervals after its completion) is a perfect example of the merits and defects of the composer. He is the most unequal of the great tone-poets; at one moment he is storming the gates of heaven and at another he is exerting himself to combine the oboe with the bass tuba, and doing other feats of musical jugglery. The first movement is as great as some of Beethoven's orchestral achievements. Its performance was a triumph for Mr. Paur and his orchestra. That wonderful stationary tone (G) on the trumpet, the brilliant flute-work and the ensemble of the strings call for especial mention. The second movement has never been heard here, although Mr. Gericke has given all the other six movements. There are many tempests in the musical repertoire; Handel in "The Seasons," St. Saens in "Le Deluge," Beethoven in the "Pastoral Symphony," Wagner in "Die Walkuere," Rossini in "Wm. Tell" overture, and a host of others have given more or less bad weather, but there has never been such a downright northeaster as this symphonic movement; it is such a furious storm that one ought to direct it with an umbrella. It is cacophonous all through, or nearly so, it gives allopathic doses of piccolo and bass drum, and it is far too long. The vulgar may delight in the squeaking of the stringed instruments played with the bow on the bridge, (sull' Ponticello) in the shrieks of the piccolo which obviously are flashes of lightning, and in the thumpings of the bass drum which are the musician's thunder, but the musical analyst finds such programme music far lower than the so-called "Pure" music which does not attempt a definite picture, which is subjective instead of objective. As regards this movement one may thrust aside the old saying—"de Mortuis nil nisi Bonum," and substitute the Shakesperian apothegm—"The evil that men do lives after them." Yet the performance of the very difficult movement calls for emphatic praise. It was a wonderful exhibition of the technique of the orchestra.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, DECEMBER 17, 1894.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The eighth Symphony concert was given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, "In Memoriam Auton Rubinstein." The programme was as follows:

Beethoven: Funeral March from Symphony No. 3, in E-flat major, "Eroica," opus 55.
Rubinstein: Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 4, in D minor, opus 70.
Rubinstein: Symphony No. 2, in C major, "Ocean," opus 42.
Mrs. Ernest Lent was the pianist.

Beethoven's grand Marcia funebre was admirably given, with noble dignity of expression, simplicity and force. The movement, to be sure, loses somewhat by being given apart from the rest of the symphony, but then, it can afford a good deal!

It is said that one of the fondest wishes of the latter half of Rubinstein's life was to find a conductor "with courage enough" to give the whole of the "Ocean" symphony; it is doubted whether he himself ever heard the entire work at a sitting, in its latest, complete shape. Well! we have heard it now, in all its seven movements, without a cut, and with all the (upon the whole, few) repeats made. The experience was worth having—for once. And, as it was an experience such as no one is likely to have more than once in a lifetime, we think the people who left the hall before the symphony was over did so rather foolishly. We much doubt whether any composer with the slightest claim to greatness will ever repeat Rubinstein's experiment of writing a symphony in seven longish movements. Every musical form has certain natural limits, which a composer can overstep only at his peril; and it may be said in general that no composer has ever overstepped such limits without suffering more or less from it. Beethoven himself did this in his great pianoforte sonata in B-flat major, opus 106; he wrote a sonata of really symphonic proportions, one that might fairly be called a "symphony for pianotorte;" and, with all its unquestionable greatness and power, the work cannot but be called too long, too full of matter, and often too fully developed, for the pianoforte to carry. It would not be an overlong symphony, if well scored for orchestra; but it is a terribly long sonata. In the same sense one can say that this "Ocean" symphony of Rubinstein's would be but a short oratorio, if based on a poetic text and written for soli, chorus and orchestra; but, as a symphony, as a purely orchestral work, its length is positively appalling. And not the least inconvenient item in its length is the disheartening effect it has upon the players; after duly rehearsing a work like the "Ocean" symphony, the orchestra is already sick of it, and comes to the concert with its enthusiasm damped.

Singularly enough, this hearing of the entire symphony does not in the least alter one's former opinion of it; one still finds the first movement far and away superior to all else in it. If there is anything else in the symphony at all worthy to stand beside this mevement, we should say it was the added Scherzo in F major (the present sixth movement), the Trio of which is especially charming. The other movements are all more or less weak: and, though they do gain a certain amount of strength by being given together—like the bundle of sticks in the fable—they are, upon the whole, tedious individually and collectively. Although we think Rubinstein really strengthened the work by adding the Andante in E major and the Scherzo in F—albeit he would have strengthened it still more by cutting out the original Andante in E minor—we cannot see that his latest addition, the "storm" movement in A minor, has any sense at all; the whole spirit of the movement is at loggerheads with that of all the rest of the symphony. Before the addition of this movement, it was peculiarly noticeable how carefully Rubinstein had kept himself on the symphonic side of the boundary line between imaginative orchestral writing and programme-music; the six other movements are essentially symphonic, and if we find "oceanic" suggestions in them, they are but suggestions, poetically idealized and in no sense merely photographic; they are romantic rather than naturalistic. But in this last-added movement Rubinstein has given us a "storm" such as Liszt himself might have given us, a pure piece of programme-music. And be it said—whether to his honor or not remains a matter of point of view—that he has not walked this path with much dignity; Liszt would have done so with more majesty. The thing is unquestionably a stunning storm, viewed as a piece of musical photography; more than this it has immense rhythmic vitality and go to it, it is good fun to listen to. The trouble is that it often makes you smile, and a poetic storm-piece should not do that. When the big-drum thunder comes, the effect is mainly comic, just as the fall of the Tower of Babel is in the composer's biblical opera,—it makes you think of bricks and mortar more than it does of a heaven-sent cataclysm. Then that Choral in the last movement; what impressiveness there may be in it resides wholly in the bare fact that it is a church-like melody; musically it is weak, and harmonized with a crudeness that is the merest aping of rugged strength; and, as for the counterpoint in the strings the composer has put against it at its last appearance, one would have thought that, after Meyerbeer, no self-respecting composer would touch counterpoint of that sort with a pair of tongs!

One thing impressed us strongly throughout the symphony; indeed, we have been impressed with it before in re Rubinstein: this is the man's sadly defective sense for orchestral coloring, or else his terrible lack of skill in scoring. In the year of grace 1857 (when the original parts of the symphony were written), and a fortiori later, an orchestral composer might fairly be expected sufficiently to have mastered the art of instrumentation to turn out a work that needed none of that painful "doctoring" at rehearsals which is required by parts of the ninth symphony and some things by Schumann; he ought to know how to score so that his work should sound well if played simply as it was written. Well! the instrumentation of the "Ocean" symphony seldom sounds thoroughly well; the effect is often confused, the coloring seldom really beautiful; one body of instruments often kills another, instead of adding strength or richness thereto; the orchestra is often very ill-balanced. Take that added Andante in D: the thing is not as strong as Goliath, but the first five or six pages of it sound absolutely delicious on the pianoforte; on the strings the effect is null! Then the final Choral: how coarse, thick, and muddy those brass harmonies sound! without real power or brilliancy! But the last movement [illegible] in its way: thoroughly original, and unspeakably strong in its beauty and poetry. This movement should live—say, as a concert "Ocean" overture.

The performance was in the main fine, if not quite so finished as is our orchestra's wont. But we incline to think that much of the roughness of effect is to be charged to Rubinstein's scoring, rather than to the playing. One point detracted a good deal from the general effect of the work, and this was that Mr. Paur seemed to have an all too vivid consciousness of the length of the symphony, and appeared to be in too much of a hurry. The first movement suffered especially. If any movement in all orchestral literature has ample indications of the proper tempo, this one has; just look at its history; at first Rubinstein marked it Allegro maestoso; then, doubtless finding that conductors took it too fast, he changed the marking to Moderato assai; could any indication be plainer? But, notwithstanding all this, Mr. Paur takes it at a frank Allegro vivace. The "Storm" movement, too, was taken at a break-neck pace, in spite of the Con moto moderato written over it. The Andante in D major sounded restless and hurried,—although here the composer's change in the marking, from Adagio to Andante, as the symphony grew older, certainly indicates that the tempo must not drag. Still the whole experience was an interesting one, though one may suspect that it may have the effect of burying the composer several fathoms deeper than Ariel's father in the "Tempest."

Mrs. Lent came to us wholly unheralded, and played Rubinstein's D minor concerto in a sincere, musical way, without trickery or false sentiment. The performance was perhaps rather pallid, the Finale being in especial beyond the player's powers of virtuosity. Upon the whole, the pianist was placed—or had placed herself—in a somewhat false position—that of doing sincere but not strikingly effective work, at a concert where the very best is not too good. In another setting her playing might have made a far different impression.

The next programme is: C. P. E. Bach, Symphony in D-major; Handel, scena, "Sweet Bird," from "L'Allegro, il Penseroso ed il Moderato;" J. S. Bach, Shepherds' music, from the "Christmas Oratorio;" Haydn, Symphony in G major (B. & H., No. 13, Peters, No. 8); Goetz, aria from "Taming of the Shrew;" Beethoven, overture to "Fidelio," opus 72. Miss Gertrude Franklin will be the singer.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, DEC. 16, 1894.

THE KNEISEL QUARTETTE.

The third of this season's concerts was given on Monday evening before an audience which completely filled Union hall. Mr. Carl Baermann and Mr. Leon Pourtau, the wonderful new clarinetist of the Symphony orchestra, were the assisting artists, and the programme was:

Quartette, op. 44, No. 1.....Mendelssohn
Piano Trio, op 97.....Beethoven
Quintet for strings and clarinet, op. 115.. Brahms
.....

The very well known—indeed, well nigh hackneyed—quartette of Mendelssohn was excellently played. One is glad to hear it occasionally, if for no other reason than to assure one's self anew that Mendelssohn was often guilty of uttering inaninities with a great show of brilliancy and vigor. Only such a masterly rendering as the Kneisel group gives it, especially in the allegro movements, can make it sufferable.

The Beethoven trio, that thing of perennial strength and beauty, was likewise given masterly rendering, and the performance of it received warm commendations of applause. Mr. Baermann's playing of a work of this sort is such as no other Boston player can give us, sturdy yet delicate, studied yet clear.

The Brahms quintette has already become one of the best known and best loved of its author's works, although it was finished not quite four years ago. The addition of the clarinet to the strings gives delightful richness as well as novelty of tone color. The themes are Brahmsian to the last degree, and the methods of working-out are likewise as characteristic of the composer as possible. Yet there are no spots of ugliness of sound and excessive complexity of thought such as we are likely to observe on a first hearing of a Brahms work. The second movement, with its remarkable tremolo effects, is one of the most intensely tragic things which have ever happened in music. We wish we might hear it again, yet almost dread to.

If one may say that a thing is "beneath criticism," and express thereby the superlative of badness in art, may one not exalt the superlatively good by calling it "above criticism?" Such seemed to us a fitting word to say of Mr. Pourtau's playing. It must have been a revelation to the audience.

The next concert is set for New Year's eve.

THE EVENING BULLETIN.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 20, 1894.

Symphony Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's third concert was given last evening at Infantry Hall. There was the usual attendance of music-lovers, about two-thirds filling the hall, the same forceful, delicate and finely rounded interpretation by the players, the familiar etnergetic method of conducting on the part of Herr Paur, and, last but not least, a genuine novelty on the programme. The present conductor of the Symphony Orchestra has been sharply criticised by certain musical writers for lack of skill in programme making. While it is exceedingly doubtful that all would be of one mind as to what does constitute a well constructed programme, it can hardly be denied that the one presented last night was both symmetrical and solid, worthy, too, of a musical audience and of the fine artists to whom its interpretation was entrusted, as well as pleasing to that numerous class which the musical critic is wont to group under the title of "the average listener."

Last night's offering consisted of but three numbers, as follows:

Symphony No. 7, in A major, Op. 92.Beethoven
I. Poco Sostenuto (A major).
Vivace (A major).
II. Allegretto (A minor).
III. Scherzo: Presto (F major).
Trio: Assai meno presto (D major).
IV. Finale: Allegro con brio (A major).
Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 5, in E-flat major, Op. 73.....Beethoven
I. Allegro.
II. Adagio un poco moto.
III. Rondo: Allegro ma non troppo.
Overture, "Die Verkaufte Braut"....Smetana
(First Time.)

It is sometimes difficult to see upon what grounds certain works of a composer are singled out for pre-eminence and set above their fellows as of greater worth. The matter is a simple one, of course, when some writer of pleasant mediocrities suddenly startles the world with something resembling a masterpiece, but how is it when a man composes nine symphonies and each one is a masterpiece? Probably no one will care to quarrel with the dictum that assigns to Beethoven's ninth symphony the place of honor, or even with the ranking of the fifth in second place, but yet the others have claims. This very seventh symphony presents a sustained interest, a musical beauty in its exquisite themes and charming modulations, a Titanic grasp in its orderly working out and a masterly use of orchestral resource that makes one feel while listening to its golden measures that, after all, perhaps the verdict should be reconsidered. But if it is not to be allowed to displace its fellow works of art, it must yet be granted that at certain points it sparkles with the full effulgence of Beethoven's mighty genius, that brightest star in the firmament of pure music. It is needless to say that it was magnificently played.

The novelty of the programme was Smetana's overture. The works of this Bohemian composer, who died some ten years ago, are just beginning to make their way outside of his country, where they have long been held in high repute. This overture is short and written in something like a rondo form. It is brilliant in the extreme, Wagnerish in its liberal use of the brass, and its themes are tinged with that peculiar flavor that seems inseparable from the music of Bohemian and Hungarian composers. It was played with great fire and dash, its resounding finale making a brilliant close to the concert. The programme notes imparted the interesting information that Dr. Antonin Dvorak was a pupil of Smetana.

The soloist of the evening was Mr. Carl Baermann, the well-known Boston pianist, who gave a fine performance of Beethoven's great "Emperor" concerto. Mr. Baermann's abilities are too well known and appreciated here to call for extended remark upon his playing. He is a fine artist, and did himself full justice last evening. Beethoven's concerto is one of the classics of the pianoforte. It demands a facile and finished technic, which Mr. Baermann certainly possesses, as he does the power of mechanical expression. He does not express his own individuality in anything he plays, which is a lack in his artistic equipment, or the reverse, according to the point of view from which one chooses to regard the end and aim of pianoforte playing.

The fourth concert of the series will take place on the evening of Wednesday, Jan. 16.

PROVIDENCE, THURSDAY

The Telegram.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 20, 1894.

Another Symphony Concert Proves Quite a Musical Treat.

The third concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Infantry hall last night was the counterpart of the two which preceded it, in all the features that made those events so enjoyable. The performance was exceedingly interesting from first to last, and applause in generous, but deserved measure was bestowed upon the musicians and their hard-working conductor. Particularly acceptable was Smetana's overture, a piece which flashed with brilliancy and moved the slowest pulse by its magnetizing spirit. It was finely rendered. Beethoven's No. 7 symphony was played with admirable care, taste and discrimination.

Mr. Carl Baermann of Boston, a pianist of note, was the soloist. His execution of Beethoven's No. 5 concerto was an artistic display of address and technical understanding, though the interpretation he gave could have been improved by treatment of a more sympathetic character. He was encored twice.

The next concert occurs on the evening of Jan. 16.

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 20, 1894.

Symphony Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's third concert was given last evening at Infantry Hall. There was the usual attendance of music-lovers, about two-thirds filling the hall, the same forceful, delicate and finely rounded interpretation by the players, the familiar etnergetic method of conducting on the part of Herr Paur, and, last but not least, a genuine novelty on the programme. The present conductor of the Symphony Orchestra has been sharply criticised by certain musical writers for lack of skill in programme making. While it is exceedingly doubtful that all would be of one mind as to what does constitute a well constructed programme, it can hardly be denied that the one presented last night was both symmetrical and solid, worthy, too, of a musical audience and of the fine artists to whom its interpretation was entrusted, as well as pleasing to that numerous class which the musical critic is wont to group under the title of "the average listener."

Last night's offering consisted of but three numbers, as follows:

Symphony No. 7, in A major, Op. 92.Beethoven
I. Poco Sostenuto (A major).
Vivace (A major).
II. Allegretto (A minor).
III. Scherzo: Presto (F major).
Trio: Assai meno presto (D major).
IV. Finale: Allegro con brio (A major).
Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 5, in E-flat major, Op. 73.....Beethoven
I. Allegro.
II. Adagio un poco moto.
III. Rondo: Allegro ma non troppo.
Overture, "Die Verkaufte Braut"....Smetana
(First Time.)

It is sometimes difficult to see upon what grounds certain works of a composer are singled out for pre-eminence and set above their fellows as of greater worth. The matter is a simple one, of course, when some writer of pleasant mediocrities suddenly startles the world with something resembling a masterpiece, but how is it when a man composes nine symphonies and each one is a masterpiece? Probably no one will care to quarrel with the dictum that assigns to Beethoven's ninth symphony the place of honor, or even with the ranking of the fifth in second place, but yet the others have claims. This very seventh symphony presents a sustained interest, a musical beauty in its exquisite themes and charming modulations, a Titanic grasp in its orderly working out and a masterly use of orchestral resource that makes one feel while listening to its golden measures that, after all, perhaps the verdict should be reconsidered. But if it is not to be allowed to displace its fellow works of art, it must yet be granted that at certain points it sparkles with the full effulgence of Beethoven's mighty genius, that brightest star in the firmament of pure music. It is needless to say that it was magnificently played.

The novelty of the programme was Smetana's overture. The works of this Bohemian composer, who died some ten years ago, are just beginning to make their way outside of his country, where they have long been held in high repute. This overture is short and written in something like a rondo form. It is brilliant in the extreme, Wagnerish in its liberal use of the brass, and its themes are tinged with that peculiar flavor that seems inseparable from the music of Bohemian and Hungarian composers. It was played with great fire and dash, its resounding finale making a brilliant close to the concert. The programme notes imparted the interesting information that Dr. Antonin Dvorak was a pupil of Smetana.

The soloist of the evening was Mr. Carl Baermann, the well-known Boston pianist, who gave a fine performance of Beethoven's great "Emperor" concerto. Mr. Baermann's abilities are too well known and appreciated here to call for extended remark upon his playing. He is a fine artist, and did himself full justice last evening. Beethoven's concerto is one of the classics of the pianoforte. It demands a facile and finished technic, which Mr. Baermann certainly possesses, as he does the power of mechanical expression. He does not express his own individuality in anything he plays, which is a lack in his artistic equipment, or the reverse, according to the point of view from which one chooses to regard the end and aim of pianoforte playing.

The fourth concert of the series will take place on the evening of Wednesday, Jan. 16.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCVI., NO. 171.

TUESDAY, DEC. 18, 1894.

The resemblance between Beethoven and Rubinstein was most strongly marked at the last Symphony concert by the placing of the latter's bust so the audience could compare its massive features with those of the greater master. There was the same mysterious mark of genius, the same ideality, showing how nature repeats herself even in distinct types, and emphasizing the theory that man is born again into the world. Not that Rubinstein is Beethoven; but that his transcendent gift may have descended in part to this Russian who proved himself a worthy heir of an inheritance which moves the soul to ecstasy and tears.

It is doubtful if the Symphony orchestra ever played anything with such intensity as it played that storm movement of the Ocean symphony. Talk of Wagnerian effects! Why, people expected to see the ceiling of old Music Hall open, and the deluge to fall, and some sensitive persons even grew hysterical, as the gale increased with such velocity, and with that drummer thundering away like Jove himself through it all. It was superb! Mr. Paur very nearly jumped off the platform in his supreme efforts to hold these wild elements in hand, and though the verdict on dear Rubinstein's famous work was that its length was tiresome, the storm was simply grand at every point. Sometimes noise has its advantages. It wakes you up.

[66]

The program of the eighth Symphony concert, given last evening in Music Hall, was as follows:

Funeral March, from Symphony No. 3, "Eroica".....Beethoven
Concerto for piano, No. 4, in D minor.....
Symphony No. 2, in C major, "Ocean"...Rubinstein
Moderato assai.
Lento assai. Con moto moderato.
Andante.
Allegro.
Andante.
Scherzo: Allegro. Trio: Moderato assai.
Andante. Allegro con fuoco.

They say that Mr. Paur chose the whole of the "Ocean" symphony as a number of this memorial program because Rubinstein himself never heard the seven movements in consecutive order. I am not prepared to admit that Rubinstein heard them all last evening. Is it not mistaken reverence to expose the weakness as well as the strength of a great man? As a whole, the "Ocean" symphony is not as strong a work as the "Dramatic," which was played here last season. The first movement is glorious music; the flight of the composer is skyward, and it is sure. In spite of clever instrumentation in the "Storm" movement and fine passages in other movements, there is from the beginning to the end that decrescendo of musical interest which distinguishes so many of Rubinstein's larger works.

On the other hand, the D minor concerto is one of his finest compositions. It is so sustained. There is almost nothing that is trivial. It is free from padding. The heroic concerto demands a heroic player. Let it be a man. And yet I remember a remarkable performance of it by Sophie Menter, that Amazon, I almost wrote virago, of the piano. Mrs. Ernest Lent, of Washington, was the pianist last evening. Her technic was clean and well developed; her touch was agreeable; she played with taste and understanding. But the task was greater than her strength, and in the last movement she seemed exhausted.

The orchestra played well, and yet, although it was a memorial concert and the bust of Rubinstein faced the hearers, each movement of the symphony was the signal for the departure of a portion of the audience.

The progam of the concert of the 22d will include the symphony in D major, P. E. Bach; Hirtenmusik, J. S. Bach; symphony G major, Haydn; overture, "Fidelio," Beethoven. Miss Franklin will sing Händel's "Sweet Bird" and an air from Goetz's "Taming of the Shrew."

* * *

There has been considerable discussion concerning the Symphony, program books. I, too, have been in Arcadia; which being interpreted means that I have in my turn written such books. Yet I do not believe in the program book as it exists and flourishes in England and the United States.

The program book, no matter how carefully it is edited, stands between the hearer and the composer.

The book that is purely technical and without thematic illustrations is a bore to the musician, and a stumbling block to the amateur.

The book that looks rather at the æsthetics is apt to prejudice the hearer for or against the composition played.

They suffer from the evil in England to a greater extent, perhaps; certainly I know of no program book in this country that contains such gems as the following taken from London programs by the music critic of the "Pall Mall Gazette," and published in that journal November 29. Here are a few:

"Of a Mozart quintet the program compiler remarks: 'So carefully is each player attended to in the allegretto, and so genial is the entire movement, that there must have been great complacency in the palace at Potsdam during its performance.' Again: 'In the true spirit of a laughing philosopher he took leave of one branch of his multiform art.' Again: 'The first movement, after a single preludial bar, opens with an orchestral tutti.' 'Preludial bar' is good. Again, of a Scottish overture: 'Too much stress should not be laid upon the title with which the overture is headed. * * * But as a good deal of Scotch poetry is in praise of whiskey, the Bacchanalian character * * * is easily accounted for.' Again: 'One passage near the beginning, at the eighth bar, is always waited for.' Again: 'What a pity it is that a catholic enjoyment of music should be denied to music loving people! * * * Wagner is for the stage; he himself descried it. He is for the footlights. We are not all of us in the heroic, theatrical mood, the Hercules vein. We still love music for music's sake, without librettos or Leitmotiven.'"

And then the "Pall Mall" man, moved to bitter scorn, analyzes a "comparatively uninteresting" song after the manner of these program writers. He takes Horn's "I've Been Roaming."

"This delicious cavatina, which, 'on the outstretched forefinger of Time, sparkles forever,' was composed by Horn during a period of great suffering; so true it is that

Our sweetest songs are those that tell of saddest thought.

It is written in the key of D major, and opens with a flowing prelude, itself commonplace, though made, by the composer's genius, fertile in beauty. The composer for some time delays the entrance of a tonic close, for it is not till an alternative strain is introduced that this becomes apparent. On this passage being however brought to a tonic close, a passage of a somewhat less simple character is introduced.

"This new subject is in the key of the dominant, but by an easy resolution a return to the original key is effected, and a brief repetition of the first subject is again brought to a tonic close. Without any warning a charming little melody in the relative minor is here introduced, reminding one of some sad human maiden wandering pensively among a gay troupe of Dryads, refusing to be comforted. But she is only disguised as a human maiden (this is strictly within the common limits of program fancy); in a trice she throws off her mournful raiment, and laughing with the best of them joins in the gay song, as from the mournful minor the original subject suddenly leaps up.

"Then, again, the gay throng takes up the subject with a somewhat different detail; then, as if mocking the sadness of the former phrase, it is tumultuously repeated, somewhat variously, in the minor; then, suddenly resuming the original major, the full tonic close is effected, as it were, through a peal of silvery laughter, while a few bars of the prelude suffice for the conclusion."

* * *

In the priggish attempt to master the letter the spirit escapes. Why should the hearer be so anxious to know about the technical structure of a work when he does not understand the terminology of the compiler? Why should he attend analytical and preparatory lectures, and in the concert read and not listen intently? In his endeavor to fit the music to the lecture and the program book he does not hear the music, let alone the impossibility of an independent judgment.

* * *

To some, however, these books serve as a refuge in time of musical distress. They even read the advertisements. They try to discover an excuse for the composer who bores them. Such a hearer should provide himself with a quicksilver bowling alley. It amuses. It is also noiseless.

* * *

BOSTON, Mass., December 16, 1894.

THE week was musically dull. The Kneisel Quartet gave a concert the 10th in Union Hall. The first number was Mendelssohn's D major quartet. The skill of the players could not turn it into a thing of beauty. To call the quartet insincere is perhaps unfair, and yet the passion is feigned and the sentiment is rank sentimentalism. You hear the composer say, "There, I think this will hit you. It is tuneful, and I can guarantee the excellence of the manufacture. You won't find a hitch in it from beginning to end. It reflects my sunny disposition, and the few clouds are summer passing clouds. Berlioz couldn't do this. Don't you listen to what they say about Schumann; he couldn't do it either. I must send a copy to Queen Victoria. By the way, how do you like this diamond pin?"

Then followed the B flat major piano trio of Beethoven. Mr. Baermann was the pianist, and he distinguished himself especially in the trio, where his performance was crisp and elegant throughout. The Brahms clarinet quintet served to display the skill and the taste of Mr. Pourtau, the new first clarinetist of the Symphony Orchestra. I am told by certain of the most earnest of the Brahmsites that this quintet is a masterpiece. It is at the same time so deep and yet so "popular." Believe me, I listened to it without prejudice. It was played superbly, and Mr. Pourtau was a delight to the soul, yet not by means of the music set before him. To me at least the quintet is a bore—a bore of large dimensions. What's the use of mincing matters? Dogberry was not without his good points. If a piece of music does not appeal to you, why should you hesitate to write yourself down an ass?

There are symphonic movements by Brahms that are like a mighty, glorious sea; there are movements as tender as virginal yet questioning thoughts. Then there are pieces by the son of the double-bass player that recall Sar Peladan's description of a wanton who insists on dancing in corybantic fashion, but in a corset. This quintet does not even suggest this magial comparison. Nor is the dullness of that blessed kind that soothes you as water dripping from a faucet, so that you forget harassing domesticity, the thought of creditors, an unpleasant neighbor, and are dimly conscious of the fact that men on the stage are working, sawing away, perspiringly earnest, rapt in self-enjoyment, while you, lucky dog, do not care for anything, least of all for the music. No, the dullness of this quintet is of the irritating kind. You see people in the street cars that look as dull as this quintet is, and you get up and converse affably with the conductor on topics of the day. You would go mad if you were obliged to sit opposite the quintet-faced passenger.

It seems eminently ungracious to say so, but the concerts of the Kneisel Quartet are, as a rule, too long. Chamber music palls after an hour and a half. If such clubs would not yield to the superstition that all the movements of a chamber composition must be played, or else the composer will come down through the roof and point the finger of scorn at the wretches who dared to cut him. Life would be sweeter if the blue pencil were more appreciated.

*

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.
SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 23, 1894.

ARIA MELBA SANG

Gertrude Franklin Made a Success With It.

THE SYMPHONY LAST NIGHT.

Mr. Mole's Fine Flute Accompaniment Won a Recall---Miss Franklin Wore a Charming Costume.

It was a varied programme which was served the symphony patrons at the ninth concert last night in Music Hall, six composers being represented. Although there was no special novelty, considerable interest centred in Miss Gertrude Franklin, who sang the difficult Handel aria, "Sweet Bird," from L'Allegro, il Penserosa ed il moderato, which Mme. Melba rendered so faultlessly at the same place a few weeks ago. The aria is replete with trills and runs, and is a severe tax on any singer; but Miss Franklin really achieved quite a success and won two recalls. Her enunciation was very distinct, and in the quieter passages her voice was wonderfully pure; but her high notes, while clear, were yet a trifle husky. Especially delightful was Mr. Mole's flute accompaniment, and he richly deserved the recall, which Miss Franklin graciously insisted on his taking. Miss Franklin was later heard in a short scene from Goetz's "Taming of the Shrew," which was dainty and melodious.

The rest of the programme included the beautiful and dreamy Haydn symphony in G, the Beethoven overture to "Fidelio," the Bach symphony in D, and one movement from the "Christmas Oratorio" of Sebastian Bach.

For the concert next week there will be the Tschaikowsky symphony No. 6, and a piano concerto by Henry Holden Huss, played for the first time, and by the composer himself.

DELIGHTED EAR AND EYE.

Gertrude Franklin's Dresses and Her Beautiful Song.

"It is the most beautiful of all modern arias I ever sung," said Gertrude Franklin yesterday when interviewed in her cosey apartments on Huntington avenue. By this Miss Franklin referred to the grand solo, "Sweet Bird," by Handel, rendered by her at last night's symphony, which the rehearsal and concert attendants were in raptures over.

"How did I discover it? Mr. Paur knew that it was specially adapted to my voice, and he engaged me to sing the aria some time ago," said Miss Franklin.

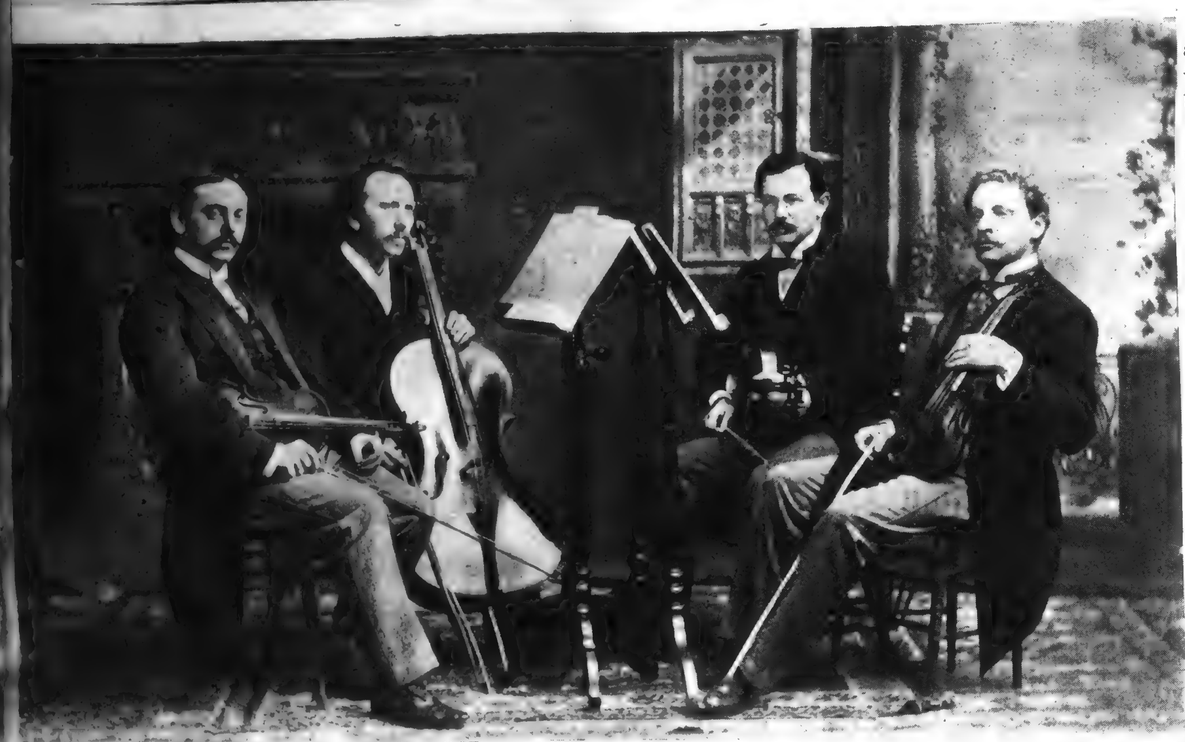
Miss Franklin not only sang the music delightfully, but she was a picture "fair to look upon." "Peaches and cream," said a Back Bay gallant to a belle, and truly her gown suggested it.

It was first of all a maize colored satin, just a trifle of a changeable hue. The skirt was made perfectly plain, but very full and bouffant at the back. It was the bodice that caused the exclamations of delight among the fair sex. Such a combination of iridescent, peachy and golden coloring is seldom seen in an evening toilet. The corsage was cut round, exposing the shoulders, and was made of the maize satin, covered with two layers of chiffon, pink over lemon, and a dash of peach-colored velvet at the waist. A full frill of Venetian point lace fell from the top of bodice, caught with a soft fold of the chiffon, fastened with rosettes of same material. Large puff sleeves of silk and chiffon gave just the right finish. The front of the corsage was ablaze with rare jewels. Miss Franklin wore her dragon fly lace pin and half sun, and her diamond star necklace.

Her hair was artistically arranged, coiffe high and ornamented with a gold-colored flower and diamond crescent.

At the rehearsal Friday Miss Franklin wore a very chic cloth gown of sea brown cordurette, edged with sable fur; the bodice brightened with bluet satin ribbons. With this she wore a dainty bonnet to match.

MISS GERTRUDE FRANKLIN.



The program of the eighth Symphony concert, given last evening in Music Hall, was as follows:

Funeral March, from Symphony No. 3, "Eroica".....Beethoven
Concerto for piano, No. 4, in D minor..... }.....Rubinstein
Symphony No. 2, in C major, "Ocean"... }
Moderato assai.
Lento assai. Con moto moderato.
Andante.
Allegro.
Andante.
Scherzo: Allegro. Trio: Moderato assai.
Andante. Allegro con fuoco.

They say that Mr. Paur chose the whole of the "Ocean" symphony as a number of this memorial program because Rubinstein himself never heard the seven movements in consecutive order. I am not prepared to admit that Rubinstein heard them all last evening. Is it not mistaken reverence to expose the weakness as well as the strength of a great man? As a whole, the "Ocean" symphony is not as strong a work as the "Dramatic," which was played here last season. The first movement is glorious music; the flight of the composer is skyward, and it is sure. In spite of clever instrumentation in the "Storm" movement and fine passages in other movements, there is from the beginning to the end that decrescendo of musical interest which distinguishes so many of Rubinstein's larger works.

On the other hand, the D minor concerto is one of his finest compositions. It is so sustained. There is almost nothing that is trivial. It is free from padding. The heroic concerto demands a heroic player. Let it be a man. And yet I remember a remarkable performance of it by Sophie Menter, that Amazon, I almost wrote virago, of the piano. Mrs. Ernest Lent, of Washington, was the pianist last evening. Her technic was clean and well developed; her touch was agreeable; she played with taste and understanding. But the task was greater than her strength, and in the last movement she seemed exhausted.

The orchestra played well, and yet, although it was a memorial concert and the bust of Rubinstein faced the hearers, each movement of the symphony was the signal for the departure of a portion of the audience.

The progam of the concert of the 22d will include the symphony in D major, P. E. Bach; Hirtenmusik, J. S. Bach; symphony G major, Haydn; overture, "Fidelio," Beethoven. Miss Franklin will sing Händel's "Sweet Bird" and an air from Goetz's "Taming of the Shrew."

* * *

There has been considerable discussion concerning the Symphony, program books. I, too, have been in Arcadia; which being interpreted means that I have in my turn written such books. Yet I do not believe in the program book as it exists and flourishes in England and the United States.

The program book, no matter how carefully it is edited, stands between the hearer and the composer.

The book that is purely technical and without thematic illustrations is a bore to the musician, and a stumbling block to the amateur.

The book that looks rather at the æsthetics is apt to prejudice the hearer for or against the composition played.

They suffer from the evil in England to a greater extent, perhaps; certainly I know of no program book in this country that contains such gems as the following taken from London programs by the music critic of the "Pall Mall Gazette," and published in that journal November 29. Here are a few:

"Of a Mozart quintet the program compiler remarks: 'So carefully is each player attended to in the allegretto, and so genial is the entire movement, that there must have been great complacency in the palace at Potsdam during its performance.' Again: 'In the true spirit of a laughing philosopher he took leave of one branch of his multiform art.' Again: 'The first movement, after a single preludial bar, opens with an orchestral tutti.' 'Preludial bar' is good. Again, of a Scottish overture: 'Too much stress should not be laid upon the title with which the overture is headed. * * * But as a good deal of Scotch poetry is in praise of whiskey, the Bacchanalian character * * * is easily accounted for.' Again: 'One passage near the beginning, at the eighth bar, is always waited for.' Again: 'What a pity it is that a catholic enjoyment of music should be denied to music loving people! * * * Wagner is for the stage; he himself descried it. He is for the footlights. We are not all of us in the heroic, theatrical mood, the Hercules vein. We still love music for music's sake, without librettos or Leitmotiven.'"

And then the "Pall Mall" man, moved to bitter scorn, analyzes a "comparatively uninteresting" song after the manner of these program writers. He takes Horn's "I've Been Roaming."

"This delicious cavatina, which, 'on the outstretched forefinger of Time, sparkles forever,' was composed by Horn during a period of great suffering; so true it is that

Our sweetest songs are those that tell of saddest thought.

It is written in the key of D major, and opens with a flowing prelude, itself commonplace, though made, by the composer's genius, fertile in beauty. The composer for some time delays the entrance of a tonic close, for it is not till an alternative strain is introduced that this becomes apparent. On this passage being however brought to a tonic close, a passage of a somewhat less simple character is introduced.

"This new subject is in the key of the dominant, but by an easy resolution a return to the original key is effected, and a brief repetition of the first subject is again brought to a tonic close. Without any warning a charming little melody in the relative minor is here introduced, reminding one of some sad human maiden wandering pensively among a gay troupe of Dryads, refusing to be comforted. But she is only disguised as a human maiden (this is strictly within the common limits of program fancy); in a trice she throws off her mournful raiment, and laughing with the best of them joins in the gay song, as from the mournful minor the original subject suddenly leaps up.

"Then, again, the gay throng takes up the subject with a somewhat different detail; then, as if mocking the sadness of the former phrase, it is tumultuously repeated, somewhat variously, in the minor; then, suddenly resuming the original major, the full tonic close is effected, as it were, through a peal of silvery laughter, while a few bars of the prelude suffice for the conclusion."

* * *

In the priggish attempt to master the letter the spirit escapes. Why should the hearer be so anxious to know about the technical structure of a work when he does not understand the terminology of the compiler? Why should he attend analytical and preparatory lectures, and in the concert read and not listen intently? In his endeavor to fit the music to the lecture and the program book he does not hear the music, let alone the impossibility of an independent judgment.

* * *

To some, however, these books serve as a refuge in time of musical distress. They even read the advertisements. They try to discover an excuse for the composer who bores them. Such a hearer should provide himself with a quicksilver bowling alley. It amuses. It is also noiseless.

* * *

BOSTON, Mass., December 16, 1894.

THE week was musically dull. The Kneisel Quartet gave a concert the 10th in Union Hall. The first number was Mendelssohn's D major quartet. The skill of the players could not turn it into a thing of beauty. To call the quartet insincere is perhaps unfair, and yet the passion is feigned and the sentiment is rank sentimentalism. You hear the composer say, "There, I think this will hit you. It is tuneful, and I can guarantee the excellence of the manufacture. You won't find a hitch in it from beginning to end. It reflects my sunny disposition, and the few clouds are summer passing clouds. Berlioz couldn't do this. Don't you listen to what they say about Schumann; he couldn't do it either. I must send a copy to Queen Victoria. By the way, how do you like this diamond pin?"

Then followed the B flat major piano trio of Beethoven. Mr. Baermann was the pianist, and he distinguished himself especially in the trio, where his performance was crisp and elegant throughout. The Brahms clarinet quintet served to display the skill and the taste of Mr. Pourtau, the new first clarinetist of the Symphony Orchestra. I am told by certain of the most earnest of the Brahmsites that this quintet is a masterpiece. It is at the same time so deep and yet so "popular." Believe me, I listened to it without prejudice. It was played superbly, and Mr. Pourtau was a delight to the soul, yet not by means of the music set before him. To me at least the quintet is a bore—a bore of large dimensions. What's the use of mincing matters? Dogberry was not without his good points. If a piece of music does not appeal to you, why should you hesitate to write yourself down an ass?

There are symphonic movements by Brahms that are like a mighty, glorious sea; there are movements as tender as virginal yet questioning thoughts. Then there are pieces by the son of the double-bass player that recall Sar Peladan's description of a wanton who insists on dancing in corybantic fashion, but in a corset. This quintet does not even suggest this magial comparison. Nor is the dullness of that blessed kind that soothes you as water dripping from a faucet, so that you forget harassing domesticity, the thought of creditors, an unpleasant neighbor, and are dimly conscious of the fact that men on the stage are working, sawing away, perspiringly earnest, rapt in self-enjoyment, while you, lucky dog, do not care for anything, least of all for the music. No, the dullness of this quintet is of the irritating kind. You see people in the street cars that look as dull as this quintet is, and you get up and converse affably with the conductor on topics of the day. You would go mad if you were obliged to sit opposite the quintet-faced passenger.

It seems eminently ungracious to say so, but the concerts of the Kneisel Quartet are, as a rule, too long. Chamber music palls after an hour and a half. If such clubs would not yield to the superstition that all the movements of a chamber composition must be played, or else the composer will come down through the roof and point the finger of scorn at the wretches who dared to cut him. Life would be sweeter if the blue pencil were more appreciated.

*

BOSTON POST.
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.
SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 23, 1894.

ARIA MELBA SANG

Gertrude Franklin Made a Success With It.

THE SYMPHONY LAST NIGHT.

Mr. Mole's Fine Flute Accompaniment Won a Recall---Miss Franklin Wore a Charming Costume.

It was a varied programme which was served the symphony patrons at the ninth concert last night in Music Hall, six composers being represented. Although there was no special novelty, considerable interest centred in Miss Gertrude Franklin, who sang the difficult Handel aria, "Sweet Bird," from L'Allegro, il Penserosa ed il moderato, which Mme. Melba rendered so faultlessly at the same place a few weeks ago. The aria is replete with trills and runs, and is a severe tax on any singer; but Miss Franklin really achieved quite a success and won two recalls. Her enunciation was very distinct, and in the quieter passages her voice was wonderfully pure; but her high notes, while clear, were yet a trifle husky. Especially delightful was Mr. Mole's flute accompaniment, and he richly deserved the recall, which Miss Franklin graciously insisted on his taking. Miss Franklin was later heard in a short scene from Goetz's "Taming of the Shrew," which was dainty and melodious.

The rest of the programme included the beautiful and dreamy Haydn symphony in G, the Beethoven overture to "Fidelio," the Bach symphony in D, and one movement from the "Christmas Oratorio" of Sebastian Bach.

For the concert next week there will be the Tschaikowsky symphony No. 6, and a piano concerto by Henry Holden Huss, played for the first time, and by the composer himself.

DELIGHTED EAR AND EYE.

Gertrude Franklin's Dresses and Her Beautiful Song.

"It is the most beautiful of all modern arias I ever sung," said Gertrude Franklin yesterday when interviewed in her cosey apartments on Huntington avenue. By this Miss Franklin referred to the grand solo, "Sweet Bird," by Handel, rendered by her at last night's symphony, which the rehearsal and concert attendants were in raptures over.

"How did I discover it? Mr. Paur knew that it was specially adapted to my voice; and he engaged me to sing the aria some time ago," said Miss Franklin.

Miss Franklin not only sang the music delightfully, but she was a picture "fair to look upon." "Peaches and cream," said a Back Bay gallant to a belle, and truly her gown suggested it.

It was first of all a maize colored satin, just a trifle of a changeable hue. The skirt was made perfectly plain, but very full and bouffant at the back. It was the bodice that caused the exclamations of delight among the fair sex. Such a combination of iridescent, peachy and golden coloring is seldom seen in an evening toilet. The corsage was cut round, exposing the shoulders, and was made of the maize satin, covered with two layers of chiffon, pink over lemon, and a dash of peach-colored velvet at the waist. A full frill of Venetian point lace fell from the top of bodice, caught with a soft fold of the chiffon, fastened with rosettes of same material. Large puff sleeves of silk and chiffon gave just the right finish. The front of the corsage was ablaze with rare jewels. Miss Franklin wore her dragon fly lace pin and half sun, and her diamond star necklace.

Her hair was artistically arranged, quite high and ornamented with a gold-colored flower and diamond crescent.

At the rehearsal Friday Miss Franklin wore a very chic cloth gown of seal brown cordurette, edged with sable fur, the bodice brightened with bluet satin ribbons. With this she wore a dainty bonnet to match.

MISS GERTRUDE FRANKLIN.

...TRAL.
...DAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. ..., NO. 176.

SUNDAY, DECEMBER 23, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Miss Gertrude Franklin Wins a Brilliant Success.

The Soloist in Her Best Voice—Bach's Symphony in D Exquisitely Played by the Orchestra—A Most Satisfying and Convincing Haydn Interpretation by Mr. Paur.

The selections for the concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall last night were:

Symphony in D.....Philip Emanuel Bach
Scena, "Sweet Bird".....Handel
Sinfonia from the "Christmas Oratorio"
Symphony G (B. and H. 13).....J. S. Bach
Scena from "Taming of the Shrew"..H. Goetz
Overture, "Fidelio," op. 72.....Beethoven

The soloist was Miss Gertrude Franklin. The attendance was very large. The programme was pleasingly light in character, and it was a felicitous idea to place the symphony by Emanuel Bach in such close proximity with that of Haydn, for the latter was always an earnest and enthusiastic student of the music of the earlier masters, and, moreover, anticipated much in the symphony form that is generally credited to Haydn. This Bach is the connecting link between the period of the great Bach and Handel and that of Haydn and Mozart, and was the immediate precursor of Haydn. In him was manifested the germs of form and of thematic treatment which were so wonderfully developed by Haydn, and his works in their construction, especially in regard to his recognition of the necessity of a more artistic form than prevailed in his time have given him a far greater prominence and importance than were attained by any of his contemporaries. His instrumentation is remarkable for his era, notably in connection with its contrasts between the wind and the strings and for its free writing. The symphony played last night may have sounded quaint and notable more for its cheerfulness and its easy natural flow than for its depth, but it must have seemed revolutionary to the musical public of that day. In his best instrumental works this Bach rises boldly above his contemporaries. This symphony in D is his most successful achievement in that species of composition, and is the only one that has survived. It is still delightful in its freshness, despite certain quaint cadences, and will always be interesting for its animation, its grace and its melodiousness. Its proper character was admirably preserved in the masterful and sympathetic reading accorded it by Mr. Paur, and it was exquisitely played by the orchestra.

The Haydn symphony is one of the most fascinating of its composer's works in its kind. It charms from beginning to end by its pure and natural melody, its buoyancy of spirit, its dainty simplicity and its beautiful contrasts of tone color. The slow movement, though almost naive in its themes and their treatment, is full of poetry, and its finale effervesces with gayety and brilliancy. Mr. Paur's interpretation of the work was one of his most brilliant successes. The movements were taken at their first pace, the readings of the largo and the minuet being conspicuously striking in this relation. The coloring throughout was exquisite in its finish, and the whole may be fairly pronounced the most satisfying and convincing Haydn interpretation and playing that has ever been heard at these concerts. The selection from the "Christmas Orations," by the giant Bach, seasonably introduced in the programme, was rendered by the orchestra with surpassing beauty and purity of style. The audience was exceptionally appreciative of the efforts of the orchestra and its conductor through the whole concert, and its applause was very cordial.

Miss Franklin, who has not been heard at these concerts in several seasons, was cordially received. The Handel scena is its composer's most carefully written song in its kind, and, though it is now somewhat quaint, and its Da capo narrowly escapes making it tiresome, it is always interesting when performed by a thorough singer. Miss Franklin sang it very beautifully throughout, with flawless technique, absolute purity of style and impressive breadth and dignity. She was in her best voice, and in both the legato and the more florid passages her singing was artistic in the truest sense of the term. Strikingly fine was her trilling in its tunefulness, its steadiness and its splendid crescendo in its climaxes. In the cadenza there were two remarkably long and evenly sustained pianissimo notes, and a chromatic run that was exceptional in its clearness and precision, every note coming out distinctly. The scene has rarely been so well sung here. At its close she was heartily applauded and twice recalled. The Goetz air was given for the first time in Boston. It is a beautiful composition and the orchestration is of rare beauty. The strings are used in masterly style and with great richness in effect, and there are some delightful touches with the wind instruments. It is an exacting work, wholly in the legato style, which perhaps may account for why it has not been given here before. It is not a "show" piece, and demands solid singing, without which it might easily become dry, bald and uninteresting. Here again the artist distinguished herself by her mastery of the technique of her art and by the refined color that marked the interpretation generally, and won another brilliant success and two vigorous recalls.

The programme for the next concert is: Symphony No. 6, Tschaikowsky; concerto for pianoforte, H. H. Huss (first time); Ballet music, "Die Rebe," Rubinstein; overture, "Benvenuto Cellini," Berlioz. Mr. Henry Holden Huss is to be the soloist.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 23.

The Symphony Concert.

The ninth concert of the Symphony Orchestra was given, last night, at Music Hall. The programme was:

Symphony in D-major.....C. Ph. E. Bach
"Sweet Bird".....Handel
Hirtenmusik.....J. S. Bach
Symphony in G-Major.....Haydn
Aria from "Taming of the Shrew".....Goetz
Overture, "Fidelio".....Beethoven

The Symphony by Carl Philip Bach was interesting historically rather than æsthetically, and we must be in the historical mood to properly appreciate it. It is a voice from the past and unmistakably reveals its respectable antiquity. We all know that Hayden was "father" of symphony, and yet Carl Philip was his predecessor in this species of writing. As a question of age Carl Philip is first; as a question of merit Carl Philip, with his eighteen symphonies, must remain in the background. Judged as an art work the D-major symphony suggests childhood, without its grace, hard work and high knowledge without inspiration, hardness and dryness without profundity. The work is not alive, it is dead and mummified childhood, and in place of leading us forward, transports us backwards to the time of which it is a type. The great Johann Sebastian is, and always will be a modern, and Carl Philip has the further disadvantages of being his son. There may be a class of modern supersensitives who are emotionally thrilled and spiritually moved by this D-major symphony; as we know that there was at least one person who was stirred to religious fervor by the mere sound of the word "Mesopotamia"; but to the average music lover of the present day the work will suggest little more than powdered wigs, dignified deportment, suave manner galliards and sarabands. This is from the æsthetic side; historically the Carl Philip symphony is of the greatest interest and value; it is good work in itself; it repesents a transition phase in musical history and is a connecting link between the great Johann Sebastian and the great Haydn. The work was finely played, but perhaps with the objection that a too modern color was given to the interpretation. Some works—those which are not immortal—refuse to be modernized, and in the process lose all their characteristic traits. In this local color is everything, for the language spoken appeals in vain to our ear. We cannot see or recall the living Pharaoh in the mummy, and so we study the hieroglyphics on the coffin lid, inspect the nard and frankincense, muse over the Canopic jars, and so feel a vague, sentimental regret for the good old times, while at the same time, trying to repress a selfish joy that we were born at a later state.

The Haydn Gmajor symphony is not much younger than the one that preceded it on the programme. Carl Philip was dead but a few years when it was written—but what a contrast! It is quaint here and there, but it still speaks a living language that all understand, and with an authority that all obey. It is not necessary to make allowances, but only to note differences. The beauty seen through inspiration is never antiquated, and good "papa" Haydn put in music a portion of that beauty entombed by Phidias in marble. The beauty of the one is naked, that of the other is clad in an attire that is out of date; but at soul both are one. In the Haydn work there are beauty, grace, lightness and surety of touch, born of definite ideas, gentle humor, an absence of pedantry, a fine fertility of invention, a sweet cheerfulness, depth, earnest-broadness, and full ripe technical knowledge as, to take one instance, the working out of the allegro movement proves. This symphony was faultlessly played, all the beauties characterizing the composer being in full evidence in the interpretation. The beautiful largo was a finished piece of work and the finale was given with admirable brilliancy. The large and majestic shepherds' music of Bach was also admirably played and the "Fidelio" overture brought an admirable programme to a satisfactory close. Mr. Paur was the recipient of frequent applause and was called forward to bow his thanks. It is only justice to note that the symphony orchestra has steadily improved until it has reached a degree of perfection that has been hitherto unknown to this excellent organization.

The soloist of the evening was Miss Gertrude Franklin, who might have shown greater discretion in the selection of pieces she sang. In the first place, in singing "Sweet Bird" so soon after the great Melba sung it, Miss Franklin forces a comparison that must necessarily tell against her. Of course comparison is not criticism, but yet, in the present case it foretells the result of criticism. Any man has the right to compose a tragedy on the subject of Hamlet, but though one may wonder at the daring, the result can be safely predicted from the start. And then, it must be remembered that art can be judged only from its results, and, so far as these results are concerned, it makes no difference whether the artist fails through large or through small ambition. As for the Goetz aria, it was a mistake to select it; a modern opera will not admit of mutilation; each portion is part of a homogeneous whole and, taken by itself, loses the effect intended by the composer, and, judging from the few words that could be heard, the aria seems intended to be sung by a perplexed, troubled, heart-sore woman; that is with feeling and some show of emotion. Perhaps it is not allowable on the concert stage to yield to impulse or feeling; but surely art has a higher claim than the routine of tradition. If it be necessary to sing with cold impassiveness; if technical excellence be the only object aimed at, then it would seem as though songs should be selected that demand nothing more than technical skill in the interpretation. There is a tendency at the present time to applaud technical skill as something that deserves praise in itself, whereas it has really nothing to do with art but with method. Every pedant can tell us that Rubenstein "dropped" notes in his piano playing; there are thousands of pianikins who do not drop notes, and yet Rubinstein's failures are more admirable than their successes. The fiery flash of genius excuses everything; but mere mechanical excellence will not excuse the absence of genius; if it is the only possession of artist, it will hardly excuse itself. We must have evidence of fine art before we are prepared to estimate the value of faultless technique. Any number of swallows will not make the spring, let them cleave the air in never so many graceful curve and circumgyrations, and, on the other hand, if the spring is perfect we may even forgive and forget the absence of swallows. In a singer as in all artists, mere techinal excellence is of secondary value; if nothing is done there is but small interest in noting how skilfully the failure was brought about. It only remains to add that Miss Franklin is careful and painstaking in all that she does. The programme for the next concert is: Symphony No. 6 Tschaikowsky; Concerto for Pianoforte, Henry H. Huss, Rubinstein Ballet music, "Die Rebe"; Overture Benvenuto Cellini," Berlioz.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 23, 1894.

THE NINTH SYMPHONY, ETC.

The ninth Symphony concert might almost have been fitted up with a Christmas tree decoration, for the general range and character of the music was so simple, innocent, free and seasonably placid even in its gayety, that the juvenile audience at those unique concerts for children which Miss Orviss has just been giving might have understood and enjoyed nearly every number on the programme.

The concert was quite short, and yet there were six selections to be played, their composers being two Bachs (father and son), Handel, Haydn, Beethoven and Goetz—all but the last-named being classic, and two being scenes for soprano, undertaken by Miss Gertrude Franklin. In detail, these selections were:—From Philipp Emanuel Bach, his symphony in D major, hardly larger or longer than many an overture of our day, for its three movements, each running directly into the next, present in about a dozen minutes a gayly and keenly counterpointed allegro, a short, persuasively melodic largo, and a stirring presto. All is honest, open and almost ingenuous, betraying its author's kingship and yet giving evidence of independence of thought and incipient emancipation of style. From John Sebastian Bach, the pastoral Shepherd Music from the "Christmas" oratorio, with its calm buoyancy and gently piety of feeling. From Haydn, the favorite symphony in G major, the slow movement of which is a shade or two graver and more severe than one expects from him, but whose bright allegro, solid-footed minuet and happy-hearted final rondo are as characteristic as they are delightful. From Beethoven, the "Fidelio" overture, which, as it was the fourth he wrote for that opera, is but a pale suggestion of the strength and splendor of the three which bear the name he loved for his great work, "Leonora." All this music was excellently directed and admirably played, but one might except that the double-basses were not always so smooth and clear in the Haydn as they ought to have been.

In her concert selections Miss Franklin always respects her art, her self and her audience. For this occasion she chose the "Sweet Bird," from Handel's music to the "Il Pensieroso" of Milton, and the scene of Katherine's repentance and new resolutions from Goetz's "Taming of the Shrew." If in the former a comparison arose between her and Mme. Melba who had recently won a triumph with that air in that same hall, Miss Franklin can blame only herself. Yet she was no great sufferer in such a comparison. Her voice is absolutely limpid, her intonation perfect, her phrasing unimpeachable and her general style has a distinguished fineness. All that could reasonably be said in a comparative comment would be then that Mme. Melba's voice has the greater fulness and that her execution of the more elaborate fioriture had the freedom of spontaneity, while Miss Franklin's showed something of the reserve of the accomplished student and the preparation of the skilful artist. The Goetz scene was skilfully proportioned, and the distinction between its two moods clearly manifested, the singer's beautiful enunciation contributing much to this. Mr. Mole played the flute obbligato to the "Bird" song (which had a charming new cadenza) in his best style.

Next Saturday's programme names: Tschaikowsky's sixth symphony; Rubinstein's "Die Rebe" ballet music; Berlioz's "Benvenuto Cellini" overture, and a concerto for pianoforte, which its composer, Mr. Henry Holden Huss will come from New York to play.

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

American Art Journal.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JAN. 5, 1895.

In the Ninth Symphony Concert it was interesting to hear a symphony so old as that in D, by Philipp Emanuel Bach, who died over a century ago; have that followed by his father's Shepherd Music, from a Christmas oratorio written in 1734; then to hear Haydn's Symphony in G, with its brief movements, reminding you of the sparkling sprays on a holiday tree; and have the concert wind up with Beethoven's Fidelio. Four eighteenth-century compositions. The soloist was Gertrude Franklin, with right noble work in another last century selection, the Sweet Bird, from Handel's Penseroso, her voice finely blending with Mole's flute obligato. Her other number (and very kind it was on the singer's part to let us hear it) was up to date, "My strength is spent," from Taming the Shrew. Though praised as musicianly, the music conveys little of the spirit of Katharine's character or the words, nor does it inspire any special wish to hear the rest of Goetz's opera.

An the Tenth Symphony Concert we enjoyed two decided novelties. One was Tschaikowsky's Pathetic Symphony, whose publication shortly preceded his death in 1893. It is indeed a variation from the stereotyped classic form, beginning and ending adagio, with the allegros between; but it is full of suggestions which might indicate a mind about venturing on the unknown sea.

The other "first time" was the piano concerto in B, by Henry Holden Huss. The composer was himself at the piano. The introduction is disagreeably suggestive of a big doll shouting papa; but when this is over, the brilliancy of the work chains your attention, especially the delicate second movement. The concert ended with Berlioz's Bellini overture.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, DECEMBER 23, 1894.

The Ninth Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The program of the ninth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Paur was as follows:

Symphony in D major.....P. E. Bach
Scena: "Sweet bird, that shun'st the noise of folly," from "L'Allegro, il Penseroso ed il Moderato".....Handel
Flute obligato, Mr. Mole.
Sinfonia, (Shepherds' Music) from the "Christmas Oratorio".....J. S. Bach
Symphony in G major (Breitkopf & Hartel, No. 13; Peters, No. 8).....Hadyn
Scena: "My strength is spent," from "The Taming of the Shrew".....Goetz
Overture to "Fidelio," in E major.....Beethoven

There were brave symphony makers before Haydn. It is easy to say that the fully developed sonata form is not found in their works; but take the symphony of Emanuel Bach played last evening, and how fresh it is, how alive its simple figures. The largo is a movement that might well serve as a prelude to reading Milton, such music as Charles Lamb spoke of, full of solemn, almost unearthly beauty. And then these old symphonies have the great merit of brevity. There is more than an historical interest awakened by hearing these works. It might be well to play once a year a symphony by Sammartini, or Gossec, or Stamitz. The work might show us how easily the audiences before Haydn were amused. Or the hearing might be like unto a walk in an old-fashioned flower garden, with paths trimmed with box, with a quaint, old summer house, with a sundial bearing a verse that serves as a reminder of death.

In his arrangement of the "Shepherds' Music" Franz tells us how he thinks Bach should have written the instrumental introduction. It is the fashion to set this piece against Handel's pastoral symphony in "The Messiah," to the disadvantage of the latter. Yet are not the strains of Handel more naive, more realistic, more in keeping with "the silly shepherds" who heard the angelic song as they kept their flocks? These shepherds of Bach knew too much about counterpoint.

A symphony by Haydn almost always gives genuine pleasure. The one chosen last evening is familiar, but its jollity, its good nature, its artful simplicity are not stale. It would be an interesting experiment to play it with the orchestra of Haydn's time. The great body of strings in the modern orchestra is surely out of proportion with the number of the other instruments, no matter how discreet the conductor may be. Some have proposed to double the wind instruments, both wood and brass, but would it not be easier to reduce the strings? The symphony, as is true of the other numbers, was well read and finely played.

But this last sentence needs qualifying. In the overture to "Fidelio," there was a lack of precision, and the horn-theme in the main allegro was wobbly. Then, too, the overture—for Beethoven—is pretty poor stuff. In comparison with the great Lenore overtures it sinks into insignificance.

Miss Franklin sang with her usual taste and skill. There is more than this to be said in praise of her. In the air by Handel her display of technique was admirable. Many were the fine points in the detail; witness, for instance, the upward run at the close; the purity of the tones held in friendly rivalry with the flute; the treatment of the cadences, a stumbling block to many excellent singers and players who are at their ease in works of the romantic school. Mr. Molé played the obligato with his customary skill, and sympathetically.

In the scena from "The Taming of the Shrew," Miss Franklin sang with genuine and unexaggerated feeling. The beauty of the music does not rest in the singer's part. Her voice is but one instrument of the orchestra. Goetz, a musician of undoubted talent and more than ordinary promise, took life seriously, even in writing a comic opera. In this scene he is at his best; the opera as a whole suffers from his seriousness, his apparent desire to be intense even when the text calls for light and humorous music. Nor as I remember the opera did he show unmistakably the true dramatic instinct. This scena, fine as it is, might fit a woman of more dreamy, romantic character than Katharine, the repentant shrew. Her regret might well take a lighter tone. Even prophetic mockery might be heard in the orchestra. For who was ever convinced that Petruchio after the curtain falls is sure of a peaceful married life? Nor is he the man to be content with uneventful, sluggish domesticity.

PHILIP HALE.

---

[68]

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCVI., NO. 176.

SUNDAY, DECEMBER 23, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Miss Gertrude Franklin Wins a Brilliant Success.

The Soloist in Her Best Voice—Bach's Symphony in D Exquisitely Played by the Orchestra—A Most Satisfying and Convincing Haydn Interpretation by Mr. Paur.

The selections for the concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall last night were:

Symphony in D.....Philip Emanuel Bach
Scena, "Sweet Bird".....Handel
Sinfonia from the "Christmas Oratorios"
Symphony G (B. and H. 13).....J. S. Bach
Scena from "Taming of the Shrew"...H. Goetz
Overture,, "Fidelio," op. 72.....Beethoven

The soloist was Miss Gertrude Franklin. The attendance was very large. The programme was pleasingly light in character, and it was a felicitous idea to place the symphony by Emanuel Bach in such close proximity with that of Haydn, for the latter was always an earnest and enthusiastic student of the music of the earlier masters, and, moreover, anticipated much in the symphony form that is generally credited to Haydn. This Bach is the connecting link between the period of the great Bach and Handel and that of Haydn and Mozart, and was the immediate precursor of Haydn. In him was manifested the germs of form and of thematic treatment which were so wonderfully developed by Haydn, and his works in their construction, especially in regard to his recognition of the necessity of a more artistic form than prevailed in his time have given him a far greater prominence and importance than were attained by any of his contemporaries. His instrumentation is remarkable for his era, notably in connection with its contrasts between the wind and the strings and for its free writing. The symphony played last night may have sounded quaint and notable more for its cheerfulness and its easy natural flow than for its depth, but it must have seemed revolutionary to the musical public of that day. In his best instrumental works this Bach rises boldly above his contemporaries. This symphony in D is his most successful achievement in that species of composition, and is the only one that has survived. It is still delightful in its freshness, despite certain quaint cadences, and will always be interesting for its animation, its grace and its melodiousness. Its proper character was admirably preserved in the masterful and sympathetic reading accorded it by Mr. Paur, and it was exquisitely played by the orchestra.

The Haydn symphony is one of the most fascinating of its composer's works in its kind. It charms from beginning to end by its pure and natural melody, its buoyancy of spirit, its dainty simplicity and its beautiful contrasts of tone color. The slow movement, though almost naive in its themes and their treatment, is full of poetry, and its finale effervesces with gayety andb rilliancy. Mr. Paur's interpretation of the work was one of his most brilliant successes. The movements were taken at their first pace, the readings of the largo and the minuet being conspicuously striking in this relation. The coloring throughout was exquisite in its finish, and the whole may be fairly pronounced the most satisfying and convincing Haydn interpretation and playing that has ever been heard at these concerts. The selection from the "Christmas Orations," by the giant Bach, seasonably introduced in the programme, was rendered by the orchestra with surpassing beauty and purity of style. The audience was exceptionally appreciative of the efforts of the orchestra and its conductor through the whole concert, and its applause was very cordial.

Miss Franklin, who has not been heard at these concerts in several seasons, was cordially received. The Handel scena is its composer's most carefully written song in its kind, and, though it is now somewhat quaint, and its Da capo narrowly escapes making it tiresome, it is always interesting when performed by a thorough singer. Miss Franklin sang it very beautifully throughout, with flawless technique, absolute purity of style and impressive breadth and dignity. She was in her best voice, and in both the legato and the more florid passages her singing was artistic in the truest sense of the term. Strikingly fine was her trilling in its tunefulness, its steadiness and its splendid crescendo in its climaxes. In the cadenza there were two remarkably long and evenly sustained pianissimo notes, and a chromatic run that was exceptional in its clearness and precision, every note coming out distinctly. The scene has rarely been so well sung here. At its close she was heartily applauded and twice recalled. The Goetz air was given for the first time in Boston. It is a beautiful composition and the orchestration is of rare beauty. The strings are used in masterly style and with great richness in effect, and there are some delightful touches with the wind instruments. It is an exacting work, wholly in the legato style, which perhaps may account for why it has not been given here before. It is not a "show" piece, and demands solid singing, without which it might easily become dry, bald and uninteresting. Here again the artist distinguished herself by her mastery of the technique of her art and by the refined color that marked the interpretation generally, and won another brilliant success and two vigorous recalls.

The programme for the next concert is: Symphony No. 6, Tschaikowsky; concerto for pianoforte, H. H. Huss (first time); Ballet music, "Die Rebe," Rubinstein; overture, "Benvenuto Cellini," Berlioz. Mr. Henry Holden Huss is to be the soloist.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 23.

The Symphony Concert.

The ninth concert of the Symphony Orchestra was given, last night, at Music Hall. The programme was:

Symphony in D-major.....C. Ph. E. Bach
"Sweet Bird".....Handel
Hirtenmusik.....J. S. Bach
Symphony in G-Major.....Haydn
Aria from "Taming of the Shrew".....Goetz
Overture, "Fidelio".....Beethoven

The Symphony by Carl Philip Bach was interesting historically rather than æsthetically, and we must be in the historical mood to properly appreciate it. It is a voice from the past and unmistakably reveals its respectable antiquity. We all know that Hayden was "father" of symphony, and yet Carl Philip was his predecessor in this species of writing. As a question of age Carl Philip is first; as a question of merit Carl Philip, with his eighteen symphonies, must remain in the background. Judged as an art work the D-major symphony suggests childhood, without its grace, hard work and high knowledge without inspiration, hardness and dryness without profundity. The work is not alive, it is dead and mummified childhood, and in place of leading us forward, transports us backwards to the time of which it is a type. The great Johann Sebastian is, and always will be a modern, and Carl Philip has the further disadvantages of being his son. There may be a class of modern supersensitives who are emotionally thrilled and spiritually moved by this D-major symphony; as we know that there was at least one person who was stirred to religious fervor by the mere sound of the word "Mesopotamia"; but to the average music lover of the present day the work will suggest little more than powdered wigs, dignified deportment, suave manner galliards and sarabands. This is from the æsthetic side; historically the Carl Philip symphony is of the greatest interest and value; it is good work in itself; it repesents a transition phase in musical history and is a connecting link between the great Johann Sebastian and the great Haydn. The work was finely played, but perhaps with the objection that a too modern color was given to the interpretation. Some works—those which are not immortal—refuse to be modernized, and in the process lose all their characteristic traits. In this local color is everything, for the language spoken appeals in vain to our ear. We cannot see or recall the living Pharaoh in the mummy, and so we study the hieroglyphics on the coffin lid, inspect the nard and frankincense, muse over the Canopic jars, and so feel a vague, sentimental regret for the good old times, while at the same time, trying to repress a selfish joy that we were born at a later state.

The Haydn Gmajor symphony is not much younger than the one that preceded it on the programme. Carl Philip was dead but a few years when it was written—but what a contrast! It is quaint here and there, but it still speaks a living language that all understand, and with an authority that all obey. It is not necessary to make allowances, but only to note differences. The beauty seen through inspiration is never antiquated, and good "papa" Haydn put in music a portion of that beauty entombed by Phidias in marble. The beauty of the one is naked, that of the other is clad in an attire that is out of date; but at soul both are one. In the Haydn work there are beauty, grace, lightness and surety of touch, born of definite ideas, gentle humor, an absence of pedantry, a fine fertility of invention, a sweet cheerfulness, depth, earnest broadness, and full ripe technical knowledge as, to take one instance, the working out of the allegro movement proves. This symphony was faultlessly played, all the beauties characterizing the composer being in full evidence in the interpretation. The beautiful largo was a finished piece of work and the finale was given with admirable brilliancy. The large and majestic shepherds' music of Bach was also admirably played and the "Fidelio" overture brought an admirable programme to a satisfactory close. Mr. Paur was the recipient of frequent applause and was called forward to bow his thanks. It is only justice to note that the symphony orchestra has steadily improved until it has reached a degree of perfection that has been hitherto unknown to this excellent organization.

The soloist of the evening was Miss Gertrude Franklin, who might have shown greater discretion in the selection of pieces she sang. In the first place, in singing "Sweet Bird" so soon after the great Melba sung it, Miss Franklin forces a comparison that must necessarily tell against her. Of course comparison is not criticism, but yet, in the present case it foretells the result of criticism. Any man has the right to compose a tragedy on the subject of Hamlet, but though one may wonder at the daring, the result can be safely predicted from the start. And then, it must be remembered that art can be judged only from its results, and, so far as these results are concerned, it makes no difference whether the artist fails through large or through small ambition. As for the Goetz aria, it was a mistake to select it; a modern opera will not admit of mutilation; each portion is part of a homogeneous whole and, taken by itself, loses the effect intended by the composer, and, judging from the few words that could be heard, the aria seems intended to be sung by a perplexed, troubled, heart-sore woman; that is with feeling and some show of emotion. Perhaps it is not allowable on the concert stage to yield to impulse or feeling; but surely art has a higher claim than the routine of tradition. If it be necessary to sing with cold impassiveness; if technical excellence be the only object aimed at, then it would seem as though songs should be selected that demand nothing more than technical skill in the interpretation. There is a tendency at the present time to applaud technical skill as something that deserves praise in itself, whereas it has really nothing to do with art but with method. Every pedant can tell us that Rubenstein "dropped" notes in his piano playing; there are thousands of pianikins who do not drop notes, and yet Rubinstein's failures are more admirable than their successes. The fiery flash of genius excuses everything; but mere mechanical excellence will not excuse the absence of genius; if it is the only possession of artist, it will hardly excuse itself. We must have evidence of fine art before we are prepared to estimate the value of faultless technique. Any number of swallows will not make the spring, let them cleave the air in never so many graceful curve and circumgyrations, and, on the other hand, if the spring is perfect we may even forgive and forget the absence of swallows. In a singer as in all artists, mere techinal excellence is of secondary value: if nothing is done there is but small interest in noting how skilfully the failure was brought about. It only remains to add that Miss Franklin is careful and painstaking in all that she does. The programme for the next concert is: Symphony No. 6 Tschaikowsky; Concerto for Pianoforte, Henry H. Huss, Rubinstein Ballet music, "Die Rebe"; Overture Benvenuto Cellini," Berlioz.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 23, 1894.

THE NINTH SYMPHONY, ETC.

The ninth Symphony concert might almost have been fitted up with a Christmas tree decoration, for the general range and character of the music was so simple, innocent, free and seasonably placid even in its gayety, that the juvenile audience at those unique concerts for children which Miss Orviss has just been giving might have understood and enjoyed nearly every number on the programme.

The concert was quite short, and yet there were six selections to be played, their composers being two Bachs (father and son), Handel, Haydn, Beethoven and Goetz—all but the last-named being classic, and two being scenes for soprano, undertaken by Miss Gertrude Franklin. In detail, these selections were :—From Philipp Emanuel Bach, his symphony in D major, hardly larger or longer than many an overture of our day, for its three movements, each running directly into the next, present in about a dozen minutes a gayly and keenly counterpointed allegro, a short, persuasively melodic largo, and a stirring presto. All is honest, open and almost ingenuous, betraying its author's kingship and yet giving evidence of independence of thought and incipient emancipation of style. From John Sebastian Bach, the pastoral Shepherd Music from the "Christmas" oratorio, with its calm buoyancy and gently piety of feeling. From Haydn, the favorite symphony in G major, the slow movement of which is a shade or two graver and more severe than one expects from him, but whose bright allegro, solid-footed minuet and happy-hearted final rondo are as characteristic as they are delightful. From Beethoven, the "Fidelio" overture, which, as it was the fourth he wrote for that opera, is but a pale suggestion of the strength and splendor of the three which bear the name he loved for his great work, "Leonora." All this music was excellently directed and admirably played, but one might except that the double-basses were not always so smooth and clear in the Haydn as they ought to have been.

In her concert selections Miss Franklin always respects her art, her self and her audience. For this occasion she chose the "Sweet Bird, from Handel's music to the "Il Pensieroso" of Milton, and the scene of Katherine's repentance and new resolutions from Goetz's "Taming of the Shrew." If in the former a comparison arose between her and Mme. Melba who had recently won a triumph with that air in that same hall, Miss Franklin can blame only herself. Yet she was no great sufferer in such a comparison. Her voice is absolutely limpid, her intonation perfect, her phrasing unimpeachable and her general style has a distinguished fineness. All that could reasonably be said in a comparative comment would be then that Mme. Melba's voice has the greater fulness and that her execution of the more elaborate fioriture had the freedom of spontaneity, while Miss Franklin's showed something of the reserve of the accomplished student and the preparation of the skilful artist. The Goetz scene was skilfully proportioned, and the distinction between its two moods clearly manifested, the singer's beautiful enunciation contributing much to this. Mr. Mole played the flute obbligato to the "Bird" song (which had a charming new cadenza) in his best style.

Next Saturday's programme names: Tschaikowsky's sixth symphony; Rubinstein's "Die Rebe" ballet music; Berlioz's "Benvenuto Cellini" overture, and a concerto for pianoforte, which its composer, Mr. Henry Holden Huss will come from New York to play.

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

American Art Journal.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JAN. 5, 1895.

In the Ninth Symphony Concert it was interesting to hear a symphony so old as that in D, by Philipp Emanuel Bach, who died over a century ago; have that followed by his father's Shepherd Music, from a Christmas oratorio written in 1734; then to hear Haydn's Symphony in G, with its brief movements, reminding you of the sparkling sprays on a holiday tree; and have the concert wind up with Beethoven's Fidelio. Four eighteenth-century compositions. The soloist was Gertrude Franklin, with right noble work in another last century selection, the Sweet Bird, from Handel's Penseroso, her voice finely blending with Mole's flute obligato. Her other number (and very kind it was on the singer's part to let us hear it) was up to date, "My strength is spent," from Taming the Shrew. Though praised as musicianly, the music conveys little of the spirit of Katharine's character or the words, nor does it inspire any special wish to hear the rest of Goetz's opera.

An the Tenth Symphony Concert we enjoyed two decided novelties. One was Tschaikowsky's Pathetic Symphony, whose publication shortly preceded his death in 1893. It is indeed a variation from the stereotyped classic form, beginning and ending adagio, with the allegros between; but it is full of suggestions which might indicate a mind about venturing on the unknown sea.

The other "first time" was the piano concerto in B, by Henry Holden Huss. The composer was himself at the piano. The introduction is disagreeably suggestive of a big doll shouting papa; but when this is over, the brilliancy of the work chains your attention, especially the delicate second movement. The concert ended with Berlioz's Bellini overture.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, DECEMBER 23, 1894.

The Ninth Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The program of the ninth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Paur was as follows:

Symphony in D major.....P. E. Bach
Scena: "Sweet bird, that shun'st the noise of folly," from "L'Allegro, il Penseroso ed il Moderato".....Handel
Flute obligato, Mr. Mole.
Sinfonia, (Shepherds' Music) from the "Christmas Oratorio".....J. S. Bach
Symphony in G major (Breitkopf & Hartel, No. 13; Peters, No. 8).....Hadyn
Scena: "My strength is spent," from "The Taming of the Shrew".....Goetz
Overture to "Fidelio," in E major.....Beethoven

There were brave symphony makers before Haydn. It is easy to say that the fully developed sonata form is not found in their works; but take the symphony of Emanuel Bach played last evening, and how fresh it is, how alive its simple figures. The largo is a movement that might well serve as a prelude to reading Milton, such music as Charles Lamb spoke of, full of solemn, almost unearthly beauty. And then these old symphonies have the great merit of brevity. There is more than an historical interest awakened by hearing these works. It might be well to play once a year a symphony by Sammartini, or Gossec, or Stamitz. The work might show us how easily the audiences before Haydn were amused. Or the hearing might be like unto a walk in an old-fashioned flower garden, with paths trimmed with box, with a quaint, old summer house, with a sun dial bearing a verse that serves as a reminder of death.

In his arrangement of the "Shepherds' Music" Franz tells us how he thinks Bach should have written the instrumental introduction. It is the fashion to set this piece against Handel's pastoral symphony in "The Messiah," to the disadvantage of the latter. Yet are not the strains of Handel more naive, more realistic, more in keeping with "the silly shepherds" who heard the angelic song as they kept their flocks? These shepherds of Bach knew too much about counterpoint.

A symphony by Haydn almost always gives genuine pleasure. The one chosen last evening is familiar, but its jollity, its good nature, its artful simplicity are not stale. It would be an interesting experiment to play it with the orchestra of Haydn's time. The great body of strings in the modern orchestra is surely out of proportion with the number of the other instruments, no matter how discreet the conductor may be. Some have proposed to double the wind instruments, both wood and brass, but would it not be easier to reduce the strings? The symphony, as is true of the other numbers, was well read and finely played.

But this last sentence needs qualifying. In the overture to "Fidelio," there was a lack of precision, and the horn-theme in the main allegro was wobbly. Then, too, the overture—for Beethoven—is pretty poor stuff. In comparison with the great Lenore overtures it sinks into insignificance.

Miss Franklin sang with her usual taste and skill. There is more than this to be said in praise of her. In the air by Handel her display of technique was admirable. Many were the fine points in the detail; witness, for instance, the upward run at the close; the purity of the tones held in friendly rivalry with the flute; the treatment of the cadences, a stumbling block to many excellent singers and players who are at their ease in works of the romantic school. Mr. Molé played the obligato with his customary skill, and sympathetically.

In the scena from "The Taming of the Shrew," Miss Franklin sang with genuine and unexaggerated feeling. The beauty of the music does not rest in the singer's part. Her voice is but one instrument of the orchestra. Goetz, a musician of undoubted talent and more than ordinary promise, took life seriously, even in writing a comic opera. In this scene he is at his best; the opera as a whole suffers from his seriousness, his apparent desire to be intense even when the text calls for light and humorous music. Nor as I remember the opera did he show unmistakably the true dramatic instinct. This scena, fine as it is, might fit a woman of more dreamy, romantic character than Katharine, the repentant shrew. Her regret might well take a lighter tone. Even prophetic mockery might be heard in the orchestra. For who was ever convinced that Petruchio after the curtain falls is sure of a peaceful married life? Nor is he the man to be content with uneventful, sluggish domesticity.

PHILIP HALE.

---

[68]

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, DEC. 23, 1894.

Miss Franklin Soloist at the Symphony Concert.

Last night's symphony concert was attended by an audience unusually large, considering the holiday season. The program was varied, and afforded excellent opportunities for the orchestra's good work. The soloist of the occasion was Miss Gertrude Franklin, and Mr Mole accompanied her with a flute obligato.

The scene from Handel's cantata, L'Allegro, il Penseroso ed il Moderato," beginning with "Sweet bird that shun'st the noise of folly," was sung by Miss Franklin with exquisite grace. Her voice was clear as a lute at times, her trilling was sweet and her phrasing charming. She interpreted the spirit of the music with striking effect, and, while her voice is not susceptible of great strength, it is capable of very delicate modulations. She was enthusiastically applauded at the end of her first song, and Mr Mole shared the applause for his excellent flute playing.

Miss Franklin was not so felicitous in her second song of "My Strength is Spent," from Hermann Goetz's "The Taming of the Shrew." Her voice was clear and the periods rounded, but it lacked dramatic expression and force. She did not elucidate that impassionate feeling which the spirit of the lines required, though she sang it with technical accuracy and good effect.

